Mat. 8. 28. we read, Mat. 8. 28. that Chriſt coming from the other ſide of the Lake of Tiberias, landed in their coaſts: where caſting the Devils out of the poſſeſſed, he permitted them to enter into the herd of Hoggs: in which ſtory, for Gergeſites, or Gergeſins, St. Luke and St. Mark have Gadarens: not as if theſe were all one (for Gergeſſa, or Geraſſa is a diſtinct Town in theſe parts from Gadara) but the bounds being confounded, and the Cities neighbours, either might well be named in this ſtory. This City received many changes and calamities: of which Joſephus hath often mention. For beſides other adventures, it was taken by L. Annius, Lieutenant to Veſpaſian: and 1000 of the ableſt young men put to the ſword, and the City burnt. In the Year 1120. it was rebuilt by Baldwine King of Damaſcus: and in the ſame year recovered by Baldwine de Burgo King of Jeruſalem: and by him utterly razed. Neer unto Geraſa is the Village of Mogedan, or, after the Syriak, Magedu, or, after the Greek, Magdala, where the Phariſees and Sadducees deſired of our Saviour a ſign from Heaven: the ſame place, or ſome adjoyning to it, which St. Mark calleth Dalmanutha. By the circumſtances of which ſtory it appears that this coaſt lay between the Lake of Tiberias and the Country of Decapolis. Brochard makes both theſe places to be one; and finds it to be Phiale, the fountain of Jordan, according to Joſephus: but this Phiale is too far from the Sea of Galilee, and from Bethſaida, to be either Magdala or Dalmanutha. For as it appears by the ſtory, not far hence, towards the North, was the Deſart of Bethſaida, where Chriſt filled 5000 people with the five barley loaves and two fiſhes.

Mark 5. Luke 8. Mark 15. Mark 8. Broch. itin. 2. Of this Phiale ſee in Neph.c. 7. §. 4. ll. 3. Matt. 14. Mark 6. Luke 9. John 6.

On the North of this Bethſaida, they place Julias, not that which was built by Herod, but the other by Philip, which boundeth the Region Trachonitis towards the South. It was ſometime a Village, and not long after the birth of Chriſt, it was compaſſed with a wall by Philip the Tetrarch of Ituræa and Trachonitis: and after the name of Julia, the wife of Tiberias, called Julias, as hath been further ſpoken in the Tribe of Gad: where it was noted that Joſephus makes this Julias to be the ſame as Bethſaida. Upon the Eaſt ſide of the ſame Lake of Tiberias ſtands Corozaim, or Corazim, of which Chriſt in Matthew; Wo be unto thee, Corazim.

Joſeph 18. ant. 3. & alibi.

But the principal City of all theſe in antient time was Aſteroth: ſometime peopled with the Giants Raphaim: and therefore the Countrey adjoyning called the Land of Giants, of whoſe race was Og King of Baſan. In Geneſis this City is called Aſteroth Carnaim, whence 1 Mac. 5. 26. it is called ſimply Carnaim, as Joſ. 13. 21. it is called Aſteroth, without the addition of Carnaim. The word Carnaim ſignifieth a pair of Horns, which agree well with the name of their Idol Aſteroth, which was the image of a ſheep, as it is elſewhere noted, that Aſteroth in Deuteronomy ſignifieth ſheep. Others, from the ambiguity of the Hebrew take Carnaim to have been the name of the people which inhabited this City: and expound it Heroes * radiantes. For of old the Raphæi which inhabited this City (Gen. 14. 5.) were Giant-like men, as appears by comparing the words Deut. 3. 11. Og ex reſiduo gigantum, with the words Joſ. 13. 12. Og ex reliquiis Raphæorum: but if the Carnaim (or Carnajim) were theſe Raphæi, the word would not have been in the dual number: neither would Moſes in the places of Geneſis have ſaid the Raphæi in Aſteroth of the Carnaim, but either the Raphæi in Aſteroth of the Raphæi, or ſome other way fitteſt for perſpicuity: for this naming of both thus in the ſame clauſe, diſtinguiſheth one from the other.

Gen. 14. 5. See chap. 7. §. 3. ll. 2. * Becauſe horn when it is poliſhed, ſhineth: hence it is that the Verb of this Noun is ſometime Lucere: as it were corneum eſſe: whereupon the Vulgar, Exo. 34 19 reading cornutam cornutam, or luciſam faciem, gave occaſion to the fabulous Painters to paint Moſes with Horns. Judith 1. 8. 1 Cant. 5.

Not far from Aſteroth, Adricomius out of Brochard and Breidenbachius placeth Cedar in the way out of Syria into Galilee, four miles from Corazin. This City (ſaith he) is remembred in the Canticles, and in the book of Judith, and there are that of this City understand David in his 120. Pſalm: and here the Sepulchre of Job is yet to be ſeen, ſaith Breidenbach.

in

Now concerning the Texts which he citeth, it is ſo that the Greek hath Galaad in ſtead of the word Cedar, which the Vulgar doth uſe in that place of Judith, and joyneth Camèl and Galilee. The Canticles and the 120. Pſalm do rather prove that Cedar was not hereabout, than any way help Adricomius. For that they ſpeak of Scenitæ Cedareni, it is apparent, and as evident by the place in the Canticles, that they were decolores, much more than any under the Climates of the Land of Canaan: whence Junius out of Lampridius and Pliny placeth them in Arabia Petræa, far from theſe parts. Touching the Sepulchre of Job, it is certain that the Arabians and Saracens (holding thoſe places) feign many things to abuſe the Chriſtians, and to get mony. Further, it may well be affirmed, that many (if not all) the hiſtorical circumſtances of Job are ſo obſcure, that we ſhould rather by finding his Country ſeek to get ſome knowledge of him, than by any preſumptions founded upon him, infer what his Country was, and build unto him a City by conjecture.

* Rup. Lyran. Oleaſt in Gen. Bel. in Cont. lib. 1. de ver. Dei S. Am. ſup. Ep. ad Rom. Aug. de Civit. Dei. l. 18. c. 4. Chryſ. Hom. 2. De patientia Job. Greg. com. in Job.

Of Job himſelf, whether he was the ſame Jobab remembred in the 36. of Geneſis, deſcended from Eſau King alſo of Idumæa, though * Rupertus, Lyranus, Oleaſter, and Bellarmine are of another opinion, yet Saint Ambroſe, Auguſtine, Chryſoſtome, and Gregorie, with Athanaſius, Hippolitus, Irenæus, Euſebius Emiſſenus, Apollinaris, Euſtachius, and other cited by St. Jerom in his 126. Epiſt. to Evagrius, take him for the ſame.

For ευ and αυ are often changed one into the other: whence they uſed Auſitis for Ouſitis, &c. Hence alſo by Junius and others it is called Auſanitis, and ſo as it ſeems they read it in the Septuagint, Jun. in Gen. 10. 23.

The Land of Huts or Hus, wherein Job dwelt, is from the Greek ους, which the Septuagint uſe for the word Hutz, tranſlated by the Vulgar ſometimes Hus, as Job 1. 1. ſometime Auſitis, as Jer. 25. 20. This Land is placed by Junius between Palæſtine and and Cæloſyria, beſides Chamatha (or Hamatha) under Palmyrene, in the Countrey called by Ptolomy Trachonitis, or Bathanæa, the bounds of which Countries are confounded with Baſan in this half Tribe of Manaſſes. And that this Land of Hus was thus ſeated, it may in part be gathered out of the place of Jer. 25. 20. where he reckons the Huſhites among the promiſcuous borders of the Iſraelites, whom he therefore calleth promiſcuous, or miſcellaneam turbam, becauſe their bounds were not only joyned but confounded, and their Seigniories mingled one with the other: but of this place the words of Jeremy, Lam. 4. 21. ſpeaketh of the ſame Prophecy, of which he ſpeaketh in the 25th Chapter, muſt needs be expounded, as Junius reads them, diſtinguiſhing the Land of Hus from Edom: O filia Edomi, O quæ habitas in terra Hutzi; O daughter of Edom, O thou which dwelleſt in the Land of Hus. Now becauſe the Vulgar doth not ſo diſtinguiſh, but readeth, Filia Edom quæ habitas in terra Hus; Daughter of Edom which dwelleſt in the land of Hus: Hence, as it ſeems, ſome of the learned have thought that Job was an Edomite, as we have ſaid, and King of Edom, which if they underſtand by it Idumæa, or Edom, ſo called in Moſes's time, they are greatly miſtaken, making this Land of Hus to be in Idumæa. For it is very probable that Eſau, when he firſt parted from Jacob, did not ſeat himſelf in Edom, or Seir, which lieth on the South border of Judæa, but inhabited Seir far to the Eaſt of Jordan, and held part of thoſe Mountains, otherwiſe called Galaad, and Hermon, which by corruption the Sidonians call Shirion, and the Amorites, Shenir, for Seir; and from this his habitation did Eſau incounter Jacob, when he returned out of Meſopotamia, who paſſed by the very border of Eſau his abiding. It is true, that at ſuch time as Moſes wandered in the Deſarts, that the poſterity of Eſau inhabited Seir to the South of Judæa: for it is like that the Amorites, who had beaten both Ammon and Moab, did alſo drive the Edomites out of thoſe parts, who thence-forwaad ſeated themſelves to the South of Judæa, bordering the Deſart Paran, and ſtretched their habitations over the Deſarts as far as Hor where Aaron died.

Deut. 3. 9.

Now for this Hus, which gave the name to a part of the Land of Trachonitis, whether it were Hus the the ſon of Aram, as Junius thinks in his note upon Gen. 10. 23. or rather Hus the ſon of Nachor, Abrahams brother, the queſtion is doubtful. For my part I rather encline to think, that it was Hus the ſon of Nachor: partly becauſe theſe Families of Aram ſeem long before to have been loſt: and partly becauſe in Job 32. 2. Elihu the fourth of Jobs friends, which ſeems to be of Jobs own Country, is called a Buzite, of Buz the brother of Hus, the ſon of Nachor: as alſo Jer. 25. in the ſame continuation (though ſome other Nations named between) where Hus is ſpoken of, there Buz is alſo named. Neither doth it hinder our conjecture, that in the place of Job. 32. Elihu the Buzite is ſaid to be of the Family of Ram: (which Junius expounds to be as much, as of the Family of Aram) for that by his Aram we are not to underſtand Aram the ſon of Sem, Junius himſelf maketh it plain, both in his annotation upon the beginning of his book, where he ſaith, that one of Jobs friends (which muſt needs be this Elihu) was of the poſterity of Nachor (as alſo in this place he confeſſeth ſo much expreſly) and in as much as he readeth not è Familia Aram, or Ram, but è Familia Syriæ; like as elſe where Laban, who ſprung of Nachor, is called a Syrian.

Whence the Septuagint call him ex regione Auſitide.

As for the other three of Jobs friends (of whom by this note of Elihu his being of the Syrian Family, or of the Family of Nachor) it is implyed that they were of other kindreds, as alſo by the Septuagints addition, that this Elihu was of the Land of Hus, or Auſitis, it is implyed that they thought only Elihu to have been of Jobs own Country.

See Sixtus Senenſis.

Franciſcus Brochard the Monk, in his deſcription of the Holy Land, in the journey from Acon Eaſtward, findeth Suetha, and Theman on the Eaſt of the Sea of Galilee: both very near to the Land Hus, whereof the one may ſeem to have denominated Bildad the Shuchite; the other Eliphaz the Themanite: two of the three friends of Job, of the which Job. 2. 11. But Junius thinks that the Shuchites were inhabitants of Arabia the Deſart, deſcended of Shuach the ſon of Abraham and Ketura: of whom Gen. 25. 2. perhaps, ſaith he, the ſame whom Pliny calls Saccæi. So alſo he thinketh the Themanites, of whom Eliphaz was, to have been of Arabia the Deſart: and Eliphaz himſelf to have been of the poſterity of Theman the ſon of Eliphaz, which was the ſon of Eſau. And ſo alſo Nahamah, whence Tſophar the third of Jobs friends (which in this place of Job. 2. 11. are mentioned) is by the ſame learned Expoſitor, thought either to be named of Thimnah by tranſpoſition of letters (which Thimnah, Gen. 36. 40. is named among the ſons of Eſau, that gave denomination to the places where they were ſeated) or elſe to be the ſame Nahamah, which Joſ. 15. 41. is reckoned for a City of Juda in the border, as he thinks, of Edom. And yet I deny not but that near the Land of Hus, in Baſan, as it ſeems, in the Tribe of Manaſſes, there is a Region which (at leaſt) in later times was called Suitis, or of ſome like name. For this is evident by the Hiſtory of Will. Tyrius, which reports of a Fort in this Region of Suita, or Suites (as he calls it diverſly) of exceeding great ſtrength and uſe for the retaining of the whole Country: which, in the time of Baldwine the ſecond King of Jeruſalem, was with great digging through through rocks recovered by the Christians; having not long before been lost, to the great disadvantage of the Country, while it was in the hands of the Saracens. The situation of this Fort is by Tyrius described to be sixteen miles from the City Tiberias, on the East of Jordan: by Adrichomius four miles Northward from the place where Jordan enters the Lake Tiberias at Corazin.

De bel. ſac. lib. 22. c. 15. and 21

Other Cities of this part of Manasses named in the Scripture, are these: Golan, Beheshthera, Mitspa of Gilead, and Kenath, which after the coming of the Israelites was called Nobach. Of Nobach or Kenath, and Mitspa of Gilead, we have spoken by occasion among the Cities of Gad. The other two were given to the Levites, and Golan made one of the Cities of refuge: from which Golan we have both Gaulanitis superior and inferior, oft in Josephus. Beheshthera is accounted the chief City of Basan by some, but the Writers corrupting the name into Bozra, it is confounded with Betser, or Bozra of Reuben, and with Bozra of Edom. Argob is oft named for a Region in this Tract, and hence Jerom hath Arga, a name of a City placed by some about the waters of Merom (as they are called by Josua) which make the Lake Samachonitis, as Josephus calls it. This Lake, being as it were in the midst between Cæsarea Philippi and Tiberias, through which, as through the Lake of Tiberias, Jordan runneth, boundeth part of this half Tribe on the West. When the snow of Libanus melteth, it is very large, saith Brochard: otherwise more contract, leaving the marish ground on both sides, for Lions and other wilde beasts, which harbour in the shrubs that plentifully grow there.

Jos 21.27. Deut. 4 43

Adjoyning to this Lake in this Country of Manasses, Josephus names two places of strength, fortified by himself in the beginning of the Jews rebellion: Seleucia the one, and Sogane the other. In the North side of this half Tribe of Manasse, and in the North-East, the Scripture nameth divers bordering places towards Damascus, as Tsedad, Chauram, and Chatsar-Henan, lying in a line drawn from the West; of which three Cities we read, Ezek. 47. 15. with which also agrees the place, Num. 34. 8. where for Chauram between Tsedad, and Chatsar-Henan, Ziphron is named. From this Chauram is the name of Auranitis Regio, in Josephus and Tyrius, whose bounds (as also the bounds of Gessur and Mahacath, or Macati, which were likewise borderers to Manasses towards the North-East) are unknown: only that Gessur was of might, it appears in that David married Mahaca the daughter of Thalmay King of Gessur: by whom he had the most beautiful, but wicked and unfortunate Absalom.

The History of the Syrians, the chief Borderers of the Israelites that dwelt on the East of Jordan.

SECT. I.

Of the City of Damascus, and the divers Fortunes thereof.

Damascus of all other in this border, and of that part of the world, was the most famous, excelling in beauty, antiquity, and riches, and was therefore called the City of joy or gladness, and the House of pleasure; and is not only remembred in many places of Scripture, but by the best Historians and Cosmographers. The Hebrews, saith Josephus, think it to have been built by Hus the son of Aram: of which opinion S. Jerom upon Esay seemeth to be: though in his Hebrew questions he affirmeth, that it was founded by Damascus the son of Eliezer, Abraham's Steward; a thing very unlikely, seeing the City was formerly known by that name, as appears by Abraham's calling this his Steward Eliezer of Damasco. David was the first that subjected it to the Kingdom of Juda, after the overthrow of Adadezer their King; but in Solomons time, Rezon recovered it again, though he had no title at all or right to the Principality: but David having overthrown Hadadezer King of Sophena (otherwise Syria Soba, or Zoba) Razon or Rezon, with the remainder of that broken Army, invaded Damascena, and possest Damascus it self, and became an enemy to Solomon all his life.

Joseph. l. 1. c. 14. In Esa. 17. Gen. 15. 2. 1 King. 11. 40.

The next King of Damascus was Adad the Edomite, who flying into Egypt from David and Joab, when they slew all the males in Edom, was there entertained, and married Taphnes the King of Egypts Wives sister: of whom, Taphnes in Egypt was so called. This Adad returning again, became an enemy to Solomon all his life, and (as some Writers affirm) invaded Damascus, and thrust Rezon thence out. In the Line of Adad that Kingdom continued nine descents (as hereafter may be shewed in the Catalogue of those Kings of Syria) to whom the Assyrians, and then the Grecians succeeded. This City was exceeding strong, compassed with waters from the Rivers of Abanah, and Pharpar: whereof one of them, prophane Writers call Chrysorrhoas, the golden River. Junius takes it for Adonis. The Country adjoyning is very fruitful of excellent Wines and Wheats, and all manner of excellent fruits. It had in it a very strong Castle, built as it seems by the Florentines, after it became Christian: the Lillies being found cut in many Marbles in that Citadel. Against this City the Prophets Amos, Esay, Jeremy, and Zacharias, prophesied that it should be taken, burnt, demolished, and made a heap of stones. In the time of the last Rezon, and tenth King of the Damascens, Teglatphalasser, invited by Achaz King of Juda, carried away the Naturals of Damascus into the East: leaving of his own Nation to inhabit it. After that it was utterly ruined by the Babylonians, saith Jerom upon Esay: which thing was performed by Salmanasser, according to Junius in his note upon that place, five years after the Prophecy. In time it was restored by the Macedonians, and the Ptolomies; but long after, when Syria fell into the hands of the Romans, it was taken by Metellus, and Lollius. In the time of the Christians it had an Archbishop: Saint Jerom living, as he affirmeth upon the Acts, it was the Metropolis of the Saracens: being taken by

In the year 1262. Halon the Tartar incompast it, and having formerly taken the King, brought him under the Walls, and threatned extreme torture unto him, except the Citizens rendred the place: but they refusing it, the King was torn asunder before them, and in fine the City taken, Agab the Son of Halon, was by his Father made King thereof.

Hereld bel. sacr 4 c. 14.

In the year 1400. Tamberlain Emperour of the Parthians, invaded that Region, and besieged the City with an Army of 1200000 (if the number be not mistaken.) He entred it, and put all to the sword, filling the Ditch with his prisoners; those that retired into the Castle, which seemed a place impregnable, he overtopped with another Castle adjoyning: he forbore the demolishing of the City, in respect of the beauty of the Church, garnished with forty Gates, or sumptuous Porches. It had within it 9000 Lanterns of Gold and Siver: but while he invaded Egypt, they again surprized Damascus. Lastly, in his return after three Months siege, he forc't it: the Mahometans prostrating themselves with their Priests, desired mercy. But Tamberlain commanding them to enter the Church he burnt them and it, to the number of 30000 and did so demolish it, as those that came afterwards to see their Houses, knew them not by the Foundations. And as a Trophee of his victory, he raised three Towers with great art, builded with the heads of those whom he had slaughtered. After this, it was restored and re-possest by the Soldane of Egypt with a Garrison of Mammalukes: And in the year 1517. Selimus Emperour of the Turks wrested it out of the hands of the Egyptians: in whose possession it now remaineth, inhabited with Mahometans and Christians of all neighbouring Nations.

SECT. II.

Of the first Kings of Damascus, and of the growing up of their power.

NOw be it that Damascus were founded by Hus, the Son of Aram, or by Damascus the Son of Eliezer, Abraham's steward, we find no relation of their Kings, or Common-wealth till Davids time. For it stood without the bounds of Canaan: and therefore neglected by Moses, Josua, and the Judges, as impertinent to that Story. But were it so, that it had some Reguli, or petty Kings over it, as all the Cities of those parts had, yet none of them became famous for ought that is left to writing, till such time as David overthrew Adadezer Prince of Sophena, or Syria Zoba: the same Nation which Pliny calleth Nubei, inhabiting between Batania and Euphrates. Now the better to understand the story of those Syrian Princes, whom soon after the Kings of Damascus made their Vassals, the Reader may inform himself, That on the North-East parts of the Holy Land, there were three chief Principalities, whereof the Kings or Commanders greatly vexed or disturbed the State or Common-wealth of Israel, namely, Damascus, or Aram, Sophena, or Syria Zoba, and Chamath, or Chamath Zoba; of which these were the Princes in David's and Solomon's times: Razon, or Rezon of Damascus, Adadezer of Syria Zoba, and Tohu of Chamath. But it seemeth, that Damascus was one of the Cities subject to Adadezer when David invaded him, though when Saul made war against Zoba, Damascus was not named. And as Josephus affirmeth, the leaders of those succours, which were levied and sent to Hadad-Hezer from Damascus, had the name of Adad: who was in that battel slain with 22000 Aramites of Damascus: whereof, as of the overthrow of Adadezer, Rezon the Commander of his Army, taking advantage, made himself King of Damascus: Adadezer, and Adad of Damascus, being both slain. About the same time Tohu King of Chamath, or Iturea, hearing that his neighbour and enemy Adadezer was utterly overthrown, sendeth for peace to David, and presenteth him with rich gifts: but in dolo, saith St. Hierome; it was craftily done of him. Now to the North of the Holy Land, and to the West of Damascus, the Tyrians and Zidonians inhabited: but they for the most part were in league and peace with the Judæans and the Israelites. But to return to the Kings of Syria, I mean of Syria as it is taken in the Scriptures, containing Damascena, Soba or Zoba, and Chamath, or Iturea; to which I may add Geshur, because it is so accounted in the second of Sam. 15. as joyning in the Territory to Damascus (for Syria at large is far greater, of which Palæstina it self is but a Province, as I have noted in the beginning of this Tract:) It is not agreed among the Historians of former times, nor of our later Writers who was the first of those Adads of Syria Zoba, and Damascus:

1 Kings 11.

Some account Rezon, others Adad of Idumæa: of whom it is written in the first of Kings, that David having invaded that Region, and left Joab there to destroy all the male Children thereof: Adad of the Kings seed, fled into Egypt; and was there married to Taphnes the Queens Sister, as before; who hearing of David's death, and of the death of his Captain Joab (whom indeed all the bordering Nations feared) he turned again: and, as Bunting thinketh, this Adad did expel Rezon out of Damascus, and was the first of the Syrian Kings. To me it seemeth otherwise. For, as I take it, Adadezer, the Son of Rehob, whom Saul invaded, was the Founder of that Principality: and the first of Adads who forsaking his Fathers name, as he grew powerful, took upon him the stile of Adad, the great God of the Assyrians, saith Macrobius, which signified Oneness of Unity. I also find a City called Adada, in the same part of Syria: of which whether these Princes took the name, or gave it, I am ignorant. For Adad-ezer, Ben-hadad, El-adad were the same in name, with the differences of Ezer, Ben, and Eli adjoyned. And that Adadezer was of greatest power, it appeareth first, because it is against him, that David undertook the war: Secondly, because he levied 22000 Aramites out of the Territory of Damascus: as out of his proper Dominions: for had the Damascens had a King apart, it is probable that the Scriptures would have given us his name: Thirdly, because Syria Zoba, of the most of which Adadezer was King, was an exceeding large Territory, and contained of Arabia the Desart, as far as to Euphrates, according to Pliny: and the greatest part of Arabia Petræa, according to Niger. Whosoever was the first, whether Adadezer, or Adad of Idumæa, Rezon, was the second: Who was an enemy to Israel all the days of Solomon. Besides the evil that Adad did, seemeth to be referred to Hadad of Idumæa, lately returned out of Egypt: to wit, 23 Years after he was carried thither.

The

The third King of Damascus, and of Zobah both, was Hezion; to Hezion succeeded Tabremmum, or Tabrimmum; to him Benhadad, as is proved in the first of Kings: For Asa King of Juda the Son of Abiam, the Son of Roboam, the Son of Solomon, being vexed and invaded by Baasha, the successour of Nadab, the Son of Jeroboam, sent to Benhadab the Son of Tabrimmon, the Son of Hezion, King of Aram, that dwelt at Damascus, to invade Israel (while Baasha sought to fortifie Rama against Asa: thereby to block him up, that he should not enter into any of the territories of Israel) who according to the desire of Asa, having received his presents, willingly invaded the Countrey of Nepthalim, and took divers Cities, and spoils thence: Asa in the mean while carrying away all the Materials, which Baasha had brought to fortifie Rama withal, and converted them to his own use.

1 Kings 15. 18.

This Benhadads Father, Tabremmon, was in league with Asa: and so was his Father Hezion: for Asa requireth the continuance of that friendship from Benhadad, his Son: though it seemeth that the Gold and Silver sent him out of the Temple, was the most forcible argument. And that this Tabremmon invaded Israel, before the enterprize of his Son Benhadad, it is conjectured. For Benhadad when he was prisoner with Achab, spake as followeth: The Cities which my Father took from thy Father, I will restore, and thou shalt, make Streets or Keepers of the borders for thee in Damascus, as my Father did in Samaria. And herein there ariseth a great doubt (if the argument it self were of much importance) because Tabremmon was Father indeed to Benhadad, which invaded Baasha, at the request of Asa: But this Benhadad that twice entred upon Achab, and was the second time taken prisoner, was rather the Son of Benhadad, the first of that name, the confederate of Asa and Abiam, as before, than the Son of Tabremmon. For between the invasion of Benhadad the first, in Baasha's time, and the siege of Samaria, and the overthrow of Benhadad by Achab, there past 49 years, as may be gathered out of the reigns of the Kings of Israel. So that if we allow 30 years of age to Benhadad, when he invaded Baasha, and after that 49 years ere he was taken by Achab, which make eighty, lacking one, it is unlikely that Benhadad at such an age should make War. Besides all this, the first Benhadad came with no such pomp; but the second Benhadad vaunteth, that he was followed with 32 Kings: and therefore I resolve, that Benhadad the Son of Tabremmon invaded Baasha and Omri; and Benhadad the second invaded Achab, at whose hands this Benhadad received two notorious overthrows: the first at Samaria, by a sally of 700 Israelites: the second at Aphec, where with the like number in effect, the Israelites slaughtered 200000 of the Aramites; besides 27000 which were crush't by the fall of the wall of Aphec. And this Benhadad, Achab again setteth at liberty: to whom he rendreth those Towns that his Father had taken from the Predecessour of Achab, but being returned, he refused to render Ramoth Gilead, a frontier Town, and of great importance. Now three years after (for so long the league lasted) Ramoth not being delivered, Achab invaded Gilead, and besieged the City, being assisted by Josaphat. The Aramites came to succour and fight: in which Achab is wounded, and dieth that night. After this, Benhadad sendeth the Commander of his forces, called Naaman, to Joram the son of Achab to be healed of the leprosie, and though Elizeus had healed him, yet he picked a quarrel against Joram: and when Joram, by Elizeus his intelligence had escaped his plot, he sent Men and Chariots to take the Prophet, as is aforesaid. After Benhadad besieged Samaria again, and being terrified thence from Heaven he departed home, and sickneth, and sendeth Azael with great gifts to Elizeus, to know his estate, if he might live. Azael returning, smothereth him. Zonaras and Cedrenus call this Benhadad Adar, and the Son of Adar: Amos and Jeremy mention the Towers of Benhadad. Josephus writeth that Benhadad and his successour Azael were worshipped for Gods by the Syrians to his time, for the sumptuous Temples which they built in Damascus. The Syrians also boasted much of their antiquity, ignorant, saith he, that scarce yet 1100 years are compleat since their wars with the Israelites.

Hazael or Azael, the first King of the race of the Adads of Damascus, was anointed by Elisha, or Elizeus, when he was sent by Benhadad to the Prophet, to know whether Benhadad should recover his present sickness: He waged War with Joram, who received divers wounds at the encounter of Ramoth in Gilead: from whence returning to be cured at Jesrel, he and the King of Juda, Ahaziah or Ochozias, are slain by Jehu, as before is said. After the death of Joram, Azael continued War against Jehu, and wasted Gilead, and all those portions of Gad, Reuben, and Manasse, over Jordan. He then invaded Juda, and took Gath; but by gifts from Joas he was averted from attempting Jerusalem: for he presented him all the hollowed things which Jehosophat, Jehoram, and Ahaziah his Fathers, Kings of Juda, had dedicated, and which he himself had dedicated; and all the Gold which was found in the treasures of the Lord and in the Kings house. This was the second time that the Temple was spoiled to please the Adads of Damascus. For Asa did present Benhadad with those treasures, when he invited him to War upon Baasha King of Israel. And notwithstanding this composition between Joas and Azael, yet a part of his Army spoiled the other Provinces of Judæa, and slaughtered many principal persons. Lastly, Azael vexed Joahaz the Son of Jehu, and brought him to that extremity, as he left him but fifty Horse-Men, ten Chariots, and ten thousand Foot-men, of all his people.

SECT. III.

Of the later Kings, and decay and overthrow of their power.

After Hazael, Benhadad the second, or rather the third of that name, the Son of Hazael reigned in Damascus: who fought against Israel with ill success: for Joas King of Israel, the Son of the unhappy Joachaz, as he was foretold by Elisha the Prophet, beat Benhadad in three several battels: and he lost all those Cities to Israel, which his Father Hazael had taken violently from Joachaz,

2 Reg. 13. Jos. ant. c. 9.

After this Benhadad the Son of Hazael, there succeeded three others by the same name, of whom the Stories are lost, only Nicholaus Damascenus cited by Josephus, makes mention of them: and in one of these Kings times it was that Jeroboam the second, the Son of Joas recovered Damascus it self to Juda, saith the Geneva, but better in Junius, Utque recuperabat Damascum, & Chamatham Judææ pro Israele; that is, And how he recovered for Israel, Damascus and Chamatha of Judæa; for these Cities sometimes conquered by David, did of right belong to the Tribe of Juda.

Jos. ant. l. 7. c. 6.

1 Kin. 14. 28.

And it is likely, that this conquest upon the Adads was performed: the first of these three Adads then living, of whom there is no Story. For when as Jehoas the King of the ten Tribes had thrice overcome the Syrians in the time of Benhadad the Son of Hazael had won from Israel; and so left his Kingdom to his Son Jeroboam the second; it seemeth that this Jeroboam without delay, and having nothing else left for him to enterprize, instantly followed his Fathers good Fortune, and invaded Damascus.

Razin, or Rezin, after Josephus, Rases; after Zonaras, Raason, the tenth Adad, making league with Pekah, or Phacas King of Israel, against Achaz King of Juda, both carry away a great number of prisoners. After this they both besiege Achaz in Jerusalem: but in vain. Then Adad alone invadeth Elath, and beating out the Jews, maketh it a Colony of Syrians. Wherefore Achab brought Teglatphalasser against Razin, who took him and beheaded him, and won Damascus: with whom ended the line of the Adads, and the Kingdom of Damascus: the Assyrians becoming masters both of that and Israel. These Adads, as they reigned in order are thus reckoned:

2 Kin. 16. 5. 5. Esay 7. Joseph. ant. l. 9. c. 11.

1 Adadezor the Son of Rehob.
2 Rezin the Son of Eliadad, or Razin.
3 Hezion.
4 Tabremmon.
5 Benhadad, who invaded Baasha.
6 Benhadad the second, taken prisoner by Achab.
7 Hazael, whom Elisha foretold with tears, of his advancement; the same who overthrew Joram King of Israel at Ramoth Gilead. And that there was a second Hazael which preceded Benhadad the third, it is not improbable, because that Hazael which took Geth, and compounded the War with Joas, made the Expedition thirty years, and perchance more, after the first Hazael which stifled his master Benhadad, and had slain Joram the Son of Achab King of Israel. For Joas began to reign in the seventh year of Jehu King of Israel; and after he had reigned twenty three years, the Temple was not yet repaired, after which (and how long we know not) it is said that Hazael, took Geth, and turned his Face towards Jerusalem. It is also some proof that Hazael, that took Geth, was not the same with Hazael that murdered Benhadad, because he could not at that time be of good years, being as it seemeth, the second person in the Kingdom, and Commander of Benhadads Men of War. To this Hazael (be he the first or second) succeeded.
8 Benhadad, the third, whom Joash King of Israel thrice overthrew.
9 Resin, or Rezin, the last, who joyned with Pekah King of Israel, against Juda, at which time Achaz King of Juda, waged for his defence Teglatphalasser.

Now betwen Benhadad the third and Rezin the last, Nicolaus Damascenus finds three other Kings of the Adads, which make twelve in all.

For the rest of the Princes of Syria, which were but Reguli, as those of Emath, and Gessur, we find that Tobu was King of Emath, or Camath, in Davids time, to whom he sent his Son Joram with presents, after Davids victory against Adadezer. Also Senacherib speaketh of a King of Emath, but names him not.

2 Sam. 8. 9. Esay 37.

II. IV.

Of Other lesser Kingdoms of the Syrians, which being brought under the Assyrians, never recovered themselves again.

OF Gessur we find two Kings named; to wit, Talmai, and his Father Ammihur: to Talmai, whose Daughter David married, it was, that Absalom fled, who was his maternal Grandfather. Of the Kings of Sephena, of Syria, Soba, or Cœlosyria, there are two named, Rehob, or Rechob, the Father of Adadezer, and Adadezer himself; and it is plain that after his death the seat of the Kings of Soba was transferred to Damascus, a City better fitting their greatness. After, Rezin became Lord of both Principalities. And the race of these Kings of Syria (which became so potent, and joyned Soba, Damascus, Emath, and the Desart of Arabia, with other Provinces into one, under Rezin the second of the Adads) as it began with David, so it ended at once with the Kingdom of Israel. For Ahaz King of Juda waged the Assyrian Teglatphalasser against Pekah King of Israel, and against Rezin the last King of Damascus: which Teglath first invaded Damscena, and the Region of Soba, and took Damscus it self, and did put to death Rezin the last, carrying the Inhabitants captive. This was the second time that the Assyrians attempted Israel. For first Phul Belochus entred the borders thereof (Menahem governing Israel) who stopt the enterprise of Phul with a thousand talents of Silver: for this Phul Belochus, whose pedigree we will examine hereafter, being scarce warm, as yet, in his seat at Babylon, which he, with the help of his companion Arbaces, had wrested from Sardanapalus: having besides this King of Syria in his way, who seemed to be a great and strong Prince, was content to take the composition of a thousand talents of the King of Israel for that present time. But his Son Teglath following the purpose of his Father Belochus, and finding so excellent an occasion, as the War begun between Israel and Juda, Pekah commanding in the one, and Achaz in the other, his neighbour Rezin being also wrapt in that War, and wasted in strength thereby, did willingly accept the offer of Achaz King of Juda, his impress and entertainment. So, first attempting Damascus, which lay in his path towards Israel, he carried it (as is before remembred) and then with great ease possest himself of the Cities of Nephtalim; leading with him a great part of the people captive. And his Son Salmanasser, whom Ptolemy called Nabonasser, after the revolt of Hosea, forced Samaria, and rent that Kingdom asunder. So as the line and race of Ninus in Sardanapalus, whom Belochus supplanted, the race and Monarchy of the Syrian Adads in Rezin, whom Teglath slaughtered; the Kingdom of Israel in Hosea, whom Salmanasser overturned, happened near about a time: that of Ninus in the days of Belochus, and the other two in the days of Teglatphalasser, and Salmanasser his Son. For Sardanapalus perished, Osia ruling Juda; and the other two Kingdoms were dissolved, Achaz yet living.

Lastly, the Kingdom of Juda it self, being attempted by Senacherib, the Son of Salmanasser, in vain, and and preserved for the time by God miraculously, was at length utterly overturned. Jerusalem and the Temple burnt 132 years after the captivity of Israel and Samaria: the destruction of Israel being in the ninth year of Hosea: that of Juda in the eleventh of Zedechia. Now the Emperours of Assyria and and Babylon held also the Kingdom of Syria, from the eighth year of Salmanasser; to the last of Baltasser, whom Herodotus calleth Labynitus: in all about 200 years. After these the Persians from Cyrus to Darius their last King, held Syria, about 220 years.

Then Alexander Macedon took this among other Provinces of the Persian Empire, and his successors the Seleucidæ reigned therein, till it became subject unto the power of the Romans, from whom it was wrested long after by the Saracens, and remaineth now in possession of the Turk, as shall be shewed in due place. Thus much of the Nations bordering upon the Israelites, with whom they had most to do, both in War and Peace, being the onely people, whose History in those antient times carried an assured face of Truth.

CHAP. XII.

Of the Tribe of Benjamin, and of Jerusalem.

SECT. I.

Of divers memorable places in the Tribe of Benjamin, whereof Jericho, Gilgal, Mitspa, Bethel, Rama, Gobah, and Gibba.

OF the Tribe of Benjamin, the twelfth and youngest Son of Jacob, whom he had by Rachel, there were mustered at Mount Sina 35000 able bodies: all which perishing in the Desarts, there entred the Holy Land of their issues 45600 fit to bear Arms: and these had their Territory on this side Jordan, between Juda and Ephraim: The Cities within this Tribe neareſt Jordan, are Lod, Hadid, and Ono: of which, Lod and Ono were built by Shemed a Benjamite: they were all three re-inhabited with Benjamites, after the return out of Captivity, as is mentioned Nehem. 11.35. and Esd. 2. 35. where Adrichomius reading Lod, Hadid, Ono, makes besides Hadid in Nebemia, a City called Lodhadid: This Hadid or Chadid was rebuilt by Simon Macchabæus.

1 Chron. 8. 12.

Mac. 12.38.

Samarim, or Tsemaraim, named of Tsemary one of the Sons of Canaan, was another of their Cities: and further into the Land standeth Jericho, one of the Toparchies and the last of Juda, seated in a most fruitful Valley adorned with many Palm-trees: and therefore elsewhere called the City of Palms. From the time of Josua, who utterly destroyed it, it lay waste until the time of Achad: in whose days Chiel of Bethel laid the new foundation of it, in the loss of Abiram his eldest Son, and built the gates of it in the loss of his youngest Son Segub: according to the curse of Josua: in which and other respects, Hos 12.14. calleth Josua a Prophet. In aftertimes it was destroyed by Vespasian, and rebuilt by Adrian.

1 Kin. 16. 34. Jos. 6. 29.

* 1 Chr. 6. 60. This Halmon is called Halemeth, whence they make a new City Almath, as if this Tribe had given five Cities to the Levites.

To the South-east of Jericho stood * Halmon of the Levites, of which Jos. 21. 18. To the South, Betharaba, of which Jos. 21. 18. Then that Gilgal of which there is so much mention in the Scripture, where Josua first eate of the fruits of the land, circumcised all those born in the Desarts and celebrated the Passover.

The reason of the name, or rather a memorable application of the Etymology of this name (for it seems by the place, Deut. 11.30. that the name was known before the coming of the Israelites into Canaan) is noted Jos. 5.9. Ob devolutionem probri Ægyptiaci, because their fore-skins (the people being there circumcised) were tumbled down the Hill: which from thence was called Collis præputiorum. This Gilgal was also called Geliloth, as appears by comparing the places, Jos. 15. 7. and 18. 17. for it was in the borders of Jordan, of which Jos. 22. 13. and Geliloth signifieth borders. It stood (though in some distance) directly Eastward, over against the two Hills Garazim and Hebal: upon the one of which the blessings, and on the other the cursings were to be read to the people, both being the Mountains of Ephraim. Further, for the situation of this Gilgal, it is to be noted, that both it, and Mitspa of Benjamin (of which also we read oft in the Scripture) were seated about the midst of the length of the Land of Canaan: for which reason † Samuel chose these two places, to either of which he came yearly to give judgment to the Israelites; of which two, Gilgal (as is said) was near Jordan on the East side of this Tribe and Mitspa, near the West Sea, towards the land of the Philistims.

Deut. 11. 30.

† 1 Sam. 7. 15.

The third place, which is named with these two, whither also Samuel used yearly to come, is ‖ Bethel: which also was seated in this Tribe of Benjamin. But to return to Gilgal, which was the first place where the Ark resided, after they past over Jordan (from whence it was carried to Silo, and thence to Kiriath-Jeharim, and at length to Jerusalem) here in Gilgal it was, that Josua pitched up the 12 Stones, which were taken out of the Channel of Jordan, when it was dry, that the Israelites might pass over it: by which Story, as it is set down Jos. 4. it appears, that the same day that they passed over Jordan, they lodged at Gilgal. At the same Gilgal, to omit many other memorable things, it was, that Samuel hewed Agag the King of the Amalekites in pieces. And as for Mitspa, whither Samuel came yearly to give judgment, there also were often the greatest meetings held: as that for the revenge of the Levites Wife against Gibba, and the Benjamites, Jos. 20. 1. and another against the Philistims, 1 Sam. 7. 12. Thither also Judas Macchabæus gathered the Jews (when Jerusalem was possest by the Heathen) as it is 1 Mac. 3. 47. in which place this reason of their meeting is added; Quia locus orationi fuerat Mitspæ anteà Israeli. Touching this Mitspa, to avoid confusion, it is to be remembred, that the Scriptures mention four places of this name: Mitspa of Juda, of which neither is it easie to expound Bethel otherwise than for the City Bethel. though Junius also takes it for the place where the Ark was, 1 Sam. 10. 3.

‖ Junius in this place, for Bethel reads Domum Dei fortis, and interprets it, Kireath-jeharim, where the Ark abode. For (saith he) by the Law, Exo. 23. 17. the greatest meetings in their annual feasts were to be, where the Ark was, but this place doth not speak of festival, but of judicial meetings: and besides the Priests did use to bring the Ark to their great meetings, wheresoever they were, as appears 1 Sam. 12: 11. & 14. 18.

Jos.

Jos. 15. 38. * Mitspa of Gilead, of which we have spoken already in the Tribe of Gad. Mitspa of the Moabites, where David for a while held himself, commending his Parents to the King of Moab, 1 Sam. 22. 3. and lastly, this chief Mitspa of the Benjamites. And as in this place the chief meetings were held both before Jerusalem was recovered from the Jebusites, and also in the time of the Macchabees (as we have said) when Jerusalem was held by the wicked under Antiochus, so also in the time of Jeremy, after the destruction of the Temple by the Chaldees, Gedaliah, whom Nabuchodonosor left in Jewry, as Governour over those that were left in the land, held his abiding in this place: until (to the great hurt of the Jews) he was slain by the treason of Ishmael, one of the royal blood of Juda, as it is Jer. 41.

* It was no other than this Mitspa of Gilead, of which Jos. 11. 8. as appears by that which is added, Versus orientem, for Josua notes the three quarters, North, West, and East, to which he followed the Canaanites, though Adrichomius and others, out of this place, imagine a Mitspa or Mispha (as they write it) in the Tribe of Asser.

Neer unto this Mitspa, the Scripture mentioneth Bethcar, after called Aben-Hezer, that is, the Stone of help: where Samuel pitched up the pillar or Stone, for a Trophy against the Philistims.

Touching Bethel, which (as it seems) was the third place where Samuel held his chief meetings for the ministring of Justice, that it was antiently called Luz, and how it was taken by the issue of Joseph (though it belonged to the portion of Benjamin, as it is Neh. 11. 31. and Jos. 18. 22.) and how another City called Luz † near adjoyning to it, was built by the man of the City which shewed the entrance to the Spies, as it is Jud. 1. and of the occasion of the name from Jacob's vision: and how Jeroboam, by erecting one of his calves here, of Bethel (which signifieth the house of God) made it * Bethaven, that is, the house of Vanity, Hos. 4. 15. and 10. 5. as also other memorable things of this place, they are so well known out of the Histories of the Scripture, that we may well pass them over.

* Borrowing the name of a neighbour town in the confines of the Kingdom of Juda and Israel between Hai and Bethel, Jos. 7. 2. and 18. 12.

The Territory of Bethel, which at the first belonged to the Kingdom of the ten Tribes, from the time of the great victory of Abia against Jeroboam, of which 2 Chron. 13. was taken from them, and adjoyned to the Kingdom of Juda: and so it continued, as appears by the Story of Josias: which performed the Prophecies against the altar of Bethel, 2 Reg. 23. whence those coasts 1 Macc. 11. 34. are called Apherema, which Greek word signifieth as much as, A thing taken away, to wit, from the ten Tribes. It was one of the three Seigniories, or Præfectures which Demetrius in his Epistle mentioneth, as added by him to the Ditton of the Jews, out of the Samaritan Country. A part of it, as appears 2 Chron. 13. 19. was Hephravin, which Jos. 18. 23. is called Hophram, belonging to this Tribe of Benjamin.

Not far from this Bethel, in this Tribe, we find three other Cities, often mentioned in the Scriptures, Rama, Gidha, and Geba. Of the name Rama, * it is noted already, in the description of Ephraim, that there were many Towns so called, because of their high situation. But whereas they find out Rama in the Tribe of Juda (as it seems, because Matt. 2. it appears that it bordered Bethlehem) and also out of Brochard and Breidenbach make Silo to have been called Rama, and find yet another Rama in Zabulon; these three have no warrant in the Scripture. Of Rama in the Tribe of Asser, as it seems, we have testimony, Jos. 19. 29. and of another in Nephtalim, Jos. 19. 36. of a third Rama, where Samuel dwelt in Mount Ephraim, 1 Sam. 25. 1. which, more often is called * Ramatha, and 1 Sam. 1. 1. Ramathaim Tsophim: for which the Septuagint have Aramathaim-Sophim, taking the Article affixed in the beginning, for a part of the word, whence they think Joseph of Aramathæa, Matt. 27. 57. was denominated.

* See c. 9. §. 1.

* Of this Ramatha I understand the place. 1 Mac. 11. 34. where it is named for one of the three Præfectures which Demetrius yeilded to the Jews out of the country of Samaria: this lying toward the East to Jericho, and Lydda toward the West, and Apherema (of which even now we spake) lying in the middest between the two other. A sixth it seems there was in the Tribe of Simeon toward the South, which Josh. 19. 8. is called Rama of the South, and otherwise Baalath-beer.

Of a fourth Rama we read, 2 Reg. 8. 29. which is Ramoth in Gilead. The first, which is most often mentioned, is Rama of Benjamin, seated, as we said, near Bethel the uttermost South-border of the Kingdom of the ten Tribes: for which cause Baasha in the time of Asa King of Juda, fortified it, to hinder those that did fly from him to Asa. Of this Rama, or Ramatha, I should rather think Joseph was, that buried Christ: because it was nearer to Jerusalem, and after the Captivity belonged to Judæa, as it appears, Esd. 2. 26. wherein that it is joyned with Geba, it is plain that he speaketh of that Rama with whose stones (after Baasha had ceased to build it) Asa (as it is 1 Reg. 25. 22.) built Gebah adjoyning to it: both being in Benjamin. And as Rama was the South border of the ten Tribes, so was Gebah the North-border of the Kingdom of Juda: whence 2 Reg. 23. 8. we read that Josiah through all his Kingdom, even from Gebah, which was the North-border, to Beer-sheba, which was the South-border, destroyed the places of Idolatry.

The third City Gibha, which was the City of Saul (the wickedness of which City in the time of the Judges had almost utterly rooted out this Tribe) Adrichomius confounds with Gebah, making one of two (as they are evidently distinguished, Esa. 10. 27.) of which word * Gibha, in another from Gibbath, he imagineth Gibbaath, another City in this Tribe, making two of one. The vicinity of this City also to Rama of Benjamin appears, Jud. 19. 13. where the Levite with his Wife, not able to reach to Rama, took up his lodging at Gibha. By that place of 1 Sam. 22. 6. it seems that there was in this Gibha some Tower or Cittadel called Rama: where Junius reads in excelso, for in Rama: but it may be that the name of the Kings Palace in this City, was Rama: as it seems that in Rama of Samuel, the name of the chief place where Samuel with the Colledge of Prophets abode, was Najoth. The great City of Hai overthrown by Josua, which Jos. 7. 2. is placed neer Beth-aven, upon the East of Bethel, was in this Tribe, as is proved, Neh. 7. 10. 30. though it be not named by Jos. c. 18. for it was burned by him and laid desolate, as it is Jos. 8, 28. In solitudinem, in tumulum perpetuum. Another City of chief note is reckoned Jos. 18. 25. In this Tribe was Gibbon, the chief City of the Hevites: whose cunning to bind the Israelites by oath to save their lives, is set down, Jos. 9. whence they were reckoned among the * Nethinæi, or Proselytes, and were bound to certain publick services in the house of God: which oath of saving these Gibeonites, broken in part after by Saul, was by God punished by a famine, 2 Sam. 21. 1. This Gibeon, or Gibbon with Almon and Jebah (of both which we have spoken) and with Hanothoth, the natal place of Jeremy the Prophet, were said Jos. 21. 28. to be given to the Levites by the Benjamites. Near to this Hanothoth was Nob, as appears, 1 Reg. 2. 26. where Abiathar the Priest, which was of Nob, before it was destroyed by Saul, is sent to his grounds at Hanothoth. It is reckned in the Tribe of Benjamin, Neh. 9. 31. and though in the time of Saul the residing place of the Ark was at Kireath-

* Gibha in construction, that is, Governing a genitive case, is Gibbath: whence the Vulgar out of the Septuagint read Jos. 24. 33. Gibbath Phinees: for which Junius hath Collis Phineasi (for this word is oft-times an Appellative, signifying a Hill) but Adrichomius taking notice of this, builds his City Gabaath upon this Text, and placeth it in Benjamin, when as the words adjoyned, note that this Hill was in the Mountains of Ephraim.

* The word Nethinim, or Nethinæi, is as much as dati (as it were à Deo dati) or as Junius expounds it, deditiii: it is used 1 Chr. 9. 2. and in Esdras and Nehemias often.

Kireath-jeharim: yet by the lamentable tragedy of bloud-shed, which Saul raised in this place (as it is set down 1 Sam. 21, and 22.) in the judgement of Junius, it is proved that the Tabernacle was there for a time.

Micmas also in this Tribe, Nehem. 9. 31. was a place of fame, of which Esay. 10. 28. where also he nameth Gallim, and Migron in this Tribe. In Micmas, Saul had his Camp, 1 Sam. 13. 2. (when he left Gibha to Jonathan) and there also was Jonathan Maccabæus his abode, 1 Macc. 9. 73. Of Giscala in Galilee, Josephus makes often mention, but of any here in Benjamin, which they make the natal place of St. Paul, whence (they say) when it was taken by the Romans, he sailed with his parents to Tharsis, of this I find no good warrant. Other places of less importance I omit, and come to the City of Jerusalem, and the Princes and Governours of this City: A great part whereof was in the Tribe of Benjamin, whence Jos. 18. 28. it is named among the Cities of Benjamin.

SECT. II.

Of divers memorable things concerning Jerusalem.

AT what time Jerusalem was built (which afterward became the Princes of all Cities) it doth not appear. Some there are who imagine that Melchisedec was the Founder thereof in Abraham's time. But, * according to others, that City out of which Melchisedec encountred Abraham (in his return from the overthrow of the Assyrian and Persian Kings or Captains, when Lot was made prisoner) standeth by the River of Jordan, in the half Tribe of Manasse bordering Zabulon, which was also called Salem, and and by the Greeks Solima.

* See in the hither halt of Manasse.

Jerusalem (whensoever, or by whomsoever built) was a principal City in Josua his time: yet not so renowned as Hazor the Metropolis (in those days and before) of all the Canaanites. Adonizedek (whom Josua slew) was then King of Jerusalem. That it was belonging to the Jebusites it is manifest: for how long soever they held it before Moses's time, they were Masters and Lords thereof almost 400 years after him: even till David won it: and therefore in all likelihood, it was by the Jebusei (the children of Jebusæus the son of Canaan) built; after whom it was called Jebus. And so much did that Nation rely on the strength of the place, as when David attempted it, they bragged that their lame, and blind, and impotent people should defend it.

2 Sam. 5. 6.

David, after he had by Gods assistance possest it, and turned out the Jebusites, gave it an exceeding great increase of circuit; strengthened it with a Citadel or Castle: and beautified it with many Palaces, and other buildings: changing the name from Jebus-salem, the City of the Jebusites, to Jerusalem, which the Greeks call Hierosolima. After David's time Solomon amplified, beautified and strengthened it exceedingly. For besides the work of the Temple, which was no less admirable than renowned among all Nations, the Palaces, Gates, and Walls, could not any where in the world be exampled: and besides, that it had 150000 Inhabitants, the women and children not accounted. The ditch had 60 foot depth, cut out of the very rock: and 250 foot of breadth: whereof the like hath seldom been heard of, either since or before.

Jos. cont. Ap. l. 1. Strab. geog. l. 16.

After the death of Solomon, and that the Kingdom of the Jews was cut asunder, Shishak King of Egypt, and his Predecessor, having bred up for that purpose Adad the Idumæan, and Jeroboam Solomon's servant; and both married to Egyptians: the State by the one disturbed, by the other broken: Shishak first invaded the Territory of Juda, entred Jerusalem, and sack't it, and became Master not only of the riches of Solomon, but of all those spoils which David had gotten from Adadezer, Tohu, the Ammonites, and other Nations. It was again sack't, and a part of the wall thrown down by Joas King of Israel; while Amasia the twelfth King thereof governed Juda.

2 King. 16

Not long after, Achas the fifteenth King of Juda impoverished the Temple, and presented Teglatphalasser with the treasures thereof. And Manasses the son of Ezekiah, the son of Achaz, by the vaunts made by Ezekiah, to the Embassadors of Merodach, lost the remain, and the very bottom of their treasures. It was again spoiled by the Babylonians, Joakim then reigning. But this ungrateful, Idolatrous and rebellious Nation, taking no warning by these Gods gentle corrections and afflictions, but persisting in all kind of impiety, filling the City even to the mouth with innocent bloud, God raised up that great Babylonian King Nebuchodonosor, as his scourge and revenger, who making this glorious City and Temple, with all the Palaces therein, and the Walls and Towers, which embraced them, even and level with the dust, carried away the spoils with the Princes and people, and crusht them with the heavy yoke of bondage and servitude full seventy years, insomuch as Sion was not only become as a torn plowed-up field, Jerusalem an heap of stones, and rubble, the Mountain of the Temple as a grove, or wood of thorns and briars, but (as Jerom speaketh) even the birds of the Air scorned to fly over it, or the beasts to tread on that defiled soil.

Then 70 years being expired, according to the Prophecy of Daniel, and the Jews by the grace of Cyrus returned: the Temple was again built, though with interruption and difficulty enough: and the City meanly inhabited, and without Walls or other defences, for some 60 and odd years, till Nehemia by the favour of Artaxerxes re-built them. Then again was the Temple and City spoiled by Bagoses, or Vagoses, the Lieutenant of Artaxerxes: after by * Ptolomæus the first; then by Antiochus Epiphanes: and again by Apollonius his Lieutenant. By Pompey it was taken long after, but not destroyed, nor robbed, though Crassus in his Parthian expedition took as much as he could of that which Pompey spared.

But the damages which it sustained by the violence of sacrilegious Tyrants, were commonly recompenced by the industry or bounty of good Princes, the voluntary contribution of the people, and the liberality of strangers. Before the captivity, the people of the Land, through the exhortation of godly Kings, made many and large offerings to repair the Temple of Solomon. The wrong done by Ptolomæus Lagi to the second Temple, was requited by the bounty of his son Ptolomæus Philadelphus. The mischief wrought by Antiochus Epiphanes and his followers, was amended partly by the great offerings which were sent to Jerusalem out of other Nations. Finally, all the losses, which either the City or Temple had endured, might well seem forgotten in the reign of Herod, that usurping and wicked, but magnificent King, who amplified the City, new built the Temple, and with many sumptuous works did so adorn them, that he left them far more stately and glorious than they had been in the days of Solomon.

SECT. III.

Of the Deſtruction of Jeruſalem by the Romans.

IN this flouriſhing eſtate it was at the coming of our Saviour Chriſt Jeſus: and after his death and aſcenſion, it ſo continued about forty years. But then did Titus the Roman, being ſtirred up by God to be the revenger of Chriſt his death, and to puniſh the Jews ſinful ingratitude, incompaſs it with a Roman Army, and became Lord thereof. He began the ſiege at ſuch time as the Jews from all parts were come up to the celebration of the Paſſover: ſo as the City was then filled with many hundreds of thouſands of all ſorts: and no manner of proviſion or ſtore for any ſuch multitudes. An extreme famine, with the civil diſſenſion, oppreſt them within the Walls; a forcible enemy aſſailed them without. The Idumæans alſo, who lay in wait for the deſtruction of the Jews Kingdom, thruſt themſelves into the City, of purpoſe to betray it: who alſo burnt the Temple, when Nabuchodonoſor took it. And to be ſhort, there periſhed of all ſorts, from the firſt beſieging, to the conſummation of the victory, eleven hundred thouſand ſouls: and the City was ſo beaten down and demoliſhed, as thoſe which came afterward to ſee the deſolation thereof, could hardly believe that there had been any ſuch place or habitation. Only the three Herodian Towers, (works moſt magnificent, and overtopping the reſt) were ſpared, as well for lodgings for the Roman Garriſons, as that thereby their victory might be the more notorious and famous: for by thoſe buildings of ſtrength and ſtate remaining, after ages might judge what the reſt were; and their honour be the greater and more ſhining, that thereover became victorious.

1 Eſdr. 4. 45.

After this, ſuch Jews as were ſcattered here and there in Judæa, and other Provinces, began again to inhabit ſome part of the City; and by degrees to re-build, and ſtrengthen it as they could, being then at peace, and Tributaries to the Roman State: but after 65 years, when they again offered to revolt and rebel, Ælius Adrianus the Emperour ſlaughtered many thouſands of them, and overturned thoſe three Herodian Towers, with all the reſt, making it good which Chriſt himſelf had foretold; That there ſhould not ſtand one ſtone upon another of that ungrateful City. Afterward, when his fury was appeaſed, and the prophecy accompliſhed, he took one part without the Wall, wherein ſtood Mount Calvary, and the Sepulchre of Chriſt, and excluding of the reſt the greateſt portion, he again made it a City of great capacity, and called it after his own name, Ælia Capitolia. In the gate toward Bethel, he cauſed a Sow to be cut in Marble, and ſet it in the front thereof, which he did in deſpight of the Jews Nation: making an Edict, that they ſhould not from thenceforth ever enter into the City, neither ſhould they dare ſo much as to behold it from any other high place over-topping it.

Guil. Tyr. bell. ſacr. l. 14. c. 12.

But the Chriſtian Religion flouriſhing in Paleſtina, it was inhabited at length by all Nations, and eſpecially by Chriſtians; and ſo it continued 500 years.

Onuphrius Coron.

It was afterward in the 636 year after Chriſt, taken by the Egyptian Saracens, who held it 400 and odd years.

Guil. Tyr. l. 8. c. 5. 18 19. &c.

In the year 1099, it was regained by Godfrey of Buillon, by aſſault, with an exceeding ſlaughter of the Saracens; which Godfrey, when he was elected King thereof, refuſed to be crowned with a Crown of Gold, becauſe Chriſt, for whom he fought, was therein crowned with thorns. After this recovery, it remained under the Succeſſours of Godfrey, fourſcore and eight years: till in the year 1197, it was regained by Saladine of Egypt: and laſtly, in the year 1517, in the time of Selim, the Turks caſt out the Egyptians, who now hold it, and call it Cuzumbarec, or the Holy City. Neither was it Jeruſalem alone that had ſo often times been beaten down and made deſolate, but all the great Cities of the World have with their Inhabitants, in ſeveral times and ages, ſuffered the ſame ſhipwrack. And it hath been Gods juſt will, to the end others might take warning, if they would, not only to puniſh the impiety of men, by famine, by the ſword, by fire, and by ſlavery; but he hath revenged himſelf of the very places they poſſeſt; of the walls and buildings, yea, of the ſoil and the beaſts that fed thereon.

For, even that land, ſometime called holy, hath in effect loſt all her fertility and fruitfulneſs; witneſs the many hundreds of thouſands which it fed in the days of the Kings of Juda and Iſrael: it being at this time all over, in effect, exceeding ſtony and barren. It alſo pleaſed God, not only to conſume with fire from Heaven the Cities of the Sodomites; but the very ſoil it ſelf hath felt, and doth feel the hand of God to this day. God would not ſpare the beaſts that belonged to Amalek, no not any ſmall number of them to be ſacrificed to himſelf: neither was it enough that Achan himſelf was ſtoned, but that his moveables were ſo conſumed and brought to aſhes.

SECT. IV.

Of the vain and malicious reports of Heathen Writers, touching the ancient Jews.

OF the original of the Jews, prophane Writers have conceived diverſly and injuriouſly. Quintilian ſpeaks infamouſly of them, and of their Leader; who (ſaith he) gathered together a pernicious Nation. Diodore and Strabo make them Egyptians. Others affirm, that while Iſis governed Egypt, the people were ſo increaſed, as Jeroſolimus and Judas led thence a great multitude of that Nation, with whom they planted the neighbour Regions: which might be meant by Moſes and Aaron: for the name of Moſes was accidental, becauſe he was taken up and ſaved out of the waters. But Juſtine, of all other moſt malicious, doth derive the Jews from the Syrian Kings; of whom, Damaſcus, ſaith he, was the firſt: and to him ſucceeded Abraham, Moſes, and Iſrael. He again ſuppoſeth (ſomewhat contrary to himſelf) that Iſrael had ten ſons, among whom he divided the land of Juda; ſo called of Judas his eldeſt, who had the greateſt portion. The youngeſt of the ſons of Iſrael he calleth Joſeph: who being brought up in Egypt, became learned in Magical Arts, and in the interpretation of Dreams, and ſigns prodigious; and this Joſeph (ſaith he) was father to Moſes: who with the reſt, by reaſon of their foul diſeaſes, and leaſt they ſhould infect others, were baniſhed Egypt. Further, he telleth how theſe men thus baniſhed, when in the Deſarts they ſuffered exream thirſt and famine, and therein found relief the ſeventh day, for this cauſe ever after obſerved the ſeventh day, and kept it Holy; making it a law among themſelves; which afterward became a branch of their Religion. He addeth alſo, that they might not marry out of their own Tribes, leſt diſcovering their uncleanneſs, they might alſo be expelled by other Nations, as they were by the Egyptians. Theſe and the like fables hath Juſtine.

Cornelius Tacitus doth as grosly belie them, in affirming, that in the inmost Oratory of their Temple, they had the golden head of an Ass, which they adored. But herein Tacitus forgetteth himself, having in the fifth book of his own History truly confessed of the Jews, that they worshipped one only God: and thought it most prophane to represent the Deity by any material figure, by the shape of a man, or any other creature: and they had therefore in their Temples no Image or Representation, no not so much as in any City by them inhabited. Somewhat like this, hath Alexander Polyhistor, in Stephanus; who also makes Judas with Idumæa, the first parents of the Jews. Cited by Stephanus in Judæa.

Claudius Iolaus draws them from Judæus, whose parents were Sparton and Thebis; whence it came, that the Spartans or Lacedæmonians challenged kindred of the Hebrews: but they did it as descended of Abraham, saith Josephus. Some of these reports seem to have been gathered out of divine letters, though wrested and perverted, according to the custom of the Heathen. For so have they obscured and altered the Story of the Creation, of Paradise, of the Flood; and given new names to the children of Adam in the first age, to Noah and his sons in the second: and so to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, Moses, and the rest of the Fathers, and Leaders of the Hebrews: all which feignings, as touching the Jews and their originals, Josephus against Appion, and Tertullian have sufficiently answered. For that the Hebrews were the children of Arphaxad and Heber, no man doubteth: Tert. in Apol.

and so Chaldæans originally taking name either of Heber, the son of Sale, or else (saith Montanus) of wandring, as is before remembred. And therefore doth Stephanus, the Greek Grammarian, derive the Hebrews, or Jews, from Arabon; having mistaken the name of Abraham, who was the son of Heber, in the sixth descent. Their antient names were first changed by the two grand-children of Abram: for after Jacob, otherwise Israel, the chief part were called Israel, another part after Esau or Edom, Edomites; at length the remnant of Jacob, being most of the Tribe of Juda, honoured the name of Judas, the son of Jacob, and became Judæans, or Jews: as also for a time in the name of Ephraim the son of Joseph, the chief of the Patriarchs of the ten Tribes, the rest of the ten Tribes were comprehended: but were first rooted out when the Kingdom of Israel fell. The Judæans continued their names, though they suffered the same servitude not long after, under Nabuchodonosor. Caleb. f. 63.

The government which this Nation under-went, was first paternal: which continued till they served the Egyptians. They were secondly ruled by their Captains and Leaders, Moses and Josua, by a policy Divine. Thirdly, they subjected themselves to Judges. Fourthly, they desired a King, and had Saul for the first: Of whom, and his Successours, before we intreat, we are first to speak of their government under Judges, after the death of Josua: with somewhat of the things of Fame in other Nations about these times.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the memorable things that happened in the World, from the death of Josua, to the War of Troy: which was about the time of Jephtha.

SECT. I.

Of the Inter-regnum after Josua's death: and of Othoniel.

WHen Josua was now dead, who with the advice of the 70 Elders, and the high Priest, held authority over the people, and ordered that Common-weal: it pleased God to direct the Tribe of Juda (in whom the Kingdom was afterward established) to undertake the War against the Canaanites, over whom (with Gods favour, and the assistance of Simeon) they became victorious.

In the first attempt which they made, they not only slew ten thousand, but made Adonibezek prisoner: the greatest and cruellest Commander, both of the Canaanites and Perizites. This Tyrant's cruelty, as elsewhere hath been signified, they returned in the same kind upon his own head: and so by the torments which he now felt in his own person (before no otherwise known unto him but by his malicious imagination) made him confess and acknowledge Gods judgments against himself.

The Tribes of Juda and Simeon did also master and possess duting this Inter-regnum (or as some think, before the death of Josua) the Cities of Azotus, Askolon, Ekron, and Jerusalem, which they burnt, and the Jebusites after re-edified. They took also the Cities of Hebron, Debir, or Kiriathsepher, and Zephath, afterwards Horma. And although it be not set down in express words that any one person commanded in chief over the people, as Moses and Josua did: yet it seemeth that Caleb was of greatest authority among them: and that he, with the advice of Phinees, directed and ordered their wars. For if any think that they proceeded without a Chief, the good success which followed their undertakings, witnesseth the contrary. And it was Caleb, even while Josua governed, as appears, Jos. 10. 39. that propounded the attempt of Debir, to the rest of the Captains: for the performance of which enterprise, he promised his daughter Achsah: which he performed to Othoniel his younger brother after the conquest: whose behaviour in that service was such, as (next unto the ordinance of God) it gave him the greatest reputation among them, and may be esteemed the second cause of his preferment and election for their first Judge soon after. But while those of Juda made war with their borderers, from whom they only recovered the mountainous Countries (for they could not drive out the Inhabitants of the Vallies, because they had Chariots of Iron.) Judg. 1. 19. The rest of the Tribes sought also to enlarge and establish their own Territories. In which war they laboured with variable success: for as the house of Joseph recovered Bethel, or Luz, from the Hittites, Judg. 1. 25. so did the Amorites recover from Dan all the plain Judg. 1. 30. Countries, and forc't them to save themselves in the Mountains. And now the Israelites, unmindful of Gods benefits, and how often he had miraculously a-fore-time defended them, and made them victorious over their enemies (the Elders being also consumed, who better advised them in the Inter-regnum) did not only joyn themselves in marriage with the Heathen Nations: but (that which was more detestable) they served the Idols of Baal, and Asteroth, with other the dead gods of the Canaanites and Amorites. And therefore did the Lord God, whom they had provoked with their Idolatry, deliver them into the hands of the Aramites of Mesopotamia, whom Cushan Rishathaim at that time commanded. But after they had felt the smart of Gods displeasure against them eight years, it pleased him to have compassion on his people, and to raise up Othoniel to be their Judge and Leader: who, by God assisted, delivered his brethren from oppression, and inforced the Aramites to return into their own Desarts, and into Mesopotamia adjoyning: after which the Israelites had peace forty years, during all the time of Othoniels government. This Othoniel is thought by Tostatus, to have been the younger brother of Caleb, for as much as in the book of Judges, he is twice called Othoniel, the son of Cenaz, Calebs younger brother. Others do rather interpret those words [Calebs younger brother] as if they signified the meanest of his kindred. Indeed it is not likely that Calebs Daughter should marry with her own Uncle; yet it follows not therefore that Othoniel should have been the meanest of the kindred. Wherefore we may better think that he was the Nephew of Caleb, (as some learned men expound it) and as the very words of Scripture seem to enforce. For Caleb was the son of Jephunneth, and Othoniel the son of Cenas, Calebs younger brother; that is, he was not brother to Caleb, but his younger brothers son; to whom it was not only lawful, but commendable to marry with his Cousin German Calebs Daughter.

How long it was from the death of Josua, to the government of Othoniel, it cannot be found: but it seems to have been no short time. For many wars were made in that space against the people of the Land. Laish was then taken (as is thought) by the Danites; and the best Writers are of opinion, that between the times of Josua and Othoniel, that civil war brake out between the Benjamites and the rest of Israel, for the forcing to death of the Levites Wife. For it is written, that in those days there was no King in Israel, but every Man did that which was good in his own eyes. And as Juda led the people against the Canaanites, during the Inter-regnum, so was he commanded to do against Benjamin, even by the Lord God, whose direction they craved, as wanting a Judge to appoint what should be done; which sheweth it to have been when Josua was dead, and before the government of Othoniel, especially considering, that all other times wherein they wanted Governours, were spent under such oppression of strangers, as would have given them no leave to have attempted such a civil war, if their power had been as great, as it was in the managing of this action; wherein they so weakned the the body of their estate, by effusion of blood, that in many ages they could not bring into the field such numbers as formerly they had mustered against their bordering enemies.

SECT. II.

Of the memorable things of this age in other Nations: and of the difficulty in the computation of times.

THere lived in this age of Othoniel, Pandon, or Pandareus, according to Homer, the fifth King of Athens; who began to rule in the twentieth year of Othoniel, and governed forty years. He was father to Erictheus: his daughters were Progne and Philomela, so greatly mentioned in fables.

Cadmus also about this time obtained Thebes: of whose daughter Semele was born Dionysius, or Liber Pater: under whom Linus the Musician lived. In his time also the Cities of Melus, Paphus, and Tharsus were built.

Ida and Dactylus flourished in this age, who are said to have found out the use of Iron: but Genesis hath taught us the contrary, and that Tubalcain long before wrought cunningly both in Iron and Brass. Not long after this time, Amphion and Zethus governed Thebes: whom divers Chronologers find in Ehuds time. But St. Augustine making a repetition of those fables, which were devised among the Grecians and other Nations, during the government of the Judges, begins with Triptolemus, of whose parentage there is as little agreement. Vives upon the thirteenth Chapter of S. Augustine de Civit. Dei, and the eighteenth book, hath gathered all the opinions of this mans progeny, where, he that desires his pedigree may find it. Lactantius and Eusebius make him native of Attica: and the son of Eleusius King of Elusina: which Elusius by careful industry had fed the people of that Territory in the time of a great famine. This, when upon the like occasion Triptolemus could not perform, fearing the fury of the people, he fled thence by Sea in a kind of Galley or long Boat, which carried in her Prow a graven or carved Serpent; who because he made exceeding great speed to return and to relieve his people with Corn from some neighbour Nation: it was feigned by the Poets, that his Coach was carried by Serpents through the air.

Gen. 4.12. Whence came the name of Vulcan by Aphæresis of the two first letters.

Aug. de civit. Dei, l. 18. c. 13.

Whether the times of these Kings, which lived together with Othoniel, and after him, with the rest of the Judges and Kings of Israel and Juda, be precisely set down, I cannot avow; for the Chronologers, both of the former and latter times, differ in many particulars; to examine all which would require the whole time of a long life: and therefore I desire to be excused, if in these comparisons I erre with others of better judgment. For whether Eusebius and all that follow him, or his opposites (who make themselves so conversant with these antient Kings, and with the very year when they began to rule) have hit the mark of time, of all other the fartheſt off and most defaced, I cannot but greatly doubt. First, because the Authors themselves, from whom the antienteſt Chronologers have borrowed light, had nothing for the warrant of their own works, but conjecture. Secondly, because their own disagreement and contention in those elder days, with that of our own age among the labourers in times, is such, as no man among them hath yet so edified any mans understanding, save his own; but that he is greatly distracted, after what pattern to erect his buildings.

This disagreement is found not only in the reigns of Heathen Kings and Princes; but even in the computation of those times which the indisputable authority of holy Scripture hath summed up, as in that of Abrahams birth; and after in the times of the Judges

Judges and the oppreſſions of Iſrael, in the times from the egreſſion to the building of Solomon's Temple, in the Perſian Empire, the ſeventy Weeks, and in what not? Whereſoever the account of times may ſuffer examination, the arguments are oppoſite, and contentions are ſuch, as for ought that I ſee, men have ſought by ſo many ways to uncover the Sun, that the days thereby are made more dark, and the clouds more condenſed than before: I can therefore give no other warrant, than other men have done in theſe computations: and therefore that ſuch and ſuch Kings and Kingdoms took beginning in this or that year, I avow it no otherwiſe than as a borrowed knowledge, or at leaſt as a private opinion: which I ſubmit to better judgments. Nam in priſcis rebus veritas non ad unguem quærenda; In antient things we are not to require an exact narration of the truth, ſays Diodore.

SECT. III.

Of Ehuds time, and of Proſerpina, Orithya, Tereus, Tantalus, Tytius, Admetus, and others that lived about theſe times.

After the death of Othoniel, when Iſrael fell back to their former Idolatry, God incouraged Moab to invade and ſuppreſs them: to perform which, he joyned the forces of Ammon, and Amalek unto his own, and ſo (as all kind of miſery readily findeth out thoſe whom God hath abandoned, or for a time with-drawn his help from, thereby to make them feel the difference between his grace and his diſpleaſure) theſe Heathen neighbouring Nations had an eaſie conqueſt over Iſrael, whom God himſelf expoſed to thoſe perils, within which they were ſo ſpeedily folded up. In this miſerable eſtate they continued full eighteen years under Eglon King of the Moabites and his confederates. Yet, as the mercies of God are infinite, he turned not his ears from their crying repentance: but raiſed up Ehud the ſon of Gera to deliver them: by which weak man, though maimed in his right hand, yet confident in the juſtneſs of his quarrel, and fearing that the Iſraelites were too few in numbers to contend with the Head of thoſe valiant Nations, he reſolved to attempt upon the perſon of Eglon, whom if he could but extinguiſh, he aſſured himſelf of the following victory: eſpecially giving his Nation no time to re-eſtabliſh their government, or to chooſe a King to command and direct them in the Wars. According to which reſolution, Ehud went on as an Embaſſadour to Eglon, loaden with preſents from the Iſraelites, as to appeaſe him, and obtaining private acceſs, upon the pretence of ſome ſecret to be revealed, he pierc't his body with a Poniard, made of purpoſe with a double edge: and ſhutting the doors of his cloſet upon him, eſcaped.

It may ſeem, that being confident of his good ſucceſs, he had prepared the ſtrength of Iſrael in readineſs. For ſuddenly after his return, he did re-paſs Jordan, and invading the Territory of Moab, overthrew their Army, conſiſting of 10000 able and ſtrong men: whereof not any one eſcaped. After which victory, and that Samgar his Succeſſor had miraculouſly ſlain 600 Philiſtims with an Ox goad: the Land and People of Iſrael lived in peace unto the end of fourſcore years from the death of Othoniel, which term expired in the Worlds year 2691.

In the days of Ehud, Naomi, with Elimelech her husband, and with her two ſons, travelled into Moab, and ſo the ſtory of Ruth is to be referred to this time. About the beginning of the fourſcore years which are given to Ehud, it was that Orcus King of the Moloſſians, otherwiſe Pluto, ſtole Proſerpina, as ſhe walked to gather flowers in the fields of Hipponium in Sicilia: or (according to Pauſanias) by the River Cephiſus, which elſewhere he calleth Chemer, if he mean not two diſtinct Rivers. This ſtealth being made known to Pyrithous, with whom Hercules and Theſeus joyned themſelves, they agreed together to recover her: but Pluto, or Orcus (whom others call Aidonius) had (as they ſay) a very huge Dog, which faſtened on Pyrithous, and tare him in pieces, and had alſo worried Theſeus, but that Hercules ſpeedily reſcued him, and by ſtrength took and maſtered the Dog Cerberus: whereof grew the fable of Hercules his delivering Theſeus out of Hell. But Zezes, as I take it, hath written this ſtory ſomewhat more according to the truth. For Theſeus and Pyrithous, ſaith he, attempted to ſteal Proſerpina Daughter to Aidonius, King of the Moloſſians, who had Ceres to Wife, the mother of Proſerpina: Proſerpina being a general name alſo for all fair women. This purpoſe of theirs, being known to Aidonius, Theſeus and Pyrithous were both taken; and becauſe Pyrithous was the principal in this conſpiracy, and Theſeus drawn on by a kind of affection or inforcement, the one was given for food to Aidonius his great Dog Cerberus, the other held priſoner, till Hercules, by the inſtigation of Euriſtheus, delivered him by ſtrong hand. The Moloſſi, which Stephanus writes with a ſingle (S) were a people of Epirus, inhabiting near the Mountains of Pindus: of which Mountains Oeta is one of the moſt famous, where Hercules burnt himſelf. The River of Acheron (which the Poets deſcribe to be in Hell) riſeth out of the ſame Hills. There is another Nation of the Moloſſi in Theſſali: but theſe are neighbours to the Caſſiopæi, ſaith Plutarch in his Greek queſtions.

Pauſ. in Att.

The rape of Orithya, the daughter of Erytheus, King of Athens, taken away by Boreas of Thrace, is referred to the time of Ehud. The Poets aſcribe this rape to the North-wind, becauſe Thrace is ſituate North from Athens. In this time alſo Tereus raviſhed Philomela, of which the fable was deviſed of her converſion into a Nightingale. For Tereus having married her ſiſter Progne, conducting Philomela from Athens to ſee her ſiſter, forced her in her paſſage, and withall cut out her tongue, that ſhe might not complain; perſwading Progne his Wife, that Philomela died in the mid-way: all which her Brother-in-law's mercileſs behaviour towards her, Philomela expreſſed by her needle upon cloath, and ſent unto Progne. In revenge whereof, Progne cauſed her only ſon Itys to be cut in pieces, and ſet before Tereus her husband, ſo dreſt, as it appeared to be ſome other ordinary food: of which when he had eaten his fill, ſhe cauſed his head, hands and feet, to be preſented unto him: and then fled away with ſuch ſpeed towards Athens, where her Father Pandion yet lived, as the Poets feigned, that ſhe was turned into a Swallow. The place where it was performed, Strabo finds to be Daulis, in Phocis: and the Tomb of Tereus, Pauſanias hath built near the Rocks Mergi, in the Territory of Athens. By which, as alſo by the name Daulis, where theſe things are ſuppoſed to have been done (whence alſo Philomela is called Daulias Ales) it appears that it is true, which Thucydides notes by way of digreſſion in his Peloponneſian War, That this Tereus was not King in that which is now called Thracia, or in Odryſe, (as the Poets call him Odryſius) but that Phocis a Country in Greece not far from Attica, a City whereof is called Daulia, was in Pandions time inhabited by Thracians, of which this Tereus was King: whence Pandion, to have amity with his neighbours, made him his Son-in-law: as it is good to believe, saith Thucydides, that Pandion King of Athens made that alliance with a neighbour King, from whom he might have succour, rather than with any Tereus, that should have held the Kingdom of Odrysæ, which was greatly distant from thence. The occasion that the Poet chose a Swallow for Progne, to be turned into, may seem to have been, partly because, as Pausanias says, Daulidè, nec nidificant, nec habitant in tota circum regione Hirundines; as if a Swallow, remembring the wrong that was there done to her, and her Sister, did for ever after hate that place.

Lib. 9. Pauſ. in Att.

Near this time Melampus (who is said to have understood the voices of Birds and Beasts) flourished, being also esteemed for an excellent Physician. He restored to their former health the Daughters of Prætus King of the Argives, who (as the Poets please) were made mad by Juno: and thinking themselves to be Kine, fled into the Woods, fearing to be constrained to the Plough: for in those Countries where the Ground was light, they did use often to plough with Kine.

In the seven and fortieth year of Ehud, Tros began to reign in Dardania, and gave it his own name; about which time Phemone the chief Priest of Apollo in Delphos, devised the Heroical Verse.

Of the same date was Tantalus, King of Lydia: whom Eusebius makes King of Phrygia: and also of that part of which the people were antiently Mæones. Of Tantalus was devised the fable that some Poets have applyed to the passion of love: and some to the covetous that dare not injoy his riches. Eusebius calls this Tantalus the Son of Jupiter, by the Nymph Pleta: Diaconus and Dydimus in Zezes, give him another Mother. He was said to be the Son of Jupiter, as some will have it; because he had that Planet in his ascendent, betokening Wisdom and Riches. It is said, that when he made a feast to the gods, having nothing more precious, he caused his own Son to be slain and drest to the Banquet: of whom Ceres eat part of one of the shoulders; whereby was signified, that those Men which seek after Divine knowledg, prefer nothing on earth before it: no not the care of their own Children, of all else the most deareſt. And where it was devised, that he had always Water and Fruit offered to his lips, and yet suffered the torment of hunger and thirst, it was ment thereby, that though he abounded (by reason of his riches) in all delicacy of the World, yet his mind being otherwise, and to higher desires transported, he enjoyed no pleasure at all by the rest. Of whom Ovid:

Euseb. prap. Ev. in. l. 2. Zezez. h st. 10. Chil. 5.

Quærit aquas in aquis, & poma fugacia captat
Tantalus, hoc illi garrula lingua dedit.

Here Tantalus in water seeks for water, and doth miss.
The fleeting fruit he catcheth at: His long tongue brought him this.

This punishment, they say, was inflicted upon him, for that he discovered the secrets of the gods: that is, because he taught Wisdom and Vertue to mortal Men: which Story, Cornelius Gallus hath elegantly expresst in Verse. Others expound this Fable otherwise, and say, That Tantalus, though he excelled in riches, yet being thirsty of more abundance, was never satisfied. Of whom Horace against covetousness.

Tantalus à labiis sitiens fugientia captat
Flumina; quid rides? mutato nomine de te Fabula narratur.

The thirsting Tantalus doth catch at streams, that from him flee.
Why laugheſt thou? the name but chang'd, the tale is told of thee.

Others conceive, where it is feigned of Tantalus, that he gave the Nectar and Ambrosia of the gods, to vain and unworthy Men, that he was therefore by them in that sort punished. Of which Natalis, out of Pindarus:

Immortalitatem quod furatus,
Cœtaneis convivis,
Nectar Ambrosiamque dedit.

Because that stealing immortallity,
He did both Nectar and Ambrosia give
To guests of his own age, to make them live.

Whereby it was meant, that the secrets of Divinity ought not to be imparted to the unpure Vulgar. For as the cleaneſt Meats in a foul stomack, are therein corrupted, so the most high and reserved mysteries are often perverted by an unclean and defiled mind.

To you it is given (saith Christ in Mark) to know the mystery of the Kingdom of God, but unto them that are without, all things be done in Parables. So it is said of him, that he expounded all things to his Disciples apart. And therefore doth Gregory Nazianzen infer upon a place of St. Paul: Quod si Paulo licuisset effari ea, quorum ipsi cognitionem cœlum tertium & usque ad illud progressio suppeditavit, fortasse de Deo, nobis aliquid amplius constaret; If Paul might have uttered the things, the knowledg whereof the third Heavens, and his going thither, did bring unto him, peradventure we might know somewhat more of God. Mark 4. 11 Mark 4. 34. Greg. in Orat. de recta rationc disp. de Deo. 2 Cor. 12.

Pythagoras, saith Revelin, thought it not the part of a wise Man, Asino lyram exponere, aut mysteria, quæ ita reciperet, ut Sus tubam, & fidem Graculus, & unguenta Scarabæus: quare silentium indixit discipulis, nè vulgo divinorum arcana patefacerent, quæ meditando facilius quàm loquendo apprehendantur; To set an Ass to a Harp, or to learn mysteries: which he would handle as a Swine doth a Trumpet, or a Jay a Viol, or Scarabies, and unclean flies soveraign Ointment. Wherefore he commanded silence to his Disciples, that they should not disclose divine misteries to the common sort, which are easier learned by meditation than by babling. And therefore did the Egyptians communicate their mysteries among their Priests in certain Hieroglyphick letters, to the end that their secrets might be hidden from the Vulgar: and that they might bestow the more time in the contemplation of their covered meanings.

But to porceed with the contemporaries of Aod, or Ehud, with him it is also said, that Tytius lived, whom Apollo slew, because he sought to force his Mother Latona. Euphorion hath it thus, that Tytius was the Son of Elara, the Daughter of Orchomenus; which Elara being beloved of Jupiter, to avoid Juno's revenge, he hid Elara in the Earth, where she was delivered of Tytius: whose Mother dying, and himself therein nourished, he was therefore called the Son of the Earth. Pausanias speaking of the grave of this Giant, affirms, that his body occupied the third part of a furlong. But Tibullus hath a louder lie of his stature out of Homer:

Por-

Hom. Od. 11. Porrectúsque novem Tytius per jugera terræ, Assiduus atro viscere pascit aves.

Nine furlongs stretcht, lies Tytius, who for his wicked deeds,
The hungry Birds with his renewing Liver daily feeds.

This Strabo doth thus expound; That Apollo killing this cruel and wicked Tyrant of Panopea, a City in Phocis, it was feigned by the Poets, to the terrour of others, That he was still eaten in Hell by Birds, and yet still lived, and had his Flesh renewed.

Admetus, King of Thessaly, lived also in this age, whom it is said that Apollo first served as a Herd-man, and afterward, for his excellent wit, was by him advanced; but having slain Hyacinthus, he crost the Hellespont, and fled into Phrygia: where, together with Neptune, he was entertained by Laomedon, and got his Bread by working in Brick, for building of the Walls of Troy, not by making the Bricks leap into their places by playing on his Harp: according to him, in Ovid, which saith:

Illion aspicies, firmataque turribus altis
Mœnia, Apollineæ structa canore lyræ.

Strong Ilion thou shalt see with walls and towers high,
Built with the harp of wise Apollo's Harmony.

Thus the Poets: but others, that he laboured with his hands, as hired in this work. And that he also laboured at the building of the Labyrinth in Greece, all the Megariens witness, saith Pausanias. Paus. in Att.

In these days also of Ehud, or (as some find it) in the days of Deborah, lived Perseus, the Son of Jupiter and Danae, by whose Souldiers (as they sailed out of Peloponnesus, to seek their adventure on Africa side) Medusa, the Daughter and Successour of Phorcus, being weakly accompanied, as she hunted near the Lake Tritan, was surprised and slain: whose beauty, when Perseus beheld, he caused her Head to be imbalmed, and carried into Greece: the beauty whereof was such, and so much admired, and the beholders so astonished which beheld it, as thereof grew the fiction, that all that looked on Medusa's head, were turned into Stones. Triton a Lake of Africa, which Plini calleth Pallantias. Didym. in pereg. Hist.

Cecrops, the second of that name, and seventh King of Athens, and Acrisius the 13. or, after Eusebius, the fourteenth King of the Argives, began also their reigns, as it is said, in the time of this Judge: of which, the first ruled forty years, and the second, thirty one years. Euseb. in Chron.

Also Bellerophon lived in this age, being the Son of Glaucus, the Son of Sisyphus: who inticed by Antea, or Sthenobia, the Wife of Prætus of the Argives, to accompany her, but refusing it, she accused him to her husband, that he offered to force her: whereupon Prætus sent Bellerophon into Lycia, about some affairs of weight, between him and his Son-in-law Jobates: giving secret orders to Jobates to dispatch him: but Jobates thinking it dishonourable to lay violent hands on him, imployed him against Chimæra, a Monster, vomiting, or breathing fire. Now the gods (as the report is) pittying his innocency, sent him the winged Horse, Pegasus, sprung up of the blood of Medusa, formerly slain by the Souldiers of Perseus in Africa, to transport him: a Horse that none other could master or bridle but Minerva: upon which Beast Bellerophon overcame Chimæra: and performed the other services given him in charge: which done, as he returned towards Lycia, the Lycians lay in ambush to have slain him: but being victorious also over all those, he arrived to Jobates in safety: whom Jobates for his eminent vertues honoured, first with one of his Daughters: and afterward with his Kingdom: after which he grew so insolent, as he attempted to flie up to Heaven upon his Pegasus: whose pride, Jupiter disdained, caused one of his stinging Flies so to vex Pegasus, as he cast of Bellerophon from his back, into the Valley of Cilicia, where he died blind; of which burthen, Pegasus being discharged (as the fable goeth) flew back to Heaven: and being fed in Jupiters own stable, Aurora begg'd him of Jupiter to ride on before the Sun. This tale is diversly expounded; as first by some, That it pleaseth God to relieve Men in their innocent and undeserved adversity, as to cast down those which are too high minded: according to that which is said of Bellerophon: that when he was exposed to extream hazard, or rather certain death, he found both deliverance and honour: but waxing overproud and presumptuous in his glorious fortunes, he was again thrown down into the extremity of sorrow, and ever-during misery. Secondly by others, That under the name of Chimæra, was meant a cruel Pyrat of the Lycians, whose Ship had in her prow a Lyon, a Goat in the mid-ship, and a Dragon in the Stern, of which three Beasts, this Monster Chimæra was said to be compounded, whom Bellerophon pursued with a kind of Gally, of such swiftness, that it was called the flying Horse; to whom the invention of Sayls (the Wings of a Ship) are also attributed. Many other expositions are made of this tale by other Authors: but it is not unlikely, that Chimæra was the name of a Ship, for so Virgil calleth one of the greatest Ships of Æneas. Plutar. in claris mulier. L. 5. Ænesd. Homer in hym. ad Apoll.

Ion also, from whom the Athenians (being ignorant of the antiquity of their parent Javan) derive their name of Ions, is said to have ben about Ehuds time: Homer calls them Jaones, which hath a near resemblance to the word Javan. Perhaps it might be so that Ion himself took name from Javan: it being a custom observable in the Histories of all times, to revive the antient name of a fore-Father, in some the principal of his issue.

The invasion of India by Liber-Pater, is by some reported as done in this age: but St. Augustine makes him far more ancient: placing him between the coming out of Egypt, and the death of Josua. Li. 18. c. 12. de Ci. Dei. l. 18. c. 15.

About the end of the eighty years, ascribed to Ehud, and Samger, Pelops flourished: who gave name to Peloponnesus in Greece, now called Morea.

SECT. IV.

Of Deborah and her Contemporaries.

After Israel had lived in peace and plenty to the end of these 80 years, they again began to forget the Giver of all goodness, and many of those being worn out, which were witnesses of the former misery, and of Gods deliverance by Ehud; and after him by Samgar; the rest began to return to their former neglect of Gods commandments. For as Plenty and Peace are the parents of idle security; so is security as fruitful in begetting and bringing forth both danger and subversion: of which, all estates in the World have tasted by interchange of times. Therefore when their sins were again ripe for punishment, Jabin King of Hazor, after the death of Ehud, invaded the territory ritory of Iſrael; and having in his ſervice 900 iron Chariots, beſides the reſt of his forces, he held them in ſubjection twenty years, till it pleaſed God to raiſe up Deborah the Propheteſs, who incouraged Barac to levy a force out of Nepthalim, and Zabulon, to incounter the Canaanites. That the Men of Nepthalim were more forward than the reſt in this action, it may ſeem to have proceeded partly from the authority, that Barac had among them, being of the ſame Tribe; and partly from their feeling of the common grievance, which in them was more ſenſible than in others, becauſe Hazor and Haroſeth the chief holds of Jabin, were in Nepthalim. So in the days of Jeptha the Gileadites took the greateſt care, becauſe the Ammonites, with whom the War was, preſſed moſt upon them, as being their borderers. Now as it pleaſed God by the left hand of Ehud to deliver Iſrael from the Moabites: and by the counſel and courage of a Woman, to free them from the yoak of Canaan, and to kill the valiant Siſera by Jael the Kenites wife: ſo was it his will at other times, to work the like great things by the weakeſt means. For the mighty Aſſyrian Nabuchodonoſor, who was a King of Kings, and reſtleſs, he overthrew by his own imaginations, the cauſers of his brutiſh melancholy: and changed his matchleſs pride into the baſe humility of a Beaſt. And to approve that he is the Lord of all power, he ſometime puniſheth by inviſible ſtrength, as when he ſlaughtered the Army of Senacherib by his Angel, or as he did the Egyptians in Moſes's time: ſometime by dead bodies, as when he drowned Pharaoh by the waves of the Sea; and the Canaanites by hail ſtones in the time of Joſua: ſometimes by the miniſtery of Men, as when he overthrew the four Kings of the Eaſt, Chedorlaomer, and his companions, by the houſhold Servants of Abraham. He cauſed the Moabites and Ammonites to ſet upon their own confederates, the Army of the Edomites; and having ſlain them, to kill one another in the ſight of Joſaphat: and of the like to theſe, a volume of examples may be gathered. And to this effect did Deborah the Propheteſs, ſpeak unto Barac in theſe words, But this journey that thou takeſt, ſhall not be for thine honour, for the Lord ſhall ſell Siſera into the hands of a Woman. In which victory all the ſtrength of the Canaanite Jabin fell to the ground, even to the laſt Man: in the end of which War it ſeemeth, that Jabin himſelf alſo periſhed, as appeareth by the laſt Verſe of the fourth of Judges.

2 Chron. 20.

Judg. 49.

After all which, Deborah giveth thanks to God, and after the acknowledgement of all his powerfulneſs, and great mercies, ſhe ſheweth the weak eſtate whereinto Iſrael was brought for their Idolatry, by the Canaanites, and other bordering Nations, in theſe words: Was there a ſhield or ſpear ſeen among forty thouſand of Iſrael? She alſo ſheweth how the Iſraelites were ſevered and amazed, ſome of them confined over Jordan, and durſt not joyn themſelves to the reſt; as thoſe of Reuben in Gilead: that the Aſherites kept the Sea-coaſt, and forſook their habitations towards the Land; and the Children of Dan, who neighboured the Sea, crept into their Ships for ſafety, ſhewing thereby that all were diſperſed, and all in effect, loſt. She then curſed the Inhabitants of Meroz, who dwelling near the place of the battel (belike fearing the ſucceſs) came not out to aſſiſt Iſrael, and then bleſſeth Jael the Wife of Heber the Kenite, who who nailed Siſera in her Tent: ſhewing the ancient affection of that race to the Iſraelites. For though the Family of Heber were inforced in that miſerable time of ſubjection, to hold correſpondency with Jabin the Canaanite, yet when occaſion offered them means, they witneſſed their love and faith to their ancient Friends. Laſtly, ſhe derideth the Mother of Siſera who promiſed her Son the victory in her own hopes: and fancied to her ſelf, and deſcribed the ſpoils both of Garments and Maidens by him gotten. For concluſion, ſhe directeth her praiſe and thanks to God only victorious.

Jud. 5. v. 18.

verſ. 17.

From the beginning of Jabins oppreſſion to the end of that peace, which Deborah and Barac purchaſed unto Iſrael, there paſſed forty years. In which time the Kingdom of Argos, which had continued 544 years, was tranſlated to Mycænæ: The tranſlation of this Kingdom, Vives out of Pauſanias writeth to this effect: After Danaus, Lynceus ſucceeded in Argos, after whom the Children of Abas, the Son of Lynceus divided the Kingdom: of which Acriſius being eldeſt, held Argos it ſelf: Prætus his Brother poſſeſt Ephyra, or Corinth, and Tirynthos, and other Cities, with all the Territory towards the Sea: there being many Monuments in Tyrinthos, which witneſs Prætus's poſſeſſion, ſaith Pauſanias.

Pau. in Corinthiacis.

Now Acriſius was foretold by an Oracle, that he ſhould be ſlain by the Son of his Daughter Danae: whereupon he cauſed her to be incloſed in a Tower, to the end that no Man might accompany her. But the Lady being exceeding fair, it is feigned that Jupiter turned himſelf into a golden ſhower: which falling into her lap, begat her with Child: the meaning whereof was, that ſome Kings Son, or other worthy Man, corrupted her Keepers with gold, and enjoyed her, of whom Perſeus was born; who when he grew to Mans eſtate, either by chance (ſaith Cteſius) or in ſhewing his Grand-Father the invention of the diſcus, or Leaden Ball, ſlew him unwillingly. After this, Perſeus, to avoid the infamy of Patricide in Argos, changed Kingdomes with his Uncle Prætus: and built Mycænæ. This impriſonment of Danae, Sophocles reporteth otherwiſe: and that ſhe was incloſed in a brazen vault under the Kings Hall with her Nurſe and Keepers. Upon this cloſe cuſtody, Horace hath this witty obſervation:

Incluſam Danaen turris ahenea,
Robuſtæque fores, & vigilum canum
Triſtes excubiæ munierant ſatis
Nocturnis ab Adulteris:

Si non Acriſium Virginis abditæ
Cuſtodem pavidum, Jupiter & Venus
Riſiſſent, fore enim tutum iter & patens,
Converſo in pretium Deo.

Aurum per medios ire ſatellites,
Et perrumpere amat ſaxa, potentius
Ictu fulmineo.

The brazen tower with doors cloſe barr'd,
And watchful bandogs frightful guard,
Kept ſafe the maidenhead
Of Danae from ſecret love:
Till ſmiling Venus, and wiſe Jove
Beguil'd her Fathers dread.
For chang'd into a golden ſhowre,
The God into her lap did poure
Himſelf, and took his pleaſure.
Though guards and ſtony wals to break,
The thunder-bolt is far more weak,
Than is a golden treaſure.

The first Kings of the Argives were these.

Inachus the first King, who began to reign in the first year of Jacob, and the 61 of Isaac: from which time, to the end of Sthelenus, Castor misreckoneth 400 years. This Kingdom before the translation, Eusebius accounteth to have stood 544 years, others but at 417. Io was the Daughter of this Inachus: whom the Egyptians called Isis.

Phoroneus,	Sthenelus,
Apis,	Danaus,
Argus,	Lynceus,
Pirasus,	Abas,
Phorbas,	Acrisius,
Triopas,	Pelops.
Crotopus,

After the translation to Mycenæ, Mar. Scotus finds these Kings:

Perseus,	Eurysteus,
Sthenelus,

Atreus, and Thyestes. } The Sons of Pelops by Hippodamia: Atreus by Europe had Agamemnon and Menelaus.

Agememnon,	Tisamenus,
Ægysthus,	Penthilus and
Orestes,	Cometes.

Of these Kings Mercator and Bunting leave out the two first, and the last, beginning with Eurysthеus: and ending with Penthilus. In Tisamenus's time the Heraclidæ returned into Peloponnesus: of which hereafter.

The Contemporaries of Barac and Debora, were Midas, who reigned in Phrygia: and Ilus, who built Ilium: with others mentioned in our Chronological Table, as Contemporaries with Debora.

SECT. V.

Of Gideon, and of Dædalus, Sphinx, Minos, and others that lived in this Age.

DEbora and Barac bein dead, the Midianites, assisted by the Amalekites, infested Israel. For when, under a Judge, who had held them in the fear of the Lord, they had enjoyed any quiet or prosperity: The Judg was no sooner dead, than they turned to their former impious Idolatry. Therefore, now the neighbouring Nations did so master them in a short time (the hand of God being withheld from their defence) as to save themselves, they crept into caves of the mountains, and other the like places of hardest access: their enemies possessing all the plains
Jud. 6. and fruitful vallies: and in harvest time, by themselves, and the multitude of their cattel, destroying all that grew up: covering the Fields as thick as grashoppers: which servitude lasted seven years.

Then the Lord by his Angel stirred up Gideon the
Jud. 8. v. 5. Son of Joash, afterward called Jerubbaal: whose fear and unwillingness, and how it pleased God to hearten him in his enterprize, it is both largely and precisely set down in the holy Scriptures: as also how it pleased God by a few select persons, namely 300 out of 32000 Men, to make them know that he only was the Lord of Hosts. Each of these 300 by Gideons appointment carried a Trumpet, and light, in a pitcher, instruments of more terrour than force, with which he gave the great Army of their enemies an alarum: who hearing so loud a noise, and seeing (at the crack of so many pitchers broken) so many lights about them, esteeming the Army of Israel to be infinite, and strucken with a sudden fear, they all fled without a stroke stricken, and were slaughtered in great numbers: two of their Princes being made prisoners and slain. In his return the Ephramites began to quarrel with Gideon, because he made war without their assistance, being then greedy of glory, the victory being gotten: who (if Gideon had failed and fallen in the enterprize) would no doubt have held themselves happy by being neglected. But Gideon appeasing them with a mild answer, followed after the enemy, in which pursuit being tyred with travel, and weary even with the slaughtering of his enemies, he desired relief from the inhabitants of Succoth, to the end, that (his Men being refreshed) he might over-take the other two Kings of the Midianites: which had saved themselves by flight. For they were four Princes of the Nations, which had invaded and wasted Israel: to wit, Oreb and Seeb, which were taken already, and Zebah and Zalmunna; which fled. Jud. c. 6. & 7.

Gideon being denyed by them of Succoth, sought the like relief from the Inhabitants of Pennel, who in like sort refused to succour him. To both of these places he threatned therefore the revenge, which in his return from the prosecution of the other two Princes, he performed: to wit, that he would tear the flesh of those of Succoth with thorns and briars, and destroy the Inhabitants and City of Pennel. Now why the people of these two Cities should refuse relief to their brethren the Israelites, especially after so great a victory: if I may presume to make conjecture, it seems likely, first, that those Cities set over Jordan, and in the way of all invasions, to be made by the Moabites, Ammonites and Midianites, into Israel, had either made their own peace with those Nations, and were not spoiled by them; or else they knowing that Zeba and Zalmunna were escaped with a great part of their Army, might fear their revenge in the future. Secondly, it may be laid to the condition and dispositions of these Men: as it is not rare to find of the like humour in all ages. For there are multitudes of Men especially of those which follow the War, that both envy and maligne others, if they perform any praise-worthy actions, for the honour and safety of their own Countrey, though themselves may be assured to bear a part of the smart of contrary success. And such malicious hearts can rather be contented that their Prince and Country should suffer hazzard and want, than that such Men as they mislike, should be the authors or actors of any glory or good to either.

Now Gideon, how or whersoever it were that he refreshed himself and his weary and hungry Souldiers, yet he followed the opportunity, and pursued his former victory to the uttermost: and finding Zebah and Zalmunna in Karkor (suspecting no further attempt upon them) he again surprized them, and slaughtered those 15000 remaining: having put to the sword in the former attempt 120000 and withall he took Zebah and Zalmunna prisoners: whom because themselves had executed Gideon's Brethren before at Tabor, he caused them both to be slain: or (as it is written) at their own request, slew them with his own hands; his Son whom he first com-commanded to do it, refusing it; and in his return from the consummation of this marvellous victory, he took revenge of the Elders of Succoth, and of the Citizens of Penuel: forgiving no offence committed against him, either by strangers, or by his Brethren the Israelites. But such mercy as he shewed to others, his own Children found soon after his death, according to that which hath been said before. The debts of cruelty and mercy are never left unsatisfied: for as he slew the 70 Elders of Succoth, with great and unusual torments, so were his own 70 Sons, all but one, murthered by his own Bastard Abimelec: The like Analogy is observed by the Rabbines, in the greatest of the plagues which God brought upon the Egyptians, who having caused the male Children of the Hebrews to be slain, others of them to be cast into the River and drowned: God rewarded them even with the like measure, destroying their own first born by his Angel, and drowned Pharaoh and his Army in the Red Sea. And hereof a world of examples might be given both out of the Scriptures and other Histories.

In the end so much did the people reverence Gideon in the present, for his victory, and there own deliverance, as they offered him the Sovereignty over them, and to establish him in the Government which Jud. 8.23. he refused, answering; I will not reign over you, neither shall my Child reign over you, but the Lord shall, &c. But he desired the people that they would bestow on him the golden Ear-rings which every Man had gotten. For the Ismaelites, neighbours, and mixt with the Midianites, used to wear them: the weight of all which was a thousand and seven hundred shekles of Gold, which makes of ours 2380. li. if we follow the account of the shekle vulgar. And because Exod. 28. he converted that Gold into an Ephod, a Garment of Jud. 8.28. Gold, blew Silk, Purple, Scarlet, and fine Linnen, belonging to the High Priest only, and set up the same in his own City of Ophra or Ephna, which drew Israel to Idolatry, the same was the destruction of Gideon and his house.

There was another kind of Ephod besides this of the High Priests, which the Levites used, and so did David when he danced before the Ark: and Samuel while he was yet young, which was made of linnen only.

Now if any Man demand how it was possible for Gideon with 300 Men to destroy 120000 of their enemies, and afterward 15000 which remained, we may remember, that although Gideon with 300 gave the first alarm, and put the Midianites in rout and disorder; yet all the rest of the Army came in to the slaughter, and pursuit: for it is written; That the Jud. 7.23. Men of Israel being gathered together out of Nepthali, and out of Asher, and out of Manasse, pursued after the Midianites: for, this Army Gideon left in the Tents behind him, when he went down to view the Army of his enemies, who with the noise of his 300 Trumpets came after him to the execution.

There lived with Gideon, Ægeus, the Son of Pandion, who reigned in Athens: Eurystheus King of Mycenæ: Atreus and Thyestes the Sons of Pelops, who bare dominion over a great part of Peloponnesus, and after the death of Eurystheus, the Kingdom of Mycenæ fell into the hand of Atreus. This is that Atreus, who holding his Brother in jealousie, as an attempter, both of his Wife and Crown, slew the Children of Thyestes, and causing their flesh to be drest, did therewith feast their Father. But this cruelty was not unrevenged. For both Atreus and his Son Agamemnon was slain by a base Son of Thyestes, yet the grand Children, and all the linage of Atreus died by the same sword.

In Gideon's time also those things were supposed to have been done, which are written of Dædalus and Icarus. Dædalus, they say, having slain his Nephew Attalus, fled to Minos King, of Crete for succour; where, for his excellent workmanship he was greatly esteemed, having made for Minos a Labyrinth, like unto that of Egypt. Afterward he was said to have framed an artificial Cow for Pasiphae the Queen, that she, being in love with a fair Bull, might by putting her self into the Cow, satisfie her lust; a thing no less unnatural than incredible, had not that shameless Emperour Domitian exhibited the like beastly spectacle openly before the people of Rome, in his Amphitheater; of purpose, as may seem, to verifie the old Fable. For so it appears by those Verses of Martial, wherein the flattering Poet magnifieth the abominable shew, as a goodly Pageant, in those vitious times.

Junctam Pasiphaen Dicæo credite Tauro
Vidimus, accepit fabula prisca fidem.
Nec se miratur Cæsar, longæva vetustas,
Quicquid fama canit, donat arena tibi.

But concerning that which is reported of Pasiphae, Servius makes a less unhoneſt construction of it, thinking that Dædalus was of her counsel, and her Pandar for the enticeing of a Secretary of Minos called Taurus which signifieth a Bull, who begat her with Child; and that she being delivered of two Sons, the one resembling Taurus, the other her husband Minos, it was feigned that she was delivered of the Monster Minotaur, half a Man, and half a Bull. But this practise being discovered, and Dædalus appointed to be slain, he fled out of Creta to Cocalus King of Sicily: in which passage he made such expedition, as it was feigned that he fashioned wings for himself and his Son to transport them. For whereas Minos pursued him with Boats which had Oars only, Dædalus framed Sails both for his own Boat, and for his Sons, by which he out-went those that had him in chase. Upon which new invention, Icarus bearing himself over-bold, was over-born and drowned.

It is also written of Dædalus, that he made Images that could move themselves, and go, because he carved them with Legs, Arms and Hands; whereas those that preceded him; could only present the Body and Head of those Men, whom they carried to counterfeit, and yet the workmanship was esteemed very rare. But Plutarch, who had seen some of those that were called the Images of Dædalus, found them exceeding rude.

With Gideon also flourished Linus the Theban, the Herinf. Son of Apollo, and Terpsichore, who instructed Thamaris, Orpheus, and Hercules. He wrote of the Creation, of the Sun and Moons course, and of the Generation of living Creatures, but in the end he was slain by Hercules, his Scholar, with his own Harp. Plut. Parall. l. 9.

Again, in this age those things spoken of Sphinx, Strab. l. 9. and Oedipus, are thought to have been performed. This Sphinx being a great robber by Sea and Land, was by the Corinthian Army, led by Oedipus, overcome. But that which was written of her propounding of riddles, to those whom she mastered, was meant by the rocky and unaccessible Mountain near Thebes, which she defended; and by Oedipus dissolving her probleme, his victory over her. She was painted with wings, because exceeding swift, and with the body of a Lion, for her cruelty. But that which Palæphatus reports of Sphinx, were more probable, did not the time disprove it, for he calls her an Amazonite, and the Wife of Cadmus: who when by her her help he had cast Draco out of Thebes (neglecting her) he married the Sister of Draco, which Sphinx taking in despightful part, with her own Troop she held the Mountain by Thebes, from whence she continued a sharp War upon the Thebans, till by Oedipus overthrown. About this time did Minos thrust his Brother out of Crete, and held sharp War with the Megarians and Athenians, because his Son Androgeus was slain by them. He possest himself of Megara, by the treason of Scylla, Daughter of Nisus the King. He was long Master of the Sea, and brought the Athenians to the tribute of delivering him every year seven of their Sons: which tribute Theseus released, as shall be shewed, when I come to the time of the next Judg Thola. In the end he was slain at Camerinus or Camicus in Sicilia, by Cocalus the King, while he pursued Dædalus: and was esteemed by some to be the first Law-giver to those Islands.

To this time are referred many deeds of Hercules, as the killing of Antæus the Giant, who was said to have 60 and odd cubits of length, which though Plutarch doth confirm, reporting that there was such a body found by Sertorius the Roman, in Lybia, where Hercules slew Antæus: yet for my self I think it but a loud lie. That Antæus was of great strength, and a cunning wrestler Eusebius affirmeth: and because he cast so many Men to to the ground, he was feigned to be the Son of the earth. Pliny saith, that he inhabited near the Gardens Hesperides in Mauritania. St. Augustine affirms, that this Hercules was not of Greece, but of Lybia: and the Hydra also which he overcame, Plato expoundeth to be a subtle Sophister.

SECT. VI.

Of the Expedition of the Argonauts.

ABout the eleventh year of Gideon, was the famous expedition of the Argonauts of which many fabulous discourses have been written, the Sum of which is this:

Pelias the Son of Neptune, Brother by the Mothers side to Æson, who was Jasons Father, reigning in Jolcos a Town of Thessaly, was warned by the Oracle of Apollo to take heed of him that wore but one shoe. This Pelias afterward sacrificing to Neptune, invited Jason to him, who coming hastily, lost one shoe in passing over a brook: whereupon Pelias demanded of him what course he would take (supposing he were able) against one of whom an Oracle should advise him to take heed? to which question when Jason had briefly answered, that he would send him to Colchos to fetch the golden Fleece, Pelias immediately commanded him to undertake that service. Therefore Jason prepared for the voyage, having a Ship built by Argus the Son of Phryxus, by the counsel of Pallas: whein he procured all the bravest Men of Greece to sail with him: as Typhis the Master of the Ship, Orpheus the famous Poet, Castor and Pollux the Sons of Tyndarus, Telamon and Peleus Sons of Æacus, and Fathers of Ajax and Achilles, Hercules, Theseus Zetes and Calais the two winged Sons of Boreas, Amphiaraus the great Southsayer, Meleager of Calidon, that slew the great wild Boar, Ascalaphus and Jalmenus, or Almenus, the Sons of Mars, who were afterwards at the last War of Troy, Laërtes the Father of Ulysses, Atalanta a warlike Virgin, Idas and Lynceus, the Sons of Aphareus, who afterwards in fight with Castor and Pollux, slew Castor, and wounded Pollux, but were slain themselves: Lynceus by Pollux, Idas by Jupiter with lightning.

These and many other went with Jason in the Ship Argo: in whose Prow was a table of the Beech of Dodona, which could speak. They arrived first at Lemnos; the Women of which Island having slain all the Males, purposing to lead an Amazonian life, were nevertheless contented to take their pleasure of the Argonauts. Hence they came to the Countrey about Cyzicus: where dwelt a people called Doliones: over whom then reigned one Cyzicus, who entertained them friendly; but it so fell out, that loosing thence by night, they were driven by contrary winds back into his Port, neither knowing that it was the same Haven, nor being known by the Doliones to be the same Men: but rather taken for some of their bordering Enemies: by which means they fell to blows, insomuch that the Argonauts slew the most part of the Doliones, together with their King Cyzicus: which when by day-light they perceived, with many tears they solemnized his Funeral. Then departed they again, and arrived shortly in Mysia, where they left Hercules and Polyphemus the Son of Elates who went to seek Hylas the darling of Hercules, that was ravished by the Nymphs.

Polyphemus built a Town in Mysia called Cios, wherein he reigned. Hercules returned to Argos. From Mysia the Argonauts sailed into Bithinia, which then was peopled by the Bebryses, the ancient Inhabitants of the Country, over whom Amycus the Son of Neptune was then King. He being a strong Man, compelled all strangers to fight with him at whorlbats, in which kind of fight he had slain many, and was now himself slain by Pollux. The Bebryces in revenge of his death flew all upon Pollux, but his companions retcued him with great slaughter of the people. They sailed from hence to Salmydesus a Town in Thrace (somewhat out of the way) wherein Phineus a South-sayer dwelt, who was blind, and vexed with the Harpyes. The Harpyes were said to be a kind of Birds which had the Faces of Women, and foul long claws, very filthy Creatures, which when the table was furnished for Phineus, came flying in, and devouring or carrying away the greater part of the victuals, did so defile the rest, that they could not be endured. When therefore the Arognauts craved his advise and direction for their voyage: You shall do well (quoth he) first of all to deliver me from the Harpyes, and then afterwards to ask my counsel. Whereupon they caused the Table to be covered, and Meat set on; which was no sooner set down, than that presently in came the Harpyes, and played their accustomed pranks: when Zetes and Calais the winged young Men, saw this, they drew their Sword, and pursued them through the Air: Some say, that both the Harpyes and the young Men died of weariness in the fight, and pursuit. But Apollonius saith, that the Harpyes did covenant with the youths, to do no more harm to Phineus, and were thereupon dismissed. For this good turn, Phineus gave them informations of the way, and advertised them withall of the dangerous Rocks, called Symplegades, which by force of windes running together, did shut up the passage; wherefore he willed them to put a Pigeon before them in the passage: and if that passed safe, then to adventure after her; if not, then by no means to hazzard themselves in vain. They did so, and perceiving that the Pigeon had only lost a piece of her taile, they observed the next opening of the Rocks, and then rowing with all their might, passed through safe, onely the end of their Poop was bruised.

From thence forward (as the tale goeth) the Symplegades have stood still, for the Gods, say they, had decreed that after the passage of a ship, they ſhould be fixed. Thence the Argonauts came to the Mariandini, a people inhabited about the mouth of the River Parthenius, where Lycus the King entertained them courteouſly, Here Idmon a Southſayer of their company was ſlain by a wild Boar, alſo here Typhis dyed: and Anceus undertook to ſtear the Ship. So they paſſed by the River Thermodon, and Mount Caucaſus, and came to the River Phaſis, which runs through the land of Colchos. When they were entred the Haven, Jaſon went to Æetes the King of Colchos, and told him the Commandment of Pelias, and cauſe of his coming, deſiring him to deliver the golden Fleece; which Æetes, as the Fable goeth, promiſed to do, if he alone would yoak together two brazen hooft Bulls, and plowing the ground with them, ſowe Dragons Teeth, which Minerva had given to him, being part of thoſe which Cadmus did ſowe at Thebes. Theſe Bulls were great and fierce and breathed out Fire: Vulcan had given them to Æetes.

Whileſt Jaſon was in a great perplexity about this task, Medæa the Daughter of Æetes fell into a moſt vehement love of him, ſo far forth, that being excellent in Magique, ſhe came privily to him, promiſing her help if he would aſſure her of his marriage. To this Jaſon agreed, and confirmed his promiſe by oath. Then gave ſhe to him a medicine wherewith ſhe bade him to annoint both his body and his armour, which would preſerve him from their violence: further ſhe told him, that armed Men would riſe out of the ground, from the Teeth which he ſhould ſowe, and ſet upon him. To remedy which inconvenience, ſhe bade him throw ſtones amongſt them as ſoon as they came up thick, whereupon they would fall together to blows, in ſuch wiſe that he might eaſily ſlay them. Jaſon followed her counſel; whereto when the event had anſwered, he again demanded the Fleece. But Æetes was ſo far from approving ſuch his deſire, that he deviſed how to deſtroy the Argonauts, and burn their Ship; which Medæa perceiving, went to Jaſon, and brought him by night to the Fleece, which hung on an Oak in the Grove of Mars, where, they ſay it was kept by a Dragon that never ſlept. This Dragon was by the Magick of Medæa caſt into a ſleep: ſo taking away the Golden Fleece, ſhe went with Jaſon into the Ship Argo; having with her, her Brother Abſyrtus.

Æetes underſtanding the practices of Medæa, provided to purſue the Ship, whom when Medæa perceived to be at hand, ſhe ſlew her Brother, and cutting him in peices, ſhe ſcattered his limbs in divers places; of which Æetes finding ſome, was fain to ſeek out the reſt, and ſuffer his Daughter to paſs: the parts of his Son he buried in a place, which thereupon he called Tomi; the Greek word ſignifieth Diviſion. Afterwards he ſent many of his ſubjects to ſeek the Ship Argo, threatning that if they brought not back Medæa, they ſhould ſuffer in her ſtead. In the mean while the Argonauts were driven about the Seas, and were come to the River Eridanus: which is Po in Italy.

Jupiter, offended with the ſlaughter of Abſyrtus, vexed them with a great tempeſt, and carried them they knew not whether; when they came to the Iſlands Abſyrtides, there the Ship Argo, (that their might want no incredible thing in this Fable) ſpake to them and ſaid, that the anger of Jupiter ſhould not ceaſe, till they came to Auſonia, and were cleanſed by Circe, from the murder of Abſyrtus. Now they thereupon ſailing between the coaſts of Lybia and Gallia, and paſſing through the Sea of Sardinia, and alongſt the coaſts of Hetruria, came to the Iſle of Æea, wherein Circe dwelt, who cleanſed them. Thence they ſailed by the coaſt of the Syrens, who ſang to allure them into danger: but Orpheus on the other ſide ſang ſo well, that he ſtayed them. Onely Butes ſwam out unto them, whom Venus raviſhed, and carried to Lylibæum in Sicily to dwell.

Having paſt the Syrens, they came between Scylla and Carybdis, and the ſtragling Rocks, which ſeemed to caſt out great ſtore of flames and ſmoak. But Thetis and the Nereides, conveyed them ſafe through at the appointment of Juno. So they coaſted Sicilie, where the Beeves of the Sun were, and touched at Corcyra, the Iſland of the Phæaces, where King Alcinous reigned. Mean while the Men of Colchos, that had been ſent by Æetes in queſt of the Ship Argo, hearing no news of it and fearing his anger, if they fulfilled not his will, betook themſelves to new habitations: Some of them dwelt in the Mountains of Corcyre, others in the Iſlands of Abſyrtides, and ſome coming to the Phæaces, they found the Ship Argo, and demanded Medæa of Alcinous: whereto Alcinous made anſwer, that if ſhe were not Jaſons Wife, they ſhould have her; but if ſhe were already married, he would not take her from her husband. Arete, the Wife of Alcinous, hearing this, married them: wherefore they of Colchos, not daring to return home, ſtayed with the Phæaces, ſo the Argonauts departed thence, and after a while came to Crete. In this Iſland, Minos reigned who had a Man of braſs given to him (as ſome of the Fablers ſay) by Vulcan. This Man had one vein in his body reaching from the neck to the heel, the end whereof was cloſed up with a brazen nail; his name was Talus, his cuſtom was to run thrice a day about the Iſland for the defence of it. When he ſaw the Ship Argo paſs by, he threw Stones at it, but Medæa with her Magick deſtroyed him. Some ſay that ſhe ſlew him by potions, which made him mad; others, that promiſing to make him immortal, ſhe drew out the nail that ſtopt his vein, by which means all his blood ran out, and he died: others there are that ſay he was ſlain by Pæan, who wounded him with an arrow in the heel. From hence the Argonauts ſailed to Ægina, where they were fain to fight for freſh Water. And laſtly, from Ægina they ſailed by Eubæa and Locris, home to Jolchos, where they arrived, having ſpent four whole months in the expedition.

Some there are that by this journey of Jaſon, underſtand the myſtery of the Philoſophers Stone, called the golden Fleece, to which alſo, other ſuperfine Chimiſts draw the twelve labours of Hercules. Suidas thinks that the golden Fleece was meant a golden Book of Parchment, which is of ſheeps-skin, and therefore called golden, becauſe it was taught therein how other mettals might be tranſmuted. Others would ſignifie by Jaſon, Wiſdom, and Moderation, which overcometh all perils: but that which is moſt probable, is the opinion of Dercilus, that the ſtory of ſuch a paſſage was true, and that Jaſon with the reſt went indeed to rob Colchos, to which they might arrive by Boat. For not far from Caucaſus, there are certain ſteep falling Torrents, which waſh down many Grains of Gold, as in many other parts of the World; and the people there inhabiting uſe to ſet many fleeces of Wooll in thoſe deſcents of Waters, in which the grains of gold remain, and the water paſſed thorow, which Strabo witneſſeth to be true. The many Rocks, Straits, Sands, and Currents in the paſſage between Greece and the bottom of Pontus, are Poetically converted into thoſe fiery Bulls, the armed Men riſing out of the ground, the Dragon caſt aſleep, and the like. The Man of braſs, the Syrens, Scylla and Carybdis, were other hazzards zards and adventures which they fell into in the Mediterran Sea, disguised, as the rest, by Orpheus, under Poetical morals: all which Homer afterward used (the man of brass excepted) in the description of Ulysses his travels on the same In-land seas.

SECT. VII.

Of Abimelech, Tholan, and Jair, and of the Lapythæ, and of Theseus, Hippolytus, &c.

After the death of Gideon, Abimelech his base son, begotten on a Concubine of the Sechemites, remembring what offers had been made to his father by the people, who desired to make him and his their perpetual Princes; and, as it seemeth, supposing (notwithstanding his fathers religious modesty) that some of his brethren might take on them the Soveraignty, practised with the Inhabitants of Sechem (of which his mother was native) to make election of himself; who being easily moved with the glory, to have a King of their own, readily condescended: and the better to enable Abimelech, they borrowed seventy pieces of silver of their Idol Baal-
Judg. 9. 4. berith, with which treasure he hired a company of loose and desperate vagabonds, to assist his first detestable enterprise, to wit, the slaughter of his seventy brethren, the sons of Gideon, begotten on his Wives, of which he had many; of all which none
Verse 5. escaped but Jotham the youngest, who hid himself from his present fury: all which he executed on one stone; a cruelty exceeding all that hath been written of in any age. Such is humane ambition, a monster that neither feareth God (though all powerful, and whose revenges are without date, and for everlasting) neither hath it respect to nature, which laboureth the preservation of every being: but it rageth also against her, though garnished with beauty, which never dieth, and love that hath no end. All other passions and affections, by which the souls of men are tormented, are by their contraries often-times resisted or qualified. But ambition, which begetteth every vice, and is it self the child and darling of Satan, looketh only towards the ends by it self set down, forgetting nothing (how fearful and inhumane soever) which may serve it: remembring nothing, whatsoever justice, piety, right or Religion can offer and alledge on the contrary. It ascribeth the lamentable effects of like attempts, to the error or weakness of the undertakers, and rather praiseth the adventure, than feareth the like success. It was the first sin that the World had, and began in Angels: for which they were cast into Hell, without hope of redemption. It was more antient than man, and therefore no part of his natural corruption. The punishment also proceeded his creation, yet hath the Devil, which felt the smart thereof, taught him to forget the one as out of date, and to practise the other, as befitting every age, and mans condition.

Jotham, the youngest of Gideons sons, having escaped the present peril, sought by his best perswasions to alienate the Sechemites from the assisting of this mercilesse Tyrant, letting them know, that those which were vertuous, and whom Reason and Religion had taught the safe and happy estate of moderate subjection, had refused to receive as unlawful, what others had no power to give, without direction from the King of Kings: who from the beginning (as to his own peculiar people) had appointed them, by whom and how to be governed. This he taught them by the Olive, which contented it self with its Fatness, the Fig-tree with its sweetness, and the Vine with the good juice it had: the Bramble only, who was most base, cut down all the rest, and accepted the Soveraignty. He also fore-told them by a Prophetical spirit, what should befall them in the end, and how a fire should come out of the Bramble, and consume the Cedars of Lebanon.

Now (as it is an easie matter to call those men back whom rage without right led on) Gaal the son of Ebed withdrew the Citizens of Sechem from the Service of Abimelech: who therefore after some assaults entred the place, and mastered it; and in conclusion fired the Town, wherein their Idol Baal-berith was worshipped, and put all the people of all sorts to the slaughter. Lastly, in the assault of the Castle or Tower of Tebet, himself was wounded in the head with a stone thrown over the wall by a woman; and finding himself mortally bruised, he commanded his own Page to pierce his body, thereby to avoid the dishonour of being slain by so feeble a hand.

While Abimelech usurped the Government, the Lapithæ and Centaurs made war against the Thebans. These Nations were descended of Apollo, and were the first in those parts that devised to manage horses, to bridle and to sit them: insomuch, as when they first came down from the Mountains of Pindus, into the plains, those which had never seen horsmen before, thought them creatures compounded of men and horses; so did the Mexicans, when Ferdinando Cortes the Spaniard, first invaded that Empire. Palæp. l. 1. de incredi.

After the death of Abimelech, Tholo of Issachar governed Israel 23 years, and after him Jair the Gileadite 22 years, who seems to be descended of Jair the son of Manasse, who in Moses's time conquered a great part of Gilead, and called the same after his own name, Havoth Jair. For to this Jair there remained thirty years of those Cities which his Ancestor had recovered from the Amorites. Of these Judges, because there is nothing else written, it is an argument, that during all their times Israel lived without disturbance, and in peace. Deut. 3. 14. Numb. 12. 41. Judg. 10.

When Jair judged Israel, Priamus began to reign in Troy, who at such time as Hercules sacked Ilium, was carried away captive with his sister Hesione into Greece, and being afterward redeemed for ransom, he re-built and greatly strengthened and adorned Troy; and so far enlarged his Dominions, as he became the supreme Lord in effect of all Asia the less. He married Hecuba the Daughter of Cisseus King of Thrace, and had in all (saith Cicero) fifty sons, whereof seventeen by Hecuba, of whom Paris was one; who attempting to recover his Aunt Hesione, took Helena the Wife of Menelaus, the cause of the war which followed. 2091. In Tusc.

Theseus the tenth King of Athens, began likewise to reign in the beginning of Jair: some Writers call him the son of Neptune and Æthra: but Plutarch in the Story of his life, finds him begotten by Ægeus, of whom the Grecian Sea, between it and Asia the less, took name. For when Minos had mastered the Athenians, so far as he forc'd them to pay him seven of their sons every year for tribute, whom he inclosed within a Labyrinth, to be devoured by the Monster Minotaur: because, belike the sons of Taurus, which he begat on Pasiphae the Queen, had the charge of them: among these seven Theseus thrust himself, not doubting by his valour to deliver the rest, and to free the Countrey of that slavery occasioned for the death of Androgeus, Minos his son.

And having possest himself of Ariadnes affection, who was Minos's daughter, he received from her a bottom of thred, by which he conducted himself through all the crooked and inextricable turnings of the Labyrinth, made in all like that of the City of Crocodiles in Egypt; by means whereof having slain Minotaur, he found a ready way to return. But whereas his father Ægeus had given order, that if he came back with victory and in safety, he should use a white sail in sign thereof, and not that mourful black sail under which they left the port of Athens: This instruction being either forgotten or neglected, Ægeus descrying the ship of Theseus with a black sail, did cast himself over the Rocks down into the Sea, afterward called of his name Ægeum.

One of the first famous acts of Theseus, was the killing of Scyron, who kept a passage between Megara and the Peloponnesian Isthmos, and threw all whom he mastered into the Sea, from the high Rocks. Afterward he did the like to Cercyon, by wrestling, who used by that art to kill others. He also rid the Country of Procrustes, who used to bend down the strong limbs of two trees, and fastned by cords such, as he took part of them to one, and part to the other bough, and by the springing up tare them asunder. So did he root out Periphetes and other mischievous thieves and murtherers. He overthrew the Army of the Amazons, who after many victories and vastations, entred the Territory of Athens. Theseus having taken their Queen Hippolita prisoner, begat on her Hippolitus; with whom afterward his mother-in-law Phædra, falling in love, and he refusing to abuse his fathers bed, Phædra perswaded Theseus, that his son offered to force her: after which it is feigned, that Theseus besought Neptune to revenge this wrong of his sons by some violent death. Neptune taking a time of advantage, sent out his Sea-Calves, as Hippolitus passed by the Sea-shore, and so affrighted his horses, as casting the Coach over, he was (by being intangled therein) torn in pieces. Which miserable and undeserved destiny, when Phedra had heard of, she strangled her self. After which, it is feigned, that Diana intreated Æsculapius to set Hippolitus his pieces together, and to restore him to life: which done, because he was chaste, she led him with her into Italy, to accompany her in her hunting, and field sports.

It is probable that Hippolitus, when his father sought his life, thinking to escape by Sea, was affronted thereat, and did receive many wounds in forcing his passage and escape; which wounds, Æsculapius, to wit, some skilful Physician, or Chirurgion, healed again: after which, he passed into Italy, where he lived with Diana, that is, the life of a Hunter, in which he most delighted. But of those antient prophane Stories Plutarch saith well, that as Cosmographers in their descriptions of the World, where they find many vast places whereof they know nothing, fill the same, with strange Beasts, Birds, and Fishes, and with Mathematical lines; so do the Grecian Historians and Poets imbroider and intermixe the Tales of antient times, with a world of fictions and fabulous discourses. True it is, that Theseus did many great things in imitation of Hercules, whom he made his pattern, and was the first that gathered the Athenians, from being dispersed in thin and ragged Villages: in recompence whereof, and for devising them Laws to live under, and in order, he was by the beggarly, mutable, and ungrateful multitude, in the end banished. Some say, per Ostracismum, by the Law of Lots, or names written on shells, which was a device of his own.

He stole Helen (as they say) when she was fifty years old, from Aphidna, which City, Castor and Pollux overturned, when they followed after Theseus to recover their sister. Eratostratus and Pausanias write, that Theseus begot her with child at Argos, where she erected a Temple to Lucina: but her age makes that Tale unlikely to be true, and so doth Ovid, Non tamen ex facto fructum tulit ille petitum, &c. The rape Eusebius finds in the first of Jair, who governed Israel twenty two years, to whom succeeded Jephta or Jepte, six years, to whom Ibzan, who ruled seven years, and then Habdon eight years: in whose time was the fall of Troy. So, as if Theseus had a child by her in the first of Jair, (at which time we must count her no less than fifteen years old: for the women did not commonly begin so young as they do now) she was then at least two and fifty years old at the destruction of Troy: and when she was stollen by Paris, eight and thirty: but herein the Chronologers do not agree. Yet Eusebius and Bunting, with Halicarnasseus, do in effect consent, that the City was entred and burnt in the first year of Demophoon King of Athens, the Successour of Mnestheus, the Successour of Theseus, seventeen days before the Summer Tropick; and that about the eleventh of September following, the Trojans croft the Hellespont into Thrace, and wintered there, and in the next spring that they navigated into Silicia, where wintering the second year, the next Summer they arrived at Laurentum, and builded Lavinium. But S. Augustine hath otherwise, That when Polyphides governed Sicyon; Mnestheus, Athens; Tautanes, Assyria; Habdon, Israel; then Æneas arrived in Italy, transporting with him in twenty ships, the remainder of the Trojans: but the difference is not great; and hereof more at large in the story of Troy at hand.

In Sicyonia, Phestus the two and twentieth King, reigned eight years, beginning by the common account in the time of Thola. His successours, Adrastus, who reigned four years, and Polyphides, who reigned thirteen, are accounted to the time of Jair; so is also Mnestheus King of Athens and Arteus, who held a great part of Peloponnesus. In Assyria, during the government of these two peaceable Judges, Mitreus, and after him Tautanes reigned. In Egypt, Amenophis, the son of Rameses, and afterwards Annemanes.

SECT. VIII.

Of the War of Thebes, which was in this age.

IN this age was the War of Thebes, the most antient that ever Greek Poet or Historian wrote of: Wherefore the Roman Poet Lucretius, affirming (as the Epicures in this point held truly against the Peripateticks) that the World had a beginning, urgeth them with this objection:

—— Si nulla fuit genitalis origo
Rerumque & Mundi, semperque æterna fuêre,
Cur supra bellum Thebanum, & funera Trojæ,
Non alias alii quoque res cecinere Poetæ?

If all this World had no original,
But things have ever been as now they are:
Before the siege of Thebes, or Troys last fall,
Why did no Poet sing some elder War?

It is true, that in these times Greece was very salvage, the Inhabitants being often chaced from place to place, by the Captains of greater Tribes: and no man thinking the ground whereon he dwelt his own, longer than he could hold it by strong hand. Wherefore merchandize and other intercourse they used little; neither did they plant many trees, or sow more more corn than was neceſſary for their ſuſtenance. Money they had little or none; for it is thought that the name of money was not heard of in Greece, when Homer did write, who meaſures the value of Gold and Braſs by the worth in cattel: ſaying, that the golden Armour of Glaucus was worth an hundred Beeves; and the Copper Armour of Diomedes worth nine.

Roberies by Land and Sea were common and without ſhame, and to ſteal Horſes or Kine was the uſual exerciſe of their great Men. Their Towns were not many, whereof thoſe that were walled were very few, and not great. For Mycenæ, the principal City in Peloponneſus, was a very little thing, and it may well be thought that the reſt were proportionable: briefly, Greece was then in her infancy, and though in ſome ſmall Towns of that half Iſle of Peloponneſus, the Inhabitants might have enjoyed quietneſs within their narrow bounds; as likewiſe did the Athenians, becauſe their Country was ſo barren, that none did care to take it from them: yet that the Land in general was very rude, it will eaſily appear to ſuch as conſider, what Thucydides the greateſt of their Hiſtorians hath written to this effect, in the Preface to his Hiſtory. Wherefore, as in theſe later times, idle Chroniclers uſe when they want good matter, to fill whole Books with reports of great Froſts, or dry Summers, and other ſuch things which no man cares to read; ſo did they, who ſpake of Greece in her beginnings, remember only the great Flouds which were in the times of Ogyges and Deucalion: or elſe rehearſe Fables of men changed into Birds, of ſtrange Monſters, of adultery committed by their gods, and the mighty men which they begat, without writing ought that ſavoured of humanity before the time of the war of Thebes: the brief whereof is this.

Oedipus the ſon of Laius King of Thebes, having been caſt forth when he was an Infant, becauſe an Oracle foretold what evil ſhould come to paſs by him, did afterwards in a narrow paſſage, contending for the way, ſlay his own Father, not knowing either then or long after, who he was. Afterward he became King of Thebes, by marriage of the Queen Jocaſta, called by Homer, Epicaſte: on whom, not knowing her to be his mother, he begat two ſons, Eteocles and Polynices. But when in proceſs of time, finding out by good circumſtances, who were his Parents, he underſtood the grievous murther and inceſt he had committed, he tore out his own eyes for grief, and left the City. His Wife, (and Mother) did hang her ſelf. Some ſay, that Oedipus having his eyes pulled out, was expelled Thebes, bitterly curſing his ſons, becauſe they ſuffered their father to be caſt out of the Town, and aided him not. Howſoever it were, his two ſons made this agreement, that the one of them ſhould reign one year, and the other another year, and ſo by courſe rule interchangeably. But this appointment was ill obſerved. For when Polynices had after a years government reſigned the Kingdom to his brother: or (according to others) when Eteocles had reigned the firſt year, he refuſed to give over the rule to Polynices. Hereupon Polynices fled unto Argos, where Adraſtus the ſon of Talaus then reigned, unto whoſe Palace coming by night, he was driven to ſeek lodging in an out-houſe, on the backſide.

Hom. Odyſſ. 11.

There he met with Tydeus the ſon of Oeneus, who was fled from Calydon: with whom ſtriving about their lodging, he fell to blows. Adraſtus hearing the noiſe came forth and took up the quarrel. At which time, perceiving in the ſhield of Tydeus a Bore, in that of Polynices, a Lion, he remembred an old Oracle by which he was adviſed to give his two Daughtes in marriage to a Lyon and a Bore: and accordingly he did beſtow his Daughter Argia upon Tydeus, and Deipyle upon Polynices, promiſing to reſtore them both to their Countries. To this purpoſe levying an Army, and aſſembling as many valiant Captains as he could draw to follow him, he was deſirous among others to carry Amphiaraus the ſon of Oicleus a great Soothſayer, and a valiant man, along with him. But Amphiaraus, who is ſaid to have fore-ſeen all things, knowing well that none of the Captains ſhould eſcape, ſave only Adraſtus, did both utterly refuſe to be one in that expedition, and perſwaded others to ſtay at home. Polynices therefore dealt with Eriphyle the Wife of Amphiaraus, offering unto her a very fair Bracelet, upon condition that ſhe ſhould cauſe her Husband to aſſiſt him. The Soothſayer knowing what ſhould work his deſtiny, forbade his Wife to take any gift of Polynices. But the Bracelet was in her eye ſo precious a Jewel, that ſhe could not refuſe it. Therefore, whereas a great controverſie between Amphyaraus and Adraſtus, was by way of compromiſe put unto the deciſion of Eriphyle, either of them being bound by ſolemn oath to ſtand to her appointment: ſhe ordered the matter ſo, as a Woman ſhould that did love a Bracelet better than her Husband. He now finding that it was far more eaſie to foreſee then avoid deſtiny, ſought for ſuch comfort as revenge might afford him, giving in charge unto his ſons, that when they came to full age, they ſhould kill their Mother, and make ſtrong war upon the Thebans.

Now had Adraſtus aſſembled all his forces, of which, the ſeven chief Leaders were, Himſelf, Amphiaraus, Capaneus, and Hippomedon (in ſtead of whom ſome name Meciſſeus) all Argives, with Polynices the Theban, Tydeus the Ætolian, and Parthenopeus the Arcadian, ſon of Meleager and Atalanta. When the Army came to the Nemæan Wood, they met a Woman, whom they deſired to help them to ſome Water; ſhe having a Child in her arms, laid it down, and led the Argives to a Spring: but ere ſhe returned, a Serpent had ſlain the Child. This Woman was Hypſipyle the Daughter of Thoas the Lemnian, whom ſhe would have ſaved when the Woman of the Iſle ſlew all the Males by conſpiracy, intending to lead an Amazonian life. For ſuch her Piety, the Lemnian Wives did ſell her to Pyrates, and the Pyrates to Lycurgus Lord of the Countrey about Nemæa, whoſe young ſon Opheltes, or Archemorus ſhe did nurſe, and loſt, as is ſhewed before. When upon the Childs death ſhe hid her ſelf for fear of her Maſter, Amphiaraus told her Sons where they ſhould find her: and the Argives did both kill the Serpent which had ſlain the Child, and in memory of the chance, did inſtitute ſolemn funeral games, called Nemæan, wherein Adraſtus wan the prize with his ſwift horſe Areon, Tydius with the whorlbars, Amphiaraus at running and quoiting, Polynices at wreſtling, Parthenopæus at ſhooting, and one Laodocus in darting. This was the firſt inſtitution of the Nemæan games, which continued after famous in Greece for very many ages. There are, who think that they were ordained in honour of one Opheltus a Lacedæmonian. Some ſay by Hercules, when he had ſlain the Nemæan Lyon: but the common opinion agrees with that which is here ſet down.

From Nemæa the Argives marched onwards, arrived at Citheron, whence Tydeus was by them ſent Embaſſadour to Thebes, to require of Eteocles the performance of Covenants between him and Polynices. This meſſage was nothing agreeable to Eteocles, who who was throughly reſolved to hold what he had, as long as he could: which Tydeus perceiving, and intending partly to get honour, partly to try what mettle was in the Thebans, he made many challenges, and obtained victory in all of them, not without much envy and malice of the people, who laid fifty men in ambuſh to intercept him at his return to the army, of which fifty he ſlew all but one, whom he ſent back to the City as a Reporter and Witneſs of his Valour. When the Argives underſtood how reſolved Eteocles was, they preſented themſelves before the City, and encamped round about it. Thebes is ſaid to have had at that time ſeven gates, which belike ſtood not far aſunder, ſeeing that the Argives (who afterward when they were very far ſtronger, could ſcarce muſter up more thouſands than Thebes had gates) did compaſs the Town, Adraſtus quartered before the Gate Homoloides, Capaneus before the Oygean, Tydeus before Crenis, Amphiaraus at Proëtis, Hippomedon at Anachis, Parthenopæus at Electa, and Polynices at Hyp'ſiſta. In the mean ſeaſon, Eteocles having armed his men, and appointed Commanders unto them, took advice of Tireſias the Soothſayer, who promiſed Victory to the Thebans, if Menœcius the ſon of Creon, a principal man of the City, would vow himſelf to be ſlain in honour of Mars the god of War. So full of malice and pride is the Devil, and ſo envious at his Creators glory, that he not not only challengeth honour due to God alone, as oblations and ſacrifice, with all Divine worſhip, but commandeth us to offer our ſelves and our children unto him, when he hath ſufficiently clouded mens underſtanding, and bewitched their Wills with ignorance and blind devotion. And ſuch abominable ſacrifice of men, maids, and children hath he exacted of the Syrians, Carthaginians, Gauls, Germans, Cyprians, Egyptians, and of many other, if not of all Nations, when through ignorance or fear they were moſt filled with ſuperſtition. But as they grew more wiſe, ſo did he wax leſs impudent in cunning, though not leſs malicious in deſiring the continuance of ſuch barbarous inhumanity. For King Diphilus in Cyprus without advice of any Oracle, made the Idol of that Country reſt contented with an Ox in ſtead of a man. Tiberius forbade humane ſacrifices in Africa, and crucified the Prieſts in the Groves where they had practiſed them. Hercules taught the Italians to drown men of hay in ſtead of the living: yet among the ſalvages in the Weſt Indies theſe cruel offerings have been practiſed of late Ages: which, as it is a ſufficient argument that Satan's malice is only covered and hidden by this ſubtilty among civil people: ſo it may ſerve as a probable conjecture of the barbariſms then raigning in Greece. For Menœcius, as ſoon as he underſtood that his death might purchaſe Victory to his people, beſtowed himſelf (as he thought) upon Mars, killing himſelf before the gates of the City. Then was a battel fought, wherein the Argives prevailed ſo far at the firſt, that Capanius advancing laddars to the Walls, got up upon the Rampart: whence, when he fell, or was caſt down, or (as Writers wave it) was ſtricken down by Jupiter with a thunder bolt, the Argives fled. Many, on each part were ſlain in this battel, which cauſed both ſides to deſire that Eteocles and Polynices might try out the quarrel in ſingle fight; whereto the two brethren according, ſlew each other.

Another battel was fought after their death, wherein the ſons of Aſtacus behaved themſelves very valiantly: Iſmarus one of the ſons, ſlew Hippomedon, which was one of the ſeven Princes: Parthenopæus being another of the ſeven (who was ſaid to have been ſo fair, that none would hurt him when his face was bare) was ſlain by Amphidicus, or, as ſome ſay, by Periclymenus the ſon of Neptune: and the valiant Tydeus, by Menalippus: yet ere Tydeus died, the head of Menalippus was brought unto him by Amphiaraus, which he cruelly tore open, and ſwallowed up the brains. Upon which fact, it is ſaid, that Pallas, who had brought from Jupiter ſuch remedy for his wounds, as ſhould have made him immortal, refuſed to beſtow it upon him: whereby perhaps was meant that his honour which might have continued immortal, did periſh through the beaſtly rage that he ſhewed at his death.

The hoſt of the Argives being wholly diſcomfited, Adraſtus and Amphiaraus fled: of whom, Amphiaraus is ſaid to have been ſwallowed quick into the earth, near to the River Iſmenus, together with his Chariot, and ſo loſt out of mens ſight, being peradventure overwhelmed with dead carkaſſes, or drowned in the River: and his body never found, nor greatly ſought for. Adraſtus eſcaped on his good horſe Arion, and came to Athens; where ſitting at an Altar, called the Altar of Mercy, he made ſupplication for their aid to recover their bodies. For Creon having obtained the government of Thebes after the death of Eteocles, would not ſuffer the bodies of the Argives to be buried: but cauſed Antigone, the only daughter then living of Oedipus, to be buried quick, becauſe ſhe had ſought out and buried the body of her brother Polynices, contrary to Creons Edict. The Athenians condeſcending to the requeſt of Adraſtus, did ſend forth an Army under the conduct of Theſeus, which took Thebes, and reſtored the bodies of the Argives to ſepulture: at which time, Evadne the Wife of Capaneus threw her ſelf into the funeral fire, and was burnt willingly with her Husband. But it little contented the ſons of thoſe Captains which were ſlain at Thebes, that any leſs revenge ſhould be taken of their Fathers death, than the ruine of the City: Wherefore ten years after, having levied Forces, Egialeus the ſon of Adraſtus, Diomedes of Tydeus, Promachus of Parthenopæus, Sthenelus of Capaneus, Therſander of Polynices, and Euripylus of Meciſteus, marched thither under the conduct of Alcmæon, the ſon of Amphiaraus: with whom alſo went his brother Amphylacius. Apollo promiſed Victory, if Alcmæon were their Captain, whom afterward by another Oracle, he commanded to kill his own Mother.

When they came to the City, they were encountred by Laodamas the ſon of Eteocles then King of the Thebans (for Creon was only Tutor to Laodamas) who though he did valiantly in the battel, and ſlew Ægialeus, yet was he put to the worſt, and driven to fly, or (according to Apollodorus) ſlain by Alcmæon. After this diſaſter, the Citizens began to deſire compoſition; but in the mean time they conveyed themſelves with their Wives and Children away from thence by night, and ſo began to wander up and down, till at length they built the Town called Eſtiæa. The Argives, when they perceived that their enemies had quitted the Town, entring in it, ſacked it, threw down the Walls, and laid it waſte; howbeit it is reported by ſome, that the Town was ſaved by Thirſander the ſon of Polynices, who cauſing the Citizens to return, did there reign over them. That he ſaved the City from utter deſtruction, it is very likely; for he reigned there, and led the Thebans to the War of Troy, which very ſhortly after enſued.

SECT. IX.

Of Jephta, and how the three hundred years which he speaketh of, Judg. 11. 28. are to be reconciled with the places, Acts 13. 20. 1 Reg. 6. 1. together with some other things touching Chronology about these times.

AFter the death of Jair (near about whose time these things hapned in Greece, and during whose Government, and that of Thola, Israel lived in peace and in order) they revolted again from the Law and Service of God, and became more wicked and idolatrous than ever. For whereas in the former times they worshipped Baal and Asteroth, they now became followers of all the Heathen Nations adjoyning, and imbraced the Idols of the Aramites, of the Zidonians, Moabites, and Ammonites: with those of the Philistims. And as before it pleased God to correct them by the Aramites, by the Amalekites, and Midianites: so now he scourged them by the Ammonites, and afterward by the Philistims.

Judg. 10. * The persecution of the Ammonites lasted 18 years, and ended in the year of the World 2820. in which year Jephta began,

Now among the Israelites, those of Gilead being most oppress, because they bordered upon the Ammonites, they were inforc't to seek Jephta, whom they had formerly despised and cast from them, because he was base born; but he (notwithstanding those former injuries) participating more of godly compassion, than of devilish hatred and revenge, was content to lead the Gileadites to the War, upon condition that they should establish him their Governour after Victory. And when he had disputed with Ammon for the Land, disproved Ammon's right, and fortified the Title of Israel by many arguments, the same prevailing nothing, he began the war; and being strengthened by God, overthrew them: and did not only beat them out of the Plains, but forc't them over the Mountains of Arabia, even to Minneth, and Abel of the vineyards, Cities expreſt heretofore in the description of the Holy Land. After which victory it is said, that he performed the vain vow which he made, to sacrifice the first living creature he incountred, coming out of his house to meet him; which happned to be his own daughter, and only child, who with all patience submitted her self, and only desired two moneths time to bewail her Virginity on the Mountains of Gilead; because in her the issues of her Father ended: but the other opinion, that she was not offered, is more probable, which Borhæus and others prove sufficiently.

Judg. 11. 28. Judg. 11. 33. Bor. in Judg.

After these things the children of Israel, of the Tribe of Ephraim, either envious of Jephta's victory, or otherwise making way to their future calamity, and to the most grievous slavery that ever Israel suffered, quarrelled with Jephta, that they were not called to the War, as before time they had contested with Gideon. Jephta hereupon inforced to defend himself against their fury, in the incounter, slew of them 42000 which so weakened the body of the Land, as the Philistims had an easie conquest of them all not long after. Jephta, after he had judged Israel six years, died: to whom succeeded Ibzan, who ruled seven years: after him Elon was their Judge ten years: in all which time Israel had peace. Eusebius finds not Elon, whom he calleth Adon, for in the Septuagint, approved in his time, this Judge was omitted.

Judg. 12. 2925. 2942.

Now before I go on with the rest, it shall be necessary upon the occasion of Jephta's account of the times, Judg. 11. 28. (where he says that Israel had then possest the East side of Jordan 300 years) to speak somewhat of the times of the Judges, and of the differing opinions among the Divines and Chronologers: there being found three places of Scripture touching this point, seeming repugnant or disagreeing: the first is in this dispute between Jephta and Ammon, for the right and possession of Gilead: the second is that of St. Paul, Acts 13. the third is that which is in the first of Kings. Jephta here challengeth the possession of Gilead for 300 years: S. Paul giveth to the Judges, as it seems, from the end of Josua to the last of Heli, 450 years. In the first of Kings it is taught, that from the departing of Israel out of Egypt, to the foundation of Solomon's Temple, there were consumed 480 years. To the first, Beroaldus findeth Jephta's 300 years to be but 266 years, to wit, 18 of Josua, 40 of Othoniel, 80 of Aod and Samgar, 40 of Debora, 40 of Gideon, 3 of Abimelech, 23 of Thola, and 22 of Jair: But Jephta (saith Beroaldus) putteth or proposeth a certain number for an uncertain: Sic ut dicat annum agi prope trecentesimum, ex quo nullus litem ea de re moverit Israeli; So he speaketh (saith he) as meaning, that then it was about, or well-nigh, the three hundredth year, since Israel possessed those Countries, no man making question of their right. Codoman on the contrary, finds more years than Jephta named by 65, to wit, 365, whereof 71 were spent in Israels captivity, at several times, of which (as Codoman thinketh) Jephta forbare to repeat the whole sum, or any great part, lest the Ammonites should have justly objected, that 71 of those years the Israelites were in captivity, and vassals to their neighbour Princes, and therefore knowing that to name three hundred years, it was enough for prescription, he omitted the rest.

Judg. 11. 21. Act. 13. 20 1 Kin. 6. 1. Id facit, numero certo pro incerto proposito.

To justifie this account of 365 years, besides the 71 years of captivity or affliction, to be added to Beroaldus his 266, he addeth also 28 years more, and so maketh up the sum of 365. These 28 years he findeth out thus: twenty years he gives to the Seniors between Josua and Othoniel: and where Beroaldus alloweth eighteen years to Josua his government, Codoman accounts that his rule lasted 26, according to Josephus; whereas Saint Augustine and Eusebius give him 27. Melanchon 32. The truth is, that this addition of 28 years, is far more doubtful than the other of 71. But though we admit not of this addition, yet by accounting of some part of the years affliction (to wit 34 years of the 71) if we add them to the 266 years of Beroaldus, which reckoneth none of these, we have the just number of 300 years. Neither is it strange that Jephta should leave out more than half of the years of affliction: seeing, as it is already said, the Ammonites might except against the 71 years, and say, that during these years, or at least a good part of them, the Israelites had no quiet possession of the Countries in question. Martin Luther is the author of a third opinion, making those 300 years remembred by Jephta, to bee 306, which odd years, saith he, Jephta omitteth. But because the years of every Judge, as they reigned, cannot make up the number of 306, but do only compound 266, therefore doth Luther add to this number the whole time which Moses spent in the Desarts of Arabia Petræa; which forty years of Moses added to the number which Beroaldus findeth of 266, make indeed 306.

But I see nothing in the Text to warrant Luther's judgment herein; for in the dispute between Jephta and Ammon for the Land of Gilead, it is written in the person of Ammon, in these words: Because Israel took my Land, when they came up from Egypt, from Arnon unto Jaboc, &c. now therefore restore those Lands quietly; quietly; or in peace. So by this place it is plain, that the time is not to be accounted from Moses's departure out of Egypt: but from the time that the Land was possest. For it is said, Quia cepit Israel terram meam, Behold Israel took my Land: and therefore the beginning of this account is to be referred to the time of the taking: which Jephta's answer also confirmeth in these words: When Israel dwelt in Heshbon, and in her Towns, and in Aroer, and in her Towns, and in all the Cities that are by the coast of Arnon 300 years: why did ye not then recover them in that space? so as this place speaks it directly, that Israel had inhabited and dwelt in the Cities of Gilead 300 years: and therefore to account the times from the hopes or intents that Israel had to possess it, it seemeth somewhat strained to me: for we do not use to reckon the time of our conquests in France, from our Princes intents or purposes, but from their victories and possessions.

Junius nevertheless likes the opinion of Luther, and says, that this time of 300 years hath reference, and is to take beginning from the first of Jephta's narration: when he makes a brief repetition of Moses's whole journey: to wit, at the sixteenth Verse of the eleventh Chapter of Judges, in our translation in these words: But when Israel came up from Egypt, &c. and therefore Moses's his 40 years (as he thinks) are to be accounted, which make the number of 305 years: and not only the time in which Israel possest Gilead, according to the Text, and Jephta's own words: of which I leave the judgment to others; to whom also I leave to judge, whether we may not begin the 480 years, from the deliverance out of Egypt to the Temple, even from the first departure out of Egypt, and yet find a more probable reconciliation of Saint Pauls and Jephta's account with this reckoning, than any of those that as yet have been signified. For first, touching Jephta's three hundred years of possession of the East-side of Jordan, it is to be remembred, that for a good while before the Israelites possessed it, Sehon and Og had dispossessed Moab and Ammon thereof: so that when the Israelites had conquered Sehon and Og, the right of possession which they had, passed to Israel; and so Jephta might say, that they had possessed those Countries 300 years, reckoning 266 years of their own possession, and the rest of the possession of the two Kings, Sehon and Og, whose right the Israelites had by the law of conquest.

Junius in 11. of Judg. annot.

Read the 24. of Jos. and the 2. of Jud. 7. Funct. Chro. f. 4. Beza in his annotations upon the 13. of Act. v. 10.

The second place disputed is this of Saint Paul, Acts 13. that from the end of Josua, to the beginning of Samuel, there past 450 years. And this place Luther understandeth also besides the letter, (as I find his opinion cited by Functius Krentzhemius, and Beza) for I have not read his Commentaries. For he accounteth from the death of Moses, to the last year of Heli, but 357 years: and this he doth the better to approve the times from the egression out of Egypt to the building of the Temple, which in the first of Kings 6. is said to be 480 years.

Act. 13. 20.

Now forasmuch as Saint Paul (as it seems) finds 450 years from the death of Josua to the last of Heli, and leaves but thirty years for Saul and Samuel, who governed 40, for David who ruled 40, and for Solomon who wore the Crown three whole years ere that the foundation of the Temple was laid; therefore Luther takes it, that there was errour in the Scribe, who wrote out this piece of Scripture of Saint Paul: to wit, Then afterward he gave unto them Judges about 450 years, unto the time of Samuel the Prophet: the words [then afterward] being clearly referred to the death, or after the death of Josua, as shall be hereafter proved. But where Saint Luke, rehearsing the words of Saint Paul, wrote 350 years (saith Luther) the Scripture in the transcription being deceived by the affinity of those two Greek words, whereof the one signifieth 300, and the other 400. wrote Tetracosiois, for Triacosiois; 400 years for 300 years; and 450 for 350. This he seeketh to strengthen by many arguments: to which opinion Beza in his great annotations adhereth. A contrary judgement to this hath Codoman: where Luther and Beza begin at Moses's death, he takes his account from the death of Josua, and from thence to the beginning of Samuel he makes 430 years: to wit, of the Judges (not reckoning Sampsons years) 319, and of years of servitude and affliction under strangers, 111. The reason why he doth not reckon Sampsons twenty years is, because he thinks that they were part of the 40 years, in which the Philistims are said to have oppressed Israel. For it is plain, that during all Sampsons time, they were Lords over Israel. So then of the Judges, besides the 111 years of servitude, Codoman reckoneth (as I have said) 319 years, which two sums put together, make 430 years. And whereas Saint Paul nameth 450 years, he finds 20 years to make up Saint Paul's number, to have been spent after the death of Josua by the Seniors, before the Captivity of Cushan, or the election of Othoniel: which 20 years added to 430 make 450, according to Saint Paul. To approve this time of the Elders, he citeth two places of Scriptures, namely the 24 of Josua, and the second of Judges, in each of which places it is written, that Israel served the Lord all the days of Josua, and all the days of the Elders that over-lived Josua: so as to these times of the Elders, Codoman giveth 20 years, which make as before 450, according to Saint Paul. Neither would it breed any great difficulty to this opinion, if here also the 20 years of the Seniors between Josua and Othoniel should be denied. For they which deny these years, and make Othoniels 40 to begin presently upon the death of Josua, as in the beginning of this reckoning, they have 20 years less than Codoman, so toward the end of it (when they reckon the years of affliction apart from the years of the Judges) in the number of Sampsons years, and of the forty years of the Philistims oppressing the Israelites, they have 20 years more than Codoman. For they reckon these 40 years of oppression all of them apart from Sampsons 20: but Codoman, as is said, makes Sampsons 20 to be the one half of the forty of the Philistims oppressions; so that if the 20 years of the Seniors be not allowed to Codoman, then he may reckon (as the letter of the Text seems to inforce) that the Philistims in any Inter-regnum, before Sampson judged Israel, vexed the Israelites 40 years, besides the 20 while Sampson was their Judge; and so the reckoning will come to 450 years between the end of Josua, and the beginning of Samuel, though we admit not of an Inter-regnum of the Seniors between Josua and Othoniel; For, if the times of their afflictions be summed, they make 111 years, to which if we add the years of the Judges, 339, we have the just sum of 450. And this computation either one way or other, may seem to be much more profitable, than theirs that correct the Text, although we should admit of their correction thereof, and read with them 350 for 450. For whereas they conceive that this time of 350 years, is to begin immediately, or soon after the death of Moses: certainly the place of Saint Paul doth evidently teach the contrary, though it be received for true that there was vitium scriptoris in the rest. For these are Saint Pauls words: And about the time of forty years, God suffered their manners in the wilderness: and he destroyed seven Nations in the Land of Canaan, and divided divided their Land to them by lot. Then afterward he gave unto them Judges about 450 years, unto the time of Samuel the Prophet. So as first in the eighteenth verse he speaketh of Moses, and of his years spent in the Wilderness, then in the nineteenth verse he cometh unto the acts of Josua; which were, that he destroyed seven Nations in the Land of Canaan, and divided their Land to them by lot. In the twentieth Verse it followeth, Then afterward he gave them Judges about 450 years, &c. Jos. 14. 1. and therefore to reckon from the death of Moses, is wide of Saint Pauls meaning, so far as my weak understanding can pierce it. The only inconvenience of any weight in opinion of Codoman touching this place in the Acts, is, that it seems irreconcileable with the account, 1 Reg. 6. 11. For if indeed there were spent 450 years between the end of Josua and the beginning of Samuel, certainly there must needs be much more than 480 years between the beginning of the Israelites journeying from Egypt, and the foundation of the Temple by Solomon. To this difficulty Codoman answereth, that these 480 years, 1 Reg. 6. 1. must begin to be reckoned, not in the beginning, but in the ending of their journeying from Egypt, which he makes to be 25 years after the beginning of Othoniels government; from whence if we cast the years of the Judges, with the years of servitude (which sums, according to his account, of which we have already spoken, make 397 years) and so to these years add the 40 of Samuel, and Saul, and the 40 of David, and the 3 of Solomon, we shall have the just sum of 480 years. Neither is it hard, saith he, that the annus egressionis, 1 Kings 6. 1. should be understood egressionis non incipientis, sed finitæ, the year of their coming out of Egypt (for so it is in the original) or the year after they came out of Egypt, may well be understood for the year after they were come out thence, that is, after they had ended their wandring from thence. For so we find that things which were done forty years after they had set foot out of Egypt, are said to have been done in their going out of Egypt; as Psal. 114. When Israel came out of Egypt, Jordan was driven back. And Deut. 4. 45. These are the testimonies which Moses spake when they came out of Egypt. And thus far it seems we may very well agree with Codoman, for the interpretation of the ab exitu, to be as much as quum exivissent, or ab exitu finito: for if Junius, Deut. 4. 45. do well read quum exivissent, for in exitu, as it seems that herein he doth well, why may not we also, to avoid contradiction in the Scripture, expound ab exitu to be, postquam exivissent?

The next point to be cleared, is how their journeying should be said not to have had end until the 25 year after the victory of Othoniel. To this Codoman answereth, that then it had no end, till when all the Tribes had obtained their portions, which happened not until this time: at which time the Danites at length seated themselves, as it is declared, Judg. 18. Judg. 18. 1 For doubtless to this time the Expedition may most conveniently be referred. And thus without any great inconvenience to him appearing, doth Codoman reconcile the account of Jephta, and of Saint Paul, with that in the first of Kings 6. Now whereas it is said, that the Expedition of the Danites was when there was no King in Israel: to this Codoman answereth, that it is not necessary that we should suppose that Othoniel lived all those 40 years of rest, of which Judg. 3. 11. so that by the 25 year after his victory, either he might have been dead, or at least, as Gideon did, he might have refused all Soveraignty, and so either way it might truly be said that at this time (to wit, the 25 year after Othoniels victory) there was no King in Israel. This opinion of Codoman, if it were as consonant to other Chronologers, grounding their opinions on the plain Text, where it is indisputable, as it is in it self round enough and coherent, might perhaps be received as good; especially considering, that the speeches of St. Paul have not otherwise found any interpretation, maintaining them as absolutely true, in such manner as they sound, and are set down. But seeing that he wanteth all help of authority, we may justly suspect the supposition whereupon his opinion is grounded; it being such as the consent of many Authors would hardly suffice to make very probable. For who hath told Codoman, that the conquest of Laish, by the Tribe of Dan, was performed in the five and twentieth year of Othoniel? Or what other probability hath he than his own conjecture, to shew that Othoniel did so renounce the office of a Judge after five and twenty years, that it might then be truly said there was no King in Israel, but every man did that which was good in his own eyes?

Now concerning the rehearsal of the Law by Moses, and the stopping of Jordan, they might indeed be properly said to have been, when Israel came out of Egypt: like as we say that King Edward the first was crowned when he came out of the Holy Land, for so all journeys with their accidents commonly take name from the place either whence or whither they tend. But I think that he can find no such phrase of speech in Scripture as limiteth a journey by an accident, or saith by converting the proposition, when Jordan was turning back, Israel came out of Egypt. Indeed most unproper it were to give date unto actions commenced long after, from an expedition finished long before, namely, to say, that King Edward at his arrival out of Palestina did win Scotland, or died at Carlile. How may we then believe that enterprize performed so many years after the division of the Land (which followed the conquest at the journeys end) should be said to have been at the time of the departure out of Egypt? Or who will not think it most strange, that the most notable account of time, serving as the only guide for certain ages in sacred Chronology, should not take name and beginning from that illustrious deliverance out of Egypt, rehearsed often by God himself among the principal of his benefits to Israel, whereof the very day and moneth are recorded in Scripture (as likewise are the year and moneth wherein it expired) and the form of the year upon that occasion changed; but should have reference to the surprizing of a Town by six hundred men, that robbed a Chappel by the way, and stole from thence Idols to be their guides, as not going to work in Gods Name? For this accident whereupon Codoman buildeth, hath either no time given to it, or a time far different from that which he supposed, and is indeed rather by him placed in such a year, because it best stood with his interpretation so to have it, than for any certainty or likelihood of the thing it self.

Wherefore we may best agree with such as affirm, that the Apostle Saint Paul did not herein labour to set down the course of time exactly (a thing no way concerning his purpose) but only to shew that God, who had chosen Israel to be his people, delivered them out of bondage, and ruled them by Judges and Prophets unto the time of Saul, did raise up our Lord Jesus Christ out of the seed of David the King, in whose succession the Crown was established, and promise made of a Kingdom that should have no end. Now in rehearsing briefly thus much which tended as a Preface to the declaration following (wherein he sheweth Christ to have been the true Messias) the Apoſtle was ſo far from labouring to make an exact calculation of times (the Hiſtory being ſo well known and believed of the Jews to whom he preached) that he ſpake as it were at large of the 40 years conſumed in the Wilderneſs, whereof no man doubted, ſaying, that God ſuffered their manners in the Wilderneſs about 40 years. In like manner he proceeded, ſaying, that from the diviſion of the Land unto the days of Samuel the Prophet, in whoſe time they required to have a King, there paſſed about 450 years. Neither did he ſtand to tell them, that an hundred and eleven years of bondage mentioned in this middle while, were by exact computation to be included within the 339 years of the Judges; for this had been an impertinent digreſſion from the argument which he had in hand. Wherefore it is not a work ſo needful as laborious, to ſearch out of this place that which the Apoſtle did not here intend to teach, when the ſum of 480 years is ſo expreſly and purpoſely ſet down.

Now that the words of St. Paul (if there be no fault in the copy through error of ſome Scribe) are not ſo curiouſly to be examined in matter of Chronology, but muſt be taken, as having reference to the memory and apprehenſion of the Vulgar, it is evident by his aſcribing in the ſame place 40 years to the reign of Saul: whereas it is manifeſt that thoſe years were divided between Saul and Samuel, yea, that far the greater part of them were ſpent under the government of the Prophet, howſoever they are here included in the reign of the King. As for thoſe that with ſo much cunning forſake the general opinion, when it favoureth not ſuch expoſition as they bring out of a good mind, to help where the need is not over-great; I had rather commend their diligence, than follow their example. The words of St. Paul were ſufficiently juſtified by Beroaldus, as having reference to a common opinion among the Scribes in thoſe days, that the 111 years of ſervitude were to be reckoned apart from the 339 years aſcribed to the Judges; which account the Apoſtle would not in this place ſtand to contradict, but rather choſe to ſpeak as the Vulgar, qualifying it with a quaſi, where he ſaith, quaſi quadringentis & quinquaginta annis; As it were four hundred and fifty years. But Codoman being not thus contented, would needs have it be ſo indeed, and therefore diſ-joyns the members to make the account even. In ſo doing he daſheth himſelf againſt a notable Text, whereupon all Authors have builded, (as well they might and ought) that purpoſely and preciſely doth caſt up the years from the departure out of Egypt, unto the building of Solomon's Temple, not omitting the very moneth it ſelf.

1 King. 6.

Now (as commonly the firſt apprehenſions are ſtrongeſt) having already given faith to his own interpretation of St. Paul, he thinketh it more needful to find ſome new expoſition for that which is of it ſelf moſt plain, and to examine his own conjecture upon a place that is full of controverſie. Thus by expounding after a ſtrange Method, that which is manifeſt by that which is obſcure, he loſeth himſelf in thoſe ways wherein before him never man walked. Surely if one ſhould urge him to give reaſon of theſe new opinions, he muſt needs anſwer, that Othoniel could not govern above 25 years, becauſe then was the taking of Laiſh; at which time there was no King in Iſrael; That the Danites muſt needs have taken Laiſh at that time, becauſe elſe we could not reckon backwards from the foundation of the Temple to any action that might be termed the coming of Iſrael out of Egypt, without excluding the years of ſervitude; And that the years of ſervitude muſt needs be included, for that otherwiſe he himſelf ſhould have ſpent his time vainly, in ſeeking to pleaſure St. Paul with an expoſition. Whether this ground be ſtrong enough to uphold a Paradox, I leave it to the deciſion of the judicious Reader.

And now to proceed in our ſtory. To the time of Jephta are referred the death of Hercules, the rape of Helen by Paris, and the proviſions which her huſband Menelaus, reigning then in Sparta, & his brother Agamemnon King of Mycenæ, made for her recovery. Others refer this rape of Helen to the fourth year of Ibzan: from which time, if the war of Troy (as they ſuppoſe) did not begin till the third of Ailon or Elon, yet the Greeks had ſix years to prepare themſelves: the rule holding not true in this War, Longa præparatio belli celerem affert victoriam; That a long preparation begets a ſpeedy victory: for the Greeks conſumed ten years in the attempt; and Troy, as it ſeems, was entred, ſackt, and burnt in the third year of Habdon.

Three years after Troy was taken, which was in the ſixth year of Habdon, Æneas arrived in Italy. Habdon in the eighth year of his rule, died, after he had been the Father of 40 ſons, and 30 grand-children. And whereas it is ſuppoſed, that the 40 years of Iſraels oppreſſion by the Philiſtims (of which Judg. 13. 1.) took beginning from the ninth year of Jair, and ended with the laſt of Habdon: I ſee no reaſon for that opinion. For Ephraim had had little cauſe of quarrel againſt Jephta, for not calling them to war over Jordan, if the Philiſtims had held them in ſervitude in their own territories; and if Ephraim could have brought 42000 armed men into the field, it is not likely that they were then oppreſt: and had it been true that they were, who will doubt but that they would rather have fought againſt the Philiſtims with ſo powerful an Army for their own deliverance, than againſt their own brethren the Iſraelites? but Ammon being overthrown, it ſeemed at that time, that they feared no other enemy. And therefore theſe 40 years muſt either be ſupplied elſewhere, as in the time of Sampſon, and afterward: or elſe they muſt be referred to the Inter-regnum between the death of Habdon, and the deliverance of Iſrael by Sampſon, ſuch as it was.

CHAP. XIV.

Of the War of Troy.

SECT. I.

Of the Genealogie of the Kings of Troy, with a note touching the antient Poets, how they have observed historical truth.

THe War at Troy, with other ſtories hereupon depending (becauſe the ruine of this City, by moſt Chronologers is found in the time of Habdon Judg of Iſrael whom in the laſt place I have mentioned) I rather chooſe here to treat of in one entire narration, beginning with the lineal deſcent of their Princes, than to break the ſtory into peices by rehearſing a-part in divers years, the diverſity of occurrents.

The Hiſtory of the antient Kings of Troy is uncertain, in regard both of their original, and of their continuance. It is commonly held that Teucer and Dardanus were the two Founders of that Kingdom. This is the opinion of Virgil: which if he (as Reineccius thinks) took from Beroſus, it is the more probable: if Annius borrowed it of him, then it reſts upon the authority of Virgil, who ſaith thus:

Creta Jovis magni medio jacet inſula Ponto:
Mons Idæus ubi, & gentis cunabula noſtræ.
Centum Urbes habitant magnas, uberrima regna:
Maximus undè Pater (ſi ritè audita recordor)
Teucrus Rhœteas primum eſt advectus ad oras,
Optavitque locum regno. Nondum Ilium & arces
Pergameæ ſteterant: habitabant vallibus imis.
Hinc Mater cultrix Cybele, Corybantiaque æra, Idæumque nemus.

In the main Sea the Ile of Crete doth lie;
Where Jove was born, thence is our progeny.
There is a mount Ida: there in fruitful Land
An hundred great and goodly Cities ſtand.
Thence (if I follow not miſtaken fame)
Teucer the eldeſt of our grand-ſires came
To the Rhœtean ſhores: and reigned there,
Ere yet fair Ilion was built, and ere
The Towers of Troy: their dwelling place they ſought
In loweſt Vales. Hence Cybels rites were brought:
Hence Corybantian Cymbals did remove;
And hence the name of our Idæan grove.

Thus it ſeemeth by Virgil, who followed ſurely good authority, that Teucer firſt gave name to that Countrey, wherein he reigned ere Troy was built by Dardanus: of which Dardanus in the ſame book he ſpeaks thus:

Eſt locus, Heſperiam Graii cognomine dicunt:
Terra antiqua, potens armis atque ubere gleba,
Oenotrii coluere viri; nunc fama minores
Italiam dixiſſe, ducis de nomine gentem.
Hæ nobis propriæ ſedes: hinc Dardanus ortus:
Jaſiuſque Pater, genus à quo principe noſtrum.

Heſperia the Græcians call the place:
An antient fruitful Land, a warlike race,
Oenotrians held it: now the later progeny
Gives it their Captains name, and calls it Italy:
This ſeat belongs to us; hence Dardanus,
Hence came the Author of your ſtock, Jaſius,

Atque equidem memini (fama eſt obſcurior annis)
Auruncos ita fere ſenes, hic ortus ab agris
Dardanus Idæus, Phrygiæ penetravitque ad urbes,
Threiciamque Samum, quæ nunc Samothracia fertur.
Hinc illum Coryti Tyrrhena ab ſede profectum,
Aurea nunc ſolio ſtellantis regia cœli
Accipit, &c.

Some old Auruncans, I remember well,
(Though time have made the fame obſcure) would tell
Of Dardanus, how born in Italy,
From hence he into Phrygia did flie
And leaving Tuſcaine (where he earſt had place)
With Corytus did ſail to Samothrace;
But now inthronized he ſits on high,
In golden Palace of the ſtarry Sky.

But contrary to this, and ſo many Authors, approving and confirming it, Reineccius thinks that theſe names, Troes, Teucri, & Thraces, are derived from Tiras or Thiras the Son of Japhet: and that the Dardanians, Myſians, and Aſcanians, mixt with the Troians, were Germane Nations, deſcended from Aſhkenaz, the Son of Gomer: of whom the Country, Lake, and River of Aſcanius in Aſia, took name. That Aſhkenaz gave name to thoſe places and people, it is not unlikely: neither is it unlikely, that the Acanii, Dardani, and many others did in aftertimes paſs into Europe: that the name of Teucer came of Tyras, the conjecture is ſomewhat hard. Concerning Teucer, whereas Halicarnaſſæus makes him an Athenian, I find none that follow him in the ſame opinion. Virgil (as is before ſhewed) reported him to be of Crete, whoſe authority is the more to be regarded, becauſe he had good means to find the truth, which it is probable that he carefully ſought, and in this did follow, ſeeing it no way concerned Auguſtus (whom other whiles he did flatter) whether Teucer were of Crete or no. Reineccius doth rather embrace the opinion of Diodorus, and others that think him a Phrygian, by which report he was the Son of Scamander and Ida, Lord of the Countrey, not founder of the City; and his Daughter or Neece Batia was the ſecond Wife of Dardanus founder of Troy. Reineccius further thinks that Atlas reigned in Samothracia, and gave his Daughter Electra to Corythus, or Coritus: and that theſe were parents to Chryſe, firſt wife to Dardanus. Virgil holds otherwiſe; and the common Tradition of Poets makes Dardanus the Son of Electra by Jupiter which Electra was the Daughter of Atlas, and Wife to Coritus King of Hetruria, to whom ſhe bare Jaſius.

Annius out of his Berosus finds the name of Comblobascon, to whom he gives the addition of Corytus as a Title of dignity, making him Father of Dardanus and Jasius; and further telling us very particularly of the faction between these Brethren, which grew to such a heat, that finally Dardanus killed his Brother, and therefore fled into Somothrace. The obscurity of the History gives leave to Annius of saying what he list. I, that love not to use such liberty, will forbear to determine any thing herein. But if Dardanus were the Son of Jupiter, it must have been of some elder Jupiter than the Father of those that lived about the War of Troy. So it is likewise probable that Atlas the Father of Electra was rather an Italian than an African, which also is the opinion of Boccace. For (as hath often been said) there were many Jupiters, and many of almost every name of Gods: but it was the custome to ascribe to some one, the acts of the rest, with all belonging to them. Therefore I will not greatly trouble my self with making a narrow search into these fabulous Antiquities, but set down the Pedigree according to the general fame; allowing to Teucer such Parents as Diodorus gives, because others giving him none, and carrying the line of Dardanus in manner following.

Concerning

Concerning the beginning and continuance of the Trojan Kingdom, with the length of every Kings reign, I have chosen good Authors to be my guides, that in a History whereon depends the most ancient computation of times among the Greeks, I might not follow incertainties, ill cohering with the consent of Writers, and general passage of things elsewhere done. And first for the destruction of Troy, which was of greater note than any accident befalling that City whilst it stood, it is reckoned by Diodorus to be 780 years more ancient than the beginning of the ninty fourth Olympiad. Whereas therefore 372 did pass between the beginning of the Olympiads, and the first year of the 94, it is manifest that the remainder of 780 years, that is, 408 years went between the destruction of Troy, and the first institution of those games by Iphitus, if the authority of Diodorus be good proof, who elsewhere tells us, that the return of the Heraclidæ, which was 80 years after the fall of Troy, was 328 years before the first Olympiad.

Dionys. Halic. Antiq. 2.

Hereunto agrees the authority of Dionysius Hilicarnasseus, who placing the foundation of Rome in the first of the seventh Olympiad, that is, four and twenty years after the beginning of those games, accounts it 432 later then the fall of Troy. Solinus in expres words, makes the institution of the Olympiads by Iphitus, whom he calleth Iphiclus, 480 years later than the destruction of Troy. The sum is easily collected by necessary inference out of divers other places in the same book. Hereunto doth Eusebius, reckoning exclusively agree: and Eratosthenes (as is cited by Clemens Alexandrinus) makes up out of many particulars, the same total sum, wanting, but one year, as reckoning likewise exclusively.

Solin. Po. hist. c. 2.

Euseb. de prap. Evan l. 10. c. 3. Cle. Alex. Strom. lib. 1.

The other collections of divers Writers that are cited by Clemens in the same place, do neither cohere any way, nor depend upon any collateral History, by which they may be verified.

The destruction of Troy being in the year before the Olympiads four hundred and eight: we must seek the the continuance of that from the beginning to the end, out of Eusebius, who leads us from Dardanus on-wards, through the reigns of four Kings, by the space of two hundred and five and twenty years, and after of Priamus, with whom also at length it ended. As for the time which passed under Laomedon, we are fain to do as others have done before us, and take it upon trust from Annius his Authors; believing Manetho so much the rather, for that in his account of the former Kings reigns, and of Priamus, he is found to agree with Eusebius, which may give us leave to think that Annius hath not herein corrupted him. But in this point we need not be very scrupulous: for seeing that no History or account of time depends upon the reign of the former Kings, but only upon the ruins of the City under Priamus, it may suffice that we are careful to place that memorable accident in the due year.

True it is, that some objections appearing weighty, may be alledged in maintenance of different computations, which with the answers I purposely omit, as not willing to dispute of those years, wherein the Greeks knew no good form of a year; but rather to make narration of the actions which were memorable, and acknowledged by all Writers, whereof this destruction of Troy was one of the most renowned.

The first enterprise that was undertaken by general consent of all Greece, was the last War of Troy, which hath been famous even to this day, for the numbers of Princes and valiant Commanders there assembled, the great battails fought with variable success; the long endurance of the siege; the destruction of that great City; and the many Colonies planted in sundry countries, as well by the remainder of the Trojans, as by the victorious Greeks after their unfortunate return. All which things, with enumerable circumstances of especial note, have been delivered unto posterity, by the excellent wits of many Writers, especially by the Poems of that great Homer, whose Verses have given immortality to the action, which might else perhaps have been buried in oblivion; among other worthy deeds, done both before and since that time. For it is true which Horace saith:

Vixere fortes ante Agamemnona
Multi, sed omnes illacrimabiles
Urgentur, ignotiq; longa
Nocte: carent quia Vate sacro.

Many by valour have deserv'd renown
Ere Agamemnon; yet lie all oppress
Under long night, unwept for, and unknown:
For with no sacred Poet were they blest.

Yet so it is, that whilst the Writers have with strange fables, or (to speak the best of them) with Allegories far strained, gone about to enlarge the commendations of those noble undertakers: they have both drawn into suspition that great vertue which they sought to adorn, and filled after-ages with almost as much ignorance of the History, as admiration of the persons. Wherefore it is expedient that we seek for the knowledg of such actions, in Histories; learning their qualities who did manage them, of Poets, in whose works are both profit and delight; yet small profit to those which are delighted otherwise: but such as can interpret their fables, or separate them from the naked truth, shall find matter in Poems, not unworthy to be regarded of Historians. For those things excepted, which are gathered out of Homer, there is very little, and not without much disagreement of Authors, written of this great War. All Writers consent with Homer, that the rape of Helen by Paris the Son of Priamus, was the cause of taking Arms: but how he was hereunto emboldned, it is doubtful.

SECT. II.

Of the rape of Helen: and strength of both sides for the War.

Herodotus fetcheth the cause of this rape from very far; saying, That whereas the Phœnicians had ravished Io, and carried her into Egypt, the Greeks, to be revenged on the Barbarians, did first ravish Europa, whom they brought out of Phœnicia into Creta, and afterward Medæa, whom they fetcht from Colchos, denying to restore her to her Father, till such time as they might be satisfied for the rape of Io. By these deeds of the Greeks, Paris (as the same Herodotus affirms) was emboldned to do the like; not fearing such revenge as ensued. But all this narration seems frivolous, for what had the King of Colchos to do with the injury of the Phœnicians? Or how could the Greeks, as in revenge of Io, plead any quarrel against him, that never had heard the name of Phœnicians? Thucydides, a writer of unquestionable sincerity, maketh it plain, that the name of Barbarians was not used at all in Homers time, which was long after the War of Troy: and that the Greeks themselves were not then called all by one name, Hellenes, as afterwards. So that it were unreasonable to think, that they should have sought revenge upon all Nations, as barbarous, for the injury received by one: or that all all people elſe ſhould have eſteemed of the Greeks, as of a people oppoſed to all the World; and that even then when as the Greeks had not yet one common name among themſelves. Others with more probability ſay, that the rape of Helen was to procure the redelivery of Heſione, King Priamus his Siſter, taken formerly by Hercules, and given to Telamon. This may have been true: for Telamon (as it ſeems) was a cruel Man, ſeeing his own Son Teucer durſt not come in his ſight, after the War of Troy, but fled into Cyprus, only becauſe his Brother Ajax (which Teucer could not remedy) had ſlain himſelf. Yet, were it ſo, that Heſione was ill entreated by Telamon, it was not therefore likely that Priamus her Brother would ſeek to take her from her Husband, with whom ſhe had lived about thirty years, and to whom ſhe had born Children, which were to ſucceed in his Dominion. Whereupon I think that Paris had no regard either to the rape of Europa, Medæa, or Heſione, but was meerly inticed by Venus, that is, by his luſt, to do that which in thoſe daies was very common. For not only Greeks from Barbarians, and Barbarians from Greeks, as Herodotus diſcourſeth; but all people were accuſtomed to ſteal Women and Cattel, if they could by ſtrong hand or power get them: and having ſtoln them,, either to ſell them away in ſome far Country, or keep them to their own uſe. So did Theſeus and Pirython attempt Proſerpina; and ſo did Theſeus (long before Paris) raviſh Helen. And theſe practiſes, as it appears in Thucydides, were ſo common, that none durſt inhabit near unto the Sea, for fear of pyracy, which was accounted a trade of life no leſs lawful than merchandiſe: wherefore Tyndareus, the Father of Helen, conſidering the beauty of his daughter, and the rape which Theſeus had made, cauſed all her Wooers, who were moſt of the principal Men in Greece, to bind themſelves by ſolemn oath, that if ſhe were taken from her Husband, they ſhould with all their might help to recover her. This done, he gave free choice of a husband to his Daughter, who choſe Menelaus Brother to Agamemnon. So the cauſe which drew the Greeks unto Troy in revenge of Helens rape, was partly the oath which ſo many Princes had made unto her Father Tyndareus. Hereunto the great power of Agamemnon was not a little helping: for Agamemnon, beſides his great Dominions in Peloponneſus, was Lord of many Iſlands; he was alſo rich in Money, and therefore the Arcadians were well contented to follow his pay, whom he embarked for Troy in his own Ships, which were more than any other of the Greek Princes brought to that expedition.

Thus did all Greece, either as bound by oath, or led by reputation and power of the two Brethren, Agamemnon, and Menelaus; or deſirous to partake of the profit and honour of that great enterpriſe: take Arms againſt the Trojans. The Greeks Fleet was (by Homer's account) 1200 ſayl, or thereabouts: but the veſſels were not great: for it was not then the manner to build Ships with decks: only they uſed (as Thucydides ſaith) ſmall Ships, meet for robbing on the Sea; the leaſt of which carried fifty Men, the greateſt 120, every Man (except Captains) being both a Mariner and a Souldier. By this proportion it appears that the Grecian Army conſiſted of 100000 Men or thereabout. This was the greateſt Army that ever was raiſed out of Greece: and the greatneſs of this Army doth well declare the ſtrength and power of Troy, which ten whole years did ſtand out againſt ſuch forces: yet were the Trojans which inhabited the City, not the tenth part of this number, as Agamemnon ſaid in the ſecond of Homers Iliads; but their followers and aids were very many and ſtrong. For all Phrygia, Lycia, Miſſia, and the greateſt part of Aſia the leſs, took part with the Trojans. The Amazons alſo brought them ſuccour. And Rheſus out of Thrace, and Memnon out of Aſſyria (though ſome think out of Æthiopia) came to their defence.

SECT. III.

Of the Grecians journey, and Embaſſage to Troy, and of Helena's being detained in Egypt, and of the ſacrificing of Iphigenia.

WHerefore the Greeks, unwilling to come to tryal of arms, if things might be compounded by treaty ſent Menelaus and Ulyſſes Embaſſadours to Troy: who demanded Helen, and the goods were taken with her out of Menelaus his Houſe. What anſwer the Trojans made hereunto it is uncertain, Herodotus from the report of the Egyptian Prieſts, makes it very probable, that Helen was taken from Paris before his return to Troy. The ſum of his diſcourſe is this.

Paris in his return with Helena, being driven by foul weather unto the coaſt of Egypt, was accuſed for the rape of Helen by ſome bondmen of his, that had taken Sanctuary. Proteus then King of Egypt, finding the accuſation true by examination, detained Helen, and the goods taken with her, till her Husband ſhould require them: diſmiſſing Paris without further puniſhment, becauſe he was a ſtranger. When therefore the Greeks demanding Helen, had anſwer, that ſhe was in Egypt, they thought themſelves deluded, and thereupon made the War which ended with the ruine of Troy. But when after the City taken, they perceived indeed ſhe had not been there, they returned home, ſending Menelaus to ask his Wife of Proteus. Homer, and the whole Nation of Poets (except Euripides) vary from this Hiſtoy, thinking it a matter more magnificent, and more graceful to their Poems, for the retaining of a fair Lady, than that they endured all by force, becauſe it lay not in their power to deliver her. Yet in the fourth of his Odyſſes, Homer ſpeaks of Menelaus his being in Egypt, before he returned home to Sparta; which voyage it were not eaſily believed that he made for pleaſure, and if he were driven by contrary Winds, much more may we think that Paris was likely to have been driven thither by foul Weather. For Paris immediately upon the rape committed, was enforced to fly, taking ſuch Winds as he could get, and rather enduring any ſtorm, than to commit himſelf to any Haven in the Greek Seas: whereas Menelaus might have put into any Port in Greece, and there have remained with good entertainment, until ſuch time as the Wind had come about, and ſerved for his Navigation.

One great argument Herodotus brings to confirm the ſaying of the Egyptian Prieſts; which is, that if Helen had been at Troy, it had been utter madneſs for Priamus to ſee ſo many miſeries befall him, during the war, and ſo many of his Sons ſlain for the pleaſure of one, who neither was heir to the Kingdom (for Hector was elder), nor equal in vertue to many of the reſt. Beſides it may ſeem that Lucian ſpake not more pleaſantly then truly, when he ſaid that Helen, at the War of Troy, was almoſt as old as Queen Hecuba, conſidering that ſhe had been raviſhed by Theſeus the companion of Hercules, who took Troy when Priamus was very young; and conſidering further, that ſhe was Siſter to Caſtor and Pollux (ſhe and Pollux being ſaid by ſome to have been twins) who ſailed with the Argonauts, having Telamon mon the Father of Ajax in their company, before the time that Hesione was taken; on whom Telamon begat Ajax, that was a Principal Commander in the Trojan war. But whether it were so that the Trojans could not, or would not restore Helen, so it was that the Embassadours returned ill contented, and not very well entreated, for there wanted not some that advised to have them slain. The Greeks hereupon incensed, made all hast towards Troy: at which time Calchas (whome some say to have been a runnagate Trojan, though no such thing be found in Homer) filled the Captains, and all the Host with many troublesome answers and divinations. For he would have Agamemnons daughter sacrificed to appease Diana, whose anger, he said, withstood their passage. Whether the young Lady were sacrificed, or whether (as some write) the Goddess was contented with a Hind, it is not needful here to be disputed of. Sure it is, that the malice of the Devil, which waits for all opportunities, is never more importunate, than where mens ignorance is most. Calchas also told the Greeks, that the taking of Troy was impossible, till some fatal impediments were removed: and that till ten years were past, the Town should hold out against them. All which notwithstanding, the Greeks proceeded in their enterprise, under the command of Agamemnon, who was accompanied with his brother Menelaus, Achilles the most valiant of all the Greeks, his friend Patroclus, and his Tutor Phœnix, Ajax and Teucer, the sons of Telamon; Idomeneus, and his companion Meriones; Nestor and his sons Antilochus and Thrasymides; Ulisses, Menestheus the son of Petreus, Captain of the Athenians; Diomedes the son of Tydeus, a man of singular courage; the wise and learned Palamedes, Ascalaphus, and Talmenus, the sons of Mars, who had sailed with the Argonauts; Philoctetes also the son of Pœan, who had the arrows of Hercules, without which Chalcas said, that the City could not be taken, Ajax the son of Oilius, Peneleus, Thoas, Eumelus, Tysandrus, Euripilus, Athamas, Sthenelus, Tlepolemus the son of Hercules; Podalyrius, and Machon, the sons of Æsculapius; Epeus, who is said to have made the wooden Horse, by which the Town was taken; and Protesilaus, who first leapt on shore, neglecting the Oracle that threatned death to him that landed first.

SECT. IV.

Of the Acts of the Græcians at the siege.

THese, and many other of less note, arriving at Troy found such sharp entertainment, as might easily perswade them to think that the war would be more than one years work. For in the first encounter, they lost Protesilaus, whom Hector slew, and many others, without any great harm done to the Trojans; save only that by their numbers of men, they wan ground enough to encamp themselves in, as appeareth in Thucydides. The principal impediment which the Greeks found, was want of victuals, which grew upon them by reason of their multitude, and the smalness of their vessels, wherein they could not carry necessaries for such an Army. Hereupon they were compelled to send some part of their men, to labour the ground in Cherronesus: others to rob upon the Sea for the relief of the Camp. Thus was the war protracted nine whole years, and either nothing done, or if any skirmishes were, yet could the Town receive little loss by them, having equal numbers to maintain the field against such Greeks as continued the siege, and a more safe retreat, if the enemy got the better.

Wherefore Ovid saith, That from the first year, till the tenth, there was no fighting at all, and Heraclide commends as very credible, the report of Herodicus, that the Greeks did not lye before Troy the first nine years; but only did bear up and down the Seas, exercising their men, and inriching themselves, and so by wasting the Enemies Country, did block up the Town, unto which they returned not, until the fatal time drew near when it should be subverted.

This is confirmed by the enquiry which Priamus made, when the Greek Princes came into the field, the tenth year, for he knew none of them; and therefore sitting upon an high Tower (as Homer tells) he learned their names of Helen: which though it is like to be a fiction, yet could it not at all have been supposed that he should be ignorant of them, if they had shewed themselves before the Town so many years together. Between these relations of Thucydides and Herodicus, the difference is not much, the one saying, that a few of the Greeks remained in the Camp before Troy, whilest the rest made purveyance by Land and by Sea: the others that the whole army did spend the time in wasting the Sea-coasts. Neither do the Poets greatly disagree from these authors: for they make report of many Towns and Islands wasted, and the people carried into Captivity; in which actions Achilles was employed, whom the army could not well, nor would have spared, if any service of importance had been to be performed before the City. Howsoever it was, this is agreed by general consent, that in the begininng of that Summer, in which Troy was taken, great booties were brought into the Camp, and a great pestilence arose among the Greeks: which Homer saith, that Apollo sent in revenge of his Priest's Daughter, whom Agamemnon had refused to let go for any ransome: but Heraclides interpreting the place, saith, that by Apollo was meant the Sun, who raised pestilent Fogs, by which the Army was infected, being lodged in a moorish piece of ground. And it might well be that the Camp was over-pestered with those who had been abroad, and now were lodged all close together: having also grounded their Ships within the fortifications.

Hom. Iliad. 3.

About the same time arose much contention between Agamemnon and Achilles about the booty, whereof Agamemnon, as General, having first chosen for his part a captive woman, and Achilles in the second place chosen for himself another, then Ajax, Ulysses, and so the rest of the chief Captains in order: when the South-sayer Calchas had willed that Agamemnons Woman should be restored to her Father Apollo's Priest, so that the pestilence might cease, then did Agamemnon greatly rage, and say that he alone would not lose his part of the spoil, but would either take that which had been given to Achilles, or that which had fallen to Ajax, or to Ulysses. Hereupon Achilles defied him, but was fain to suffer all patiently, as not able to hold his Concubine by strong hand, nor to revenge her loss otherwise than by refusing to fight, or to send forth his Captains. But the Greeks, encouraged by their Captains, presented themselves before the City without him and his Troops.

The Trojans were now relieved with great succours, all the neighbour Countries having sent them aid: partly drawn to that War by their Commanders, who assisted Priamus for money, wherewith he abounded when the War began (as appears by his words in Homer,) or for love of himself and his Sons, or hope of marriage with some of his many and fair Daughters; partly also (as we may well guess) incited by the wrongs received of the Greeks when they wasted the Countries adjoyning unto Troy. So that when when Hector issued out of the Town, he was little inferiour to his enemies in numbers of Men, or quality of their Leaders. The principal Captains in the Trojan Army, were Hector, Paris, Deiphobus, Helenus, and the other Sons of Priamus: Æneas, Antenor, and his Sons Polidamas, Sarpedon, Glaucus, Asius, and the Sons of Panthus, besides Rhesus, who was slain the first night of his arrival; Memnon, Queen Penthesilea, and others who came towards the end of the War. Between these and the Greeks were many battels fought: the greatest of which were, that at the tomb of King Ilus upon the Plain: and another at the very trenches of the Camp, wherein Hector brake through the fortifications of the Greeks, and began to fire their Ships; at which time Ajax the Son of Telamon, with his Brother Teucer, were in a manner the only Men of note that remaining unwounded, made head against Hector, when the state of the Greeks was almost desperate.

Another battel (for so Antiquity calls it) or rather the same renewed, was fought by Patroclus, who having obtained leave, drew forth Achilles's Troops, relieving the weary Greeks with a fresh supply. Agamemnon, Diomedes, Ulysses, and the rest of the Princes though sore wounded, yet were driven to put on armour, and with help of Patroclus, repelled the Trojans very hardly. For in that fight Patroclus was lost, and his body, with much contention recovered by his friends, was brought back into the Camp: the armour of Achilles which he had put on, being torn from him by Hector. It was the manner of those Wars, having slain a Man, to strip him, and hale away his body, not restoring it without ransome, if he were one of Marke. Of the vulgar, little reckoning was made: for they fought all on Foot, slightly armed, and commonly followed the success of their Captains; who rode not upon Horses, but in Chariots, drawn by two or three Horses, which were guided by some trusty followers of theirs, which drave up and down the Field, as they were directed by the Captains, who by the swiftness of their Horses, presenting themselves where need required, threw first their Javelins, and then alighting, fought on Foot, with Swords and Battle-Axes, retiring into the ranks of footmen, or else returning to their Chariots when they found cause, and so began again with a new dart as they could get it, if their old were lost or broken. Their arms defensive were Helmets, Breast-plates, Boots of Brass, or other Mettal, and shields commonly of Leather Plated over. The offensive were Swords and Battel-Axes at hand; and Stones, Arrows or Darts when they fought at any distance. The use of their Chariots (besides the swiftness) was to keep them from weariness, whereto the leaders were much subject, because of their Armour, which the strongest and stoutest ware heaviest, also that from them they might throw their Javelins downwards, with the more violence. Of which Weapon I find not that any carried more than one or two into the Field: wherefore they were often driven to return to their Tents for a new one when the old was gone. Likewise of Armours they had little change or none; every Man (speaking of the chief) carried his own compleat, of which if any peice were lost or broken, he was driven to repair it with the like, if he had any fitting, taken from some Captain whom he had slain, and stripped; or else to borrow of them that had by such means gotten some to spare. Whereas therefore Achilles had lost his Armour, which Hector (as is said before) had taken from the body of Patroclus, he was fain to await the making of new, ere he could enter the fight: whereof he became very desirous, that he might revenge the death of Patroclus his dear friend.

At this time Agamemnon reconciled himself unto Achilles, not only restoring his Concubine Briseis, but giving him very great gifts, and excusing former matters as well as he might. In the next Battel Achilles did so behave himself, that he did not only put the Trojans to the worst, but also slew the valiant Hector, whom (if Homer may herein be believed) he chased three times about the Walls of Troy. But great question may be made of Homer's truth in this narration. For it is not likely that Hector would stay alone without the City (as Homer doth report of him) when all the Trojans were fled into it: nor that he could leap over the Rivers of Xanthus and Simois, as he must have done in that fight: nor that the Trojans, perceiving Hector in such an extremity, would have forborn to open some of their gates and let him in. But this is reported only to grace Achilles, who having (by what means soever) slain the noble Hector, did not only carry away his dead body, as the custome then was, but boring holes in his Feet, and thrusting leathern thongs into them, tyed him to his Chariot, and dragging him shamefully about the Field, selling the dead body to his Father Priamus for a very great ransome. But his cruelty and covetousness were not long unrevenged; for he was shortly after slain with an arrow by Paris, as Homer sayes in the Scæan Gate; or as others, in the Temple of Apollo, whither he came to have married Polyxena the Daughter of Priamus, with whom he was too far in love, having slain so many of her Brethren; and his body was ransomed (as Lycophron saith) at the self same rate that Hector's was by him sold for. Not long after this, Penthesilea Queen of the Amazons arrived at Troy, who after some proof given of her Valour, was slain by Pyrrhus the Son of Achilles.

SECT. V.

Of the taking of Troy, the wooden Horse, the Book of Dares and Dyctis, the Colonies of the Reliques of Troy.

FInally, after the death of many Worthy Persons on each side, the City was taken by night, as all Writers agree: but whether by the Treason of Æneas and Antenor; or by a wooden Horse, as the Poets, and common Fame (which followed the Poets) have delivered, it is uncertain. Some write that upon one of the Gates of Troy, called Scæa, was the Image of a Horse, and that the Greeks entring by that Gate, gave occasion to the report, that the City was taken by an artificial Horse. It may well be, that with some wooden Engine, which they called a Horse, they either did batter the Walls as the Romans in after-times used to do with the Ram: or scaled the Walls upon the sudden, and so took the City. As for the hiding of Men in the hollow body of a wooden Horse, it had been a desperate adventure, and serving to no purpose. For either the Trojans might have perceived the deceit, and slain all those Princes of Greece, that were inclosed in it (which also by such as maintain this report they are said to have thought upon:) or they might have left it a few days without the City (for it was unlikely, that they should the very first day both conclude upon the bringing it into the Town, and break down their Walls upon the sudden to do it:) by which means they who were shut into it, must have perished for hunger, if they had not by issuing issuing forth, unseasonably discovered the invention. Whereas further it is said, that this Horse was so high and great, that it could not be brought into the Town through any of the Gates, and that therefore the Trojans were fain to pull down a part of their Wall to make way for it, through which breach the Greeks did afterwards enter; it is hereby manifest, that the inclosing of so many principal men was altogether needless, considering that without their help there was way sufficient for the Army, so that the surprising of any Gate by them was now to no purpose.

John Baptista Gramay in his History of Asia, discoursing of this War, saith that the Greeks did both batter the Walls with a Wooden Engine, and were also let into the City by Antenor, at the Scæan Gate: the Townsmen sleeping and drinking without fear or care, because the Fleet of the Grecians had hoisted Sail, and was gone the day before to the Ile of Tenedos, thereby to bring the Trojans into security. That the City was betrayed, the Books of Dares, and Dyctis must prove, which whether we now have the same that were by them written, it may be suspected; for surely they who have made mention of these Writers in ancient times, would not, as they did, have followed the reports of Homer and others quite contradictory in most points to these two Authors, without once taking notice of the opposition, which they having served in that War made against the common report, had it not been that either those books were even in those times thought frivolous, or else contained no such repugnancy to the other Authors as now is found in them.

Also concerning the number of Men slain in this War, which Dares and Dyctis say to have been above 600000 on the Trojan side, and more then 800000 of the Greeks, it is a report meerly fabulous; for as much as the whole Fleet of the Greeks was reckoned by Homer, who extolled their Army and deeds as much as he could, to be somewhat less than 1200 sail, and the Army thereein transported over the Greek Seas, not much above 100000 Men, according to the rate formerly mentioned. But it is the common fashion of Men to extol the deeds of their Ancients: for which cause, both Homer magnified the Captains of the Greeks that served in the War, and Virgil with others, were as diligent in commending and extolling the Trojans and their City, from which the Romans descended. Yea the Athenians long after in the War which Xerxes the Persian King made against all Greece: did not forbear to vaunt of the great cunning which Mnestheus the Son of Peteus had shewed in marshalling the Grecian Army before Troy: whereupon, as if it had been a matter of much consequence, they were so proud, that they refused to yeild unto Gelon, King of almost all Sicily, the Admiralty of their Seas, notwithstanding that he promised to bring 200 good fighting ships, and 30000 Men for their defence.

The like vanity possessed many other Cities of Greece, and many Nations in these parts of the World, which have striven to bring their descent from some of the Princes that warred at Troy; all difficulties or unlikelihoods in such their Pedigree notwithstanding. But those Nations which indeed, or in most probability, came of the Trojans, were the Albanes in Italy; and from them the Romans, brought into that Country by Æneas: the Venetians first seated in Padua, and the Country adjoyning, by Antenor: the Chaonians planted in Epirus by Helenus, the Son of King Priamus. To which Hellanicus addeth, that the Posterity of Hector did assemble such of the Trojans as were left, and reigned over them about Troy.

SECT. VI.

Of the distresses and dispersions of the Greeks returning from Troy.

COncerning the Greeks, they tasted as much misery as they had brought upon the Trojans. For Thucydides notes, that by reason of their long abode at the siege, they found many alterations when they returned: so that many were driven by their borderers from their antient seats: many were expelled their Countries by faction: some were slain anon after their arrival: others were debarred from the Soveraignty among the people, by such as had stayed at home. The cause of all which may seem to have been the dispersion of the Army, which, weakned much by the calamities of that long War, was of little force to repel injuries, being divided into so many peices, under several Commanders, not very well agreeing. For (besides other quarrels arising upon the division of the booty, and the like occasions) at the time when they should have set Sail, Agamemnon and his Brother fell out, the one being desirous to depart immediately, the other to stay and perform some sacrifices to Minerva. Hereupon they fell to hot words, half the Fleet remaining with Agamemnon, the rest of them sailed to the Isle of Tenedos; where when they arrived, they could not agree among themselves, but some returned back to Agamemnon; others were dispersed, each holding his own course. But the whole Fleet was sore vexed with tempests: for Pallas (as Homer saith) would not be perswaded in haste.

They who returned safe were Nestor, and Pyrrhus, whom Orestes afterwards slew: also Idomeneus and Philoctetes, who nevertheless, as Virgil tels, were driven soon after to seek new seats: Idomeneus among the Salentines, and Philoctetes at Petilia in Italy. Agamemnon likewise returned home, but was forthwith slain by his Wife, and by the Adulterer Ægystus, who for a while after usurped his Kingdom. Menelaus wandring long upon the Seas, came into Ægypt, either with Helen, or (as may rather seem) to fetch her. Ulysses, after ten years having lost all his company, got home in poor estate, with much ado recovering the mastership of his own house. All the rest, either perished by the way, or were driven into exile, and fain to seek out new habitations.

Ajax the Son of Oileus was drowned; Teucer fled into Cyprus; Diomedes to King Daunus, who was Lord of the Japiges in Apulia; some of the Locrians were driven into Africk, others into Italy, all the East part whereof was called Magna Græcia, by reason of so many Towns which the Greeks were driven to erect upon that Coast. Finally, it appears in Homer, that the Grecian Ladies, whose Husbands had been at the War of Troy, were wont to call it, The place where the Greeks suffered misery, and the unlucky City not to be mentioned. And thus much for Troy, and those that warred there: the overthrow of which City, as hath been said, happened in the time of Habdon Judg of Israel, whom Sampson, after a vacancy or Inter-regnum for certain years, succeeded.

CHAP. XV.
Of Sampſon, Eli, and Samuel.

SECT. I.
Of Sampſon.

2970. THE birth and acts of Sampſon are written at large in the 13,14,15, and 16 of Judges; and therefore I ſhall not need to make a repetition thereof. But theſe things I gather out of that Story. Firſt, that the Angel of God forbad the Wife of Monoah the Mother of Sampſon, to drink Wine or ſtrong drink, or to eat any unclean Meat after ſhe was conceived with Child; becauſe thoſe ſtrong liquors hindered the ſtrength, and as it were wither and ſhrink the Child in the Mothers Womb. Though this were even the counſel of God himſelf, and delivered by his Angel, yet it ſeemeth that many Women of this age have not read, or at leaſt will not believe this precept: the moſt part forbearing nor drinks, nor meats, how ſtrong or unclean ſoever, filling themſelves with all ſorts of Wines, and with artificial drinks far more forcible: by reaſon whereof ſo many wretched feeble Bodies are borne into the World, and the races of the able and ſtrong Men in effect decayed.

Secondly it is to be noted, that the Angel of God refuſed the ſacrifice which Manoah would have offered him, commanding him to preſent it unto the Lord: and therefore thoſe that profeſs divination by the help of Angels, to whom alſo they ſacrifice, may aſſuredly know that they are Divels who accept thereof, and not good Angles, who receive no worſhip that is proper to God.

Thirdly, this Sampſon was twice betrayed by his Wives, to wit, by their importunity and deceitful tears: by the firſt he loſt but a part of his Goods; by the ſecond, his life. Quem nulla vis ſuperare potuit, voluptas evertit: Whom no force could over-maſter, Voluptuouſneſs overturned.

Fourthly, we may note, that he did not in all deliver Iſrael from the oppreſſion of the Philiſtims; though in ſome ſort he revenged and defended them: for notwithſtanding that he had ſlain 30 of them in his firſt attempt, burnt their Corn in harveſt time, and given them a great overthrow inſtantly upon it: yet ſo much did Iſrael fear the Philiſtims, as they aſſembled 3000 Men out of Juda, to beſiege Sampſon in the Rock or Mountain of Etam, uſing theſe Words: Knoweſt not thou that the Philiſtims are Rulers over us? &c. After which they bound him, and delivered him unto the Philiſtims, for fear of their revenge; though he was no ſooner looſned, but he gave them another overthrow, and ſlew 1000 with the jaw-bone of an Aſs.

Laſtly, being made blind, and a priſoner by the treaſon of his Wife, he was content to end his own life, to be avenged of his enemies, when he pulled down the Pillars of the houſe at the Feaſt whereto they ſent for Sampſon, to deride him; till which time he bare his affliction with patience: but it was truely ſaid of Seneca; Patientia ſæpe læſa vertitur in furorem; Patience often wounded is converted into fury: neither is it at any time ſo much wounded by pain and loſs, as by deriſion and contumely.

SECT. II.
Of Eli, and of the Ark taken; and of Dagons fall, and the ſending back of the Ark.

THe Story of Eli the Prieſt, who ſucceeded Sampſon, is written in the beginning of Samuel; who foretold him of the deſtruction of his houſe, for the wickedneſs of his Sons, which he ſuppreſſed not, neither did he puniſh them according to their deſerts: whoſe ſins were horrible, both in abuſing the Sacrifice, and profaning and polluting the holy places: though Levi Ben Gerſon, to extenuate this filthy offence of forcing the Women by the Sons of Eli, hath a contrary opinion. In this time therefore it pleaſed God to caſt the Iſraelites under the Swords of the Philiſtims; of whom there periſhed in the firſt encounter 4000 and in the ſecond battel 30000 footmen; among whom the Sons of Eli being ſlain, their Father (hearing the lamentable ſucceſs) by falling from his Chair, brake his neck. He was the firſt that obtained the High-Prieſthood of the ſtock of Ithamar the Son of Aaron, before whoſe time it continued ſucceſſively in the race of Eleazar the eldeſt Brother of Ithamar: for Aaron was the firſt, Eleazer the ſecond, Phinees the Son of Eleazar the third, Abiſue the Son of Phinees the fourth, his Son Bocci the fifth, Ozi the Son of Bocci the ſixth, and then Eli, as Joſephus and Lyranus out of divers Hebrew Authors have conceived. In the race of Ithamar the Prieſthood continued after Eli, to the time of Solomon, who caſt out Abiathar, and eſtabliſhed Sadock and Achimaas and their ſucceſſors. The Ark of God which Iſrael brought into the field, was in this battel taken by the Philiſtims. For as David witneſſeth, God greatly abhorred Iſrael, ſo that he forſook the habitation of Shilo: even the Tabernacle where he dwelt among Men, and delivered his power into captivity, &c.

1 Sam. 2. 22.

1 King. 2. 27. and 1 Chron. 6.

Pſal. 78.

Now as it pleaſed God at this time, that the Ark, whereby himſelf was repreſented ſhould fall in the hands of the Heathen, for the offences of the Prieſts and people: ſo did he permit the Caldæans to deſtroy the Temple built by Solomon; the Romans to overthrow the ſecond Temple; and the Turks to overthrow the Chriſtian Churches in Aſia and Europe. And had not the Iſraelites put more confidence in the ſacrament, or repreſentation, which was the Ark, than in God himſelf, they would have obſerved his Laws, and ſerved him only: which whenſoever they did, they were then victorious. For after the captivity they had no Ark at all, nor in the times of Macchabees: and yet for their piety it pleaſed God to make that Family as victorious as any that guarded themſelves by the ſign, in ſtead of the ſubſtance. And that the Ark was not made to the end to be carried into the Field as an Enſign, David witneſſed, when he fled from Abſalon. For when the Prieſts would have carried the Ark with him: he forbad it, and cauſed it to be turned into the City, uſing theſe words: If I ſhall find favour in the eyes of the Lord, he will bring me again: if not, let him do to me as ſeemeth good in his eyes.

1 Sam. 5. 6.

2 Sam. 15.

The Trojans believed that while their Palladium or the Image of Minerva was kept in Troy, the City ſhould never be overturned: ſo did the Chriſtians in the laſt fatal battel againſt Saladine, carry into the field, as they were made believe, the very Croſs whereon Chriſt

Christ died; and yet they lost the battel, their bodies, and the wood. But Chrysostom upon Saint Matthew (if that be his work) giveth a good judgment, speaking of those that wrote a part of Saint John's Gospel about their necks, for an amulet or preservative: Si tibi ea non prosunt in auribus, quomodo proderunt in collo? If those words do not profit men in their ears (to wit, the hearing of the Gospel preached) how should it profit them by hanging it about their necks? For it was neither the wood of the Ark, nor the wood of the Cross, but the reverence of the Father, that gave the one for a memory of his Covenant, and the Faith in his Son, which shed his blood on the other for Redemption, that could or can profit them and us, either in this life or after it.

The Philistims returning with the greatest victory and glory which ever they obtained, carried the Ark of God with them to Azotus, and set it up in the house of Dagon their Idol: but that night the Idol fell out of his place, from above to the ground, and lay under the Ark. The morning following they took it up, and set it again in his place. And it fell the second time, and the head brake from the body, and the hands from the arms, shewing that it had nor power nor understanding in the presence of God; for the head fell off, which is the seat of reason and knowledge, and the hands (by which we execute strength) were sundred from the arms. For God and the Devil inhabit not in one house, nor in one heart. And if this Idol could not endure the representation of the true God, it is not to be marvelled, that at such time as it pleased him to cover his only begotten with flesh, and sent him into the world, that all the Oracles, wherein the Devil derided and betrayed mortal men, lost power, speech and operation at the instant. For when that true light which never had beginning of brightness, brake through the clouds of a Virgins body, shining upon the earth which had been long obscured by Idolatry, all those foul and stinking vapours vanished. Plutarch rehearseth a memorable accident in that age concerning the death of the great god Pan, as he stileth him; where (as ignorant of the true cause) he searcheth his brains for many reasons of so great alteration: yet finds he none out, but frivolous. For not only this old Devil did then die as he supposed, but all the rest, as Apollo, Jupiter, Diana, and the whole rabble became speechless.

Now while the Philistims triumphed after this victory, God struck them with the grievous disease of the Hemorrhoides, of which they perished in great numbers. For it is written, that the Lord destroyed them. It was therefore by general consent ordered, that the Ark should be removed from Azotus to Gath or Geth, another of the five great Cities of the Philistims; to prove, as it seemeth, whether this disease were fallen on them by accident, or by the hand of God immediatly: but when it was brought to Gath and received by them, the plague was yet more grievous and mortal. For the hand of the Lord was against this City with a very great destruction, and he smote the men of the City both small and great, &c. And being not yet satisfied, they of Gath sent the Ark to Ekron or Accaron, a third City of the Philistims: but they also felt the same smart, and cryed out, that themselves and their people should be slain thereby; For there was a destruction and death throughout all the City. In the end, by the advice of their Priests, the Princes of the Philistims did not only resolve to return the Ark, but to offer gifts unto the God of Israel, remembring the plague which had fallen on the Egyptians, when their hearts were hardned to hold the people of God from their inheritance, and from his service by strong hand. Wherefore confessing the power of the God of Israel to be almighty, and that their own Idols were subject thereunto, they agreed to offer a sin-offering, using these words; So ye shall give glory to the God of Israel, that he may take his hand from you, and from your gods, and from your land. And what can be a more excellent witnessing, than where an enemy doth approve our cause? according to Aristotle; Pulchrum est testimonium, quo nostra probantur ab hostibus. So did Pharaoh confess the living God, when he was plagued in Egypt: and Nabuchadonosar and Darius, when they had seen his miracles by Daniel.

1 Sam. 5. 9.

This counsel therefore of the Priests being imbraced, and the golden Hemorrhoides, and the golden Mice prepared, they caused two milch Kine to be chosen, such as had not been yoaked, and a new Cart or Carriage to be framed: but they durst not drive or direct it to any place certain, thereby to make tryal whether it were indeed the hand of God that had strucken them. For if the Ark of God were carried towards Bethshemesh, and into the territory of Israel, then they should resolve that from God only came their late destruction. For the Philistims knew, that the milch Kine which drew the Ark, could not be forced from their Calves, but that they would have followed them whersoever; much less when they were left to themselves, would they travel a contrary way. For in the darkest night in the world, if calves be removed from their dams, the Kine will follow them through woods and desarts by the foot, till they find them. But the Kine travelled directly towards Bethshemesh: and when they came into the fields thereof, to wit, of one Josua of the same City, they stood still there; which when the Princes of the Philistims perceived, they returned to Ekron. After which, God spared not his own people the Bethshemites, in that they presumed to look in the Ark. And because they knew God and his commandments, and had been taught accordingly; he struck them more grievously than he did the heathen: for there perished of them fifty thousand and seventy. From hence the Ark was carried to Kireath-jearim, and placed in the house of Abinadab; where it is written that it remained twenty years in the charge of Eleazer his son, until David brought it to Jerusalem.

2 Sam. 6. & 1 Chro.

Now whereas it is said, that in the mean while the Ark was in Nob, Mispa, and Galgala, it was the Tabernacle, which was at this time severed from the Ark, or at least, it was for the * present occasion brought to these places, and anon returned to Kireath-jearim.

SECT. III.

Of Samuel, and of his Government.

THese Tragedies overpast and ended, Samuel, to whom God appeared while he was yet a child, became now Judge and Governour of Israel. He was descended of the family of † Chore or Korach. For Levi had three sons; Gerson, Cheath, and Merari; Cheath had Amram and Izaar; of Amram came Moses and Aaron; of Izaar, Chore; and of the family of Chore, Samuel. His father, Eleana a Levite, was called an Ephratæan; not that the Levites had any proper inheritance, but because he was of * Mount Ephraim, like as Jesse, David's father was called an Ephratæan, because born at Ephrata, or Bethleem. Hannah his mother being long fruitless, obtained him of God by prayers and tears: it being an exceeding shame to the Jewish women to be called barren, in respect of the blessing of God, both to Abraham, that his seed should multiply as the Stars of Heaven, and the sands of the Sea; as in the beginning to Adam, Increase and multiply, &c. and in Deuteronomy the seventh, There shall be neither male nor female barren among you.

Samuel was no sooner born, but that his mother, according to her former vow, dedicated him to God, and his service: to which she delivered him even from the dug. For as the first-born of all that were called Nazarites, might be redeemed till they were five years old for five shekels, and between five years and and twenty, for twenty shekels: so was it not required by the Law, that any of the race of the Levites should be called to serve about the Tabernacle, till they were five and twenty years old.

Saint Peter reckons in the Acts the Prophets from Samuel, who was the first of the Writers of holy Scriptures, to whom usually this name of a Prophet was given, and yet did Moses account himself such a one; as in the 18th of Deuteronomy, The Lord thy God will raise up unto thee a Prophet like unto me, &c. But he is distinguished from those that preceded him, who were called Seers; as before time in Israel, when a man went to seek an answer of God, thus he spake; Come and let us go to the Seer: for he that is now called a Prophet, was in old time called a Seer. And although it pleased God to appear by his Angels to Moses, as before to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; yet in the time of Eli, there was no manifest vision; not that God had altogether withdrawn his grace from Israel: but as the Caldæan Paraphrast hath it, those revelations before Samuel's time, were more clouded and obscure. The places wherein Samuel judged were Matspa or Mitspa, seated on a hill in Benjamin near Juda: also Gilgal and Bethel, of which we have spoken elsewhere.

1 Sam. 9.

1 Sam. 13.

See in this book, c. 12. sect. 1.

The Philistims taking knowledge of the assembly and preparation of War at Mitspa, in the beginning of Samuel's government, gathered their Army, and marched towards the City: at whose approach the Israelites strucken with fear, and with the memory of their former slaughters and servitude, besought Samuel to pray to God for them; who was * then performing his sacrifice when the Philistims were in view. But God being moved with Samuel's prayers (as he was by those of Moses, when Israel fought against the Amalekites at the first entrance into Arabia:) it pleased him with thunder and tempest to disperse and beat down the Army of the Philistims, according to the prophecy of Hanna, Samuel's Mother, The Lords adversaries shall be destroyed, and out of Heaven shall he thunder upon them, &c. Josephus affirms, that a part of the Philistims were swallowed with an earthquake: and that Samuel himself led the Israelites in the prosecution of their victory. After which, Samuel erected a Monument in memory of his happy success, obtained by the miraculous hand of God, which Josephus called Lapidem fortem: Samuel, Ebenezer, or the stone of assistance: and then following the opportunity and advantage of the victory, the Israelites recovered divers Cities of their own formerly lost, and held long in the possession of the Philistims, who for a long time after did not offer any invasion or revenge. And the better to attend their purposes, and to withstand any of their attempts, the Israelites made peace with the Amorites, or Canaanites, which lay on their backs, and to the North of them, that they might not be assaulted from divers parts at once; having the Philistims towards the West and Sea-coast, the Canaanite toward the North and East, and the Idumite on the South. The estate being thus settled, Samuel for the ease of the people gave audience and judgment in divers places by turns, as hath been elsewhere said.

CHAP. XVI.

Of SAUL.

SECT. I.

Of the deliberation to change the Government into a Kingdom.

But when age now began to overtake Samuel, and that he was not able to undergo the burthen of so careful a government, he put off from himself the weight of the affairs on his sons, Joel and Abijah, who judged the people at Beersheba, a City, the very utmost towards the South of Judea. And as the place was inconvenient and far away, so were themselves no less removed from the justice and vertue of their Father: For the thirst of covetousness, the more it swalloweth, the more it drieth, and desireth, finding taste in nothing but gain; to recover which, they set the Law at a price, and sold Justice and Judgment to the best Chapmen. Which when the Elders of Israel observed, and saw that Samuel as a natural man (though a Prophet) could not so well discern the errours of his own, they prayed him to consent to their change of government, and to make them a King, by whom they might be judged as other Nations were; who might also lead them to the War, and defend them against their enemies. For after the ill and lamentable success which followed the rule of Eli his sons, when those of Samuel by their first blossoms promised to yield fruit no less bitter, they saw no way to put the government from out his race, whom they so much reverenced, but by the choice of a King.

In a cause of so great consequence and alteration, Samuel sought counsel from God: which surely he did not for the establishing of his own Sons; who being as they were, God would not have approved his election. Now as it appears by the Text, this speech or motion displeasing him, he used his best arguments to dehort them: which when he perceived to be over-feeble, he delivered unto them from Gods revelation, the inconveniences and miseries which should befal them. And yet, all which he fore-shewed was not intolerable, but such as hath been born, and and is so still, by free consent of the subjects towards their Princes. For first he makes them know that the King will use their sons in his own service to make them his Horse-men, Chariotters, and Foot-men; which is not only not grievous, but by the Vassals of all Kings, according to their birth and condition, desired: it being very agreeable to subjects of the best quality to command for the King in his Wars; and to till the ground no less proper and appertaining to those that are thereto bred and brought up: so are likewise the offices of women-servants to dress meat, to bake bread, and the like. But whereas immediately it is threatned, He will take your Fields and your Vineyards, and your best Olive trees, and give them to his servants; with other oppressions: this hath given, and gives dayly occasion to such as would be ruled by their own discretion, to affirm that Samuel describeth here unto them the power of a King governed by his own affections, and not a King that feareth God. But others upon further examination construe this Text far otherwise, as teaching us what Subjects ought with patience to bear at their Soveraigns hand. The former opinion is grounded

Deut. 1. first upon that place of Deuteronomy, where God foreshewеth this change of government from Judges to Kings; and after he had forbidden many things unto the Kings, as many wives, covetousness, and the like, he commandeth that the Kings which were to raign over Israel, should write the Law of Deuteronomy, or cause it to be written: and to shew how greatly the King should honour the Law, he addeth, It shall be with him, and he shall read therein all the days of his life; that he may learn to fear the Lord his God, and to keep all the words of this Law, and these ordinances for to do them: that he may prolong his days in his Kingdom, he and his Sons. But to take away any other mans field, say they, is contrary to the Laws
Deut. 6. of God, in the same book written. For it is said, That which is just and right shalt thou follow, that thou mayst live. Now if it be not permitted to carry away grapes more than thou canst eat out of another mans
Deut. 23. 24. vineyard, but forbidden by God: it is much less lawful to take the vineyard it self from the owner, and give it to another. Neither are the words of the Text
Loyse. (say they) such as do warrant the Kings of Israel, or make it proper unto them, to take at will any thing from their vassals. For it is not said that it shall be lawful for the King, or the King may do this or that: but it is written, that the King will take your sons: and again, This shall be the manner of the King that shall raign over you. God thereby fore-shewing what power, severed from piety (because it is accountable to God only) will do in the future. And hereof we find the first example in Achab, who took from Naboth both his Vineyard and his life, contrary to the trust which God had put in him, of governing well
Deut. 16. his people. For God commanded, That his people should be judged with righteous judgment. Wherefore, though the King had offered unto Naboth compositi-on, as a Vineyard of better value, or the worth in money, which he refused: yet because he was falsly accused, and unjustly condemned (though by colour of law,) how grievously Achab was punished by God, the Scriptures tell us. Neither was it a plea sufficient for Achab against the all-righteous God, to say that it was done without his consent, and by the Elders of Israel. For God had not then left his people to the Elders, but to the King, who is called a living Law, even as David testifieth of himself: Posuisti me in caput gentium: For this of S. Augustine is very true: Simulata innocentia, non est innocentia: simulata æquitas, non est æquitas: sed duplicatur peccatum in quo est iniquitas & simulatio; Feigned innocence, and feigned equity, are neither the one nor the other: but the fault or offence is there doubled, in which there is both iniquity and dissimulation. Such in effect is their disputation, who think this place to contain the description of a Tyrant. But the arguments on the contrary side, as they are many and forcible, so are they well known to all; being excellently handled in that Princely discourse of The true Law of free Monarchies: which Treatise I may not presume to abridge, much less here to insert. Only thus much I will say, that if practice do shew the greatness of authority, even the best Kings of Juda and Israel were not so tyed by any laws, but that they did whatsoever they pleased in the greatest things; and commanded some of their own Princes, and of their own brethren to be slain without any trial of law, being sometime by Prophets reprehended, sometime not. For though David confessed his offence for the death of Uriah, yet Solomon killing his elder brother and others, the same was not imputed to him as any offence.

That the state of Israel should receive this change of government, it was not only foretold by Moses in Deuteronomy, but perceived by Jacob in this Scripture; The Scepter shall not depart from Juda, &c. It was Gen. 49. also promised by God to Abraham for a blessing: For Gen. 15. it was not only assured that his issues should in num- Gen. 17. ber equal the stars in heaven, but that Kings should proceed of him: Which state seeing it is framed from the pattern of his sole rule, who is Lord of the Universe; and the excellency thereof in respect of all other governments, hath been by many judicious men handled and proved, I shall not need to over-paint that which is garnished with better colours already, than I can lay on.

In the time of the Judges every man hath observed that civil war Israel had: what outragious slaughters they committed upon each other: in what miserable servitude they lived for many years: and when it fared best with them, they did but defend their own territories, or recover some parts thereof formerly lost. The Canaanites dwelt in the best vallies of the Country. The Ammonites held much of Gilead over Jordan; the Philistims the Sea-coasts; and the Jebusites, Jerusalem it self, till David's time: all which that King did not only conquer and establish, but he mastered and subjected all the neighbour Nations and Kings, and made them his tributaries and vassals. But whether it were for that the Israelites were moved by those reasons, which allure the most of all Nations, to live under a Monarch, or whether by this means they sought to be cleared from the sons of Samuel, they became deaf to all the perswasions 1 Sam. 8. and threats which Samuel used, insisting upon this point, that they would have a King both to judge them and defend them: whereunto Samuel had warrant from God to consent, he sent every man to his own City and abiding.

SECT. II.

Of the election of Saul.

After that Samuel had dismissed the assembly at Mizpah, he forbare the election of a King, till such time as he was therein directed by God: who foretold him the day before, that he would present unto him a man of the Land of Benjamin, whom he commanded Samuel to anoint. So Samuel went unto Ramath Sophim, to make a feast for the entertainment of Saul (whom yet he knew not, but knew the truth of Gods promises) and Saul also having wandred dred divers days to seek his fathers Asses, at length, by the advice of his servant, travelled towards Ramath to find a Seer or Prophet, hoping from him to be told what way to take, to find his beasts. In which journey it pleased God (who doth many times order the greatest things by the simplest passages and persons) to elect Saul, who sought an Ass and not a kingdom: like as formerly it had pleased him to call Moses, while he fed the sheep of Jethro; and after to make choice of David the youngest of eight sons, and k Sam. 16 by the Scriptures called a little one, who was then keeping of beasts; and changed his sheep-hook into a Scepter, making him of all other the most victorious King of Juda and Israel. So John and James were taken from casting their nets, to become fishers of men, and honoured with the titles of Apostles: a dignity that died not in the grave, as all worldly Honours do; but permanent and everlasting in Gods everlasting Kingdom.

When Samuel was entred into Ramath, he prepared a banquet for the King, whom he expected, and stayed his arrival at the gate. Not long after came Saul, whom God shewed to Samuel, and made him know that it was the same whom he had foretold him of, that he should rule the people of God. Saul finding Samuel in the gate, but knowing him not, though a Prophet and Judge of Israel, much less knowing the Honour which attended him, asked Samuel in what part of the City the Seer dwelt; Samuel answered, that himself was the man he sought, and prayed Saul to go before him to the high place, where Samuel setting him according to his degree, above all that were invited, conferred with him afterwards of the affairs of the kingdom, and of Gods graces to be bestowed on him, and the morning following anointed him King of Israel.

After this he told him all that should happen him in the way homeward, that two men should encounter him by Rachels Sepulchre, who should tell him that his Asses were found, and that his Fathers cares were changed from the fear of losing his beasts, to doubt the loss of his son: that he should then meet † Chrys. in Psa. 43. three other men in the plain of Tabor; then, a company of Prophets: and that he should be partaker of Gods Spirit, and prophecy with them: and that thereby his condition and disposition should be changed from the vulgar, into that which became a King elected and favoured by God.

But the Prophets here spoken of, men indued with spiritual gifts, were not of the first and most reverenced number, who by divine revelation foretold things to come, reprehended without fear the errors of their Kings and wrought miracles, of which number were Moses, Joshua, Samuel, and after them Gad, Nathan, Ahias, Elias, Eliseus, Esay, Jeremy, and the rest: for to these Prophets, † saith St. Chrysostom, Omnia tempora percurrunt, præterita, præsentia, & futura: but they were of those of whom St. Paul speaketh, 1 Cor. 14. 14. who inriched with spiritual gifts, expounded the Scriptures and the Law.

At Mizpeh, Samuel assembled the people, that he might present Saul to them, who as yet knew nothing of his election: neither did Saul acquaint his own Uncle therewith, when he asked him what had past between him and Samuel: for either he thought his estate not yet assured, or else that it might be dangerous for him to reveal it, till he were confirmed by general consent. When the Tribes were assembled at Mizpeh, the general opinion is, that he was chosen by lot. Chimhi thinks by the answer of * Urim and Thummim: that is, by the answer of the Priest, wearing that mystery upon his breast when he asked the counsel of the Lord. But the casting of lots was not only much used among the Jews, but by many others, if not by all nations. The Land of promise was divided by lot: God commanded lots to be cast on the two Goats, which should be sacrificed, and which turned off: a figure of Christs suffering, and our deliverance, for whose garments the Jews also cast lots. Cicero, Plautus, Pausanias, and others, have remembred divers sorts of lots, used by the Romans, Grecians, and other Nations: as in the division of grounds or honours; and in things to be undertaken: the two first kinds were called Divisory; the Third, Divinatory, and unto one of these three, all may be reduced, all which kinds, howsoever they may seem chanceful, are yet ordered and directed by God: as in the Proverbs: The lot is cast into the lap, but the whole disposition is of the Lord. And in like sort fell the Kingdom of Israel on Saul, not by chance, but by Gods ordinance, who gave Samuel former knowledge of his election: from which election Saul withdrew himself in modesty, as both Josephus construe it, and as it may be gathered by his former answers to Samuel, when he acknowledged himself the least of the least Tribe. But Samuel inlightned by God, found where Saul was hidden, and brought him among the people, and he was taller than all the rest by the shoulders. And Samuel made them know that he was the chosen King of Israel, whereupon all the multitude saluted him King, and prayed for him; yet some there were that envied his glory (as in all estates there are such) who did not acknowledge him by offering him presents, as the manner was, of whom Saul, to avoid sedition, took no notice.

* The Urim and Thummim in the ornaments of the High Priest, were inserted within the pectoral, which therefore was duplicatum: they were placed in the pectoral over against the heart of the High Priest. It is plain that they were not the precious stones, nor any thing made by the Artificers. See Exod. 38. 1 Cic. de divin. Pausan. in Mes. 1 Sam. 10.

SECT. III.

Of the establishing of Saul by his first victory.

NO sooner was Saul placed in the Kingdom, but that he received knowledge, that Nahas King of the Ammonites, prepared to besiege Jabes Gilead: which nation since the great overthrow given them by Jephta, never durst attempt any thing upon the Israelites, till the beginning of Saul his rule. And although the Ammonites did always attend upon the advantage of time, to recover those Territories which first the Amorite, and then Israel dispossest them of; which they made the ground of their invasion in Jephta's time, yet they never perswaded themselves of more advantage than at this present. For first, they knew that there were many of the Israelites that did not willingly submit themselves to this new King: secondly, they were remembred that the Philistims had not long before slain 34000 of their men of War: and besides had used great care and policy that they should have no Smiths to make them swords or spears: neither was it long before, that of the Bethshemesites, and places adjoyning, there perished by the hand of God more than 50000 and therefore in these respects, even occasion it self invited them to inlarge their Dominions upon their borderers: Jabes Gilead being one of the neerest. Besides it may further be conjectured, that the Ammonites were imboldened against Jabes Gilead, Jud. 13. in respect of their weakness: since the Israelites destroyed a great part of them, for not joyning with them against the Benjamites: at which time they did not only slaughter the men and male children, but took from them their young women, and gave them to the Benjamites: and therefore they were not likely to have been increased to any great numbers: and if they had recovered themselves of this great calamity, yet the Ammonite might flatter himself with the opinion, that that Israel, having for long time been disarmed by the Philistims, was not apt to succour those, whom they had so deeply wounded and destroyed. But contrariwise, when the tidings came to Saul of their danger, and that the Ammonites would give them no other condition to ransom themselves, but by pulling out their right eyes, by which they should be utterly disabled for the War, as elsewhere hath been spoken: Saul, both to value himself in his first years reign, and because perchance he was descended of one of those 400 Maids taken from the Gileadites, and given to the Benjamites, gave order to assemble the forces of Israel, hewing a yoak of Oxen into pieces, and sending them by messengers over all the coasts, protesting thus: That whosoever came not forth after Saul, and after Samuel; so should his Oxen be served: threatning the people by their goods, and not by their lives at the first. Seven days had Saul to assemble an Army, by reason that the Gileadites had obtained the respite of these seven days to give Nahas the Ammonite an answer: who, could they have obtained any reasonable condition, were contented to have severed themselves from Israel, and to become Vassals and Tributaries to the Heathen. In the mean while Saul assembled the forces which repaired unto him at Bezec, near Jordan, that he might readily pass the river; which done, he might in one day with a speedy march arrive at Jabes, under the Hills of Gilead. 1 Sam. 11. 8.

The army by Saul led, consisting of three hundred and thirty thousand, he returned an answer to those of Jabes, that they should assure themselves of succour by the next day at noon. For, as it seemeth, Saul marched away in the latter part of the day, and went on all night; for in the morning watch he surprised the army of Nahas the Ammonite. And to the end that he might set on them on all sides, he divided his forces into three parts, putting them unto the sword until the heat of the day, and the weariness of Sauls troop inforced them to give over the pursuit. Now the Ammonites were become the more careless and secure, in that those of Jabes, promised the next morning to render themselves and their City to their mercy. After this happy success, the people were so far in love with their new King, that they would have slain all those Israelites that murmured against his election, had not himself forbidden and resisted their resolutions. Such is the condition of worldly men, as they are violent lovers of the prosperous, and base Vassals of the time that flourisheth; and as despightful and cruel without cause against those, whom any misadventure, or other worldly accident hath thrown down.

1 Sam. 11. After the Army removed, Samuel summoned the people to meet at Gilgal, where Saul was now a third time acknowledged, and, as some Commenters affirm, anointed King: and here Samuel used an exhortation to all the assembly, containing precepts, and a rehearsal of his own Justice, during the beginning of his government to that day, after Saul had now reigned one year before he was established in Gilgal, or Galgala, he strengthned himself with a good guard of 3000 chosen men, of which he assigned 1000 to attend on Jonathan his son at Gibeah, the City of his nativity: the rest he kept about his own person in Micmas, and in the Hill of Bethel. 1 Sam. 12.

SECT. IV.

Of Sauls disobedience in his proceedings in the Wars with the Philistims and Amalekites, which caused his final rejection.

Jonathan with his small Army or Regiment that attended him, taking a time of advantage, surprized a Garrison of Philistims: the same, as some think, which Saul past by, when he came from Rama, when he was first anointed by Samuel, which they think to have been Cariath-jearim: because a place where the Philistims had a Garrison, 1 Sam. 10. is called the hill of God, which they understand of Cariath-jearim: but Junius understands this Garrison to have been at Gebah in Benjamin near Gibha, where Jonathan abode with his thousand followers. Howsoever, by this it appeareth that the Philistims held some strong places, both in the times of Samuel, and of Saul, within the Territory of Israel: and now being greatly inraged by this surprize, they assembled thirty thousand armed Chariots, and six thousand Horse, wherewith they invaded Judæa, and incamped at Machmas or Michmas, a City of Benjamin, in the direct way from Samaria to Jerusalem, and in the middest of the Land between the Sea and Jordan. With this sudden invasion the Israelites were strucken in so great a fear, as some of them hid themselves in the caves of the Mountains; others fled over Jordan into Gad and Gilead: Saul himself with some 2000 men of ordinary, and many other people, staid at Galgala in Benjamin, not far from the passage of Joshua when he led Israel over Jordan. Here Saul by Samuels appointment was to attend the coming of Samuel seven days: but when the last day was in part spent, and that Saul perceived his forces to diminish greatly, he presumed (as some expound the place, 1 Sam. 13. 9.) to exercise the office which appertained not unto him, and to offer a burnt offering, and a peace offering unto God, contrary to the Ecclesiastical Laws of the Hebrews, and Gods Commandments: others expound the word obtulit, in this place, by obtulit per Sacerdotem, and so make the sin of Saul not to have been any intrusion into the Priests office, but first a disobedience to Gods Commandment, in not staying according to the appointment, 1 Sam. 10. 8. Secondly, a diffidence or mistrust in Gods help, and too great relying upon the strength of the people, whose departing from him he could not bear patiently; and lastly, a Contempt of the holy Prophet Samuel, and of the help which the prayers of so godly a man might procure him. But whatsoever was his sin, notwithstanding his excuses, he was by Samuel reprehended most sharply, in terms unfitting his estate, had not extraordinary warrant been given to Samuel so to do, from God himself; at which time also Samuel feared not to let him know, that the Kingdom should be conferred to another (a man after Gods own heart) both from Saul and his posterity. 1 Sam. 13. 13, 14.

After this, Samuel and Saul returned to Gibeah, where Saul, when he had taken view of his army, found it to consist of 600 men: for the most were fled from him and scattered, yea and among those that staid, there was not any that had either sword or spear, but Saul and his son Jonathan only. For the Philistims had not left them any Smith in all Israel, that made weapons; besides, they that came to Saul, came hastily, and left such weapons and armour as they had behind them in their garrisons: for if they had had none at all, it might be much doubted how Saul should be able the year before, or in some part of this very year, to succour Jabes Gilead with 300 and thirty thousand men, if there had not now been any 1 Sam. 13. 19.

any iron weapon to defend themſelves withall, ſave only in the hand of Saul and Jonathan his ſon. But howſoever, all the reſt of the people were formerly diſarmed by the Philiſtims, and all thoſe craftsmen carried out of the land that made weapons: there being left unto the Iſraelites only files to ſharpen and amend ſuch ſtuff as ſerved for the Plough, and for nought elſe: yet that they had ſome kind of arms, it is manifeſt, or elſe they durſt not have attempted upon the Philiſtims as they did. And it is not ſaid in the Text that there was not any ſword in all Iſrael, but only that there was not any found amongſt thoſe 600 ſouldiers, which ſtayed with Saul after Samuels departure: and it ſeemeth that when Samuel had ſharply reprehended Saul, that his own guards forſook him, having but 600 remaining of his 3000 ordinary ſouldiers, and of all the reſt that repaired unto him, of which many were fled from him before Samuel arrived. 1 Sam. 13. 21.

With this ſmall troop he held himſelf to his own City of Gibeah, as a place of more ſtrength, and better aſſured unto him, than Gilgal was. Neither is it obſcure how it ſhould come to paſs that the Philiſtims ſhould thus diſarm the moſt part of the Iſraelites, howſoever in the time of Samuel much had been done againſt them. For the victories of Samuel were not got by ſword or ſpear, but by thunder from Heaven: and when theſe crafts-men were once rooted out of the Cities of Iſrael, no marvel if they could not in a ſhort peace under Samuel, be replanted again. For this tyranny of the Philiſtims is to be underſtood, rather of the precedent times, than under Samuel; and yet under him is to be thought that by their crafts they proceeded in the policy, not ſuffering their Artificers to teach the Iſraelites, and ſo even to the times of Saul kept them from having any ſtore of armour. The ſame policy did Nebuchodonoſor uſe after his Conqueſt in Judæa: Dionyſius in Sicily, and many other Princes elſe-where in all ages. But theſe loſt weapons, in part, the Iſraelites might repair in Gilead, for over Jordan the Philiſtims had not invaded. The reſt of their defences were ſuch as antiquity uſed, and their preſent neceſſity miniſtred unto them, to wit, clubs, bows, and ſlings. For the Benjamites exceeded in caſting ſtones in ſlings: and that theſe were the natural weapons, and the firſt of all nations, it is manifeſt, and ſo in the firſt of Chronicles the 12th Chapter, it is written of thoſe that came to ſuccour David againſt Saul, while he lurked at Siklag, That they were weaponed with bowes, and could uſe the right and the left hand with ſtones, and with a ſling it was, that David himſelf ſlew the Giant Goliah.

While the State of Iſrael ſtood in theſe hard terms, the Philiſtims having parted their army into three troops, that they might ſpoil and deſtroy many parts at once, Jonathan, ſtrengthened by God, and followed with his Eſquire only, ſcaled a mountain, whereon a company of Philiſtims were lodged: the reſt of their army (as may be gathered by the ſucceſs) being encamped in the plain adjoyning. And though he were diſcovered before he came to the hill top, and in a kind of deriſion, called up by his enemies: yet he ſo behaved himſelf, as with the aſſiſtance of God, he ſlew 20 of the firſt Philiſtims that he encountered. Whereupon the next companies taking the alarm, and being ignorant of the cauſe, fled away amazed altogether. In which confuſion, fear, and jealouſie, they ſlaughtered one another in ſtead of enemies: whereupon thoſe Hebrews which became of their party, becauſe they feared to be ſpoiled by them, took the advantage of their deſtruction, and ſlew of them in great numbers. And laſtly, Saul himſelf taking knowledge of the rout and diſorder, together with thoſe Iſraelites that ſhrouded themſelves in Mount Ephraim, ſet upon them, and obtained (contrary to all hope and expectation) a moſt happy and glorious victory over them. Here was that propheſie in Deuteronomy fulfilled by Jonathan, That one of thoſe which feared God, ſhould kill a thouſand, and two of them, ten thouſand. 1 Sam. 14. 12. 1 Sam. 14.

This done, the ſmall Army of Iſrael made retreat from the purſuit. And although Saul had bound the people by an oath not to take food till the evening, yet his ſon Jonathan, being infeebled with extream labour and emptineſs, taſted a drop of honey in his paſſage: for which Saul his father would have put him to death, had not the people delivered him from his cruelty.

The late miraculous victory of Saul and Jonathan, ſeems to have reduced, unto the Philiſtims remembrance, their former overthrow, likewiſe miraculous in the days of Samuel; ſo that for ſome ſpace of time they held themſelves quiet. In the mean while Saul being now greatly encouraged, undertook by turns, all his bordering enemies; namely, the Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, and the Arabians of Zobah, againſt all which he prevailed. He then aſſembled all the forces he could make, to wit, 210000 men, and receiving the commandment of God by Samuel, he invaded Amalek, waſting and deſtroying all that part of Arabia Petræa, and the Deſart belonging to the Amalekites, from Havilah towards Tigris unto Shur, which bordereth Egypt; in which war he took Agag their King priſoner. But whereas he was inſtructed by Samuel to follow this Nation without compaſſion, becauſe they firſt of all attempted Iſrael, when they left Ægypt in Moſes's time: he notwithſtanding did not only ſpare the life of Agag, but reſerved the beſt of the beaſts, and ſpoil of the Country, with pretence to offer them in ſacrifice to the living God. Therefore did Samuel now a ſecond time make him know that God would caſt him from his royal eſtate, to which he was raiſed when he was of baſe condition, and, as the Text hath it, little in his own eyes. And though the offence was great in Saul for not obeying the voice of God by Samuel, had there been no former precept to that effect: yet ſeeing Saul could not be ignorant how ſeverely it pleaſed God to enjoyn the Iſraelites to revenge themſelves upon that Nation, he was in all inexcuſable. For God had commanded that the Iſraelites ſhould put out the remembrance of Amalek from under heaven. For the cruelty with the predeceſſors of this Agag uſed againſt the Iſraelites, eſpecially on thoſe which were over-wearied, faint, ſick, and aged people, was now to be revenged on him, and his Nation, above 400 years afterward; and now he was to pay the debt of blood, which his forefathers borrowed from the innocent: himſelf having alſo ſinned in the ſame kind, as theſe words of Samuel witneſs: As thy ſword hath made other women childleſs, ſo ſhall thy mother be childleſs among other women; at which time Samuel himſelf (after he had been by many bootleſs intreaties perſwaded to ſtay a while with Saul) did cut Agag in pieces before the Lord in Gilgal, and ſoon after he departed to Ramath, and came no more to ſee Saul until the day of his death. 1 Sam. 14. 1 Sam. 15. Exod. 17. Deut. 25. 15. 1 Sam. 15. 33.

SECT.

SECT. V.

Of the occurents between the rejection of Saul and his death.

NOw while Samuel mourned for Saul, God commanded him to choose a King for Israel, among the sons of Ishai: which Samuel (doubting the violent hand of Saul) feared in a sort to perform, till it pleased God to direct him, how he might avoid both the suspition, and the danger. And if Samuel knew that it was no way derogating from the providence of God, that by his cautious care and wisdom, he sought to avoid the inconveniences or dangers of this life: then do these men mistake the nature of his divine ordinance, who neglecting the reason that God hath given them, do no otherwise avoid the perils and dangers thereof, than as men stupified in the opinion of fate or destiny, neglecting either to beg counsel at Gods hands by prayer, or to exercise that wisdom or foresight, wherewith God hath enriched the mind of man for his preservation. Neither did the all-powerful God (who made and could destroy the world in an instant) disdain here to instruct Samuel, to avoid the fury of Saul, by the accustomed cautious ways of the world.

Of the sons of Ishai, Samuel, by God directed, made choice of David, the youngest, having refused Eliab, the first born: who though he were a man of a comely person and great strength; yet unto such outward appearance, the Lord had no respect. For as it is written, God seeth not as man seeth, &c. but the Lord beholdeth the heart. He also refusing the other six brethren, made choice of one whom his father had altogether neglected, and left in the field to attend his flock; for of him the Lord said to Samuel, Arise and anoint him, for this is he: which done, Samuel departed and went to Ramath. Neither was it long after this, that Saul began to seek the life of David: in which bloody mind he continued till he died, overcome in battel by the Philistims.

1 Sam. 16.

The Philistims having well considered (as it seems) the increase of Saul his power through many victories by him obtained, whilst they had sitten still and forborn to give impediment to his prosperous courses, thought it good to make new trial of their fortune, as justly fearing that the wrongs, which they had done to Israel, might be repayed with advantage, if ever opportunity should serve their often injured neighbours against them, as lately it had done against Moab, Ammon, and the rest of their ancient enemies. Now for the quality of their Souldiers, and all warlike provisions, the Philistims had reason to think themselves equal, if not superiour to Israel. The success of their former wars had, for the most part, been agreeable to their own wishes: as for late disasters, they might, according to humane wisdom, impute them to second causes; as to a tempest happning by chance, and to a mistaken alarm, whereby their Army, possessed with a needless fear, had fallen to rout. Having therefore mustered their forces, and taken the field, encamping so neer to the Army, which King Saul drew forth against them, that they could not easily depart without the trial of a battel, each part kept their ground of advantage for a while, not joyning in gross, but maintaining some skirmishes, as refusing both of them to pass the Valley that lay between their Camps. Just causes of fear they had on both sides; especially the Philistims, whose late attempts had been confounded by the angry hand of God. Upon this occasion perhaps it was, that they sought to decide the matter by single combat, as willing to try in one mans person, whether any stroak from heaven were to be feared. Goliah of Gath, a strong Giant, fearing neither God nor Man, undertook to defie the whole Host of Israel, provoking them with despightful words, to appoint a Champion that might fight with him hand to hand; offering condition, that the party vanquished in its Champion, should hold it self as overcome in gross, and become vassal unto the other. This gave occasion to young David, whom Samuel by Gods appointment had anointed, to make a famous entrance into publique notice of the people. For no man durst expose himself to encounter the great strength of Goliah, until David (sent by his father of an errand to the Camp) accepted the combat, and obtained the victory, without other arms, offensive or defensive, than a sling, wherewith he overthrew that haughty Giant, and after with his own Sword strook off his head. Hereupon the Philistims, who should have yielded themselves as subjects to the Conquerour, according to the covenant on their own side propounded, fled without stay; and were pursued and slaughtered even to their own gates. By this victory the Philistims were not so broken, that either any of their Towns were lost, or their people discouraged from infesting the Territories of Israel. But David, by whom God had wrought this victory, fell into the grievous indignation of his Master Saul, through the honour purchased by his well-deserving. For after such time as the spirit of God departed from Saul, and came upon David, he then became a cruel Tyrant, faithless, and irreligious. Because the High Priest Abimelech fed David in his necessity with hallowed bread, and armed him with a sword of his own conquest, taken from Goliah; Saul not only by his wicked Edomite Doeg murthered this Abimelech and 85 Priests of Nob, but also he destroyed the City, and smote with the edge of the sword both man and woman, both child and suckling, both Ox and Ass, and Sheep. And he that had compassion on Agag the Amalekite, who was an enemy to God and his people, and also spared and preserved the best of his Cattel, contrary to the Commandment and Ordinance of God, both by Moses and Samuel, had not now any mercy in store for the innocent, for the Lords servants, the Priests of Israel. Yea, he would have slain his own son Jonathan, for pitying and pleading Davids innocency; as also once before, for tasting the honey, when his fainting for hunger made him forget his fathers unreasonable commination. The companions of cruelty are, breach of faith towards men, and impiety towards God. The former he shewed in denying David his daughter, whom he had promised him; and again in taking her away from him to whom he had given her: also in that, when as David had twice spared his life in the Territory of Ziph, and Saul twice sworn to do him no hurt, and confessed his errours, yet he sought still to destroy him, by all the means he could. His impiety towards God he shewed, in that he sought counsel of the Witch of Endor, which was the last preparative for his destruction. For whereas, when he sought counsel from God, he had been always victorious: from the Oracle of the Devil this success followed, that both himself, and his three sons, with his neerest and faithful servants, were all slaughtered by the Philistims: his body with the bodies of his sons (as a spectacle of shame and dishonour) were hung over the walls of Bethsan; and there had remained till they had found burial in the bowels of ravenous birds, had not the grateful Gileadites of Jabes, stoln their carcasses thence, and interred them. This was the end of Saul, after he had governed Israel, together with Samuel, 40 year, and by himself after Samuel 20 years, according to Cedrenus, Theophilus, and Josephus. But yet it seemeth to me, that after the death of Samuel, Saul did not rule very long: For in the beginning of the 25th chapter, it is written, that Samuel died; and in the rest of the same chapter, the passages are written of David, Nabal, and Abigail, after which the death of Saul quickly ensued.

An exceeding valiant man he was, and gave a fair entrance to all those victories which David afterward obtained: for he had beaten the Ammonites with their neigbouring Nations; crusht the Syrians, and their adherents; broken the strength of the Amalekites; and greatly wasted the power and pride of the Philistims.

SECT. VI.

Of such as lived with Samuel and Saul; of Helen, and Hercules, and of their issues: upon occasion of the Dores, with the Heraclidæ, entring Peloponnesus about this time.

IN the second year of Samuel, according to Eusebius, was David born: after Codoman, later, and in the ninth year: after Bunting, in the tenth. For David, saith he, was thirty years old when he began to reign: whence it followeth, that he was born in the tenth of the forty years, which are given to Samuel and Saul. About the eleventh year of Samuel, Æneas Silvius the son of Posthumus began his reign over the Latines in Alba, who governed that State one and thirty years. There are who place before him Latinus Silvius, as brother to Posthumus, calling him the fifth from Æneas, and fourth King of Alba, whereof I will not stand to dispute. In the eleventh of Samuel, Dercylis sate in the Throne of Assyria, being the one and thirtieth King; he ruled that Empire forty years. In this age of Samuel the Dores obtained Peloponnesus, and at once with the Heraclidæ, who then led and commanded the Nation, possest a great part thereof, 328 years before the first Olympiad, according to Diodorus and Eratosthenes. For all Greece was anciently possessed by three Tribes or Kindreds, viz. the Ionians, Dorians, and Æolians: at length it was called Hellas, and the people Hellenes, of Hellen the son of Deucalion, Lord of the Country of Pthiotis in Thessaly. But before the time of this Hellen, yea, and long after, Greece had no name common to all the Inhabitants, neither were the people called Hellenes, till such time as partly by trading in all parts of the Land, partly by the Plantation of many Colonies, and sundry great victories obtained, the issues of Hellen had reduced much of the Country under their obedience, calling themselves generally by one name, and yet every several Nation after some one of the posterity of Hellen, who had raigned over it. And because this is the fartheſt antiquity of Greece, it will not be amiss to recount the Pedigree of her first planters.

Japetus (as the Poets fable) was the son of Heaven and Earth, so accounted, either because the names of his Parents had in the Greek tongue such signification: or perhaps for his knowledge in Astronomy and Philosophy.

Japetus begat Promotheus, and Epimetheus: of whom all men have read, that have read Poets. Prometheus begat Deucalion; and Epimetheus, Pyrrha; Deucalion and his wife Pyrrha reigned in Thessaly, which was then called Pyrrha (as Cretensis Rhianus affirmeth) of Pyrrha the Queen. In Deucalions time was that great flood, of which we have spoken elsewhere. Deucalion begat Hellen: whose sons were Xuthus, Dorus, and Æolus: of Dorus and Æolus, the Dores and Æolians had name. The Æoles inhabited Bœotia. The Dores having first inhabited sundry parts of Thessaly, did afterward seat themselves about Parnassus, and finally became Lords of the Countries about Lacedæmon: Xuthus the eldest son of Hellen, being banished by his brethren, for having diverted from them to his own use, some part of their Fathers goods, came to Athens: where marrying the Daughter of King Erictheus, he begat on her two sons, Achæus and Ion. Of these two, Achæus, for a slaughter by him committed, fled into Peloponnesus: and seating himself in Laconia, gave name to that region: from whence (as some write) he afterwards departed; and levying an Army, recovered the Kingdom of his Grandfather in Thessaly.

Ion being General for the Athenians, when Eumolpus the Thracian invaded Attica, did obtain a great Victory, and thereby such love and honour of the people, that they committed the ordering of their State into his hands. He divided the Citizens into Tribes, appointing every one to some occupation, or good course of life. When the people multiplied, he planted Colonies in Sycionia, then called Ægialos or Ægialia: In which Country Solinus then reigning, who thought it safer to give his Daughter Helice in marriage to Ion, and make him his Heir, than to contend with him. So Ion married Helice, and built a Town called by his Wives name in Ægialia, where he and his posterity reigned long; and (though not obliterating the old name) gave to that Land denomination. But in after times the Dores assisting the Nephews of Hercules, invaded Peloponnesus, and overcoming the Achæans, possessed Laconia, and all those parts which the Achæi, had formerly occupied. Hereupon the Achæi driven to seek a new seat, came unto the Iones, desiring to inhabit Ægialia with them, and alledged in vain, that Ion and Achæus had been brethren. When this request could not be obtained, they sought by force to expel the Ionians, which they performed; but they lost their King Tisamenes, the son of Orestes, in that War.

Thus were the Iones driven out of Peloponnesus, and compelled to remove into Attica, from whence after a while they sailed into Asia, and peopled the Western coast thereof; on which they built twelve Cities, inhabited by them, even to this day, at the least, without any universal or memorable transmigration. The expedition of the Iones into Asia hath been mentioned of all which have written of that Age, and is commonly placed 140 years after the War of Troy, and 60 years after the descent of the Heraclidæ into Peloponnesus. These Heraclidæ were they of whom the Kings of Sparta issued; which race held that Kingdom about 700 years. Of their Father Hercules many strange things are delivered unto us by the Poets, of which some are like to have been true, others perhaps must be allegorically understood. But the most approved Writers think that there were many called Hercules, all whose exploits were by the Greeks ascribed to the sons of Alcmena, who is said to have performed these 12 great labours.

First he slew the Nemæan Lyon: secondly, he slew the serpent Hydra, whith had nine heads, whereof one being cut off, two grew in the place: the third was the overtaking a very swift Hart: the fourth was the taking of a wild Bore alive, which haunted mount Erymanthus in Arcadia: the fifth was the cleansing of Augias his Ox-stall in one day, which he performed by turning the River Alpheus into it: the sixth was the chasing away of the Birds from the Lake Stymphalis: the seventh was the fetching a Bull from Crete: the eighth was the taking of the Mares which Diomedes

medes King of Thrace fed with humane flesh the ninth, was to fetch a Girdle of the Queen of the Amazons: the three last were, to fetch Gerion's Beeves from Gades; the golden Apples of the Hesperides, and Cerberus from Hell. The Mythologicall interpretation of these I purposely omit, as both over-long to be here set down, and no less perplexed than the labours themselves. For some, by Hercules understand Fortitude, Prudence, and Constancy, interpreting the Monsters, Vices. Others make Hercules the Sun, and his travels to be the twelve signs of the Zodiak. There are others who apply his works historically to their own conceits; as well assured, that the exposition cannot have more unlikelihood, than the fables. That he took Elis, Pylus, Oechalia, and other Towns, being assisted by such as either admired his vertues, or were beholding unto him; Also that he slew many Theeves and Tyrants, I take to be truely written, without addition of Poetical vanity. His travels through most part of the World, are, or may seem, borrowed from Hercules Lybicus. But sure it is that many Cities of Greece were greatly bound to him; for that he (binding all his endeavours to the common good) delivered the Land from much oppression. But after his death, no City of Greece (Athens excepted) requited the vertue and deserts of Hercules, with constant protection of his Children, persecuted by the King Eurystheus. This Eurystheus was Son of Sthenelus, and grand-child of Perseus; he reigned in Mycenæ, the mightiest City then in Greece. He it was that imposed those hard tasks upon Hercules, who was bound to obey him (as Poets report) for expiation of that Murther, which in his madness he had committed upon his own children; but as others say, because he was his Subject and Servant: wherefore there are who commend Eurystheus for employing the strength of Hercules to so good a purpose. But it is so generally agreed by the best Writers, that Hercules was also of the stock of Perseus, and holden in great jealousie by Eurystheus because of his vertue, which appeared more and more in the dangerous services, wherein he was imployed, so that he grew great in reputation and power through all Greece; and had by many Wives and Concubines above threescore Children. These Children Eurystheus would fain have got into his power, when Hercules was dead: but they fled unto Ceyx King of Thracinia, and from him (for he durst not withstand Eurystheus) to Athens. The Athenians not only gave them entertainment, but lent them aid, wherewith they encountred Eurystheus. Iolaus the brothers son of Hercules, who had assisted him in many of his travels, was Captain of the Heraclidæ. It is said of him, that being dead he obtained leave of Pluto to live again till he might revenge the injuries done by Eurystheus: whom when he had slain in battel, he died again. It seems to me, that whereas he had led Colonies into Sicily, and abode there a long time forgotten: he came again into Greece to assist his Cousins, and afterwards returned back. When the Peloponnesians understood that Eurystheus was slain, they took Atreus the Son of Pelops to their King: for he was rich, mighty, and favoured of the People. Against him the Heraclidæ marched under Hyllus, the son of Hercules. But to avoid effusion of bloud, it was agreed, that Hyllus should fight with Echenus King of the Tegeatæ, a people of Arcadia, who assisted Atreus; with condition, that if Hyllus were Victor, he should peaceably enjoy what he challenged as his right: otherwise the Heraclidæ should not enter Peloponnesus in an hundred years. In that combat Hyllus was slain, and the Heraclidæ compelled to forbear their Country, till the third generation: at which time they returned under Aristodemus (as the best authority doth shew, though some have said, that they came under the conduct of his Children) and brought with them the Dores whom they planted in that Country, as is before shewed, having expelled the Achæi, over whom the issue of Pelops had reigned after the death of Eurystheus four generations.

SECT. VII.

Of Homer and Hesiod, and many changes in the World, that happened about this Age.

ABout this time that excellent learned Poet Homer lived, as many of the best Chronologers affirm. He was by race of the Mædnes, descended (as Funcius imagineth) of Berosus his Anamion, who gave name to that people. But this Funcius imagineth Homer the Poet to have been long after these times, rashly framing his Æra according to † Archilochus in the tract, or rather fragment de temporibus; and makes seven more of this name to have flourished in divers Cities in Greece. Whence, perhaps, sprang the diversity of opinions, both of the time, and of the native City of Homer. According to this Archilochus, Funcius finds Homer about the time of Manasse King of Juda, and Numa of Rome. He was called Melesigenes from the place of his birth, and at length Homer, because blind men follow a guide, which signification among others, is in the Verb ὁμηρεῖν; for this Homer in his later time was blind. † Clemens Alexandrinus recites many different opinions touching the question of the time when Homer lived. So also * Aulus Gellius, and Tatianus Assyrius in his Oration ad gentes. Paterculus reckons that Homer flourished 950 years before the Consulship of Marcus Vinutius: which Mercator casteth up in the Worlds year 3046, and after Troy taken, about 260 years: and about 250 years before the building of Rome; making him to have flourished about the time of Jehosophat King of Juda. But Clemens Alexandrinus and Tatianus above named, mention Authors that make him much ancienter. The difference of which Authors in this point is not unworthy the Readers consideration, that by this one instance he may guesse of the difficulty, and so pardon the errours in the computations of ancient time: seeing in such diversity of opinions a man may hardly find out what to follow. For Crates the Grammarian (as Clemens Alexandrinus reports) gave being to Homer about 80 years after Troy taken, near the time that the Heraclidæ returned into Peloponnesus: and Eratosthenes after Troy 100 years. Theopompus 500 years after the Army of Greece sailed in Phrygia for the War of Troy. Euphorion makes him contemporary with Gyges, who began to reign in the 18 Olympiad (which was 45 years after Rome was built) and Sosibius saith, that he was 90 years before the first Olympiad: which he seeks to prove by the times of Charillus and his son Nicander. Philechorus placeth him 180 after Troy: Aristarchus 140 in the time of the seating of the Colonies in Ionia. Apollodorus affirms that he lived while Agesilaus governed Lacedæmon; and that Lycurgus in his young years, about 100 years after the Ionian plantations, came to visit him, near 240 years after Troy taken. Herodotus finds Homer flourishing 622 years before Xerxes enterprise against the Grecians: which Beroaldus accounteth at 168 years after the Trojan War. Eusebius seems to make him to have been about the time of Joas King of Juda, 124 years before

In his Evangelical Preparation, where out of Tatianus Aſſyrius he citeth ſundry opinions touching the time when Homer lived, he reckoneth many other Greek Writers more ancient than Homer; as Linus, Philammon, Epimenides, Phemius, Ariſteus, Orpheus, Muſæus, Thamyras, Amphion, and others.

Now whether Homer or Heſiodus were the elder, it is alſo much diſputed. Aulus Gellius reports that Philochorus and Xenophanes affirm, that Homer preceded Heſiod: and on the contrary, that Luc. Accius the Poet, and Ephorus the Hiſtorian, make Heſiod of an elder time than Homer. Varro leaves it uncertain which of theſe learned Fables was firſt born: but he finds that they lived together ſome certain years, wherein he confirms himſelf by an Epigram, written upon a Trevit, and left by Heſiod in Helicon.

Cornelius Nepos reports that they both lived 160 years before Rome was built: while the Silvii reigned in Alba, about * 140 years after the fall of Troy. † Euthymenes finds them both 200 years after Troy taken, in the time of Acaſtus the ſon of Pelias, King of Theſſaly. For my ſelf, I am not much troubled when this Poet lived; neither would I offend the Reader with theſe opinions, but only to ſhew the uncertainty, and diſagreement of Hiſtorians, aſwel in this particular, as in all other queſtions and diſpute of time. For, the curioſity of this mans is no leſs ridiculous, than the inquiſition why he began his Iliads with the word Menin, as perhaps containing ſome great myſtery. In deriſion whereof Lucian feigning himſelf to have been in Hell, and to have ſpoken with Homer, there asked him the cauſe why he began his book with that word: who anſwered, That he began in that ſort, becauſe it came in his head ſo to do.

* This number Mercator corrects and reads 240 for it.

It ſeemeth that Seſac, or, after Macrobius, Senemires ruled Egypt at this time: for Tauthersobris was his Succeſſour, who preceded Vaphres, Father in law to Solomon.

About the end of Saul's government, or in the beginning of Davids time, according to Caſſiodorus, the Amazons with the Gymnerians invaded Aſia, Latinus Sylvius then ruling in Italy. And beſides the overthrow of that Famous State of Troy (which fell 103 years before David's time) there were many other changes in the middle part of the World, not only by reaſon of thoſe Northern Nations: but there ſprung up ſomewhat nearly together, ſix Kingdoms into greatneſs, not before erected. In Italy that of the Latines: in the South part of Greece, thoſe of Lacedæmon, Corinth, and the Achei. In Arabia, Syria, Soba, and Damaſcus, the Adads made themſelves Princes, of which there were ten Kings, which began and ended with the Kings of Iſrael in effect: and ſomewhat before theſe, the State of the Iſraelites having now altered the Form of Government, began to flouriſh under Kings, of which David, in a few years, became maſter of all thoſe neighbouring Nations, who by enterchange of times had ſubjected the Judeans, corrupted their Religion, and held them under in a moſt abject and grievous ſlavery; to wit, the Edomæans, Moabites, Ammonites, Midianites, Itureans, and the reſt of Arabians, with the Philiſtims, Jebuſites, Geſhurites, Maacathites; all which acknowledged David for their Soveraign Lord, and payed him tribute.

Of DAVID.

Of Davids eſtate in the time of Saul.

THe hazzards which David ran into while he was yet only deſigned King, and lived as a private man, expecting the Empire, were very many. The firſt perſonal act of Fame, was his killing of Goliah in the view of both Armies, whereby he became known to Saul, and ſo highly affected of Jonathan the ſon of Saul, that he loved him as his own ſoul: Inſomuch as when Saul ſought to perſwade his ſon that David would aſſuredly be the ruine of his houſe, and eſtate, and offered him violence when he pleaded his cauſe; Jonathan could never be perſwaded, never forc'd, nor ever wearied from the care of David's life, and well doing. It was not long after this ſignal act of David, but that Saul became exceeding jealous of him, though he were become as his houſhould ſervant, and his Eſquire, or Armour-bearer. Saul being vexed with an evil ſpirit, was adviſed to procure ſome cunning Muſician to play before him upon the Harp; whereby it was thought that he might find eaſe; which came to paſs accordingly. He entertained David for this purpoſe, and began to favour him, giving him a place of command among the men of War. But the jealous Tyrant ſoon waxed weary of good affection, and ſought to kill David, being thereunto moved only through envy of his Vertue. This paſſion firſt brake forth in the midſt of his raving fit, at which time he threw a ſpear at David that was then playing on his Harp, to do him eaſe.

Cenſorinus remembreth one Aſclepius a Phyſician, who practiſed the curing of the Frenzy, by the like Muſick: and tempered thereby thoſe diſeaſes which grew from paſſion. That Pythagoras did alſo the like by ſuch a kind of harmony, Seneca, in his third book of Anger, witneſſeth. But the madneſs of Saul came from the cauſe of cauſes: and was thereby incurable, howſoever it ſometimes left him, and yielded unto that Muſick, which God had ordained to be a mean of more good to the Muſician than to the King.

Cenſ. c. 12. & 14.

Saul having failed in ſuch open attempts, gave unto David the command over 1000 Souldiers to confront the Philiſtims withall. For he durſt not truſt him as before, about his perſon, fearing his revenge. Now the better to cover his hatred towards him, he promiſed him his Daughter Merab to Wife: but having married her to Adriel, he gave to David his younger Daughter Michol, but with a condition,

tion, to preſent him with an hundred fore-skins of the Philiſtims: hoping rather (in reſpect of the valour of that Nation) that the Philiſtims would take David's head, than he their foreskins. This hope failing, when as now David's Victories begat new fears and jealouſies in Saul, he practiſed with Jonathan, and afterwards with his own hands attempted his life, but his purpoſes were ſtill fruſtrated. After all this he ſought to murther him in his own houſe, but Michol his Wife delivered him. So David ſought Samuel at Ramah, and being purſued by Saul, fled thence unto 1 Sam. 19. Nob in Benjamin, to Abimelech, then to Achis the Philiſtim, Prince of Geth: where to obſcure himſelf, he was forc'd to counterfeit both ſimplicity and diſtraction. But being ill aſſured among the Philiſtims,
1 Sam. 21. he covered himſelf in the Cave of Adullam: and after conveying ſuch of his Kinsfolks as were not fit to follow him, into Moab, he hid himſelf in the deſarts of Ziph, Maon, and the Hills of Engaddi, where
2 Sam. 24. he cut off the lap of Sauls Garment, and ſpared his life: as he did a ſecond time in the deſart of Ziph, after his paſſage with Nabal and Abigail. After
1 Sam. 29. which he repaired to Achis of Geth the ſecond time, and was kindly entertained, in regard of the hatred
Jaſen. in Pſal. with which his Maſter Saul was known to proſecute him.

* It ſeemeth that Simeon never obtained Siglag till this time, for it is ſaid in the 1. of Sam. c. 27. v. 6. therefore Siglag pertaineth unto the King of Juda unto this day.

Of Achis, David obtained * Siglag in Simeon, pretending to invade Judæa: but he bent his forces another way, and ſtrook the Amalekites, with other enemies of Iſrael, letting none live to complain upon him. Achis ſuppoſing that David had drawn blood of his own Nation, thought himſelf aſſured of him: and therefore preparing to invade Iſrael, ſummoneth David to aſſiſt him, who diſſembling his intent, ſeemeth very willing thereto. But the reſt of the Philiſtim Princes knowng his valour, and doubting his diſpoſition, liked not his company, and therefore he withdrew himſelf to Siglag. At his return he found the Town burnt, his two Wives, with the Wives and Children of his people, taken by the Amalekites: Hereupon his followers mutined, but God gave him comfort, and aſſurance to recover all again: which he did.

This Army of the Philiſtims commanded by Achis, encountred Saul at Gilboa, in which he and his three Sons were ſlain. The news, with Saul's Crown and Bracelets, were brought to David at Siglag, in his
2 Sam. 1. return from being victorious over Amalek, by a Man of the ſame Nation, who avowed (though falſly) that himſelf at Saul's requeſt had ſlain him. David, becauſe he had accuſed himſelf, made no ſcruple to cauſe him to be ſlain at the inſtant: and the ſooner, becauſe the probabilities gave ſtrong evidence with al. Otherwiſe it followeth not that every Man ought to be believed of himſelf to his own prejudice. For it is
In F. de quæſt. l. 1. held in the law; Confeſſio reorum non habenda eſt pro explorato crimine, niſi approbatio alia inſtruit religionem cognoſcentis. The priſoners confeſſion muſt not be taken for an evidence of the crime, unleſs ſome other proof inform the Conſcience of the Judg. For a Man may confeſs thoſe things of himſelf, that the Judg by examination may know to be impoſſible. But becauſe it is otherwiſe determined in the title de cuſtodia reorum l. ſi confeſſus, & in cap. de pœnis l: qui ſententiam, therefore doth the Gloſs reconcile theſe two places in this ſort: Si quis in judicio ſponte de ſeipſo confiteatur, & poſtea maneat in confeſſione, id eſt ſatis. If any Man in judgment do confeſs of himſelf, of his own accord, and after doth perſevere in his confeſſion, it is enough. That David greatly bewailed Saul, it is not improbable; for death cutteth aſunder all competition: and the lamentable end that befel him being a King, with whom in effect the ſtrength of Iſrael alſo fell, could not but ſtir up ſorrow, and move compaſſion in the heart of David.

The victory which the Philiſtims had gotten, was ſo great, that ſome Towns of the Iſraelites, even beyond the River of Jordan, were abandoned by the Inhabitants, and left unto the enemy who took poſſeſſion of them without any reſiſtance made. Wherefore it may ſeem ſtrange, that a Nation ſo warlike and ambitious as were the Philiſtims, did not follow their fortune with all diligence, and ſeek to make the Conqueſt entire. Moſt like it ſeems, that the civil War immediately breaking out between David and the houſe of Saul, wherein Juda was divided from the reſt of Iſrael, gave them hope of an eaſie victory over both; and thereby cauſed them to attempt nothing at the preſent leſt by ſo doing they ſhould enforce their diſagreeing enemies to a neceſſary reconciliation; but rather to permit that the one part ſhould conſume the other, by which means both the victors, and the vanquiſhed, would become a prey to the violence of ſuch as had beaten them, when their forces were united.

SECT. II.

Of the beginning of Davids reign, and the War made by Abner for Isboſeth.

After the death of Saul, Abner, who commanded for Saul in the War, ſought to advance Iſboſeth (or Jebuſtus, according to Joſephus) though he had no right to the Kingdom of Iſrael: for Miphiboſeth the firſt Son of Jonathan lived. Againſt this Abner and Iſboſeth, David made a defenſive War, till Abner paſt Jordan, and entred the border of Juda; at which time he ſent Joab with ſuch forces as he had, to reſiſt Abner: Iſboſeth remaining in Gilead, and David in Hebron. The Armies encountred each other near Gibeon, where it ſeemeth that Abner made the offer to try the quarrel by the hands of a few; like to that combate between the Lacedæmonians and the Argives, remembred by Herodotus, 300 being choſen of each Nation, of which number three perſons were only left unſlain. The like tryal by a far leſs number was performed by the Horatii and Curiatii, for the Romans and Latines. The ſame challenge Goliah the Philiſtim, made, whom David ſlew: a cuſtom very antient. Edward the third offered the like tryal in his own perſon to the French King; and Francis the French King to Charles the Emperour. There were twelve choſen of each part, in this War of David with the houſe of Saul, to wit, ſo many of Benjamin, and as many of Juda: whoſe force and valour was ſo equal, as there ſurvived not any one to challenge the victory. But the quarrel ſtaid not here for the Army of Juda preſt Abner in groſs, and brake him. Three hundred and ſixty Men of Abners companions were ſlain, and but twenty of Juda; whereof Aſahel the Brother of Joab was one: who when he would needs purſue Abner, and by Abners perſwaſions could not be moved to quit him, he was forced to turn upon him, wounded him to death with the ſtroak of his ſpear. For though

That

Verse 10. That this civil War lasted two years, we find it written in the second of Samuel, the second Chapter; though in the beginning of the third it is again made probable, that this contention dured longer; and therefore the matter resteth still in dispute, and some of the Rabbins conceive that Isboseth had then reigned two years, when this was written, the War as yet continuing a longer time. For Abner held for the party of Isboseth after this, and till such time as there grew jealousie between him and Isboseth for Sauls Concubine: neither did the death of Isboseth instantly follow; but how long after the murther of Abner it happened, the same doth certainly appear.

SECT. III.

Of the death of Abner slain by Joab, and of Isboseth by Rechab and Baanah.

2 Sam. 3. 27. Abner, reconciled to David, was anon by Joab murdered; for Joab could not endure a companion in Davids Favour, and in the commandment of his forces; by which he was grown so powerful, as David forbore to call him to account: for thus much he confesseth of himself; I am this day weak, and these Men, the Sons of Zerviah, be too hard for me. In this sort David complained after Abners death; and to make it clear that he hated this fact of Joab, he followed him with this publick imprecation; Let the blood fall on the head of Joab, and on all his fathers house: and let them be subject to Ulcers, to the leprosie, to lameness, to the sword, and to poverty, &c. For could any thing have withstood the ordinance of God, this murther committed by Joab might greatly have indangered Davids estate, Abner being the mouth and trust of all the rest of the Tribes, not yet reconciled. This mischance therefore David openly bewailed, so that all Israel percieved him to be innocent of that fact. The place which Abner held, being General of the Men of War, was of such importance, that the Kings themselves were fain to give them great respect, as hath been already shewed more at large. This office Joab held in the army of Juda, and thought himself worthy to hold the place entire, if once his Lord might obtain the whole Kingdom. For he was near to David in kindred, and had been partaker of all his adversity; wherefore he did not think it meet, that an old enemy should in reward of new benefits, be made his partner. Indeed he was by nature so jealous of his dignity and place, that he afterward slew Amasa his own kinsman, and the Kings, upon the same quarrel, taking it in high disdain to see him joyned with himself as Captain of the host of Juda; much less could he brook a superiour: and such a one as had slain his Brother, and been beaten himself in Battel. But however Joab did hate or despise Abner, David esteemed highly of him as of a Prince, and a great Man in Israel, excusing the oversight by which he might seem to have perished, by affirming that he dyed not like a Fool, nor a Man vanquished: But as a Man falleth before wicked Men, so (saith he) didst thou fall. And certainly it is no errour of wit, nor want of valour and vertue in him, whom a stronger hand destroyed unawares, or whom subtilty in free trust bringeth to confusion. For all under the Sun are subject to worldly miseries and misadventures. Howsoever Isboseth meant to have dealt with Abner, yet when he heard of his death, he despaired greatly of his estate, and with him all Israel were possest with great fear: in so much as two of Isboseths own Captains, Rechab and Baanah, murthered Isboseth, and presenting his head to David, received the same reward that the Amalekite lately did, for pretending to have slain Saul. Isboseth, being dead, all the Elders of Israel repaired to David at Hebron, where he was the third and last time anointed by general consent. 2 Sam. 4.

SECT. IV.

Of the flourishing time of Davids Kingdom, the taking of Jerusalem, with two overthrows given to the Philistims, and the conduction of the Ark to the City of David.

WHen David was now established in the Kingdom, his first enterprise was upon the Jebusites, who in derision of his force, and confident in the strength of the place (as it is thought) manned their Walls with the blind and lame of their City; which David soon after entred, all their other forces notwithstanding. For having mastered the fort of Zion (which was afterward the City of David) he became Lord of Jerusalem, without any great danger, expelling thence the Jebusites, who had held it from the foundation, to the times of Moses and Joshua and after them almost 400 years. There are who expound this place, otherwise: Except thou take away the blind and the lame, thou shalt not come in hither. For some think that it was meant by the Idols of the Jebusites: others, that it had reference to the Covenant made long before with Isaac, and Jacob: the one blind by nature and age, the other made lame by wrestling with the Angel; and that therefore till those (that is, till that Covenant) be broken, David ought not to molest them. But for my self, I take it with Josephus, that they armed their Walls with certain impotent people at first, in scorn of Davids attempt. For they that had held their City about 400 years against all the Children of Israel, Joshua, the Judges, and Saul, did not doubt but to defend it also against David.

2 Sam. 5.

When he had now possest himself of the very heart and Center of the Kingdom, and received congratulatory Embassadours and presents from Hiram King of Tyre: he entertained divers other Concubines, and married more Wives, by whom he had ten Sons in Jerusalem, and by his former Wives, he had six in Hebron, where he reigned 7 years.

The Philistims hearing that David was now anointed King, as well of Juda as of Israel, they thought to try him in the beginning, before he was fully warm in his seat. And being encountred by David at two several times in the Valley of Rephaim, or of the Giants, they were at both times overthrown. After which he called the place Baalperazim. 2 Sam. 5.

Then David assembled 30000 choice Israelites to conduct the Ark of God from the house of Abinadab in Gibea to the City of David; which business was interrupted by the death of Uzzah the Son of Abinadab, whom the Lord slew for presuming to touch the Ark, though it were with intent to stay it from taking harm, when it was shaken. But after three years it was with great solemnity brought into the City with sacrifice, musick, dances, and signs of joyfulness, in which David himself gladly bare a part. Hereupon Michol derided him for dancing before the Ark, and afterward told him in scorn, That he was uncovered as a fool in the eyes of the maidens his Servants, namely, that he forgat his regal dignity both, in apparel and behaviour, and mixed himself among the base multitude, dancing as fools do in the ways and streets: not that she disliked Davids behaviour (as I take it) though she made it the colour of her derision; but rather the abundant grief, which this spectacle stirred up, beholding the glory of her husband husband to whom she was delivered lastly by force, and remembring the miserable end of her Father and Brethren, out of whose ruines she conceived that the Son of Ishai had built this his greatness: together with the many new Wives and Concubines imbraced, since his possession of Jerusalem, made her break out in those despiteful terms, for which she remained barren to her death. 1 Chr. c. 3.

This done, David consulted with the Prophet Nathan, for the building of the Temple or House of God, but was forbidden it, because he was a Man of War, and had shed blood. So greatly doth the Lord and King of all, detest homicide; having threatned, not in vain, that he would require the Blood of a Man, at the hand of a Man and Beast. The Wars which David had made were just, and the Blood therein shed was of the Enemies of God, and his Church: yet for this cause it was not permitted that his hands should lay the Foundation of that Holy Temple, hereby it appears how greatly those Princes deceive themselves, who think by blood-shed and terror of their Wars, to make themselves in greatness like to the Almighty, which is a damnable pride; not caring to imitate his mercy and goodness, or seek the blessedness promised by our Saviour unto the peace-makers.

Now although it was not pleasing to the Lord to accept a Temple of David's founding, yet was his religious intent so well accepted, that hereupon he received both a confirmation of the Kingdom to him and his heirs, and that happy promise of the everlasting Throne that should be established in his Seed.

SECT. V.

The overthrow of the Philistims and Moabites.

SOon after this, David overthrew the Philistims, which made them altogether powerless, and unable to make any invasion upon Israel in hast. For it is written, Accepit frænum Amgaris è manu Philisthæorum; which place, our English Geneva converts in these words, And David took the bridle of bondage out of the hands of the Philistims. The Latin of Junius giveth another and a better sence; for that bridle of Amgar was meant the strong City of Gath, or Geth, and so the Geneva hath it in the marginal note. This City of Gath was the same which was afterward Dio-Cæsarea, set on the frontier of Palæstina, at the entrance into Judæa and Ephraim. From thence they made their incursions, and thereinto their retreat in all their invasions, which being taken by David and demolished, there was left no such frontier Town of equal strength to the Philistims on that part. The hill whereon Geth or Gath stood, the Hebrews call Ammæ, whereof and of the word Gar is made Amgar, of which Pliny in his first book, and chap. 13. This exposition is made plain, and confirmed in the first of Chro, 18. 2 Sam. 8. v. 1. Junius in c. 8. of the 2. of Sam.

There was no Nation bordering the Jews that so greatly afflicted them as the Philistims did, who before the time of Saul (to the end they might not sharpen any weapon against them) did not leave one Smith in all their Cities and Villages of that kind, but inforc'd them to come down into their territory, for all iron work whatsoever they needed; so as the Israelites till this time of David, were seldom free from paying tribute to the Philistims. 1 Sam. 13.

After this he gave them four other overthrows: but the War of the Moabites and Arabians came between. In the first of which he was indangered by Ishbi-benob, the head of whose spear weighed 300 shekles of Brass, which make nine pound three quarters of our poizes: at which time Abishai succoured David, and slew the Philistim, whereupon the Counsellours and Captains of David (lest the light of Israel might by his loss be quenched) vowed that he should not thenceforth hazzard himself in any battel. The second and third encounter and overthrow of the Philistims was at Gob, a place neer Gesar, and the last at Gath or Geth. And being now better assured of the Philistims by the taking of Geth, he invaded Moab, from whom notwithstanding in his adversity he sought succour, and left his Parents with him in trust. But whether it were the same King or no, it is not known. 2 Sam. 21. v. 17.

The Rabbins feign that Moab slew those kinsfolks of David, which lived under his protection in Sauls time; but questionless David well knew how that Nation had been always enemies to Israel, and took all the occasions to vex them, that were offered. And he also remembred that in the 23 of Deut. God commanded Israel, not to seek the peace or prosperity of the Moabites; which David well observed, for he destroyed two parts of the people, leaving a third to Till the Ground. This victory obtained, he led his Army by the border of Ammon towards Syria Zobah, the region of Hadadezer the Son of Rehob King thereof. The place is set down in the description of the Holy Land: to which I refer the Reader.

SECT. VI.

The War which David made upon the Syrians.

IT is written in the Text: David smote also Hadadezer, &c. as he went to recover his border at the River Euphrates. Now whether the words (as he went to recover his border) be referred to David or Hadadezer, it is not agreed upon. Junius thinks that the article (he) hath relation to David, who finding Toha oppress by Hadadezer, overthrew the one, and succoured the other. But the antient and most received opinion, that this recovery hath reference to the Syrian, is more probable. For if David had intended any such enterprize towards Euphrates, he was in far better case to have proceeded after his victory than before, seeing that (Hadadezer being taken) he had now left no enemy on his back either to pursue him, or to take victuals and supplies from him, or to the passages of the mountains upon him at his return.

Again, seeing David was either to pass through a part of Arabia the desart, or by the plains of Palmyrena, his Army consisting of footmen, for the most, if not all: He had now both Horse and Chariots good store to carry his provisions through those uncultivated places, by which he was to have marched before he could have reached Euphrates, or any part thereof. But we find that David returned to Jerusalem, after he had twice overthrown the Syrian Army, not bending his course towards the River Euphrates, but seeking to establish his purchases already made. Whereby it may appear, that it was the Syrian, and not King David, that was going to enlarge his border, as afore is said.

The King of Syria, Damascena, and of Damascus whereof that region is so called, hearing that Hadadezer was overthrown by the Israelites, fearing his own estate, and the loss of his own Country which adjoyned to Syria Zoba of Hadadezer, sent for an Army of Aramites or Syrians to his succour: but these, as it appeareth, came too late for Hadadezer, and too soon for themselves: for there perished of those supplies 22000. This King of Damascus, Josephus (out of Nicholaus, an antient Historian) calleth Adad, who was also of the same name and family, as also those other Adads were: which now began to grow up in

After this he gave them four other overthrows: but the War of the Moabites and Arabians came between. In the first of which he was indangered by Ishbi-benob, the head of whose spear weighed 300 shekles of Brass, which make nine pound three quarters of our poizes: at which time Abishai succoured David, and slew the Philistim, whereupon the Counsellours and Captains of David (lest the light of Israel might by his loss be quenched) vowed that he should not thenceforth hazzard himself in any battel. The second and third encounter and overthrow of the Philistims was at Gob, a place near Gesar, and the last at Gath or Geth. And being now better assured of the Philistims by the taking of Geth, he invaded Moab, from whom notwithstanding in his adversity he sought succour, and left his Parents with him in trust. But whether it were the same King or no, it is not known. 2 Sam. 21. v. 17.

The Rabbins feign that Moab slew those kinsfolks of David, which lived under his protection in Sauls time; but questionless David well knew how that Nation had been alwaies enemies to Israel, and took all the occasions to vex them, that were offered. And he also remembred that in the 23 of Deut. God commanded Israel, not to seek the peace or prosperity of the Moabites; which David well observed, for he destroyed two parts of the people, leaving a third to Till the Ground. This victory obtained, he led his Army by the border of Ammon towards Syria Zobah, the region of Hadadezer the Son of Rehob King thereof. The place is set down in the description of the Holy Land: to which I refer the Reader.

SECT. VI.

The War which David made upon the Syrians.

IT is written in the Text: David smote also Hadadezer, &c. as he went to recover his border at the River Euphrates. Now whether the words (as he went to recover his border) be referred to David or Hadadezer, it is not agreed upon. Junius thinks that the article (he) hath relation to David, who finding Toha oppress by Hadadezer, overthrew the one, and succoured the other. But the antient and most received opinion, that this recovery hath reference to the Syrian, is more probable. For if David had intended any such enterprize towards Euphrates, he was in far better case to have proceeded after his victory than before, seeing that (Hadadezer being taken) he had now left no enemy on his back either to pursue him, or to take victuals and supplies from him, or to the passages of the mountains upon him at his return.

Again, seeing David was either to pass through a part of Arabia the desart, or by the plains of Palmyrena, his Army consisting of footmen, for the most, if not all: He had now both Horse and Chariots good store to carry his provisions through those uncultivated places, by which he was to have marched before he could have reached Euphrates, or any part thereof. But we find that David returned to Jerusalem, after he had twice overthrown the Syrian Army; not bending his course towards the River Euphrates, but seeking to establish his purchases already made. Whereby it may appear, that it was the Syrian, and not King David, that was going to enlarge his border, as afore is said.

The King of Syria, Damascena, and of Damascus whereof that region is so called, hearing that Hadadezer was overthrown by the Israelites, fearing his own estate, and the loss of his own Country which adjoyned to Syria Zoba of Hadadezer, sent for an Army of Aramites or Syrians to his succour: but these, as it appeareth, came too late for Hadadezer, and too soon for themselves: for there perished of those supplies 22000. This King of Damascus, Josephus (out of Nicholaus, an antient Historian) calleth Adad, who was also of the same name and family, as also those other Adads were: which now began to grow up in in greatnes, and so continued for ten descents, till they were extinguished by the Assyrians, as is shewed heretofore. David having now reduced Damascus under his obedience, left a garrison therein, as he did in Edom: having also sackt the adjoyning Cities of Betah, and Berathi, belonging to Hadadezer, of which Cities Ptolomy calleth Betah, Tauba: and Berathi he

2 Sam. 8. nameth Barathena, Tohu or Thoi, whose Country of Hamath joyned to Hadadezer (as in the description of the Holy Land the Reader may perceive) sent his Son Joram to congratulate this success of David: partly because he had War with Hadadezer, and partly because he feared David now victorious. He also presented David with vessels of Gold, Silver, and Brass; all which, together with the golden shields of the Aramites, and the best of all the spoils of other Nations, David dedicated unto God at his return. Junius translated the wordes (Clypeos aureos) by Umbones, as if all the parts of the Targets were not of Gold, but the Bosses only. The Septuagint call them Bracelets: Aquila, Golden Chains. But because Roboam made sheidls of Brass in place of these of Hadadezer, at such time as Shicah the Egyptian sack'd the Temple of Jerusalem, it may be gathered thereby that those of Hadadezer were golden shields.

2 Sam 1. This done, David sent Embassadours to Hanum, King of the Ammonites, to congratulate his establishment in his Fathers Kingdom: for David, in the time of his affliction under Saul, had been relieved by Nahash, the Father of Hanum. But this Ammonite being ill advised, and over jealous of his estate, used Davids Messengers so barbarously, and contemptuously (by curtailing their Beards, and their Garments) as he thereby drew a War upon himself, which neither his own strength, nor all the aids purchased, could put of or sustain. For notwithstanding that he had waged three and thirty thousand Souldiers of the Amalekites, and their confederates; to wit, of the Vassals of Hadadezer twenty thousand, and of Maachah and Ishtob thirteen thousand (for which he disbursed a thousand Talents of Silver) yet all these great Armies, together with the strength of the Ammonites were by Joab and his Brother Abishai easily broken and put to ruine: and that without any great loss or slaughter at that time. And it is written, that when the Aramites fled, the Ammonites also retreated into their Cities, the one holding themselves within the Walls, the other in their desarts adjoyning, till Joab was returned to Jerusalem.

Maachah the North part of Traconitis remembred in Deut. 3. 14. Ishtob or Thob a Country near Gad, under the Rocks of Arnon 2 Sam. 10.

Hadadezer hearing that Joab had dismissed his Army, assembled his forces again, and sent all the Companies that he could levy out of Mesopotamia; who under the command of Shobach passed Euphrates, and incamped at Helem, on the South side thereof. David hearing of this new preparation, assembled all the ablest Men of Israel, and marched toward the Syrian Army in Palmyrena, not yet entred into Arabia; to wit, at Helam a place no less distant from Damascus, towards the North-east, than Jerusalem was towards the South-West. Now David (speaking humanely) might with the more confidence go on towards Euphrates (which was the farthest off journey that ever he had) because he was now Lord of Damascus, which lay in the midway. He also possest himself of Thadmor or Palmyrena, which Solomon afterward strongly fortified; and this City was but one dayes journey from Helam, and the River Euphrates. So had he two safe retreats, the one to Thadmor, and the next from thence to Damascus. In this encounter between David and the Syrians, they lost 40000 Horsemen, and 700 Chariots, together with Sobach General of their Army. The Chronicles call these 40000 Souldiers, footmen, and so Junius converts it, and so is it very probable. For the Army of Israel consisting of Footmen, could hardly have slaughtered 40000 Horsmen, except they quitted their Horse and fought on Foot. So are the Chariots taken in this Battel, numbred at 7000 in the first of Chronicles the ninth; in which number, as I conceive, all the Souldiers that served in them, with the conductors, are included: so as their dyed of the Syrians in this War against David, before he forc't them to tribute, 100000 Footmen, besides all their Horsemen and waggoners, and besides all those that Joab slew, when they fled at the first encounter, together with the Ammonites before Rabbah. Notwithstanding all which, the Adads in following ages gathered strength again, and afflicted the Kings of Juda often: but the Kings of Israel they impoverished, even to the last end of that State.

Helam or Chelam which Ptolomy calleth Alamatha near the foords of Euphrates 2 Sam. 10

*See c. 18. sect. 2.

David having now beaten the Arabians and Mesopotamians, from the party and confederacy of Ammon: He sent out Joab the Lievtenant of his Armies to forrage and destroy their territory, and to besiege Rabbah, afterward Philadelphia, which after a while the Israelites mastered and possest. The Kings Crown which weighed a talent of Gold, garnished with precious Stones, David set on his own head, and carried away with him the rest of the riches and spoil of the City. And though David stayed at Jerusalem, following the War of Uriah his Wife, till such time as the City was brought to extremity, and ready to be entred: yet Joab in honour of David forbare the last assault, and entrance thereof, till his masters arrival. To the People he used extream rigour (if we may so call it, being exercised against heathen Idolaters,) for some of them he tare with Harrows, some he sawed asunder, others he cast into burning Kills, in which he baked Tyle and Brick.

SECT. VII.

Of Davids troubles in his reign and of his forces.

But as victory begetteth security, and our present worldly felicity a forgetfulnes of our former miseries, and many times of God himself, the Giver of all goodnes; so did these changes, in the fortune and state of this good King, change also the zealous care which formerly he had to please God in the precise observation of his Laws and Commandments: For having now no dangerous apparent enemy (against whom he was wont to ask counsel from the Lord) he began to be advised by his own humane affections and vain desires: For he was not only satisfied to take Uriah's Wife from him, and to use her by stealth; but he imbroidered his adultery with Uriah's slaugh- 2 Sam. 11.

shal him in the front or point of those Israelites, which gave an assault upon the suburbs of Rabba, when there was not as yet any possibility of prevailing. And that which could no less displease God than the rest, he was content that many others of his best Servants and Souldiers should perish together with Uriah, hoping thereby to cover his particular ill intent against him. After which, he began by degrees to fall from the highest of happines, and his days then to come, were filled with joys and woes interchangeable, his trodden-down sorrows began again to spring, and those perils which he had pulled up by the roots (as he hoped) gave him an after-harvest of many cares and discontentments. And if it had pleased GOD to take the witnes of Davids own mouth against him, as David himself did against the Amalekite, which pretended to have slain Saul, he had then appeared as worthy of reprehension as the other was of the death he suffered. For when Nathan the Prophet propounded unto him his own errour in the person of another, to wit, of him that took the poor mans sheep that had none else, the bereaver being Lord of many; He then vowed it to the living Lord, that such a one should die the death. And hereof, although it pleased God to pardon David for his life, which remission the Prophet Nathan pronounced; yet he delivered him Gods justice together with his mercy in the tenour following; Now 2 Sam. 12. 9, 10. therefore the sword shall never depart from thy house, &c. because thou hast taken his wife to be thy wife, and hast slain Uriah with the sword of the children of Ammon. Soon after this, David lost the child of adultery which he begot on Bersheba. Secondly, his own son Ammon, being in love with his half sister Thamar, by the advice of his cousin-german the son of Shimeah, Davids brother, possest her by force: which when he had performed, he thrust her from him in a careless and despiteful manner. Two years after which foul and incestuous act, Absalom caused him to be murthered at the feast of his sheep-shearing: not perchance in revenge of Thamars ravishment alone; but having it in his heart to usurp the Kingdom, in which, because he could not in any sort be assured of Ammon, he thought his affairs greatly advanced by his destruction. So the one brother having ravished his own sister, and then despised her; the other after a long dissembled malice first made his own brother drunken, and then slaughtered him, which done, he fled away, and lived under the safeguard of Talmai 2 Sam. 13. King of Gessur, near Damascus, who was his grandfather by the mother, but a heathen King. Thirdly, when Absalom by the invention of Joab (but chiefly because of the great affection of David towards his 2 Sam. 14. son) was brought again, first to the Kings favour, and then to his presence; he began instantly to practise against David his father, seeking by the pretence of common justice, and by lowly and familiar manner to all men, and by detracting from his fathers equity, to win unto himself a popular reputation. Here began the great affliction threatned by the Lord as a punishment of Davids sin.

2 Sam. 15. The company which Absalom gathered at the first were but 200 men: which he carried with him from Jerusalem to Hebron, pretending, though impiously, the performance of a vow to God. There when Achitophel repaired unto him, and many troops of people from all places, he proclaimed himself King, and was by the people (whose hearts God had turned from their lawful Prince) accepted so readily, that David doubting to be set upon on the sudden, durst not trust himself in his own City of Jerusalem, nor in any other walled town for fear of surprise: but incamped in the fields and desarts with some 600 of his guard, and few else. The Priests he left in Jerusalem with the Ark of God, from whom he desired to be advertised of those things that chanced; to whom he directed Hushai his trusty friend, and servant, praying him to make himself in all his outward act- 2 Sam. 15. ons and counsels of Absalom's party and confederacy, thereby the better to discover unto him the purposes of Achitophel, a revolting Counsellour, whose practices he greatly doubted. And now when treason was in fashion, Ziba also sought to betray his master Mephibosheth the son of Jonathan: And Shimei of the house of Saul (the fire of whose hatred Davids pro- 2 Sam. 16. sperity had smothered, but his adversity illightned) holding himself upon the advantage of a mountain side, cast stones at David, and most despightfully cursed him to his face: but David attending no private revenges, forbad Abishai to pursue him for the present, yet left him among others in the roll of his revenge, to his son Solomon. Absalom being now possest of Jerusalem, was advised by Achitophel to use his fathers concubines in some such publick place, as all Israel might assure themselves, that he was irreconcileable to his father: whereof being perswaded, they would then resolvedy adhere to Absalom and his 2 Sam. 17. cause, without fear of being given up upon a reconciliation between them. This salvage and impious (though crafty counsel) Achitophel indeed urged for his own respect, as fearing that this rebellion might take end to his destruction, who most of all other inflamed Absalom against his father. And now was it fulfilled that Nathan had directly foretold David: I will raise up evil against thee out of thine own house, 2 Sam. c. and will take thy wives before thine eyes, and give them unto thy neighbour, and he shall lye with thy wives in the sight of the Sun: for thou diddest it secretly, but I will do this thing before all Israel, and before the Sun. He also gave advice to Absalom, that himself with an Army of 12000 men might be employed at the instant for the surprizing of David: which had willingly been imbraced by Absalom, had not Hushai Davids faithful servant given counter-advice, and swayed it: perswading Absalom that it was fitter and more safe for him with all the strength of Israel to pursue his father, than by such a troop, which Davids valour and those of his attendants might either indanger or resist. This delay in Absalom, and advantage of time gained by David, was indeed, after God, the loss of the one, and delivery of the other. Whereupon Achitophel rightly fearing (by the occasion fore-shewed) the success which followed, disposed 2 Sam. 17. of his own estate, and then forsook both the party 23. and the care of Absalom, and of his own life.

David being advertised of this enterprize against him, marched away all night, and past Jordan, possessing himself of Mahanaim in the Tribe of Gad: the same wherein Isboseth himself in the war against David after Sauls death seated himself. To which place there repaired unto him Shobi the son of Nahash the Ammonite, whom David loved, the same which Josephus calleth Shiphar. And though it be greatly disputed, what this Shobi was, yet the most general and probable opinion makes him a second brother to Hanum, whom David for his fathers sake established in the Kingdom, after Hanums overthrow: in thankfulness whereof he relieved David in this his extremity. There came also to Davids assistance Machir of Lodobar, Guardian in former times to Mephibosheth, and among others Barzillai the Giliadite, who willingly fed David and all his company.

In the mean time both the King and Absalom prepared to fight; Absalom made Amasa Commander of the Army of Israel, the same place which Joab held with David; an office next the King himself, like unto that of the Majors of the Palace anciently in France. David, perswaded by his company, stayed in Mahanaim, and disposed the forces he had to Joab, Abishai, and Ittai, giving them charge in the hearing of all that issued out of the port of Mahanaim, that they should spare the life of Absalom. But Joab, besides that he was very cruel by nature, remembred that Absalom had lately disposed of his government to Amasa, and therefore the victory being obtained, and news brought him that Absalom hung by the hair of his head on a tree, when he could not perswade 2 Sam. 18. the messenger to return and kill him, he himself with 14. his own servants dispatcht him. It appeared also by the sequel that Joab affected Adonijah whom he afterward acknowledged, David yet living; and fearing 2 Sam. 17.

the disposition of Absalom, he imbraced the present advantage offered.

Hereof, together with news of the victory, when knowledge was brought to David, he mourned and sorrowed, not only as a man that had lost a son, but as one that had out-lived all his worldly joys, and seen every delight of life interred. For he so hid himself from his people, as those which hoped for honour and reward after so great a victory, covered themselves also in the City, as if they had committed the greatest offences, and had rather deserved death than recompence. Whereupon Joab presenting himself before David, perswaded him to dissemble his sorrow for the present, and to shew himself to the Army. For first, he told him that he had discountenanced his faithful servants, who had that day preserved his life; inferring that nothing could be more dangerous to a King, than not only not to acknowledge so great a love and constancy in his people, who being but few in number, did yet resolvedly expose themselves to great perils for his sake: but on the contrary, grieve and lament at their good success. For, no doubt, they might all have bought their peace of Absalom at an easy rate. Secondly, he urged, that it was generally believed, that he loved his enemies, and hated his friends; and that he witnessed by this his mourning, that he had not any respect of his Princes, and others his faithful servants, but would more have joyed if they had all perished, and Absalom lived, than in the victory by their faithfulness and approved valour gotten.

Lastly, he used this prevalent argument, That if the King came not out and shewed himself publickly to his men of war, that they would all that very night abandon him, and return: concluding with this fearful threatning, And that will be worse unto thee than all the evil that fell on thee from thy youth hitherto. By these over-bold and arrogant speeches (though perchance uttered with a good intent) Joab raised David from his bed of sorrow, and brought him to the gates of the City among the people, whom he assured of his love and affection, especially Amasa, who commanded the Army of Absalom, to whom he promised the office of Lievtenanship; the same which Absalom had given him, and which Joab now enjoyed. For David doubted, that if Amasa were not satisfied, he might draw from him a great part of the strength of Israel, now under his commandment.

2 Sam. 19. 19. This done, the King marched towards Jordan homeward, where in his passage he pardoned Shimei, who had lately reviled him to his face: but this remission was but external, as appeared afterward. He also accepted of Mephibosheth his excuse, whom Ziba had falsly accused and betrayed.

2 Sam. 19. 38. He also intreated Barzillai the Gileadite, his late liberal host, to follow him to Jerusalem, that he might reward his service done him; who excusing himself by his age, appointed his son Chimham to attend the King.

At Gilgal on this side Jordan, all the Tribes assembled, and after some contention which of them ought to have most interest in David, the Army brake, and David returned to Jerusalem. But Sheba the son of Bichri, a Benjamite, of the faction of the house of Saul; finding some discontent among the Israelites, withdrew them from David, as from a stranger in whom they had no interest, and it seemeth that many of the people of the out Tribes, and in effect of all but Juda, bare still a good affection to the issues of their first King. David imployed his reconciled Captain Amasa, to give him contentment, and to witness his trust, as also because he conceived that Amasa had interest in those revolts of Israel more than Joab had. He received commandment from David to assemble the Army within three days, which he foreslowed: but being onward on his way, Abishai, Joabs brother, was sent after him, with Davids guard and best Souldiers, whom also Joab accompanied: and overtaking Amasa near Gibeon, pretending to imbrace him, gave him a wound, whereof he fell dead, being no less jealous of Amasa than he was of Abner, whom he murdered in the same manner, and out of the same impatient ambition. This done, he pursued Sheba; and finding him inclosed in Abel, assaulted the City with that fury, that the Citizens by the perswasions of a wise woman there inhabiting, cut off Sheba his head, and flung it to Joab over the walls: which done, he retreated his Army to Jerusalem, and commanded, as before, all the Hoast of Israel. 2 Sam. 20. 12.

The next act of David, was the delivery of Sauls sons or kinsmen to the Gibeonites, whom those Citizens hung up in revenge of their fathers cruelty. David had knowledge from the Oracle of God, that a famine which had continued on the land three years, came by reason of Saul and his house; to wit, for the slaughter of the Gibeonites: and therefore he willingly yielded to give them this satisfaction, both because he had warrant from God himself, as also, if we may judge humanely, to rid himself of Sauls line, by whom he and his might, aswell in the present as in the future, be greatly molested and indangered; only he spared Mephibosheth the son of Jonathan, both for the love he bare to his father, and for his oath and vow to God.

Now whereas it is written in the Text, The King took the two sons of Rispah, whom she bare unto Saul, and the five sons of Michol the daughter of Saul, whom she bare to Adriel, and delivered them to the Gibeonites: 2 Sam. 21. Junius calls this Michol the sister of her that was Davids wife, she whom Saul married to Phaltiel: but Michol here named, had Adriel to her husband; the same which is named Merab in the first of Samuel the eighteenth, who was first promised to David when he slew Goliah in the Valley Raphaim: and because it is written that Michol loved David, which perchance Merab did not, whether David had any humane respect in the delivery of her children, it is only known to God.

Now where the Geneva nameth Michol for Merab the wife of Adriel: the better translation were out of the Hebrew word here used, having an eclipsis or defect, and signifieth, as I am informed, one of the same kindred, as in the 19th verse of the same one and twentieth chapter it is said of Goliah, whose spear was weighty as a Weavers beam, when as by the same eclipsis it must be understood by the brother of Goliah; Goliah himself being formerly slain.

As by the death of Sauls children God secured the house of David, leaving no head unto rebellion: so did he strengthen both the King and Nation against forreign enemies by the valour of many brave Commanders, the like of whom, for number and quality, that people of Israel is not known to have had at any time before or after. Thirty Captains of thousands there were, all men of mark, and great reputation in war. Over these were six Collonels, whose valour was so extraordinary, that it might be well held as miraculous. The Collonels had some difference of place and honour, which seemeth to have been given upon meer consideration of their vertue. For Abishai the brother of Joab, who in the war against the Ammonites and Aramites was Lievtenant, and commanded half the army, could not attain to the honour of the first rank, but was fain to rest contented with being principal of the three Collonels Collonels of the second order, notwithstanding his nearness of blood unto the King, the flourishing estate of his own house, and his well approved services. All these Collonels and Captains, with the Companies belonging to them, may seem to have been such as were continually retained, or at the least kept in readiness for any occasion, considering that the numbers which were mustered and drawn out, if need required, into the field, very far exceeded thirty thousand, yea, or thirty times as many. They were most of them such as had followed the King in Saul's time, and been hardned with his adversities. Others there were very many, and principal men in their several Tribes, that repaired unto him after the death of Saul; but these Captains and Collonels (who with Joab, that was General of all the Kings Forces, make up the number of 37,) were the special men of War, and reckoned as David's Worthies. The long reign of David, as it is known to have consumed many of these excellent men of War, so may it probably be guessed to have wasted the most of those whose deaths we find no where mentioned. For the sons of Zervia, who had been too hard for David, were worn away, and only Joab left in the beginning of Solomon, who wanted his brother Abishai to stand by his side in his last extremity.

By the actions forepassed in the time of David, it is gathered, that he had reigned now 33 years or thereabouts, when the posterity of Saul was rooted out, so that he enjoyed about seven years of entire quiet and security, wherein it pleased God to remove all impediments that might have troubled the succession of Solomon in his Fathers Throne. In this time also David having established all things in Juda and Israel, and the borders thereof, he again displeased God by numbring the people, as in ostentation of his power: in which he employed Joab, with other Captains of his Army, who after nine moneths and twenty days travel, returned with the account and register of all the people, able and fit to bear Arms, and they amounted to the number of thirteen hundred thousand, besides Levi and Benjamin, whereof in Juda and the Cities thereof, five hundred thousand, and in Israel eight hundred thousand.

2 Sam. 24. 1 Chro. 21.

For this, when by the Prophet Gad he was offered from God the choice of three punishments, whereof he might submit himself to which he pleased; to wit, seven Years Famine; three Moneths War, wherein he should be unprosperous in all attempts, and be chased by his enemies; or a general pestilence to last three days: David made choice to bow himself under the hand of God only, and left himself subject to that cruel disease, which hath no compassion or respect of persons, of which there perished 70 thousand. And hereby he hath taught all that live, that it is better to fall into the hands of God than of men; whereof he giveth this divine reason, For his mercies are great.

2 Sam. 14.

SECT. VIII.

Of the last acts of David; Adonijahs faction; the revenge upon Joab and Shimei.

LAstly, when he grew weak and feeble, and past the acts and knowledge of Women, he was yet advised to lie in the arms of a young and well-complexioned Maiden, to keep him warm. In this his weak estate of body, when he was in a manner bedrid, Adonijah his eldest son (Ammon and Absalom being now dead) having drawn unto his party that invincible, renowned and feared Joab, with Abiathar the Priest, began manifestly to prepare for his establishment in the Kingdom after his Father. For being the eldest now living of David's sons, and a man of goodly personage, Solomon yet young, and born of a Mother formerly attainted with adultery, for which her name was omitted by Saint Matthew (as Beda, Hugo, Thomas, and others suppose) he presumed to carry the matter without resistance. Hereof when David had knowledge by Bersabe the Mother of Solomon, who did put him in mind of his faithful promise, that Solomon, her son should reign after him (Nathan the Prophet affirming the same thing unto the King, and seconding her report of Adonijah his presumption) the King calling unto him Zadok the Priest, Nathan the Prophet, and Benajah the Captain of his Guard, gave charge and commission to anoint Solomon, and to set him one the Mule whereon himself used to ride in his greatest state: which done, Solomon attended, and strongly guarded by the ordinary and choice men of War, the Cherethites, and Peletbites, shewed himself to the people. These tidings being reported to Adonijah, he presently abandoned his assistants, and for the safety of his life, he held by the horns of the Altar, whom for the present Solomon pardoned. After this, David had remaining two special cares, whereof he was desirous to discharge his thoughts; the one concerning the peace of the Land, which might be disturbed by some Rebellion against Solomon; the other concerning the building of the Temple, which he sought by all means to advance, and make the business publick. To bring these intentions to good effect, he summoned a Parliament, consisting of all the Princes of Israel, the Princes of the several Tribes, all the Captains and Officers, with all the mighty, and men of power; who did repair unto Jerusalem.

1 Chr. 28. 2.

In this Assembly the King stood up, and signified his purpose of building the Temple, shewing how the Lord had approved the motion. Herein he took occasion to lay open his own title to the Crown, shewing that the Kingdom was by Gods ordinance due to the Tribe of Juda (as Jacob in his blessing prophetically bequeathed it) and that God himself was pleased to make choice of him among all his Fathers sons. In like manner he said that God himself had appointed Solomon by name to be his Successour; whereupon he earnestly charged both the people and his son to conform themselves unto all that God had commanded, and particularly to go forward in this Work of the Lords house, which Solomon was chosen to build. Then produced he the pattern of the Work, according to the form which God himself had appointed; and so laying open his own preparations, he exhorted all others to a voluntary contribution.

1 Chro. 29. 9.

The Kings proposition was so well approved by the Princes and people, that whereas he himself had given three thousand talents of gold, and seven thousand of silver, they added unto it seven thousand of gold, and ten thousand of silver, besides brass, iron, and Jewels, heartily rejoycing in the advancement of so religious a Work. This business being so well dispatched, a solemn Feast with great sacrifice was made, at which time Solomon was again anointed King, and received fealty of all the Princes and people of the Land, and of all the Princes his brethren, the sons of King David. Solomon being thus established King, his Father David finding himself even in the hands of death, first exhorted his son to exercise the same courage and strength of mind, which himself had done in all his attempts; and to the end that a happy end might follow the beginning of all his enterprizes, he uttered these mighty words; Take

1 King. 2. 3. heed to the charge of the Lord thy God, to walk in his ways, and keep his ſtatutes, and his commandments, and his judgements, and his teſtimonies, as it is written in the Law of Moſes, &c. to the performance of which GOD faſtned the ſucceſſion, and proſperity of his
1 King. 1. 10. iſſues. For this done (ſaith GOD himſelf) Thou ſhalt not want one of thy Poſterity to ſit upon the Throne of Iſrael.

Secondly, he adviſed him concerning Joab; who out of doubt had ſerved David from the firſt aſſault of Jeruſalem to the laſt of his Wars, with incomparable valour and fidelity, ſaving that he faſtned himſelf to Adonijah (his maſter yet living) and thereby vexed him in his feeble age. But as God hath never left cruelty unrevenged, ſo was it his will that Joab ſhould drink of the ſame cup, whereof he had enforced other men to taſte, and ſuffer the ſame violence which himſelf had unjuſtly ſtrucken others withall, Qui gladio percutit, gladio peribit: for he had bereaved Abner and Amaſa of their lives, having againſt the one the pretence only of his brothers ſlaughter, whom Abner had ſlain in the time of War, and could not avoid him: againſt the other but a meer jealouſie of his growing great in the favour of David. And though Joab aſſured himſelf that Abner and Amaſa being dead, there was none left either to equal him, or ſupplant him, yet God (deriding the policies of wicked men) raiſed up Benhajah the ſon of Jehojadah, to pull him from the Sanctuary, and to cut him in peeces. For 1 King. 2. David giveth this cauſe to Solomon againſt Joab, that he ſlew the Captains of the Hoſt of Iſrael, and ſhed the bloud of war in peace; and to this apparent and juſt cauſe, it is not improbable but that David remembred the ill affection of Joab towards Solomon, which Joab made manifeſt by the untimely ſetting up of Adonijah, David yet living. Some other offence Joab had committed againſt David, of which in theſe words he put his ſon Solomon in mind; Thou knoweſt
1 King. 2. alſo what Joab the ſon of Serviah did to me, &c. Now whether this were meant by the killing of Abſalom, contrary to the Kings deſire, or by the proud words uſed to him when he mourned in Mahanaim for Abſalom; or whether it were the publiſhing of Davids Letter unto him for the killing of Uriah, thereby to diſgrace Solomon as deſcended of ſuch a mother, the Scriptures are ſilent. True it is, that thoſe great men of War do oftentimes behave themſelves exceeding inſolently towards their Princes, both in reſpect of their ſervice done, as alſo becauſe they flatter themſelves with an opinion, that either their maſters cannot miſs them, or that they dare not offend them. But this kind of pride hath overthrown many a worthy man, otherwiſe deſerving great honour and reſpect.

He alſo gave order to Solomon to rid himſelf of Shimei, who not long before had caſt ſtones at David, and curſed him to his face. And albeit by reaſon of 1 King. 2. his oath and promiſe David ſpared Shimei all the time himſelf lived, yet being duſt and in the grave, he ſlew him by the hand of Solomon his ſon. Hence it ſeemeth that King Henry the ſeventh of England had his pattern, when he gave order to Henry the Eighth to execute Pool as ſoon as himſelf was buried, having made promiſe to the King of Spain, when he delivered Pool unto him, that while he lived he would never put him to death, nor ſuffer violent hands to be laid upon him.

And yet did not the execution of Joab yeeld unto Solomon any ſuch great profit or aſſurance as he hoped for. For he found a young Adid of Idumea, and Reſin of Damaſcus to vex him: who, as the Scriptures witneſs, were emboldened to enterprize upon 1 King. 11. Solomon, hearing that David ſlept with his Fathers, and that Joab the Captain of the Hoſt was dead. Now when David had reigned in all forty Years, to wit, in Hebron ſeven Years, and in Jeruſalem three and thirty, he died.

For his perſon, he was of ſmall ſtature, but exceeding ſtrong. For his internal gifts and graces, he ſo far exceeded all other men, as putting his humane frailty apart, he was ſaid by God himſelf to be a man according to his own heart. The Pſalms which he wrote, witneſs his piety, and his excellent learning: of whom Jerom to Paulinus: David Simonides noſter, Pindarus, & Alcæus, Flaccus, quoque Catullus, & Serenus, Chriſtum lyra perſonat, & in decchachordo Pſalterio ab inferis ſuſcitat reſurgentem; David (ſaith he) our Simonides, Pindarus, Alcæus, Horace, Catullus and Serenus, he playeth Chriſt on his Harp, and on a ten-ſtringed Pſalter he raiſeth him up riſing from the dead. And being both a King and a Prophet, he foretelleth Chriſt more lightſomly and lively than all the reſt.

The book of the Pſalms, ſaith Glycas, was divided, ordered and diſtinguiſhed by Ezekias: but whether all the Pſalms were written by David, it is diverſly diſputed. For Athanaſius, Cyprian, Lyranus, and others conceive divers Authors anſwering the titles of the ſeveral Pſalms, as Moſes, Solomon, and the reſt hereafter named; and that only 73 Pſalms were compoſed by David himſelf, namely, thoſe which are intituled ipſius David. For the 50 and the 72 with the ten that follow, are beſtowed on Aſaph the ſon of Barachia, eleven other on the ſons of Korath; and eleven are aſcribed to Moſes, to wit, the 89 and the ten following, and ſo they are intituled in the old Hebrew Copies, though the Vulgar and Septuagint (three except) ſtile them otherwiſe. The ſuppoſed nine Authors of theſe Pſalms which David wrote not. Sixt. Senenſis nameth as followeth; Solomon, Moſes, (when Aben Ezra, contrary to Jerom, maketh one of David's ſingers) Aſaph, Ethan-Eziachi, Eman-Eziaira, Idithum, and the three ſons of Chore. But S. Chryſoſtome makes David the ſole Author of all the Pſalms, and ſo doth S. Auguſtine, reaſoning in this manner: Although (ſaith he) ſome there are that aſcribe thoſe Pſalms only to David, which are overwritten ipſius David, and the reſt intituled ipſi David, to others, this opinion (ſaith he) Voce Evangelica Salvatoris ipſius refutator, ubi ait quòd ipſe David in ſpiritu Chriſtum dixerit eſſe ſuum Dominum, quoniam Pſalmus 109 ſic incipit, Dixit Dominus Domino meo, Sede à dextris meis, &c. The voice of the Goſpel refutes this opinion, where it ſaith, that David himſelf in the ſpirit called Chriſt his Lord; becauſe the 109 Pſalm begins thus: The Lord ſaid unto my Lord, Sit thou at my right hand, &c. Laſtly, his Teſtimonies are uſed both by Chriſt and the Apoſtles, and he was as a pattern to all the Kings and Princes that ſucceeded him.

His Story, and all his particular actions, were written by the Prophets, Samuel, Nathan, and Gad, as it is in the firſt of Chron. 29. verſ. 19. For the ſeveral parts of the books of Samuel which intreat chiefly of David, were, as it ſeems, written by theſe three holy men.

Conſtantine Manaſſes hath an opinion, that the Trojans during the time of the ſiege ſought for ſuccour from David, and that he ſtayed Neuter in that War. But it ſeemeth that Manaſſes did miſcaſt the time 'twixt David and the Trojan War. For it is generally received that Troy fell between the times of Abdon and Sampſon Judges of Iſrael, about the Worlds years 2848, and David died in the year 2991.

SECT.

SECT. IX.

verſ. 14. HIs Treaſures were exceeding great. For it is written in the 22 of the firſt of Chronicles, that he left Solomon for the building of the Temple a hundred thouſand talents of Gold, and a thouſand thouſand talents of Silver, and of Braſs and Iron paſſing all weight, which is more than any King in the World poſſeſt beſides himſelf, and his Son, to whom he left it. For it amounteth to three thouſand three hundred thirty and three cart-load, and a third of a cart-load of Silver, allowing two thouſand weight of Silver, or ſix thouſand pound ſterling to every cart-load, beſides threeſcore and ſeventeen millions of French Crowns, or of our money twenty three millions and a thouſand pound: a matter, but for the teſtimony of the Scriptures, exceeding all belief. For that any riches were left him, it doth not appear, ſeeing that the Judges had not any treaſure, nor any ſoveraign power to make levies: but when they went to the wars they were followed by ſuch voluntaries as the ſeveral tribes by turns gave them: ſeeing alſo that Saul who was of a mean parentage, and perpetually vexed and invaded by the Philiſtims, could not in all likelihood gather great riches (if any at all) his Territories being exceeding narrow, and thereof the better part poſſeſt by his enemies.

Therefore it were not amiſs to conſider how David within the ſpace of not very many years, might amaſs up ſuch mighty treaſures. For though parſimony be it ſelf a great revenue, yet needs there muſt have been ſome other great means. It ſeems that he made the uttermoſt profit of all that he had, that was profitable. Euſebius in his 9 book and laſt chapter de Præparatione Evangelica, cited the words of Eupolemus, who reporteth that David, among other preparations for the Temple, built a Navy in Melanis (or, as Villalpandus corrects it, Achanis) a City of Arabia, and from thence ſent Men to dig for Gold in the Iſland Urphe, which Ortelius thinks was Ophir, though Eupolemus in this place of Euſebius (erring perhaps in this circumſtance) ſaith that this Iſland was in the red Sea: from whence, ſaith this Eupolemus, they brought Gold into Jury, Pineda l. 4. de Rebus Solomonis, c. 1. thinks that David did this way alſo enrich himſelf, and citeth this teſtimony of Eupolemus: and yet certainly David had many other ways to gather riches. Much land doubtleſs he gained by conqueſt from the Canaanites and Philiſtims, beſides thoſe fruitful vallies near Jordan in Thraconitis and Baſan, and the beſt of Syria, and other countries bordering the Iſraelites. Theſe demains belike he kept in his own hands, and with his infinite number of captives, which he took in his Wars, which were not able to redeem themſelves, husbanded thoſe grounds for his greateſt advantage. For it is written 2 Chro. 17. that Jahonathan was over his treaſures in the Field, in the Villages, in the Cities, in the Towns: that Ezri was over the labourers that tilled his ground, Simei over the Vinyards, and Sabdi over the ſtore of the Wine: Baal Hanan over the Olive trees, and Joaſh over the ſtore of the Oyl: alſo that he had herdſ-men that had charge over his Cattel, both in the high lands and in the plains, over his Sheep, Camels and Aſſes. And this cuſtom of enriching themſelves by husbandry and Cattel, the ancient Kings every where held, both before and after Davids time. For we read of Pharaoh, that he ſpake to Joſeph to appoint ſome of his Brethren, or of their Servants, to be rulers over his Cattel. We read of Uzzia, that he loved husbandry, had much Cattel, and ploughmen, and dreſſers of Vines; likewiſe we read it in all Greek Poets, that the wealth of the ancient Kings did ſpecially conſiſt in their Herds and Flocks; whereof it were needleſs to cite Augeas and Admetus, or any other for examples, the rule holding true in all. Now concerning David it is not unlikely, but that thoſe captives which were not imployed in husbandry, were many of them uſed by him in all ſorts of gainful profeſſions, as the ſame Romans in like manner uſed their ſlaves.

Gen. 47. 2 Chro. 26.

To theſe profits (beſides the tributes and impoſitions, which doubtleſs were great, and beſides the innumerable preſents which yearly were brought him, or extraordinarily ſent him, by Toha and others) we may add the great ſpoiles which he found in the Cities and Countries which he conquered: alſo the head money which was gathered per legem capitationis; by the law of capitation, or head money, every Man rich or poor paying half a ſicle of the Sanctuary, which is about as much as fourteen pence, and ſo in all it amounted to a wondrous ſum in that Kingdom: wherein one thouſand thouſand five hundred and ſeventy thouſand fighting Men were numbred by Joab. 1 Chro. 21. Now although this law of capitation be thought by ſome very learned, not to have been perpetual (which opinion of theirs nevertheleſs they confeſs is againſt the Hebrew expoſitions) yet David upon this occaſion is not unlikely to have put it in practiſe. And by theſe means might he be able to leave thoſe huge treaſures to Solomon. Yet it may ſeem that of this great maſs of Gold and Silver left by David, the leaſt part was his own in private; and ſo will it appear the leſs wonderfull that he left ſo much. Of his own liberality we find, that he gave to the building of the Temple three thouſand talents of Gold, and ſeven thouſand talents of Silver: a great ſum, but holding a very ſmall proportion to the other. Wherefore we are to conſider, that the treaſures of the Sanctuary it ſelf were exceeding great, as needs they muſt have been, having received continual encreaſe, without any loſs or diminution ever ſince the time of Moſes and Joſhuah. The revenues of the Sanctuary (beſides all manner of tithes and oblations, which defrayed the daily expences, and maintained the Prieſts and Levites) were partly raiſed out of the head money before mentioned; partly out of the ſpoils gotten in War. For all the booty was divided into two parts, whereof the Souldiers had one, and the people which remained at home, had the other half; whereby all the Country received benefit of the Victory, yet ſo, that the Souldiers had a far greater proportion than the reſt, as being fewer, and therefore receiving more for every ſingle ſhare. Numb. 31. 27.

Out of this purchaſe was deducted the Lords tribute, which was one in fifty, of that which the people received, and one in five hundred of that which was given to the Souldiers; namely, one hundred and one thouſand part of the whole booty. So in the ſpoil of Midian, thirty two thouſand Women being taken, the Army had ſixteen thouſand of them for ſlaves, and the Congregation had other ſixteen thouſand; but out of the ſixteen thouſand given to the Army, were exempted two and thirty for the Lords tribute; Out of the peoples number were taken three hundred and twenty. By this means, the leſſer that the Army was which had expoſed it ſelf to danger, the greater profit had every Souldier; but when it conſiſted of many hands, they who remaining at home were fain to undergo more than ordinary travel in domeſtical affairs, did receive by ſo much the greater portion. But the Lords tribute was Numb. 31. 40.

always certain, yea many times it was increased, either by some special commandment, as when all the Gold, and Silver, and other metals found in Jericho, were consecrated unto God; or by thankfulness of the Rulers and people, as when after the Victory obtained against the Midianites without the loss of one Man, all Jewels, Bracelets, Earrings, and the like, were offered up, as voluntary presents.

Jos. 6. 19.

Num. 31. 50.

Now howsoever the Israelites were many times oppressed, and trodden down by other Nations, yet were not these treasures robbed or spoiled; for the enemies never gat possession of the Tabernacle that was in Shilo. Wherefore it cannot otherwise be, than that the wealth of the Sanctuary must have been exceeding great; as containing above one hundredth part of all the money and other goods found by the Israelites in the whole Land of Canaan; and of all that was purchased by so many Victories, as they obtained against the bordering Nations. For that this treasury was not defrauded of the due proportion, it is evident, seeing that before the time of David and his Lievtenant Joab, it is recorded that Saul and Abner, and before them Samuel, had used to dedicate of the spoils obtained in War, to maintain the house of the Lord: the like whereof may be well presumed of the former Judges and Captains of other Ages. Certain it is, that the Conquest of David brought into the Land far greater abundance of riches, than any former Victories had purchased, those of Joshua perhaps excepted: but these vast sums of an hundred thousand Talents of Silver, may seem rather to have been made up, by the addition of his winnings and liberality, to the treasures laid up in many former Ages, than to have been the meer fruits of his own industry.

1 Chron. c. 26 v. 27. & 28.

A Talent of Gold is 700. French Crowns.

Now concerning the riches of Solomon, it is more manifest how he gathered them; for he received of yearly revenues with his tributes, 666 Talents of Gold, besides the Customs of Spices. He had also six rich Returns from the East India, which greatly increased his store. For his Ships performed that Voyage every three years, and he began that trade in the two and twentieth year of his reign, and ruled forty years. Besides this, all Judæa and Israel were now mastered to his hands; all the Arabians his borderers, the Syrians of Zobah, of Damascena, of Palmyrena, of Ituræa; all of Idumæa, Moab, and Ammon, paid him tribute; as likewise did the Hittites, who with the Perizites, Hivites, Jebusites, and other races of the Canaanites, were not as yet extinguished though subjected.

1 Chron. 29 28.

Into this flourishing estate was the Kingdom of Israel reduced by David, who after 40 years reign, and 70 years of life, dyed in a good age, full of dayes, riches, and honour, and was buried in the City of David. It is written by Josephus that there was hid in David's Tomb a marvellous quantity of treasures, insomuch as Hyreanus (who first of the Chasmanæi, or race of Macchabees, called himself King) one thousand and three hundred years after, drew thence three thousand Talents, to rid himself of Antiochus then besieging Jerusalem; and afterward Herod opening another Cell, had also an exceeding mass of Gold and Silver therein. And it was an antient custome to bury treasure with the dead. So the Peruvians and Americans did the like, which being discovered by the Spaniards, they inriched themselves by nothing so much in their first Conquest. That Solomon did bury so much treasure in his Fathers grave, it would hardly be believed, in regard of the great exactions with which he was fain to burthen the people, notwithstanding all the riches which he got otherwise or which were left unto him: were it not withal considered that his want of money grew from such magnificent imployments. Particularly of the Sepulchre of David the Scriptures have no mention, but only the Sepulchres of the Kings of Juda, as of an honourable place of burial. Yet the Monuments of these Kings, as (by relation of the Duke of Ulica) they remained within these thirty years, and are like to remain still, are able to make report credible of the cost bestowed upon them.

SECT. X.

Of the Philistims, whom David absolutely mastered: and of sundry other Contemporaries with David.

OF the Philistims, whose pride David was the first that absolutely mastered, in this conclusion of David's time somewhat here may be spoken.

They descended of Casloim, who, according to Isidor and Josephus, was one of the Sons of Misraim, and was surnamed Philistim, as Esau was surnamed Edom, and Jacob Israel. There were of them five Cities or petty Principalities, namely, Azotus or Asdod, Gaza or Aezaph, Ascalon, Geth or Gath, and Accaron, It seemeth that Casloim was the first founder of this Nation, because of his kindred on either hand, the Canaanites and the Egyptians.

Isid l. 9. 19. Jos. l. 3. Ant. 17.

1 Sam. 6.

The first King of these Philistims, which the Scriptures have named, was that Abimelech which loved Sara, Abraham's Wife.

Gen. 20.

The second Abimelech lived at once with Isaac, to whom Isaac repaired in the time of Famine, Abimelech then residing at Gerar, in the border of Idumæa; which Abimelech, fancied Isaac his Wife, as his Father had done Sara.

Gen. 26.

After Abimelech the second, the Philistims Kings are not remembred in the Scriptures, till David's time: perhaps the government was turned into Aristocratical. For they are afterwads named Princes of the Philistims, howsoever Achis be named King of Gath, the same to whom David fled, and who again gave him Siklag to inhabit in Saul's time.

Jud. 16. 1 Sam. 18. 29. 1 Sam. 21. 11.

After him we read of another Achis who lived with Solomon, to whom Shimei travelled to fetch back his fugitive Servant, what time the seeking of his Servant was the loss of his life. Jeremy the Prophet speaketh of the Kings of Palæstin or Philistim. Amos nameth the King of Ascalon: Zacharias, a King of Gaza. The rest of the Wars of the Philistims are remembred in the Catalogue of the Judges, of Saul and David, and therefore I shall not need to collect the particulars in this place.

1 King. 2.

There lived at once with David, the third of the Silvii King of Alba, called Latinus Silvius, who is said to have ruled that part of Italy fifty years. And about his fourteenth year Codrus the last King of the Athenians died, to whom succeeded the first Prince of those who being called after Medon, Medontidæ, without regal name governed Athens during their life.

The reasons which moved the Athenians to change their government, were not drawn from any inconvenience found in the rule of Soveraignty, but in honour of Codrus only. For when the Græcians of Doris, a region between Phocis, and the mountain of Oeta, sought counsel from the Oracle, for their success in the Wars against the Athenians, it was answered, that then undoubtedly they should prevail and become Lords of that State, when they could obtain any Victory against the Nation, and yet preserve the Athenian King living.

living. Codrus by some intelligence being informed of this answer, withdrew himself from his own Forces and putting on the habit of a common Souldier, entred the Camp of the Dorians, and killing the first he encountred, was himself forthwith cut in pieces.

Eupales the 31 King of Assyria, which others account but the 30 began to rule that Empire, about the 13 year of David, and held it 38 years:

Near the same time began Ixion the second King of the Heraclidæ, the Son of Euristhenes in Corinth; and Agis the second of the Heraclidæ in Lacedemon: in honour of which Agis, his successours were called Agidæ, for many years after. He restored the Laconians to their former liberty: he overcame the Citizens of Helos in Laconia, who had refused to pay him tribute: he condemned them and theirs to perpetual slavery; whereof it came, that all the Messenians, whom at length they brought into the like bondage, were after called Helots.

In like sort from the Sclavi came the Word Slave. For when that Natian issuing out of Sarmatia, now called Russia, had seized upon the Country of Illyria, and made it their own by conquest, their victory pleased them so highly, that thereupon they called themselves by a new name, Slavos which is in their language Glorious. But in aftertimes (that warmer Climate having thawed their Northern hardiness, and not ripened their Wits) when they were trodden down, and made servants with their neighbours, the Italians which kept many of them in bondage, began to call all their bondmen Slaves, using the word as a name of reproach: in which sence it is now current through many Countries.

Other Chronologers make this Agis, the third King of Sparta, and somewhat later about the 23 year of David, and say that Acheſtratus was the fourth King of this race, the same whom Eusebius calls Labotes, and sets him in the 13 year of Solomon. Euseb. in Chro.

In the tenth year of Acheſtratus, Androclus the third Son of Codrus, assisted by the Ioners, built Ephesus in Caria, who after the adjoyning of the Isle of Samos to his Territory, was slain by the Carians, whose Country he usurped. He was buried (saith Pausanias) in one of the gates of Ephesus called Magnetes, his armed Statua being set over him. Strabo reports that after Androclus had subdued the Ionians (the next Province to Ephesus on the seacoast of Asia the less) he enlarged his Dominions upon the Æoles, which joyneth to Ionia: and that his posterity governed the Cities of Ephesus and Erythræ by the name of Basilidæ in Strabo his own time. Of the expedition of the Ioners how they came hither out of Peloponnesus, I have * spoken already upon occasion of the return of the Heraclidæ into Peloponnesus, wherein, with the Dores, they expelled the Achæi, and inhabited their places in that Land: though this of the Ioners succeeded that of the Heraclidæ 100 years. [The East gate of Ephesus toward Magnesia upon the River Maander. Arist. l. 5. pol. c. 6. * See Ch. in this 17. Ch. 9. 1. post medium.

The City of Ephesus became exceeding famous: first, for the Temple of Diana therein built, which had in length 425 foot, and 220 in breadth, sustained with 127 pillars of marble, of 70 foot high: whereof 27 were most curiously graven, and all the rest of choice marble polisht, the work being first set out by Ctesiphon of Gnossos. Secondly, it became renowned by being one of the first that received the Christian faith, of which Timothy was Bishop; to whom and to the Ephesians, St. Paul wrote his Epistle so entituled. The other City possest by Androclus in Æolis, was also universally spoken of by reason of Sybilla, surnamed Erythræa, who lived 740 years before Christ was born. St. Augustine avoweth that a Roman Proconsul shewed him in an antient Greek copy certain verses of this Propheteſs, which began (as St. Augustine changed them into Latine) in these words: Jesus Christus Dei Filius, Salvator; Jesus Christ Son of God, the Saviour. Plin. 2. c. 58. & l. 7. c. 37.

About the time that Joab besieged Rabba in Moab, Vaphres began to govern in Ægypt, the same that was Father in law to Solomon whose Epistles to Solomon, and his to Vaphres, are remembred by Eusebius out of Polemon. In the 21 of David, was the City of Magnesia in Asia the less founded, the same which is seated upon the River Mæander, where Scipio gave the great overthrow to Antiochus. In this Territory are the best horses of the lesser Asia bred, whereof Lucan:

Et Magnetis equis, Minyæ gens cognita remis.

About the same time Cuma in Campania, was built by the Inhabitants of Chalcis in Eubœa, according to Servius, with whom Strabo joyneth the Cumæans of Æolis, saying, that to the one of these people the government was given, with condition that the other should give name to the City. Of this Cuma was Ephores the famous Scholar of Isocrates. Serv. in Æneid. 3. Strabo l. 5.

Eusebius and Cassiodor find the building of Carthage at this time, to wit, in the 31 year of David, but much mistaken. For the Father of Dido was Metinos the Son of Badezor, brother to Jezabel, who married Achab King of Israel; and between the death of David, and the first of Achab, there were wasted, about 45 years.

In this time also Acastus lived, the second of the Athenian Princes after Codrus, of which there were thirteen in descent before the State changed into a Magistracy of ten years. Some writers make it probable, that the Æolians, led by Graus, the grand nephew of Orestes, possest the City and Island of Thebes about this time. In the 32 year of David, Hiram began to reign in Tyre, according to Josephus, who saith in his twelfth year Solomon began the work of the Temple. But it is a familiar errour in Josephus to misreckon times, which in this point he doth so strangely, as if he knew not how at all to cast any accompt. For it is manifest, that Hiram sent Messengers and Cedars unto David, soon after his taking of Jerusalem, which was in the beginning of David's reign over Israel, when as yet he had reigned only seven years in Hebron over the house of Juda. Wherefore it must needs be that Hiram had reigned above 30 years before Solomon; unless more credit should be given to those Tyrian records which are cited by Josephus, than to the plain words of the Scripture contradicting them. For, that it was the same Hiram which lived both with David and with Solomon, the Scriptures make it plainly manifest. Euseb. in Chro. Herod. in vit. Hom. & Strab. l. 14. *Ant. 8. & cont. CHAP. XVIII.

Of SOLOMON.

SECT. I.

Of the eſtabliſhing of Solomon: of birth-right, and the cauſe of Adonijah's death, and of Solomon's wiſdom.

SOLOMON, who was brought up under the Prophet Nathan, began to reign over Juda and Iſrael, in the year of the World 2991. He was called Solomon by the appointment of God: he was alſo called Jediddia, or Theophilus by Nathan, becauſe the Lord loved him.

Hiram King of Tyre, after Solomons anointing, diſpatched Embaſſadors towards him, congratulating his eſtabliſhment: a cuſtom between Princes very ancient. Whence we read that David did in like ſort ſalute Hanum King of the Ammonites, after his obtaining the Kingdom. 2 Sam. 10.

The beginning of Solomon was in bloud, though his reign were peaceable. For ſoon after Davids death, he cauſed his Brother Adonijah to be ſlain by Benaiah the Son of Jehojada, taking occaſion from Adonijah his deſiring by Berſheba, that the young maid Abiſhag (which lay in Davids boſome in his later daies, to keep him warm) might be given to him. Whatſoever he pretended, it was enough that Adonijah was his elder Brother, and ſought the Kingdom contrary to the will of David, whom God inclined towards Solomon. And yet it is ſaid that a word is enough to the wiſe, and he that ſees but the claw may know whether it be a Lyon or no: ſo it may ſeem that to the quick-ſighted wiſdom of Solomon, this motion of Adonijahs, was a demonſtration of a new treaſon. For they which had been Concubines to a King, might not after be touched but by a King: whence Achitophel wiſhed Abſalom to take his Fathers Concubines as a part of the Royaltie. And David after that wrong, determining to touch them no more, did not give them to any other, but ſhut them up, and they remained widowed until their death. And this it ſeems was the depth of Iſhoſeths quarrel againſt Abner, for having his Fathers Concubine. And ſome ſignification of this cuſtom may ſeem too in the words of God by Nathan to David; I have given thee thy Maſters houſe, and thy Maſters Wives. And in the words of Saul upbraiding Jonathan, that he had choſen David to the ſhame of the nakedneſs of his Mother. Hereupon perhaps was ſome reference to this purpoſe of Adonijah, to marry with her that was alwaies preſent with David in his later daies, and who belike knew all that was paſt, for the conveying of the Kingdom to Solomon. There may be divers further occaſions; as either that he would learn ſuch things by her as might be for the advantage of his ambition, or that he would perſwade her to forge ſome ſtrange tale about Davids laſt Teſtament, or any thing elſe that might prejudice the title of Solomon. 2 Sam. 16. 21. 2 Sam. 2. 3. 1 Sam. 20. 30.

As for the right of an elder Brother which Adonijah pretended, though generally it agreed both with the law of Nations, and with the cuſtoms of the Jews: yet the Kings of the Jews were ſo abſolute, as they did therein, and in all elſe, what they pleaſed. 1 Kings 2. 15.

Some examples alſo they had (though not of Kings) which taught them to uſe his paternal authority in transferring the birth-right to a younger Son: namely, of Jacobs diſinheriting Reuben, and giving the birth-right (which was twice as much as any portion of the other brethren) to Joſeph: of whom he made two Tribes. And that it was generally acknowledged that this power was in David, it appeareth by the words of Berſabe and Nathan to David, and of Jonathan to Adonijah. For, as for popular election, that it was neceſſary to confirm, or that the refuſal of the people had authority to fruſtrate the elder Brothers right to the Kingdom, it no where appears in the ſtories of the Jews. It is ſaid indeed that the people made Saul King at Gilgal: that is, they acknowledged and eſtabliſhed him. For that he was King long before, no Man can doubt. In like manner elſewhere the phraſe of chooſing or making their King, is to be expounded: as where in the prohibition, that they ſhould not make themſelves a King, it is ſaid, Thou ſhalt make him King whom the Lord ſhall chooſe. Deut. 21. 15. Filium exoſa agnoſcito, dando ei portionem duorum: nam ipſum eſt jus primogenitorum. 1 Reg 1. 17. & 20. 29. & 34. 1 Kings 1. 1 v. 20. & 27. 1 Sam. 11. 14. Deut. 17. 30.

But to proceed with the acts of Solomon: at the ſame time that he put Adonijah to death, he rid himſelf alſo of Joab, and three years after of Shimei, as David had adviſed him: he diſplaced alſo the Prieſt Abiathar, who took part with Adonijah againſt him: but in reſpect of his office, and that he followed David in all his afflictions, and becauſe he had born the Ark of God before his Father, he ſpared his life. And thus being eſtabliſhed in his Kingdom, he took the daughter of Vaphres King of Egypt to Wife: for ſo Euſebius out of Eupolemus calls him. He offered a thouſand ſacrifices at Gibeon, where God appearing unto him in a dream, bad him ask what he would at his hands: Solomon chooſeth Wiſdom, which pleaſed God. And God ſaid unto him, Becauſe thou haſt asked this thing, and haſt not asked for thy ſelf long life, neither haſt thou asked riches for thy ſelf, nor haſt asked the life of thine enemies, behold I have done according to thy words: by which we may inform our ſelves, what deſires are moſt pleaſing to God, and what not. For the coveting after long life in reſpect of our ſelves, cannot but proceed of ſelf-love which is the root of all impiety: the deſire of private riches is an affection of covetouſneſs, which God abhorreth: To affect revenge, is as much as to take the Sword out of Gods hand, and to diſtruſt his juſtice. And in that it pleaſed God to make Solomon know that it liked him, that he had not asked the life of his enemies, it could not but put him in mind of his brothers ſlaughter, for which he had not any warrant either from David, or from the Law of God; but becauſe Solomon deſired Wiſdom only, which taught him both to obey God, and to rule Men, it pleaſed God to give him withal that which he deſired not. And I have given thee (ſaith 1 Kings 3.

God)

God) that which thou hast not asked, both riches and honour. This gift of Wisdom our Commentators stretch to almost all kinds of learning: but that it comprehended the knowledge of the nature of plants and living creatures, the Scripture testifieth; though
1 Kings 4. 33. no doubt the chief excellency of Solomons wisdom, was in the knowledge of governing his Kingdom: whence, as it were for an example of his wisdom,
1 King. 3. 9 the Scripture telleth how soon he judged the controversie between the two harlots.

SECT. II.

Of Solomons building and glory.

HE then entred into league with Hiram King of Tyre, from whom he had much of his materials for the Kings Palace and the Temple of God: for the building whereof he had received a double charge, one from his father David, and another from God. For 1 Chro. 22. 6. like as it is written of David, that He called Solomon his son, and charged him to build a house for the Lord of Tost. 9. 26. in 1 Chro. Israel: so doth Tostatus give the force of a divine precept to these words, Behold, a son is born unto thee, &c. He shall build an house for my Name.

1 Kings 6. He began the work of the Temple in the beginning of the fourth year of his reign, at which time also he prepared his fleet at Esion-gaber to trade for gold in the East-Indies, that nothing might be wanting to supply the charge of so great a work. For, that the Temple was in building, while his fleets were passing to and fro, it is manifest. For the pillars of the Temple were made of the Almaggim trees brought from Ophir. Of this most glorious building, of all the particulars (whereof the form and example was given by God himself) many learned men have writ-
1 Chro. 28. 29. ten; as Salmeron, Montanus, Ribera, Barradas, Azorius, Villalpandus, Pineda, and others to whom I refer the Reader.

For the cutting and squaring of the Cedars which served that building, Solomon employed 30 thousand Carpenters, 10 thousand every month by course: he also used 80 thousand Masons in the Mountain, and 70 thousand labourers that bare burdens, which it
1 Kings 5. is conceived, he selected out of the Proselites, besides three thousand three hundred masters of his work; so as he paid and employed in all, one hundred eighty three thousand and three hundred men; in which number the Sidonians, which were far more skilful in hewing timber than the Israelites, may (as I think) be included. For Hiram caused his servants to bring down the Cedars and Firrs from Lebanon to the sea, and thence sent them in rafts to Joppe, or the
1 King. 5 9 next port to Jerusalem. For in the second of Chronicles the second Chapter, it is plain, that all but the thirty thousand Carpenters, and the over-seers, were strangers, and as it seemeth the vassals of Hiram, and of Vaphres King of Egypt. In recompence of this
1 Kings 5. 11. Timber and Stone, Solomon gave Hiram twenty thousand measures of Wheat, and twenty measures of pure Oyl yearly. Eusebius out of Eupalemus in the ninth book of his preparation, the last Chapter, hath left us a Copy of Solomons Letter to Suron (which was the same as Haram and Hiram) King of Tyre, in these words:

REx Solomon Suroni, Tyri, Sydonis, atque Phœniciæ Regi, Amico, paterno salutem. Scias me à Deo magno David patris mei regnum accepisse, cumque mihi pater præcepit templum Deo, qui terram creavit, condere, ut etiam ad te scriberem præcepit: Scribo igitur, & peto à te ut artifices atque fabros ad ædificandum Templum Dei mittere velis.

KIng Solomon to King Suron, of Tyre, Sydon, and Phœnicia King, and my fathers friend, sendeth greeting. You may understand that I have received of the great God of my father David, the Kingdom: and when my father commanded me to build a Temple to God which created heaven and earth, he commanded also that I should write to you: I write therefore to you, and beseech you, that you would be pleased to send me Artificers and Carpenters to build the Temple of God.

To which the King Suron made this answer.

SUron, Tyri, Sydonis, & Phœniciæ Rex, Solomoni Regi salutem. Lectis literis, gratias egi Deo, qui tibi regnum patris tradidit: & quoniam scribis fabros, ministrosque ad condendum Templum esse tibi mittendos, misi ad te millia hominum octaginta, & Architectum Tyrium hominem ex matre Judæâ, virum in rebus architecturæ mirabilem. Curabis igitur ut necessariis non egeant, & Templo Dei condito, ad nos redeant.

SUron of Tyre, Sydon and Phœnicia King, to King Solomon greeting: When I read your Letters, I gave God thanks who hath installed you in your fathers kingdom. And because you write that Carpenters and Workmen may be sent to build Gods Temple, I have sent you fourscore thousand men, and a Master-builder, a Tyrian, born of a Jewish woman, a man admirable in building. You will be careful that all necessaries be provided for them; and when the Temple of God is built, that they come home to us. Jos. ant. l. 8. c. 2.

The Copies of these Letters were extant in Josephus's time, as himself affirmeth, and to be seen (saith he) Tàm in nostris quàm in Tyriorum annalibus, as well in our own, as in the Tyrian annals. But he delivereth them somewhat in different terms, as the Reader may find in his Antiquities. But were this intercourse between Solomon and Hiram either by message or by writing, it is somewhat otherwise delivered in the Scriptures, than either Eupolemus or Josephus set it down, but so, that in substance there is little difference between the one and the other. 1 King. 5. from the 1 v. to the 9.

The like Letter in effect Solomon is said to have written to Vaphres King of Egypt, and was answered as from Hiram.

But whereas some Commenters upon Solomon, find that Hiram King of Tyre, and Vaphres King of Egypt, gave Solomon the title of Rex magnus, and cite Eupolemon in Eusebius, I do not find any such addition of magnus in Eusebius, in the last chapter of that ninth book; neither is it in Josephus in the eighth book and second chapter of the Jews Antiquities: it being a vain title used by some of the Assyrian and Persian Kings, and used likewise by the Parthians, and many other after them, insomuch as in later times it grew common, and was usurped by mean persons in respect of the great Hermes the first, which was honoured by that name for his noble qualities, as much or more than for his mightiness.

After the finishing and dedication of the Temple and house of the Lord, Solomon fortified Jerusalem with a treble wall, and repaired Hazor which had been the ancient Metropolis of the Canaanites, before Joshua's time: so did he Gaza of the Philistims: he built Berothon, Gerar, and the Millo or munition of Jerusalem. For Pharaoh (as it seemeth in favour of Solomon) came up into the edge of Ephraim, and took Gerar, which place the Canaanites yet held, and put them to the sword, and burnt their City. The place and Jos. ant. l. 8. c. 2.

Territory he gave Solomons Wife for a dowry. And it is probable, that becauſe Solomon was then buſied in his magnificent buildings, and could not attend the war, that he entreated his father in law to rid him of theſe neighbours, which Pharaoh performed. But he thereby taught the Egyptians to viſit thoſe parts again before they were ſent for; and in his ſon Rehoboams time Sheſhack this man's ſucceſſor did ſack Jeruſalem it ſelf.

Joſ l. 8. ant. c. 2.

Solomon alſo built Megiddo in Manaſſe, on this ſide Jordan, and Balah in Dan: alſo Thadmor, which may be either Ptolomies Thamoron in the deſart of Juda, or (as Joſephus thinks) Palmira in the deſart of Syria; which Palmira, becauſe it ſtood on the utmoſt border of Solomons dominion in the Northeaſt of Libanus, and was of Davids conqueſt when he wan Damaſcus, it may ſeem that Solomon therefore beſtowed thereon the moſt coſt, and fortified it with the beſt Art that that age had. Joſephus calls this place Thadamora, by which name (ſaith he) given by Solomon, the Syrians as yet call it. Jerom in his book of Hebrew places, calls it Thermeth. In after-times, when it was rebuilt by Adrian the Emperour, it was honoured with his name, and called Adrianopolis. In reſpect of this great charge of building, Solomon raiſed tribute through all his Dominions, beſides an hundred and twenty talents of gold received from Hirams ſervants; Solomon offered Hiram twenty towns in or near the upper Galilee, but becauſe they ſtood in an unfruitful and mariſh ground, Hiram refuſed them, and therefore was the territory called Chabul.

Joſ. l. 8. ant. c. 2.

Theſe towns, as it is ſuppoſed, lay in Galilee of the Gentiles, Non quod Gentes ibi habitarent: ſed quia ſub ditione Regis Gentilis erat, Not that it was poſſeſt by the Gentiles (ſaith Nauclerus) but becauſe it was under the rule of a King that was a Gentile. Howſoever it were, it is true that Solomon in the 21 Year fortified thoſe places which Hiram refuſed. Further, he made a journey into Syria Zobah, and eſtabliſhed his tributes; the firſt and laſt war (if in that expedition he were driven to fight) that he made in perſon in all his life. He then viſited the border of all his Dominions, paſſing from Thadmor to the North of Palmyrena, and ſo to the Deſarts of Idumea, from whence he viſited Eziongaber and Eloth the uttermoſt place of the South of all his Territories, bordering to the Red Sea: which Cities I have deſcribed in the Story of Moſes.

SECT. III.

Of Solomons ſending to Ophir, and of ſome ſeeming contradictions about Solomons riches, and of Pineda's conceit of two ſtrange paſſages about Africk.

HEre Solomon prepared his Fleet of ſhips for India, with whom Hiram joyned in that voyage, and furniſhed him with Mariners and Pilots, the Tyrians being of all other the moſt expert ſeamen. From this part of Arabia which at this time belonged to Edom, and was conquered by David, did the Fleet paſs to the Eaſt-India, which was not far off, namely, to Ophir, one of the Iſlands of the Moluccas, a place exceeding rich in gold: witneſs the Spaniards, who notwithſtanding all the abundance which they gather in Peru, do yet plant in thoſe Iſlands of the Eaſt at Manilia, and recover a great quantity from thence, and with leſs labour than they do in any one part of Peru, or new Spain.

The return which was made by theſe Ships amounted to four hundred and twenty talents, but in the ſecond of Chronicles the eighth, it is written 450 talents: whereof 30 talents went in expence for the charge of the Fleet, and wages of men; and 420 talents, which make five and tweny hundred and twenty thouſand Crowns, came clear. And thus muſt thoſe two places be reconciled. As for the place 1 Reg. 10. 14. which ſpeaketh of ſix hundred ſixty and ſix talents of gold; that ſum, as I take it, is of other receipts of Solomons which were yearly, and which came to him, beſides thoſe profits from Ophir.

C. 8. ſect. 9. 10. 13. Lib. 4. de rebus Salomonis c. 6. & 15.

My opinion of the land of Ophir, that it is not Peru in America (as divers have thought) but a Countrey in the Eaſt-Indies; with ſome reaſon why at thoſe times they could not make more ſpeedy return to Jeruſalem from the Eaſt-Indies, than in three years; and that Tharſis in Scripture is divers times taken for the Ocean, hath been already declared in the firſt book.

Only it remaineth that I ſhould ſpeak ſomewhat of Pineda his ſtrange conceits, who being a Spaniard of Bætica, would fain have Gades or Calis-malis, in old times called Tarteſſus, which is the Southweſt corner of that Province, to be the Tharſis from whence Solomon fetcht his gold; for no other reaſon, as it ſeems, but for love of his own Countrey, and becauſe of ſome affinity of ſound between Tharſis and Tarteſſus. For whereas it may ſeem ſtrange that it ſhould be three Years ere they that took ſhip in the Red Sea, ſhould return from the Eaſt-Indies to Jeruſalem, this hath been in part anſwered already. And further the intelligent may conceive of ſundry lets, in the digging and refining of the metal, and in their other traffick, and in their land-carriages between Jeruſalem and the Red Sea, and perhaps alſo elſewhere: ſo that we have no need to make Solomons men to go many thouſand miles out of their way to Gades, round about all Africk, that ſo they might be long a coming home.

For the direct way to Gades (which if Solomon and the Iſraelites knew not, the Tyrians which went with them could not have been ignorant of) was along the Mediterran Sea, and ſo (beſides many wonderful inconveniences, and terrible navigation in rounding Africa) they ſhould have eſcaped the troubleſome land-carriage between Jeruſalem and the Red Sea, through dry, deſart, and the thieviſh Countreys: and within 30 miles of Jeruſalem at Joppe, or ſome other haven in Solomons own Country, have laden and unladen their ſhips.

But this direct courſe they could not hold (ſaith Pineda) becauſe the huge Iſland of Atlantis, in largeneſs greater than all Africk and Aſia, being ſwallowed up in the Atlantick Ocean, hindred Solomons ſhips from paſſing though the ſtraits of Gibraltar: for this, he alledgeth Plato in Timæo. But that this calamity happened about Solomons time, or that thereby the ſtraits of Gades were filled with mud, and made unpaſſable, that there could be no coming to Gades by the Mediterran Sea; or that this indraught where the Sea runneth moſt violently, and moſt eaſily ſcoureth his channel, ſhould be filled with mud, and not alſo the great Ocean in like manner, where this huge Iſland is ſuppoſed to have ſtood; or that Solomons ſhips being in the Red Sea, ſhould neglect the golden Mines in the Eaſt-Indies (which were infinitely better and nearer to the Red Sea, than any in Spain) to ſeek gold at Cadyz by the way of compaſſing Africa; it is moſt ridiculous to imagine. For the Spaniard himſelf that hath alſo the rich Peru in the Weſt, fortifieth in the Eaſt-Indies, and inhabits ſome part thereof, as in Manilia, finding in thoſe parts no less quantity of gold (the small territory which he there possesseth considered) than in Peru.

De rebus Sol. l. 4. 10. 11. The same Pineda hath another strange passage round about all Africa, which elsewhere he dreams of: supposing whereas Jonas sailing to Tharsis the City of Cilicia, was cast out in the Mediterran Sea, and taken up there by a Whale, that this Whale in three days swimming above twelve thousand English miles along the Mediterran Seas, and so through the straights of Gades, and along all the huge seas round about Africa, cast up Jonas upon the shore of the Red Sea, that so he might have perhaps some six miles the shorter (though much the worse) way to Nineve. This conceit he grounds only upon the ambiguity of the word Suph, which oftentimes is an Epitheton of the Red Sea (as if we should call it mare algosum, the sea full of weeds) for the Read Sea. But in Jonas c. 2. 5. it is generally taken in the proper signification for weeds, and not as Pineda would have it, who in this place against his own rule (which elsewhere he giveth thus) supposeth strange miracles without any need. For this long voyage of the Whale, finished in three days, is a greater miracle, than the very preservation of Jonas in the belly of the Whale: and therefore seeing there is no necessity of this miracle, we send it back unto him, keeping his own rule, which in this place he forgets; Miracula non sunt multiplicanda. And again, Non sunt miracula gratiis danda, nec pro arbitrio nova fingenda. Miracles are not to be multiplied without necessity, nor delivered without cause, nor feigned at pleasure. Therefore we leave this man in his dreams, which (were he not otherwise very learned and judicious) might be thought unworthy the mentioning. But to proceed with our story of Solomon.

Judg. 8.

The Queen of Saba's coming from far to Solomon (as seems, from Arabia Fœlix, and not, as some think, from Ethiopia) and her rich presents, and Solomons reciprocal magnificence, and his resolving of her difficult questions; those are set down at large in the Text. But herein Josephus is greatly mistaken, who calls this Queen of Saba, Nicaules, the successor (saith he out of Herodotus) of those thirty and eight Egyptian Kings which succeeded Meneus the Founder of Memphis; adding, that after this Egyptian, and the father in law of Solomon, the name of Pharaoh was left off in Egypt. For as it is elsewhere proved that the Queen was of Arabia, not of Egypt and Ethiopia; so were there other Pharaohs after the father in law of Solomon. Yea, above three hundred Years after Solomon, Pharaoh Necho slew Josias King of Juda.

Jos. ant. 8. 1, 2.

2 King. c. 23. 2 Chron. c. 25. Jer. c. 46. v. 2.

It is also written of Solomon, that he kept in garrisons fourteen thousand Chariots, and twelve thousand horsemen; that he spent in Court every day thirty measures of fine flower, threescore measures of wheat, one hundred sheep, besides stags and fallow Deer, bugles and fowl; four thousand stalls of horses he had for his Chariots and other uses, and for the twelve thousand horsemen of his guard. For, the ten thousand stalls in the first of Kings the fourth, are to be taken but for so many horses, whence in the second of Chronicles the ninth, it is written but four thousand stalls or teems, and in every teem ten horses, as Junius and the Geneva understand it. He was said to be wiser than any man, yea than were Ethan the Ezrahite, than Heman, Chalcal, or than Darda; to which Junius addeth a fifth, to wit, Ezrack. For the Geneva maketh Ethan an Ezrahite by Nation. Josephus writes them, Athan, Æman, Chalceus and Denon the sons of Hemon. He spake three thousand Proverbs, and his Songs were one thousand and five, whereof either the most part perished in the Captivity of Babylon, or else because many acts of Solomons were written and kept among the publick Records of Civil causes, and not Ecclesiastical, therefore they were not thought necessary to be inserted into Gods Book.

1 King. 4. 31.

SECT. IV.

Of the fall of Solomon, and how long he lived.

NOw as he had plenty of all other things, so had he no scarcity of women. For besides his seven hundred Wives, he kept three hundred Concubines, and (forgetting that God had commanded that none of his people should accompany the daughters of Idolaters) he took Wives out of Egypt, Edom, Moab, Ammon, Zidon and Heth: and when he fell a doting, his Wives turned his heart after other gods, as Asteroth of the Zidonians, Milcom or Molech of the Ammonites, and Chemosh of Moab.

These things God punished by Adad of Idumea, Rezin of Damascus, and by Jeroboam his own servant, and one of the masters of his works, who by the ordinance of God tore from his son Roboam, ten of the twelve parts of all the territory he had. Deus dum in peccatores animadvertit, aliorum peccatis utitur, quæ ipse non fecit: God punishing sinners, useth the sins of others, which he himself wrought not. V. Mart. in Reg.

In the reign of Solomon (as in times of long peace) were few memorable actions by him performed, excepting his buildings with other works of magnificence, and that great Indian voyage already mentioned. Forty Years he reigned; how many he lived, it is not written, and must therefore be found only by conjecture. The most likely way to guess at the truth in this case is, by considering the actions of David before and after Solomons birth, whereby we may best make estimation of the years which they consumed, and consequently learn the true, or most likely year of his nativity. Seven years David reigned in Hebron: in his eighth year he took Jerusalem, and warred with the Philistims, who also troubled him in the year following. The bringing home of the Ark seems to have been in the tenth Year of David, and his intention to build the Temple in the Year ensuing, at which time he had sufficient leisure, living in rest. After this he had wars with the Philistims, Moabites, Aramites, and Edomites, which must needs have held him five Years, considering the Aramites of Damasco raised war against him, after such time as he had beaten Hadadezer; and that in every of these wars, he had the entire victory. Neither is it likely, that these services occupied any longet time, because in those days and places there were no wintering camps in use, but at convenient seasons of the Year, Kings went forth to war, dispatching all with violence, rather than with temporizing; as maintaining their Armies, partly upon the spoil of the enemies country, partly upon the private provision which every souldier made for himself. The 17 Year of David, in which he took Mephibosheth the son of Jonathan into his Court, appeareth to have passed away in quiet; and the Year following to have begun the war with Ammon; but somewhat late in the end of Summer perhaps, it came to tryal of a battel (for Joab after the victory, returned immediately to Jerusalem) the causes and preparations for that war, taking up all the Summer. Davids personal expedition against the Aramites, wherein he brought all the tributaries of Hadadezer under his own allegeance, appears manifestly to have been the next Years work, wherein he did cut off all means of ſuccour from the Ammonites; all Syria, Moab, and Idumæa being now at his own devotion. By this reckoning it muſt have been the 20 Year of Davids reign, and about the fiftieth of his life, in which he ſent forth Joab to beſiege Rabba, and finiſhed the war of Ammon: wherein alſo fell out the matter of Uriahs wife. So one half of Davids reign was very proſperous: in the other half he felt great ſorrow, by the expectation, execution, and ſad remembrance of that heavy judgment laid upon him by God for his foul and bloudy offence.

Now very manifeſt it is, that in the year after the death of that child which was begotten in adultery, Solomon was born, who muſt needs therefore have been nineteen Years old or thereabout when he began to reign at the deceaſe of his father, as being begotten in the 21 Year of his fathers reign, who reigned in all forty.

This account hath alſo good coherence with the following times of David, as may be collected out of enſuing Actions: for two Years paſſed ere Abſalom ſlew his brother Ammon; three years ere his father pardoned him, and two Years more ere he came into the Kings preſence. After this he prepared horſes and men, and laid the foundation of his rebellion, which ſeems to have been one Years work. So the rebellion it ſelf, with all that happened thereupon, as the Commotion made by Sheba, the death of Amaſa, and the reſt, may well ſeem to have been in the 30 year of Davids reign.

Whether the three years of famine ſhould be reckoned apart from the laſt years of war with the Philiſtims, or confounded with them, it were more hard than needful to conjecture. Plain enough it is, that in the ten remaining Years of David there was time ſufficient, and to ſpare, both for the three Years of famine, for four Years of war, and for numbring the people, with the peſtilence enſuing; as alſo for his own laſt infirmity, and diſpoſing of the Kingdom. Yet indeed it ſeems that the war with the Philiſtims was but one years work, and ended in three or four fights, of which the two or three former were at Gob or Nob near unto Gezer, and the laſt at Gath. This war the Philiſtims undertook, as it ſeemeth, upon confidence gathered out of the tumults in Iſrael, and perhaps emboldened by Davids old age: for he fainted now in the battel, and was afterwards hindered by his men from expoſing himſelf unto danger any more. So David had ſix or ſeven years of reſt, in which time it is likely that many of his great men of War dyed (being of his own age) whereby the ſtirring ſpirit of Adonijah found little ſuccour in the broken pary of Joab the ſon of Zervia.

At this time it might both truly be ſaid by David to Solomon, Thou art a wiſe man; and by Solomon to God, I am but a young child; for nineteen Years of age might well agree with either of theſe two ſpecches.

1 Kings. 2. 3. & 3. 7.

Nevertheleſs there are ſome that gather out of Solomons profeſſing himſelf a child, that he was but eleven Years old when he began to reign. Of theſe Rabbi Solomon ſeems the firſt Author, whom other of great learning and judgment have herein followed: grounding themſelves perhaps upon that which is ſaid of Abſaloms rebellion, that it was after forty years, which they underſtood as Years of Davids reign. But whereas Rehoboam the ſon of Solomon was 41 years old when he began to reign, it would follow hereby that his father had begotten him, being himſelf but a child of nine or ten years old; the difference between their ages being no greater, if Solomon (who reigned 40 years) were but eleven Years old when his reign began. To avoid this inconvenience, Joſephus allows 80 Years of reign to Solomon; a report ſo diſagreeing with the Scriptures, that it needs no confutation. Some indeed have in favour of this opinion, conſtrued the words of Joſephus, as if they included all the Years of Solomon's life. But by ſuch reckoning he ſhould have been 40 Years old at his Fathers death; and conſequently ſhould have been born long before his Father had won Jeruſalem; which is a manifeſt untruth. Wherefore the 40 Years remembred in Abſaloms rebellion, may either ſeem to have reference to the ſpace between Davids firſt anointment, and the trouble which God brought upon him for his wickedneſs, or perhaps be read (according to Joſephus, Theodoret, and the Latine tranſlation) four Years; which paſſed between the return of Abſalom to Jeruſalem, and his breaking out.

SECT. V.

Of Solomons Writings.

THere remain of Solomons Works, the Proverbs, the Preacher, and the Song of Solomon. In the firſt he teacheth good life, and correcteth manners; in the ſecond, the vanity of humane nature; in the third, he ſingeth as it were the Epithalamion of Chriſt and his Church. For the Book intituled, The Wiſdom of Solomon (which ſome give unto Solomon, and ſome make the elder Philo the Author thereof) Jerom and many others of the beſt learned make us think it was not Solomon that wrote it. Stylus libri ſapientiæ (ſaith Jerom) qui Solomonis inſcribitur, Græcam redolet eloquentiam; The Stile of the Book of Wiſdom, which is aſcribed to Solomon, ſavoureth of the Græcian eloquence; and of the ſame opinion was S. Auguſtine, and yet he confeſſeth in the nineteenth Book, and twentieth Chapter of the City of God, that the Author of that Book hath a direct foretelling of the paſſion of Chriſt in theſe words: Circumveniamus juſtum, quoniam inſuavis eſt nobis, &c. Let us circumvent the righteous, for he is unpleaſing to us, he is contrary to our doings, he checketh us for offending againſt the Law, he makes his boaſt to have the knowledge of God, and he calleth himſelf the ſon of the Lord, &c. and ſo doth the courſe of all the following words point directly at Chriſt. The Books of Eccleſiaſtes, Proverbs and Cantica Canticorum, Rabbi Moſes, Kimchi aſcribeth to Iſaiah the Prophet. Suidas and Cedrenus report, that Solomon wrote of the remedies of all diſeaſes, and graved the ſame on the ſides of the Porch of the Temple, which (they ſay) Ezechias pulled down, becauſe the people, neglecting help from God by prayer, repaired thither for their recoveries.

Of Solomons Books of Invocations, and Inchantments to cure diſeaſes, and expel evil ſpirits, Joſephus hath written at large, though (as I conceive) rather out of his own invention, or from ſome uncertain report, than truly.

He alſo ſpeaketh of one Eliazarus, who by the root in Solomon's ring diſpoſſeſt divers perſons of evil ſpirits in the preſence of Veſpaſian, and many others, which I will not ſtand to examine.

Certainly, ſo ſtrange an example of humane frailty hath never been read of as this King: who having received Wiſdom from God himſelf, in honour of whom, and for his only ſervice, he built the firſt and moſt glorious Temple of the world: he that was made King of Iſrael and Judea, not by the law of Nature, but by the love of God, and became the wiſeſt, richeſt, and happieſt of all Kings, did in the end, by by the perſwaſion of a few weak and wretched Idolatrous Women, forget and forſake the Lord of all the world, and the giver of all goodneſs, of which he was more liberal to this King, than to any that ever the world had. Of whom Syracides writeth in this manner: Solomon reigned in a peaceable time, and was glorious; for God made all quiet round about, that he might build a houſe to his Name, and prepare the Sanctuary for ever; How wiſe waſt thou in thy youth, and waſt filled with underſtanding, as with a flood? Thy mind covered the whole Earth, and hath filled it with grave and dark ſentences. Thy Name went abroad in the Iſles, and for thy peace thou waſt beloved, &c. But thus he concludeth: Thou didſt bow thy loyns to Women, and waſt overcome by thy body; thou didſt ſtain thy body; thou didſt ſtain thine honour, and haſt defiled thy poſterity, and haſt brought wrath upon thy children, and felt ſorrow for thy folly, cap. 27.

SECT. VI.

Of the Contemporaries of Solomon.

NEar the beginning of Solomons reign, Ageſilaus the third of the Heraclidæ in Corinth; Labotes in Lacedæmon; and ſoon after Silvius Alba, the fourth of the Silvii, ſwayed thoſe Kingdoms: Laoſthenes then governing Aſſyria, Agaſtus and Archippus the ſecond and third Princes after Codrus, ruling the Athenians.

In the ſix and twentieth of Solomons reign, Hiram of Tyre died, to whom Baliaſtrus ſucceeded, and reigned ſeventeen years, after Mercators account; who reckons the time of his Rule by the age of his Sons. Joſephus gives him fewer years. Theophilus Antiochenus againſt Antolicus, finds Bozorius the next after Hiram, if there be not ſome Kings omitted between the death of Hiram and the reign of Bozorius.

Vaphres being dead, about the twentieth of Solomon, Seſac or Shiſhak (as our Engliſh Geneva terms him) began to govern in Egypt, being the ſame with him whom Diodorus calleth Soſachis; Joſephus, Suſac; Cedrenus, Suſeſinus; Euſebius in the columne of the Egyptian Kings, Smendes; and in that of the Hebrews, Suſac. Joſephus in the eighth of his Antiquities, reproveth it as an errour in Herodotus, that he aſcribeth the Acts of Suſac to Seſoſtris, which perchance Herodotus might have done by compariſon, accounting Seſac another Seſoſtris, for the great things he did.

Of the great acts and vertues of King Seſoſtris, I have ſpoken already in the ſtory of the Egyptian Princes: only in this he was reproved, that he cauſed four of his captive Kings to draw his Caroch, when he was diſpoſed to be ſeen and to ride in triumph: one of which four, ſaith Entropius, at ſuch time as Seſoſtris was carried out to take the air, caſt his head continually back upon the two formoſt wheels next him; which Seſoſtris perceiving, asked him what he found worthy the admiration in that motion: To whom the captive King anſwered, That in thoſe he beheld the inſtability of all worldly things; for that both the loweſt part of the wheel was ſuddenly carried about, and became the higheſt, and the upmoſt part was as ſuddenly turned downward, and under all: which when Seſoſtris had judiciouſly weighed, he diſmiſſed thoſe Princes, and all other from the like ſervitude in the future. Of this Seſoſtris, and that he could not be taken for Seſac, I have ſpoken at large in that part of the Egyptian Kings preceding. Hiſt. Miſcel. l. 17.

CHAP. XIX.

Of Solomons Succeſſors until the end of Jehoſaphat.

SECT. I.

Of Rehoboam his beginnings; the defection of the ten Tribes, and Jeroboams Idolatry.

REhoboam the Son of Solomon by Nahama an Ammoniteſs, now forty years old, ſucceeded his Father Solomon, and was anointed at Sichem, where the ten Tribes of Iſrael were aſſembled: who attended a while the return of Jeroboam as yet in Egypt, ſince he fled thither, fearing Solomon. After his arrival the People preſented a Petition to Rehoboam, to be eaſed of thoſe great Tributes laid on them by his Father. Sic enim firmius ei fore Imperium, ſi amari mallet quam metui; So ſhould his Empire (ſaith Joſephus) be more aſſured, if he deſired rather to be beloved than feared: Wherefore he took three days to deliberate before his anſwer; of whom therefore it could not be ſaid as of David, that he was wiſer than all his Teachers. For as of himſelf he knew not how to reſolve, ſo had he not the judgment to diſcern of Counſels; which is the very teſt of Wiſdom in Princes, and in all Men elſe. But notwithſtanding that he had conſulted with thoſe grave and adviſed Men, that ſerved his Father, who perſwaded him by all means to ſatisfie the multitude: He was tranſported by his familiars and favourites, not only to continue on the backs of his Subjects thoſe burdens which greatly cruſht them; but (vaunting falſly of greatneſs exceeding his Fathers) he threatned in ſharp, or rather in terrible terms, to lay yet heavier, and more unſupportable loads on them. But as it appeared in the ſucceſs, thoſe younger adviſers greatly miſtook the nature of ſeverity, which without the temper of clemency is no other than cruelty it ſelf: They alſo were ignorant that it ought to be uſed for the help, and not for the harm of Subjects. For what is the ſtrength of a King left by his People? And what cords or fetters have ever laſted long, but thoſe which have been twiſted and forged by love only? His witleſs Paraſites could well judg of the Kings diſpoſition: and being well learned therein though ignorant in all things elſe, it ſufficed and enabled them ſufficiently for the places they held. But this anſwer of Rehoboam did not a little advance Jeroboams deſigns. For being fore-foretold by the Prophet Achiah of his future advancement, these the Kings threats (changing the Peoples love into fury) confirmed and gave courage to his hopes, for he was no sooner arrived, than elected King of Israel: the People cried out, What portion have we in David? we have no inheritance in the Son of Ishai. Now though themselves, even all the Tribes of Israel, had consented to Davids anointing at Hebron the second time, acknowledging that they were his Bones and his Flesh: Yet now after the manner of Rebels, they forgat both the bonds of Nature, and their duty to God; and, as all alienate resolved hearts do, they served themselves for the present, with impudent excuses. And now over-late, and after-time, Rehoboam sent Adoram, one of the Taxers of the People, a Man most hateful to all his Subjects, to pacifie them: whom they instantly beat to death with stones. Whereupon the King affrighted, got him from Siehem with all speed; and recovered Jerusalem, where preparing to invade Israel, with an hundred and fourscore thousand chosen Men; Shimei in the Person of God commanding to the contrary, all was stayed for the present. In the mean time Jeroboam the new King fortified Siehem on this side, and Peniel on the other side of Jordan; and fearing that the Union and exercise of one Religion would also joyn the Peoples hearts again to the House of David, and having in all likelihood also promised the Egyptians to follow their Idolatry, he set up two Calves of Gold for the Children of Israel to worship, impiously perswading them that those were the Gods, or at least by these he represented those Gods which delivered them out of Egypt, and refusing the service of the Levites, he made Priests fit for such gods. It must needs be, that by banishing the Levites which served David and Solomon through all Israel, Jeroboam greatly enriched himself: as taking into his hands all those Cities which were given them by Moses and Joshua, for as it is written, The Levites left their suburbs, and their possession, and came to Juda, &c. This irreligious policy of Jeroboam (which was the foundation of Idolatry that never could be rooted out, until Israel for it was rooted out of the Land) was by Prophesie and Miracles impugned sufficiently when it first began; but the affections maintaining it, were so strong, that neither Prophesie nor Miracle could make them yield. Jeroboam could not be moved now by the Authority of Achia, who from the Lord had first promised unto him the Kingdom; nor by the withering of his own hand as he stretched it over the Altar, which also clave asunder according to the sign, which the Man of God had given him by the commandment of God; who again recovered and cured him of that defect; yet he continued as obstinate an Idolater as before, for he held it the safest course in policy to proceed as he had begun. This impious invention of Jeroboam, who forsook God, and the Religion of his fore-Fathers, by God and his Ministers taught them, was by a modern Historian compared with the policies of late Ages; observing well the practice of his Nation, being an Italian born. Sic qui hodiè (saith he) Politici vocantur, & propria commoda præsentesque utilitates sibi tanquam ultimum finem constituunt, causam quam vocant status in capite omnium ponunt: pro ipsa tuenda, promovenda, conservanda, amplianda nihil non faciendum putant. Si injuria proximo irroganda, si justitiæ honestatisque leges subvertendæ, si religio ipsa pessundanda, si denique omnia jura Divina & Humana violanda, nihil intentatum, nil per fas nefasque relinquendum censent; eunctia ruant, omnia pereant; nihil ad ipsos, modo id, quod è re sua esse sibi persuadent, obtineant, ac si nullus sit qui talia curet, castigareve possit Deus: So they who are now called Politicians, propounding to themselves, as their utmost end and scope, their own commodity and present profit, are wont to alledg the case of state forsooth, as the principal point to be regarded: For the good of the State, for advancing, preserving, or encreasing of the State, they think that they may do any thing. If they mean to oppress their Neighbour, to overturn all Laws of Justice and honesty, if Religion it self must go to wrack, yea, if all rights of God and Man must be violated, they will try all courses, be it right, be it wrong, they will do any thing; let all go to ruine what care they, so long as they may have what they would; as who should say, there were no God that would offer to meddle in such matters, or had power to correct them.

Indeed this allegation of Raggione del stato, did serve as well to uphold, as at the first it had done to bring in, this vile Idolatry of the ten Tribes. Upon this ground Amazia the Priest of Bethel counselled the Prophet Amos not to Prophesie at Bethel; For (saith he) it is the Kings Court. Upon this Ground even Jehu that had massacred the Priests of Baal, in zeal for the Lord, yet would not in any wise depart from that politique sin of Jeroboam the Son of Nebat, which made Israel to sin. It was reason of State that perswaded the last French King Henry the fourth to change his Religion, yet the Protestants whom he forsook, obeyed him, but some of the Papists whom he followed, murdered him. So strongly doth the painted Vizor of wise proceeding, delude even those that know the foul face of impiety lurking under it: And behold the wretched ends that have ever followed it, whereof Jehu, and all the Kings of Israel had, and were themselves very great examples.

Amos 7. 13. 2 Kings 10. 16. 2 Kings 10. 20.

SECT. II.

Of Rehoboam his impiety; for which he was punished by Sesac: Of his end, and Contemporaries.

WHile Jeroboam was occupied in setting up his new Religion, Rehoboam on the other side, having now little hope to recover the Provinces lost, strengthened the principal places remaining, with all endeavour; for he fortified and victualled fifteen Cities of Juda and Benjamin: Not that he feared Jeroboam alone, but the Egyptians, to whom Jeroboam had not only fastned himself, but withal invited them to invade Judæa: laying perchance before them the uncountable Riches of David and Solomon, which might now be easily had, seeing ten of the twelve Tribes were revolted, and become enemies to the Judæans. So as by those two ways (of late years often trodden) to wit, change of Religion, and invitation of forraign Force, Jeroboam hoped to settle himself in the Seat of Israel, whom yet the Powerful God for his Idolatry in few years after rooted out, with all his. Rehoboam having also, as he thought, by Fortifying divers places, assured his Estate, forsook the Law of the Living God, and made high Places, and Images, and Groves, on every high Hill, and under every green Tree.

2 Chron. 12.

1 Kings 14. 13.

And therefore in the fifth year of his Reign, Sesac or Shishac before spoken of, being now King of Egypt, and with whom, as well Adad of Idumæa, as Jeroboam, were familiar, and his Instruments; entred Judæa with twelve thousand Chariots, and threescore thousand Horses, besides Foot-Men, which which Josephus numbers at four hundred thousand. This Army was compounded of four Nations: Egyptians, Lubæans, Succæans, and Cusites. The Lubæans were Lybæans, the next bordering Region to Egypt, on the West-side. The Lubæans were of Petræa, and of the Desart Arabia, which afterwards followed Zera against Asa King of Juda. The Succæans according to Junius his opinion, were of Succoth, which signifieth Tents: He doth suppose that they were the Troglodites, mentioned often in Pliny, Ptolomy, and other Authors. The Troglodites inhabited not far from the Banks of the red Sea, in 22 Degrees from the line Northward, about six hundred English miles from the best and Maritimate part of Egypt: and therefore I do not think that the Succims or Succæi were those Troglodites, but rather those Arabians which Ptolemy calls Arabes Ægyptii Ichthiophagi, which possess that part of Egypt behind the Mountains called Alabastrini; and the Red Sea, far nearer Egypt, and readier to be levied, than those removed Savages of the Troglodite.

With this great and powerful Army, Sesac invaded Judæa, and (besides many other strong Cities) wan Jerusalem it self, of which and of the Temple, and Kings house, he took the spoil, carrying away (besides other treasures) the golden Shields which Solomon had made, in imitation of those which David recovered from Adadezer, in the Syrian war; these Rehoboam supplied with Targets of brass, which were fit enough to guard a King of his quality, whom Syracides calleth, The foolishness of the People.

From this time forward the King of Egypt claimed the soveraignty of Judæa, and held the Jews as their Tributaries: Sesac, as it seems, rendring up to Rehoboam his places on that condition. So much may be gathered out of the Word of God, where premising the deliverance of Juda after their humiliation, he doth notwithstanding leave them under the yoke of Egypt, in these words, Nevertheless they (to wit, the Judæans) shall be his servants, that is, the servants of Sesac.

After this overthrow and dishonour, Rehoboam reigned twelve years, and his losses received by Sesac notwithstanding, he continued the War against Jeroboam all his life-time. After his death Jeroboam governed Israel four years.

Rehoboam lived 58 years, and reigned 17, his story was written at large by Shemejah and Hiddon the Prophets, but the same perished with that of Nathan, and the rest.

With Rehoboam, Archippus, and Tersippus, the third and fourth Archontes, or Governours for life after Codrus, governed in Athens. Abdastrartus, or Abstrartus, in Tyre-Doristhus, the fifth of the Heraclidæ in Sparta, according to Eusebius (others make him the sixth) and Priminas the fourth in Corinth. Over the Latines, reigned Silvius Alba, Silvius Atys, the fourth and the fifth of the Silvii.

Euseb. Chron.

About the 12 of Rehoboam, Abdastrartus King of Tire was murthered by his Nurses sons, or Fosterbrethren, the elder of which usurped the Kingdom twelve years.

Toward his latter times, Periciades, or Pyrithiades, began to Govern Assyria, the 34th King thereof: And not long after Astartus, the son of Balcastartus, recovered the Kingdom of Tyre from the Usurpers.

SECT. III.

Of the great Battel between Jeroboam and Abia, with a Corollarie of the Examples of Gods Judgments.

Abijah the son of Rehoboam, inherited his Fathers Kingdom, and his vices. He raised an Army of four hundred thousand, with which he invaded Jeroboam, who encountered him with a double number of eight hundred thousand: Both Armies joyned near to the Mount Ephraim, where Jeroboam was utterly overthrown, and the strength of Israel broken: For there fell of that side five hundred thousand; the greatest overthrow that ever was given or received of those Nations. Abijah being now Master of the Field, recovered Bethel, Jeshanah, and Ephron. Soon after which discomfiture, Jeroboam died: who reigned in all 22 years; Abijah, the better to strengthen himself, entred into League with Hesion, the third of the Adads of Syria, as may be gathered out of the 2 of Chron. He reigned but three years, and then died: The particulars of his Acts were written by Iddo the Prophet, as some parts of his Fathers were. 2 Chron. 16. 23.

Here we see how it pleased God to punish the sins of Solomon in his son Rehoboam: First, by an Idolater and Traytor: And then by the Successor of that Egyptian, whose daughter Solomon had married, thereby the better to assure his Estate, which while he served God, was by God assured against all and the greatest neighbouring Kings, and when he forsook him, it was torn asunder by his meanest Vassals. Not that the Father wanted strength to defend him from the Egyptian Sesac; For the son Abijah was able to leavy four hundred thousand Men, and with the same number he overthrew eight hundred thousand Israelites, and slew of them five hundred thousand; God giving spirit, courage, and invention, when and where it pleaseth him. And as in those times the causes were expresst, why it pleased God to punish both Kings and their People; the same being both before, and at that instant delivered by Prophets: So the same Just God, who Liveth and Governeth all things for ever, doth in these our times give Victory, Courage, and Discourage, Raise, and throw down Kings, Estates, Cities, and Nations, for the same offences which were committed of old, and are committed in the present: For which reason, in these and other the afflictions of Israel, always the causes are set down, that they might be as presidents to succeeding ages. They were punished with famine in David's time for three years, For Saul and his bloody house, &c. And David towards the latter end suffered all sorts of afflictions, and sorrows in effect, for Uriah. Solomon had ten Tribes of twelve torn from his son for his Idolatry. Rehoboam was spoiled of his Riches and Honour by Sesac of Egypt, because the People of Juda made Images, High Places, and Groves, &c. and because they suffered Sodomites in the Land. Jeroboam was punished in himself and his Posterity, for the Golden Calves he erected. Jorom had all his Sons slain by the Philistims, and his very Bowels torn out of his Body by an Excoriating Flux, for murthering his Brethren. Ahab and Jezabel were slain, the Blood of one, the Body of the other eaten with Dogs, for the false accusing and killing of Naboth. So also hath God punished the same, and the like sins in all After-times, and in these our days by the same Famine, Plagues, War, Loss, Vexation, Death, Sickness and Calamities: howsoever the Wise Men of the World raise these 2 Sam. 21. 1.

SECT. IV.

Of Asa and his Contemporaries.

2 Chro. 14. TO Abijah succeeded Asa, who enjoyed peace for his first ten years, in which time he established the Church of God, breaking down the altars dedicated to strange Gods, with their Images, cutting down their Groves, and taking away their high places. He also spared not his own Mother, who was an Idolatress, but deposing her from her regency, broke her Idol, stampt it, and burnt it. He also Fortified many Cities, and other places, providing (as provident Kings do) for the troubles of War in leasure of Peace. For not long after he was invaded by Zerah, who then commanded all the Arabians bordering Judæa, and with such a multitude entred the Territory of Asa, as (for any thing I have read) were never assembled of that Nation, either before or since: For it is written, that there came against the Judæans, Zerah of Æthiopia, with an Host of ten hundred thousand, and three hundred Chariots, which Asa encountred with an Army of five hundred and fourscore thousand levied out of those two Tribes of Juda and Benjamin, which obeyed him, and with which he overthrew this fearful multitude, and had the spoil both of their Cities and Camps.

1 Chron. 15 16.

2 Chron. 14. 9.

* In the former book, c. 4. sect. 14. adem. c. 8. sect. 10. 16.

That this Zerah was not an Æthiopian, I have * proved already, and were it but the length between Æthiopia and Judæa, and the strong flourishing Regions of Egypt interjacent (who would not suffer a Million of strangers to pass through them) it were sufficient to make it appear how foolish the opinion is, that these Invaders were Æthiopians, but in that the Scriptures acknowledg that Gerar was belonging to Zerah, and the Cities thereabouts were spoiled by the Judæans, in following their Victory, as places belonging to Zerah, and that all Men know that Gerar standeth upon the torrent of Besor, which David past over when he surprized the Amalekites, or Arabians; this proveth sufficiently, that Zerah was leader of the Arabians, and that Gerar was a frontier Town standing on the uttermost South-border of all Judæa, from all parts of Æthiopia six hundred miles. Also the spoils which Asa took, as the Cattel, Camels, and Sheep, whereof he sacrificed five thousand, shew them to be Arabians adjoyning, and not far off, and not unknown Æthiopians. And if it be objected, that these desart Countries can hardly yield a Million of Men fit for the Wars. I answer, that it is as like that Arabia Petræa, and the Desart, which compass two parts of the holy Land, should yield ten hundred thousand, as that two Tribes of the twelve, should arm five hundred and fourscore thousand. Besides, it answered to the promise of God to Abraham, that these Nations should exceed in number; for God spake it of Ismael, that he would make him fruitful, and multiply him exceedingly, that he should beget twelve Princes, &c.

2 Chro. 14.

Baasha a King of Israel began to reign in the third of Asa, and fearing the greatness of Asa after his great Victory, entertained Benhadad King of Syria, of the race of Adadezer, to joyn with him against Asa; and to the end to block him up, he fortified Rama, which lieth in the way from Jerusalem toward Samaria.

2 Chr. 16. v. 1.

This War began according to the letter of the Scriptures in the 36 year of Asa his reign: But because in the first of Kings the 16 it is said that Baasha died in the 26 year of Asa; therefore could not Baasha begin this War in the 35 of Asa his reign, but in the 35 year of the division of Juda and Israel, for so many years it was from the first of Rehoboam, who reigned 17 years, to the 16 of Asa. It may seem strange, that Asa being able to bring into the field an Army of five hundred and fourscore thousand good Souldiers, did not easily drive away Baasha, and defeat him of his purposes, the victories of Abia against Jeroboam, and of Asa himself against Zerah, being yet fresh in mind, which might well have emboldened the Men of Juda, and asmuch disheartned the Enemies. Questionless there were some important Circumstances, omitted in the Text, which caused Asa to fight at this time with Money. It may be that the imployment of so many hundred thousands of hands, in the late service against Zerah, had caused many Mens private businesses to lie undispatched, whereby the People being now intentive to the culture of their Lands and other Trades, might be unwilling to stir against the Israelites, choosing rather to wink at apparent inconvenience, which the building of Rama would bring upon them in after-times. Such backwardness of the People might have deterred Asa from adventuring himself with the least part of his forces, and committing the success into the hands of God. Howsoever it were, he took the treasures remaining in the Temple, with which he waged Benhadad the Syrian against Baasha, whose employments Benhadad readily accepted, and brake off confederacy with Baasha. For the Israelites were his Borderers and next Neighbours, whom neither himself (after his invasion) nor his successors after him ever gave over, till they had made themselves masters of that Kingdom. So Benhadad being now entred into Nepthalim, without resistance, he spoiled divers principal Cities thereof, and inforced Baasha to quit Rama, and to leave the same to Asa, with all the materials which he had brought thither, to fortifie the same: which done, Benhadad, who loved neither party, being loden with the spoils of Israel, and the treasures of Juda, returned to Damascus. After this, when Hanani the Prophet reprehended Asa, in that he now relied on the strength of Syria, and did not rest himself on the favour and assistance of God; he not only caused Hanani to be Imprisoned, but he began to burden and oppress his People, and was therefore strucken with the grievous pains of the Gout in his feet, wherewith after he had been two years continually tormented, he gave up the Ghost when he had reigned 41 years.

There lived with Asa, Agesilaus the sixth of the Heraclidæ, and Bacis the fifth King of the same race in Corinth, of whom his successors were afterward called Bacidæ. Astartus, and Astarimus were Kings in Tyre. Astarimus took revenge on his Brother Phelletes, for the murther of Ithobalus Priest of the Goddess Astarta, whom Solomon in dotage worshipped. Atys and Capys ruled the Latines: Pirithiades and Ophrateus the Assyrians: Tersippus and Phorbas the Athenians: Chemmis reigned in Egypt; who dying in the 36 year of Asa, left Cheops his successor, that reigned sixty six years, even to the 16 of Joas.

SECT. V.

Of the great alteration falling out in the ten Tribes during the reign of Asa.

IN the reign of Asa the Kingdom of Israel felt great and violent commotions, which might have reduced the ten Tribes unto their former allegiance to the house of David, if the wisdom of God had not otherwise determined. The wickedness of Jeroboam had, in his later days, the sentence of heavy vengeance laid upon it, by the mouth of Abia, the same Prophet which had foretold the division of Israel, for the sin of Solomon, and his reign over the ten Tribes. One son Jeroboam had among others, in whom only God found so much piety, as (though it sufficed not to with-hold his wrath from that Family) it procured unto him a peaceable end; an honourable testimony of the peoples love, by their general mourning and lamentation at his death, and (wherein he was most happy) the favourable approbation of God himself.

After the loss of this good son, the ungodly father was soon taken away: a miserable creature, so conscious of his vile unthankfulness to God, that he durst not suffer his own name to be used in consulting with an holy Prophet, assured of the ruine hanging over him and his, yea of Gods extream hatred; yet forbearing to destroy those accursed Idols that wrought his confusion. So loth he was to forsake his worldly wisdom, when the world was ready to forsake him, and all belonging to him, his hateful memory excepted.

Nadab the son of Jeroboam, reigned in the second and third years of Asa, which are reckoned as two years, though indeed his fathers last year of two and twenty did run along (how far is uncertain) with the second of Asa, whose third year was the first of Baasha, so that perhaps this Nadab enjoyed not his Kingdom one whole year. He did not alter his fathers courses, neither did God alter his sentence. It seems that he little feared the judgments denounced against his fathers house: for as a Prince that was secure of his own estate, he armed all Israel against the Philistims, and besieged one of their Towns. There (whether it were so, that the people were offended with his ill success, and recalled to mind their grievous loss of five hundred thousand under Jeroboam, counting it an unlucky family to the Nation; or whether by some particular indiscretion, he exasperated them) slain he was by Baasha, whom the Army did willingly accept for King in his stead. Baasha was no sooner proclaimed King, than he began to take order with the house of Jeroboam, that none of them might molest him, putting all of them, without mercy, to the sword. That he did this for private respect, and not in regard of Gods will to have it so, it is evident by his continuing in the same form of Idolatry which Jeroboam had begun. Wherefore he received the same sentence from God that had been laid upon Jeroboam; which was executed upon him also in the same sort. He began to infest Asa, by fortifying Ramah; but was diverted from thence by the Syrian Benhadad, who did waste his Country, destroying all the Land of Nephtalim. Four and twenty years he reigned, and then dying, left the Crown to Ela his son; who enjoyed it, as Nadab the son of Jeroboam had done, two years current, perhaps not one compleat.

1 King. 15. 25.

Ela was as much an Idolater as his father: and withall a riotous person. He sent an Army against Gibbethon, the same town of the Philistims, before which Nadab the son of Jeroboam perished; but he sate at home the whilest, feasting and drinking with his Minions, whereby he gave such advantage against himself, as was not neglected. Zimri, an ambitious man, remaining with the King at Tirza, finding his Master so dissolute, and his behaviour so contemptible, conceived hope of the like fortune as Baasha had found, by doing as Baasha had done. Wherefore he did set upon Ela in his drunkenness, and slew him. Presently upon which fact, he stiled himself King of Israel: and began his reign with massacring all the house of Baasha; extending his cruelty not only to his children, and kinsfolk, but unto all his friends in Terza. These news were quickly blown to the Camp at Gibbethon, where they were not welcomed according to Zimri his expectation. For the Souldiers in stead of proclaiming him King, proclaimed him Traitor: and being led by Omri, whom they saluted King, they (quitting the siege of Gibbethon) presented themselves before Tirza; which in short space they may seem to have forced. Zimri wanting strength to defend the City, not courage to keep himself from falling alive into his enemies hands, did set fire on the Palace, consuming it and himself together to ashes. Seven days he is said to have reigned: accounting (as is most likely) to the time that Omri was proclaimed in the Camp. For Zimri was also an Idolater, Walking in the way of Jeroboam; and therefore is likely to have had more time wherein to declare himself, than the reign of seven days, and those consumed partly in murthering the friends of Baasha, partly in seeking to have defended his own life. After the death of Ela, there arose another King to oppose the faction of Omri; whereby it may seem, that Zimri had made his party strong, as being able to set up a new head, who doubtless would never have appeared, if there had not been ready to his hand, some strength, not unlikely to resist and vanquish the Army which maintained Omri. How long this Tibni, the new competitor of Omri, held out, I do not find; only it appears that his side was decayed, and so he died, leaving no other Successor than his concurrent.

SECT. VI.

A conjecture of the causes hindering the re-union of Israel with Juda, which might have been effected by these troubles.

ANy man that shall consider the state of Israel in those times may justly wonder how it came to pass, that either the whole Nation wearied with the calamities already suffered under these unfortunate Princes, and with the present civil wars, did not return to their ancient Kings, and re-unite themselves with the mighty Tribes of Juda and Benjamin, or that Zimri and Tibni, with their oppressed factions, did not call in Asa, but rather chose the one to endure a desperate necessity of yielding, or burning himself, the other to languish away as a man forsaken; than to have recourse unto a remedy, so sure, so ready, and so honourable. To say that GOD was pleased to have it so, were a true, but an idle answer (for his secret will is the cause of all things) unless it could be proved, that he had forbidden Asa to deal in that business; as he forbad Reboboam to force the rebellious people to obedience. That the restraint laid by God upon Reboboam, did only bind his hands from attempting the suppression of that present insurrection, it appears by the War continued between Israel and Juda, so many years following: wherein Abia so far prevailed, that he wan a great battel, and recovered some Towns belonging to the other Tribes, which he annexed to his own Dominion. Wherefore we may boldly look into the second causes moving the People and Leaders of the ten Tribes, to ſuffer any thing under new up-ſtarts, rather than to caſt their eyes upon that Royal houſe of David, from which the ſucceſſion of five Kings in lineal deſcent, had taken away all imputation, that might formerly have been laid upon the mean beginnings thereof. To think that Omri had prevented his Competitors in making peace with Aſa, were a conjecture more bold than probable. For Omri was not only an Idolater, but did worſe than all that were before him; which as it might ſerve alone to prove, that Aſa, being a godly King, would not adhere to him, ſo the courſe which he profeſſed to take at the very firſt, of revenging the maſſacre committed upon the family and friends of Baaſha (Aſa his mortal enemy) gives manifeſt reaſon, why Zimri, who had wrought that great execution, ſhould more juſtly than he have expected the friendſhip of Juda in that quarrel. Wherefore in ſearching out the reaſon of this backwardneſs in the ten Tribes (which was ſuch, that they may ſeem to have never thought upon the matter) to ſubmit themſelves to their true Princes; it were not amiſs to examine the cauſes moving the people to revenge the death of Ela, an idle drunkard, rather than of Nadab the ſon Jeroboam, who followed the Wars in perſon as a man of ſpirit and courage. Surely it is apparent, that the very firſt defection of the 10 Tribes, was (if we look upon humane reaſon) occaſioned by deſire of breaking that heavy yoke of bondage wherewith Solomon had galled their necks. Their deſire was to have a King that ſhould not oppreſs them; not to have no King at all. And therefore when the arrogant folly of Rehoboam had cauſed them to renounce him, they did immediatly chooſe Jeroboam in his ſtead, as a man likely to afford that liberty unto them for which he had contended in their behalf. Neither were they (as it ſeems) herein altogether deceived. For his affectation of popularity appears in his building of decayed Towers, and in the inſtitution of his new deviſed Idolatry; where he told the people, that it was too much for them to travel ſo far as to Jeruſalem. But whether it were ſo, that his moderation, being voluntary, began to ceaſe towards the latter end of his reign, and of his ſons reign, when long time of poſſeſſion had confirmed his title, which at the firſt was only good by courteſie of the people: or whether the people (as often happens in ſuch caſes) were more offended by ſome prerogatives of a King, that he ſtill retained in his own hands, than pleaſed with his remiſſion of other burdens, it is clearly apparent, that the whole Army of all Iſrael joyned with Baaſha, taking in good part the death of Nadab, and eradication of Jeroboam's houſe.

Now the reign of Baaſha himſelf, was (for ought that remaineth in writing of it) every way unfortunate; his labour and coſt at Rama was caſt away; the other ſide of his Kingdom harried by the Syrians; neither did he win that one Town of Gibbethon from the Philiſtims, but left that buſineſs to his ſon, who likewiſe appears an unprofitable ſluggard. Wherefore it muſt needs be, that the favour of the people toward the houſe of Baaſha grew from his good form of Civil Government, which happily he reduced to a more temperate method than Jeroboam ever meant to do. And ſurely he that ſhall take pains to look into thoſe examples which are extant of the different courſes, held by the Kings of Iſrael and Juda, in adminiſtration of juſtice, will find it moſt probable, that upon this ground it was that the ten Tribes continued ſo averſe from the line of David; as to think all adverſity more tolerable, than the weighty Scepter of that houſe. For the death of Joab and Shimei was indeed by them deſerved; yet in that they ſuffered it without form of judgment, they ſuffered like unto men innocent. The death of Adonijah was both without judgment, and without any crime objected, other than the Kings jealouſie: out of which by the ſame rule of arbitrary juſtice (under which it may be ſuppoſed that many were caſt away) he would have ſlain Jeroboam (if he could have caught him) before he had yet committed any offence; as appears by his confident return out of Egypt, like one that was known to have endured wrong, having not offered any.

The like and much more barbarous execution, to wit, without law, Jeboram did upon his brethren, and upon ſundry of his greateſt men; as alſo Joaſh did ſo put to death Zachariah the ſon of Jehojada, who had made him King, even in the court of the houſe of the Lord: and Manaſſes did ſhed innocent blood exceeding much, till he repleniſhed Jeruſalem from corner to corner: and this was imputed to him as another fault; beſides his ſin, wherewith he made Juda to ſin. Contrariwiſe, among the Kings of Iſrael we find no monument of ſuch arbitrary proceeding, unleſs perhaps the words of Jehoram the ſon of Ahab (which were but words) may be taken for an inſtance, when he ſaid, God do ſo to me, and more alſo, if the head of Eliſha the ſon of Shaphat ſhall ſtand on him this day: whereby it is not plain whether he meant to kill him without more ado, or to have him condemned as a falſe Prophet, that had made them hold out againſt the Aramites, till they were fain to eat their own children; which he thought a ſufficient argument to prove, that it was not Gods purpoſe to deliver them. The death of Naboth ſheweth rather the liberty which the Iſraelites enjoyed, than any peremptory execution of the Kings will. For Naboth did not fear to ſtand upon his own right, though Ahab were even ſick for anger: neither was he for that cauſe put to death, as upon commandment, but made away by conſpiracy, the matter being handled after a judicial form, which might give ſatisfaction to the people, ignorant of the device, though to God it could not.

2 Chro. 24. 21. 2 King. 21. 16. 2 King. 6. 31.

The murther of the Prophets is continually aſcribed to Jezabel, an impudent Woman, and not unto the King her husband. Neither is it certain, that there was no Law made whereby their lives were taken from them; but certain it is, that the people being Idolaters, were both pleaſed with their death, and laboured in the execution. So that the doings of the Kings of Juda (ſuch as are regiſtred) prove them to uſe a more abſolute manner of command, than the Kings of the ten Tribes. Neither do their ſufferings witneſs the contrary. For of thoſe which reigned over Juda, from the diviſion of the Kingdom, to the captivity of the ten Tribes, three were ſlain by the people, and two were denied a burial amongſt their Anceſtors. Yea, the death of Ahazia and his brethen, ſlain by Jehu, with the deſtruction of all that Royal ſeed of Athalia, did not (for ought that we can read) ſtir up in the people any ſuch thirſt of revenge, as might by the ſuddenneſs and uniformity teſtifie the affection to be general, and proceeding from a loving remembrance of their Princes: unleſs we ſhould think that the death of Athalia, after ſeven years reign, were occaſioned rather by the memory of her ill purchaſing, than by the preſent ſenſe of her tyrannical abuſing the government, whereon ſhe had ſeiſed. On the other ſide, ſuch of the Kings of Iſrael as periſhed by treaſon (which were ſeven of the twenty) were all ſlain by the conſpiracy of the great men, who aſpired by treaſon to the Crown: the people being ſo far from embruing their hands in the blood of their Soveraigns, that (after Nadab) they did never forbear to revenge the death of their Kings, when it lay in their power; nor approve the good success of treason, unless fear compelled them. So that the death of two Kings, being throughly revenged upon other two, namely the death of Ela and Zacharia, upon Zimri and Shallum, who traiterously got and usurped, for a little while, their places; only three of the seven remain, whose ends how the people took, it may be doubtful. Though indeed it is precisely said of the slaughter committed on Ahab's children by Jehu, that the people durst not fight with him that did it, 2 King. 10 4. because they were exceedingly afraid: and the same fear might be in them at the death of Peka, whose History (as others of that time) is cursorily passed over. The like may be pronounced, and more absolutely, of the Kings of England, that never any of them perished by fury of the people, but by treason of such as did succeed them; neither was there any motive urging so forcibly the death of King Edward and King Richard when they were in prison, as fear lest the people should stir in their quarrel. And certainly (howsoever all that the Law calls treason, be interpreted, as tending finally to the Kings destruction) in those treasonable insurrections of the vulgar, which have here most prevailed, the fury of the multitude hath quenched it self with the bloud of some great Officers; no such rebellions, howsoever wicked and barbarous otherwise, thirsting after the ruine of their natural Soveraign, but rather forbearing the advantages gotten upon his Royal person: which if any man impute unto gross ignorance, another may more charitably, and I think, more truly, ascribe to a reverent affection. Wherefore that Fable of Briareus, who, being loosened hy Pallas, did with his 100 hands give assistance to Jupiter, when all the rest of the gods conspired against him, is very fitly expounded by Sir Francis Bacon, as signifying that Monarchies need not to fear any curbing of their absolutenes by mighty subjects, as long as by wisdom they keep the hearts of the people, who will be sure to come in on their side. Though indeed the Story might very well have born the same interpretation, as it is rehearsed by Homer, who tells us that Pallas was one of the conspiracy, and that Thetis alone did mar all their practice, by loosening Briareus. For a good Form of Government sufficeth by it self to retain the people, not only without assistance of a laborious Wit, but even against all devices of the greatest and shrewdest Politicians: every Sheriff and Constable, being sooner able to arm the multitude, in the Kings behalf, than any over-weening Rebel, how mighty soever, can against him.

This declaration of the peoples love, being seldom found in Juda, makes it very likely, that the rule it self of government there was such, as neither gave occasion of contentment unto the subjects, nor of confidence in their good affection to the Kings. Upon which reasons it may seem that the multitude was kept usually disarmed. For otherwise it would have been almost impossible, that Athalia the sister of Ahab, a stranger to the Royal bloud of Juda, should by the only authority of a Queen-mother have destroyed all the seed of David, and usurped the Kingdom very near 7 Years, without finding any resistance. Yea when Jehojada the high Priest had agreed with the Captains and principal men of the Land to set up Joash their lawful King, whereunto the whole Nation were generally well affected, he was fain to give to these Captains and their men, the spears and the shields that were King Davids, and were in the house of the Lord. But we need not enter into such particulars. Questionless, the Tribes which thought obedience to their Princes to be a part of their duty toward God, would endure much more with patience, than they which had Kings of their own choice or admission, holding the Crown by a more uncertain tenure.

And this, in my opinion, was the reason, why the ten Tribes did never seek to return to their ancient Lords: but after the destruction of their six first Kings, which died in the reign of Asa, admitted a seventh of a new Family, rather than they would consubject themselves with those of Juda and Benjamin, under a more honourable, but more heavy yoke.

So Asa having seen the death of 7 Kings of Israel, died himself after one and forty years reign, leaving Jehosophat his son to deal with Ahab the son of Omri, who was the eighth King over the ten Tribes.

SECT. VII.

Of Jehosophat and his Contemporaries.

Jehosophat, who succeeded Asa, was a Prince religious and happy, he destroyed all the Groves, Altars, and high places dedicated to Idolatry, and sent Teachers to all places and people wanting instruction; he recovered the tribute due unto him by the Arabians and Philistims: from the one he had silver, from the other sheep and goats to the number of fifteen thousand and four hundred. The numbers of men of War were more than admirable; for it is Written that Adnah had the command of three hundred thousand, Jehohanam of two hundred and fourscore thousand, and Amasia of two hundred thousand; 2 Chro. 17. also that he had, besides these in Benjamin, of those that bare shields, which we call Targetiers, and of Archers under Eliada, two hundred thousand, and under the commandment of Jehozabad a hundred and fourscore thousand: which numbred together make eleven hundred and sixty thousand, all which are said to have waited upon the King, besides his Garrisons.

That Juda and Benjamin, a Territory not much exceeding the County of Kent, should muster eleven hundred and sixty thousand fighting men, it is very strange, and the number far greater than it was found upon any other view. Joab in David's time found five hundred thousand: Rehoboam found but an hun- 2 Sam. 24. dred and fourscore thousand: Abia four hundred 4. and eight thousand: Asa five hundred and fourscore thousand: Amazia inrolled all that could bear arms, and they amounted to three hundred thousand. Surely, whereas it is written that when news was brought to Jehosophat that Moab and Ammon were entred his Territory to the West of Jordan, and that their numbers were many, he feared (to wit) the multitude, it is not likely that he would have feared even the Army of Xerxes, if he could have brought into the field the 11 hundred and 60 thousand fighting men, leaving all his strong Cities manned. I am therefore of opinion (referring my self to better judgment) that these numbers specified in the second of Chronicles the 17 distributed to several Leaders, were not all at one time, but that the 300 thousand under Adnah, and the 200 and fourscore thousand under Jehohanam, were afterward commanded and mustered by Amasiah, Eliad, and Jehosabad: for the gross and total is not in that place set down, as it was under the other Kings formerly named. Again, as the aids which Jehosaphat brought to Ahab did not shew that he was a Prince of extraordinary power, so the Moabites and Ammonites which he feared, could never make the one half of those numbers, which he that commanded least among Jehosaphat's Leaders had under him.

This mighty Prince, notwithstanding his greatness, yet he joyned in friendship with Ahab King of Israel, who had married that wicked Woman Jezabel. Him Jehosophat visited at Samaria, and caused his son Joram to marry Athalia, this Achab's Daughter.

Achab perswaded Jehosophat to assist him in the War against the Syrians, who held the City of Ramoth Gilead from him, and called together four hundred of his Prophets, or Baalites, to fore-tell the success: who promised him Victory. But Jehosophat believed nothing at all in those diviners, but resolved first of all to confer with some one Prophet of the Lord God of Israel. Hereupon Achab made answer that he had one called Michaiah, but he hated that Prophet, because he always fore-told of evil, and never of any good towards him. Yet Michaiah was sent for to the King; but by the way the messenger prayed him to consent with the rest of the Prophets, and to promise Victory unto them, as they did. But Michaiah spake the truth, and repeated his Vision to both the Kings, which was, that God asked who shall perswade Ahab, that he may go up and fall at Ramoth Gilead? to whom a spirit that stood before the Lord answered, that he would enter into his Prophets, and be in them a false spirit to delude. For as it is said by Christ: Non enim vos estis qui loquimini, sed spiritus patris vestri loquitur in vobis. It is not you that speak, but the Spirit of your Father speaks in you: so in a contrary kind did the devil in the Prophets of Baal, or Satan, incourage Achab to his destruction. And as P. Martyr upon this place well observeth, these evil spirits are ministers of Gods vengeance, and are used as the hangmen and tormentors, which Princes sometime imploy, For as it pleaseth God by his good Angels, to save and deliver from destruction, of which the Scriptures have many examples: so on the contrary, it is by the evil that he punisheth and destroyeth; both which are said to perform the Will of their Creator, licet non eodem animo. Ecclesiasticus remembreth a second sort of malignant natures, but they are every-where visible. There are spirits, saith he, created for vengeance, which in their rigour lay on sure strokes. In the time of destruction they shew forth their power, and accomplish the wrath of him that made them.

Now Michaias having by this his revelation greatly displeased the King, and the Prophets, whose spirit he discovered, was strucken by Zidkiah one of Baal's Prophets, and by Achab himself committed to prison: where he appointed him to be reserved and fed with bread of affliction till he returned in peace. But Michaiah, not fearing to reply, answered, If thou return in peace, the Lord hath not spoken by me. Nevertheless Achab went on in that War, and was wounded to death. Jehosophat returned to Jerusalem, where he was reprehended by Jehu the Prophet for assisting an idolatrous Prince, and one that hated God.

2 Chro. 18. After this the Aramites or Damascenes, joyned with the Moabites, Ammonites and Idumæans to invade Judæa: who pass Jordan and encamp at Engaddi; and when Jehosophat gathered his Army, the Prophet Jahaziel fore-told him of the Victory, which should be obtained without any bloud-shed of his part: and so when Jehosophat approached, this Assembly of Nations, the Ammonites and Moabites, disagreeing with the Idumæans, and quarrelling for some causes among themselves, those of Ammon and Moab
2 Chro. 20. set upon the Idumæans, and brake them utterly: which done, they also invaded each other; in which broil Jehosophat arriving, took the spoil of them all without any loss of his part, as it was fore-told and promised by God. Notwithstanding this Victory, Jehosophat, forgetting that he was formerly reprehended for assisting an idolatrous King, did notwithstanding joyn with Ochazias, the son of Achab, in preparing a Fleet to send to Ophir, hoping of the like return which Solomon had: but as Eliezer the Prophet fore-told him, his shipsperished, and were broken in the port of Ezion Gaber, and so that enterprize was overthrown. 2 Chro. 20.

Yet he taketh part with Jehoram, the brother of Ochazias, against the Moabites, with which Kings of Juda and Israel, the Edomites joyn their Forces, not forgetting, it seems, that the Moabites, assisted by the Ammonites, had not long before destroyed their Army.

The Moabites, subjects to David and Solomon, forsaking the Kings of Juda, gave themselves for vassals to Jeroboam, and so they continued to his successors till the death of Achab: but Jehosophat, notwithstanding the Idolatry of his Colleague, yet as it seemeth he was drawn into this War, both to be avenged of the Moabites for their defection from Juda to Israel, as also because they had lately joyned themselvs with the Syrians against Jehosophat, and thirdly, to punish their double rebellion who first forsook Juda, and now Israel.

Both Kings resolved to pass by the way of Idumæa, thereby the better to assure that Nation; for we find that both Moab, Ammon and Edom were all in the field together at Engadi against Jehosophat: But whether they had then declared themselves against Jehosophat, it is not certain; for in the 2 of Chron. 11. vers. 8. it is written, that in the time of Jehoram the son of Jehosaphat, Edom rebelled: and therefore it seemeth to me that the Edomites, when they were slain by Moab and Ammon, not finding themselves satisfied in such conditions as they required, offered to return from them, and to joyn themselves with the Army of Juda. For, that they were numbred among the enemies of Jehosaphat, it is plain in the 2 of Chron. the 20. and as plain c. 21. v. 8. that they were not declared, nor had made them a King, till Jehosophat's death. Now in the passage of these Kings towards Moab, whether it were by the extraordinary heat of the year, or whether the Idumæans having a purpose to rebel, misled the Army of Juda and Israel, with intent to infeeble them for want of Water; true it is, that they suffered the same, if not a greater thirst than the Armies of Crassus and M. Antonius did in their Parthian expeditions; and had in all likelihood utterly perished, had not Elisha taught them to cut trenches whereinto the water sprang, by which not only Jehosaphat and his Army, but Jehoram King of Israel an Idolater was relieved: the great mercy and goodness of God having ever been prone to save the evil for the good, whereas he never destroyed the good for the evil.

The miserable issue of this War, and how Moab burnt his son, or the son of the King of Edom, for sacrifice, on the rampire of his own City, I have already written in the life of Jehoram among the Kings of Israel. Jehosophat reigned 25 Years and died; he was buried in the valley of Jehosophat, and a part of the Pyramis set over his grave is yet to be seen, saith Brochard. His acts are written at large by Jehu the son of Hanani. 2 King. 3. 2 Chr. 20. Broch. Tor. sanct.

There lived with Jehosophat, Ophratenes in Assyria, Capetus, and Tiberinus Kings of the Albans in Italy; of the latter, the river Tiber (formerly Albula) took name.

In Jehosophat's time also ruled Mecades or Mezades in Athens: Agelas or Agesilaus in Corinth; and Archilaus of the same race of the Heraclidæ the seventh in Lacedæmon. Badesorus ruled the Tyrians; Achab, Ochazias and Jehoram the Israelites.

CHAP. XX.

Of Jehoram the ſon of Jehoſaphat, and Ahazia.

SECT. I.

That Jehoram was made King ſundry times.

JEhoram the ſon of Jehoſaphat King of Judah, began his reign at thirty two years of age, and lived until he was forty years old, being eight years a King: But of theſe eight years, which Jehoram is ſaid to have reigned, four are to be reckoned in the life of his Father, who going to the Syrian War with Ahab, left this Jehoram King in his ſtead, as Ahab did his ſon Ahazia. This appears by the ſeveral beginnings, which are given in Scripture to the two Jeroboams Kings of Iſrael and Juda, and to Ahazia the eldeſt ſon of Ahab. For Ahazia is ſaid to have begun his reign, in the ſeventeenth year of Jehoſaphat. Jehoram the Brother of Ahazia ſucceeded him in the 2 year of Jehoram the ſon of Jehoſaphat King of Juda; that is, in the next year after that Jehoram of Juda was deſigned King by his Father; it being (as we find elſewhere) the eighteenth year of Jehoſaphat himſelf, who went with the Iſraelites againſt Moab. Hereby it appears that the full power and execution of the royal Office was retained ſtill by Jehoſaphat, who Governed abſolutely by himſelf, not communicating the rule with his ſon. But in the fifth year of Jeroboam King of Iſrael, which was the two and twentieth of Jehoſaphat, the old King took unto him, as Partner in the Government, this his eldeſt ſon, who was at that time 32 years old, his father being 57. Now for as much as Jehoſaphat reigned 25 years, it is evident that his ſon did not reign alone till the eighth of Joram King of Iſrael. The like regard is to be had in accounting the times of other Kings of Juda and Iſrael, who did not always reign preciſely ſo long as the bare letter of the Text may ſeem at firſt to affirm: but their years were ſometimes compleat, ſometimes only current, ſometimes confounded with the years of their ſucceſſors or foregoers, and muſt therefore be found by comparing their times with the years of thoſe others, with whom they did begin and end.

2 King. 3. v. 1. & 9.

2 King. 8. 16.

2 Kings 22. 42.

It were perhaps a thing leſs needful than curious, to enquire into the reaſons moving Jehoſaphat either to aſſume unto him his ſon as Partner in the Kingdom, whilſt he was able himſelf to command both in Peace and in War, the like having never be done by any of his Progenitors, or having once (in the 17 of his reign) vouchſafed unto him that honour, to reſume it to himſelf, or at leaſt wiſe to defer the confirmation of it, until four or five years were paſſed. Yet foraſmuch as to enter into the examination of theſe paſſages, may be a mean to find ſome light, whereby we may more clearly diſcover the cauſes of much extraordinary buſineſs enſuing, I hold it not amiſs to make ſuch conjecture, as the circumſtances of the ſtory briefly handled in the Scriptures may ſeem to approve.

We are therefore to conſider, that this King Jehoſaphat was the firſt of Rehoboams iſſue, that ever entred into any ſtraight league with the Kings of the ten Tribes. All that reigned in Juda before him, had with much labour and long War, tired themſelves in vain, making ſmall profit of the greateſt advantages that could be wiſhed. Wherefore Jehoſaphat thought it the wiſeſt way, to make a League offenſive and defenſive between Iſrael and Juda, whereby each might enjoy their own in quiet.

This confederacy made by a religious King, with one that did hate the Lord, could not long proſper, as not iſſuing from the true root and fountain of all Wiſdom: Yet as a piece of ſound policy, doubtleſs it wanted not fair pretences of much common good thereby likely to ariſe, with mutual fortification of both thoſe Kingdoms, againſt the uncircumciſed Nations their ancient Enemies. This apparent benefit, being ſo ineſtimable a jewel, that it might not eaſily be loſt, but continue as hereditary from Father to Son, it was thought a very good courſe to have it confirmed by ſome ſure Bond of Affinity, and thereupon was Athalia the Daughter of Omri, and Siſter of Ahab King of Iſrael, given in marriage to Jehoram, who was Son and Heir apparent to the King of Juda. This Lady was of a maſculine ſpirit, and had learned ſo much of Queen Jezabel her brothers Wife, that ſhe durſt undertake, and could throughly perform a great deal more in Jeruſalem, than the other knew how to compaſs in Samaria. She was indeed a Firebrand ordained by God to conſume a great part of the nobleſt Houſes in Juda, and perhaps of thoſe Men or their Children, whoſe worldly wiſdom, regardleſs of Gods pleaſure, had brought her in.

2 Chro. 19. v. 2. & 3.

The firſt fruits of this great League, was the Syrian War at Ramoth Gilead, wherein Juda and Iſrael did adventure equally, but the profit of the Victory ſhould have redounded wholly to Ahab: As Godly Princes very ſeldom thrive by matching with Idolaters, but rather ſerve the turns of thoſe falſe Friends, who being ill affected to God himſelf cannot be well affected to his Servants. Before their ſetting forth, Ahab deſigned, as King, his Son Ahaziah; not ſo much perhaps in regard of the uncertain events of War (for none of his Predeceſſors had ever done the like, upon the like occaſions) nor as fearing the threatnings of the Prophet Michaia (for he deſpiſed them) as inviting Jehoſaphat by his own Example, to take the ſame courſe, wherein he prevailed.

SECT.

SECT. II.

Probable conjectures of the motives inducing the old King Jehoſaphat to change his purpoſe often, in making his ſon Jehoram King.

MAny arguments do very ſtrongly prove Jehoram to have been wholly over-ruled by his Wife, eſpecially for his forſaking the Religion of his Godly Anceſtors, and following the abominable ſuperſtitions of the houſe of Achab.

That ſhe was a Woman of intollerable pride, and abhorring to live a private life, the whole courſe of her actions witneſſeth at large. Much vain matter ſhe was able to produce, whereby to make her Husband think that his Brethren and Kindred were but mean and unworthy Perſons in compariſon of him, and of his Children, which were begotten upon the Daughter and Siſter of two great Kings, not upon baſe Women, and meer ſubjects. The Court of Ahab, and his famous Victorys obtained againſt the Syrian Benhadad were matter ſufficient to make an inſolent man think highly of himſelf, as being allied ſo honourably, who could otherwiſe have found in his heart well enough, to deſpiſe all his Brethren, as being the eldeſt, and Heir apparent to the Crown, whereof already he had, in a manner, the poſſeſſion.

How ſoon his vices brake out, or how long he diſſembled them and his Idolatrous Religion, it cannot certainly be known. Like enough it is, that ſome ſmoke, out of the hidden fire, did very ſoon make his Fathers eyes to water; who thereupon cauſed the young Man to know himſelf better, by making him fall back into rank among his younger Brethren. And ſurely the doings of Jehoſaphat about the ſame time, argue no ſmall diſtemper of the whole Country, through the miſgovernment of his ungodly ſon. For the good King was fain to make his progreſs round about the Land, reclaiming the People unto the Service of God, and appointing Judges throughout all the ſtrong Cities of Juda, City by City. This had been a needleſs labour, if the Religion taught and ſtrongly maintained by Aſa, and by himſelf, had not ſuffered alteration, and the courſe of Juſtice been perverted, by the power of ſuch as had born authority. But the neceſſity that then was of reformation, appears by the charge which the King did give by his Judges; and by his commiſſion given to one of the Prieſts in ſpiritual cauſes, and to the Steward of his houſe in temporal Matters, to be general Over-ſeers.

2 Chr. 19. v. 4, 5. &c.

This was not till after the death of Ahaziah the ſon of Ahab; but how long after it is uncertain. For Jehoram the brother of Ahazia began his reign (as hath been already noted) in the eighteenth of Jehoſaphat, which was then accounted the ſecond of Jehoram, Jehoſaphat's ſon, though afterward this Jehoram of Juda had another firſt and ſecond year, even in his Fathers time, before he reigned alone, as the beſt Chronologers and Expoſitors of the holy Text agree. So he continued in private eſtate, until the two and twentieth of his Fathers reign, at which time, though the occaſions inducing his reſtitution to former dignity are not ſet down, yet we may not think, that motives thereto, appearing ſubſtantial, were wanting. Jehoram of Iſrael held the ſame correſpondency with Jehoſaphat, that his Father had done; and made uſe of it. He drew the Judæans into the war of Moab, at which time it might well be, that the young Prince of Juda was again ordained King by his Father, as in the Syrian expedition he had been. Or if we ought rather to think, that the preparations for the enterprize againſt Moab did not occupy ſo much time, as from the eighteenth of Jehoſaphat, in which year that Nation rebelled againſt Iſrael, unto his two and twentieth; yet, the daily negotiations between the two Kings of Juda and Iſrael, and the affinity between them contracted in the perſon of Jehoram, might offer ſome good occaſions thereunto. Neither is it certain how the behaviour of the younger ſons, in their elder brothers diſgrace, might cauſe their Father to put him in poſſeſſion for fear of tumult after his death; or the deep diſſimulation of Jehoram himſelf might win the good opinion both of his Father and Brethren; it being a thing uſual in miſchievous fell natures, to be as abject and ſervile in time of adverſity, as inſolent and bloody upon advantage. This is manifeſt, that being repoſſeſſed of his former eſtate, he demeaned himſelf in ſuch wiſe toward his Brethren, as cauſed their Father to enable them, not only with ſtore of ſilver and gold, and of precious things, (which kind of liberality other Kings doubtleſs had uſed unto their younger ſons) but with the cuſtody of ſtrong Cities in Juda, to aſſure them, if it might have been, by unwonted means, againſt unwonted perils.

1 Chro. 21. 3.

SECT. III.

The doings of Jehoram, when he reigned alone; and the rebellion of Edom and Libna.

BUt all this providence availed nothing; for an higher Providence had otherwiſe determined of the ſequel. When once the good old Man, their Father, was dead, the younger ſons of Jehoſaphat found ſtrong Cities, a weak defence, againſt the power of him unto whom the Cities were obedient. If they came in upon the ſummons of a King their Brother, then had he them without any more adoe; if they ſtood upon their guard, then were they Traytors, and ſo unable to hold out againſt him, who beſides his own power, was able to bring the forces of the Iſraelitiſh Kingdom againſt them; ſo that the apparent likelihood of their final overthrow, ſufficed to make all forſake them in the very beginning. Howſoever it was, they were all taken and ſlain, and with them for company many great Men of the Land, ſuch belike as either had taken their part, when the Tyrant ſought their lives, or had been appointed Rulers of the Country, when Jehoram was depoſed from his Government; in which office they, without forbearing to do juſtice, could hardly avoid the doing of many things derogatory to their young Maſter; which if he would now call Treaſon, ſaying that he was then King, who durſt ſay the contrary?

After this Jehoram took upon him, as being now Lord alone to make invaſions in Religion, wherein he was not contented, as other Idolatrous Princes, to give way and ſafe conduct unto Superſtition and Idolatry, and to provoke and encourage the People to that ſin, whereto it is wonderful that they were ſo much addicted, having ſuch knowledg of God, and of his deteſting that above all other ſins; but he uſed compulſion, and was (if not the very firſt) the firſt that is regiſtred, to have ſet up Irreligion by force.

Whilſt he was thus buſied at home, in doing what he liſted, the Edomites his Tributaries rebelled againſt him abroad; and having hitherto ſince David's time, been Governed by a Vice-Roy, did now make unto themſelves a King. Againſt theſe Jehoram in perſon made an expedition, taking along with him his Princes, and all his Chariots; with which he obtained victory in the field, compelling the Rebels to flie into into their places of advantage, whereof he forced no one, but went away contented with the honour that he had gotten in beating and killing some of those whom he should have subdued, and kept his servants. Now began the Prophecie of Isaac to take effect, wherein he foretold, that Esau in process of time should break the yoke of Jacob. For after this the Edomites could never be reclaimed by any of the Kings of Juda, but held their own so well, that when, after many civil and forreign Wars, the Jews by sundry Nations had been brought low; Antipater the Edomite, with Herod his son, and others of that race following them, became Lords of the Jews, in the decrepit age of Israel, and reigned as Kings, even in Jerusalem it self.

The freedom of the Edomites, though purchased somewhat dearly, encouraged Libna, a great City within Juda, which in the time of Joshua had a peculiar King, to rebel against Jehoram, and set it self in liberty. Libna stood in the confines of Benjamin and of Dan, far from the assistance of any bordering Enemies of Juda, and therefore so unlikely it was to have maintained it self in liberty, that it may seem strange how it could escape from utter destruction, or at the least from some terrible vengeance, most likely to have been taken, by their powerful, cruel, and throughly incensed Lord. The Israelite held such good intelligence at that time with Juda, that he would not have accepted the Town, had it offered it self unto him: Neither do we read that it sought how to cast it self into a new subjection, but continued a free State. The rebellion of it against Jehoram, was, Because he had forsaken the Lord God of his Fathers; which I take to have not only been the first and remote cause, but even the next and immediate reason moving the Inhabitants to do as they did: for it was a Town of the Levites; who must needs be driven into great extremities, when a religion, contrary to Gods Law, had not only some allowance to countenance it by the King, but compulsive authority to force unto it all that were unwilling. As for the use of the Temple at Jerusalem (which, being devout Men, they might fear to lose by this rebellion) it was never denied to those of the ten revolted Tribes by any of the Religious Kings, who rather invited the Israelites thither, and gave them kind entertainment: under Idolaters they must have been without it, whether they lived free, or in subjection. Yet it seems that private reasons were not wanting, which might move them rather to do than suffer that which was unwarrantable. For in the general Visitation before remembred, wherein Jehoshaphat reformed his Kingdom, the good old King appointing new Governors, and giving them especial charge to do Justice without respect of persons, used these words; The Levites shall be Officers before you; Be of good courage, and do it, and the Lord shall be with the good. By these phrases, it seems, that he encouraged them against the more powerful, than just proceedings of his Son; whom if the Levites did (according to the trust imposed in them) neglect in discharging their duties, likely it is that he meant to be even with them, and make them now to feel, as many Princes of the Land had done, his heavy indignation. How it happened that Libna was not hereupon destroyed, yea, that it was not (for ought that we can read) so much as besieged or molested, may justly seem very strange. And the more strange it is in regard of the mighty Armies which Jehosaphat was able to raise, being sufficient to have over-whelmed any one Town, and buried it under the earth, which they might well in one Month have cast into it with shovels, by ordinary approaches.

1 Chro. 21. 10.

But it seems that of those great numbers which his Father would have Levied, there were not many which Jehoram could well trust; and therefore perhaps he thought it an easier loss, to let one Town go, than to put Weapons into their hands, who were more likely to follow the example of Libna, than to punish it. So desperate is the condition of Tyrants, who thinking it a greater happiness to be feared than to be loved, are fain themselves to stand in fear of those by whom they might have been dreadful unto others.

SECT. IV.

Of the miseries falling upon Jehoram, and of his death.

THese afflictions not sufficing to make any impression of Gods displeasure in the mind of the wicked Prince; a Prophetie in writing was delivered to him, which threatned both his People, his Children, his Wives, and his own Body. Hereby likewise it appears that he was a cruel Persecutor of Gods Servants; in as much as the Prophets durst not reprove him to his face, as they had done many of his Predecessors, both good and evil Kings; but were fain to denounce Gods Judgments against him by Letters, keeping themselves close and far from him. This Epistle is said to have been sent unto him from Elias the Prophet. But Elias was translated, and Elizeus Prophesied in his stead before this time, even in the days of Jehosaphat. Wherefore it may be that Elias left this Prophesie in writing behind him, or that (as some conjecture) the error of one letter in writing, was the occasion that we read Elias for Elizeus. Indeed any thing may rather be believed, than the Tradition held by some of the Jewish Rabbins, that Elias from Heaven did send this Epistle; a tale somewhat like to the fable of our Ladys letters, devised by Erasmus, or of the Verse that was sent from Heaven to St. Giles.

2 King. 1. & 3. 11. 2 Chron. 22. 12.

But whosoever was the Author of this threatning Epistle, the accomplishment of the Prophetie was as terrible as the Sentence. For the Philistims and Arabians brake into Judæa, and took the Kings House, wherein they found all, or many of his Children, and Wives, all which they slew, or carried away, with great part of his Goods. These Philistims had not presumed since the time of David, to make an offensive War till now; for they were by him almost consumed, and had lost the best of their Towns, maintaining themselves in the rest of their small Territories, by defensive arms, to which they were constrained at Gibbethon by the Israelites. The Arabians were likely to have been then, as they are now, a naked People, all Horsemen, and ill appointed; their Country affording no other furniture, than such as might make them fitter to rob and spoil in the open fields, than to offend strong Cities, such as were thick set in Juda. True it is, that in Ages long after following, they conquered all the South parts of the World then known, in a very short space of time, destroying some, and building other some very stately Citys. But it must be considered, that this was when they had learned of the Romans the Art of War; and that the Provisions which they found, together with the Arts which they learned, in one subdued Province, did make them able and skilful in pursuing their conquest, and going on into Regions far removed from them. At this day having lost in effect all that they had gotten, such of them as live in Arabia it self are good Horsmen, but ill appointed; very dangerous to passengers, but unable to deal with good Souldiers, as riding ſtark naked, and rather truſting in the ſwiftneſs of their Horſes than in any other means of reſiſtance, where they are well oppoſed. And ſuch, or little better, may they ſeem to have been, that ſpoiled Judæa in the time of Jehoram. For their Country was always barren and deſart, wanting manual Arts whereby to ſupply the naturals with furniture: neither are theſe bands named as chief in that action, but rather adherents of the Philiſtims. Out of this we may infer, that one half, yea, or one quarter of the numbers found in the leaſt muſter of Juda and Benjamin under Jehoſhaphat (wherein were inrolled three hundred and eighty thouſand fighting Men) had been enough to have driven away far greater Forces than theſe Enemies are likely to have brought into the field, had not the People been unable to deal with them, for lack of Weapons, which were now kept from them by their Princes jealouſie, as in Saul's time by the policy of the Philiſtims.

It may ſeem that the houſe of the King which theſe Invaders took, was not his Palace in Jeruſalem, but rather ſome other houſe of his abroad in the Country, where his Wives and Children at that time lay for their recreation: becauſe we read not that they did ſack the City, or ſpoil the Temple, which would have invited them as a more commodious booty, had they got poſſeſſion thereof. Yet perhaps they took Jeruſalem it ſelf by ſurprize, the People being diſarmed, and the Kings guard too weak to keep them out; yet had not the courage to hold it, becauſe it was ſo large and populous: and therefore having done what ſpoil they could, withdrew themſelves with ſuch purchaſe as they were able ſafely to conveigh away.

The ſlaughter committed by Jehu on the two and forty brethren of Ahaziah, or (as they are called elſewhere) ſo many of his brothers ſons, and the cruel maſſacre wherein all the Royal Seed periſhed (only Joas excepted) under the tyranny of Athalia, following within two years after this Invaſion of the Philiſtims and Arabians, make it ſeem probable, that the Sons of Jehoram were not all ſlain at once, but that rather the firſt murther began in his own time, and was ſeconded by many other heavy blows, wherewith this houſe was inceſſantly ſtriken, until it was in a manner quite hewed down.

After theſe calamities, the hand of God was extended againſt the body of this wicked King, ſmiting him with a grievous diſeaſe in his bowels, which left him not until his guts fell out, and his wretched ſoul departed from his miſerable Carkaſs. The People of the Land, as they had ſmall cauſe of comfort in his life, ſo had they not the good manners to pretend ſorrow for his death; wherefore he was denied a place of Burial among his Anceſtors the Kings of Juda, though his own Son ſucceeded him in the Kingdom, who was guided by the ſame ſpirits that had been his Fathers evil Angels. Athalia had other matters to trouble her head, than the pompous interring of a dead Husband. She was thinking how to provide for the future, to maintain her own greatneſs, to retain her Favourites in their Authority, and to place about her Son ſuch Counſellours of the houſe of Ahab, as were fitteſt for her turn. Wherefore ſhe thought it unſeaſonable to make ſuch a-doe about a thing of nothing, and offend the Peoples eyes, with a ſtately Funeral of a Man by them deteſted: But rather choſe to let the blame of things paſſed, be laid on the Dead, than to procure an ill opinion of her ſelf and hers, which it now did concern her to avoid. Such is the quality of wicked Inſtigators, having made greedy uſe of bad imployments, to charge, not only with his own Vices, but with their faults alſo, the Man whoſe evil inclinations their ſiniſter counſels have made worſe, when once he is gone, and can profit them no longer. The death of Jehoram fell out indeed in a buſie time; when his friend and couſin the Iſraelites who had the ſame name, was entangled in a difficult War againſt the Aramite; and therefore could have no better leaſure to help Athalia, in ſetting of things according to her own mind, than he had (perhaps through the ſame hindrance) to help her Husband, when he was diſtreſſed by the Philiſtims; Yea, rather he needed and craved the aſſiſtance of the Men of Judah, for the taking in of Ramoth Gilead, where they had not ſped ſo well the laſt time, that they ſhould willingly run thither again, unleſs they were very fairly intreated.

2 Chron. 24. 4.

The acts of this wicked Man, I have thought good to handle the more particularly (purſuing the examination of all occurrences, as far as the circumſtances remembred in holy Scripture would guide me by their directions) to the end that it might more plainly appear, how the currupted affections of Men, impugning the revealed Will of God, accompliſh nevertheleſs his hidden purpoſe, and without miraculous means, confound themſelves in the ſeeming-wiſe devices of their own folly: as likewiſe to the end that all Men might learn to ſubmit their judgments to the Ordinance of God, rather than to think, that they may ſafely diſpenſe with his Commandments, and follow the prudent conceits which worldly Wiſdom dictateth unto them. For in ſuch kind of unhappy ſubtilties, it is manifeſt that Athalia was able to furniſh both her Husband and her Son; but the iſſue of them partly hath appeared already, and partly will appear, in that which immediately followeth.

SECT. V.

Of the reign of Ahaziah, and his buſineſs with the King of Iſrael.

OChazias, or Ahazia, the ſon of Jehoram and Athalia, began his reign over Juda, in the twelfth year of Jehoram the ſon of Ahab King of Iſrael, and reigned but one year. Touching his age, it is a point of much more difficulty than importance to know it: yet hath it bred much diſputation, whereof I ſee no more probable concluſion than that of Torniellus, alledging the Edition of the Septuagint at Rome, Anno Domini 1588 which ſaith that he was twenty years old in the beginning of his Kingdom; and the Annotations thereupon, which cite other Copies, that do give him two years more. Like enough he is to have been young: for he was governed by his Mother, and her Miniſters, who gave him counſel, by which he periſhed. In matter of Religion, he altered none of his Fathers courſes. In matter of State he likewiſe upheld the league made with the houſe of Ahab. He was much buſied in doing little, and that with ill ſucceſs. He accompanied his couſin the Iſraelite againſt Ramoth Gilead, which they wan, but not without blows: for the Aramites fought ſo well, that the King of Iſrael was fain to adventure his own perſon, which eſcaped not unwounded.

The Town being won, was manned ſtrongly, in expectation of ſome attempt likely to be made by Hazael King of Aram: which done, Jehoram King of Iſrael withdrew himſelf to the City of Jezrael, where with more quiet he might attend the curing of his Wounds; and Ahazia returned to Jeruſalem. It ſeems that he was but newly come home (for he reigned in all ſcantly one year) whereof the former expedition tion, with the preparations for it, had taken up a great part) when he did make a new journey, as it were for good manners ſake, to viſit the King of Iſrael, who lay ſore of his wounds. Belike Athalia was brewing ſome new plots, which his preſence would have hindred, and therefore ſought every occaſion to thruſt him abroad: for otherwiſe it was but a vain piece of work ſo to leave his kingdom, having no other buſineſs than by way of complement to go ſee one whom he had ſeen yeſterday. Certain it is, that the Lord had reſolved at this time to put in execution that heavy judgment, which he had laid by the mouth of Elias the Prophet upon the houſe of Ahab. And hereupon at this time had he diſpoſed not only the concurrence of all other things, which in mans eyes might ſeem to have been accidental, but the very thoughts and affections of ſuch perſons, as intended nothing leſs than the fulfilling of his high pleaſure. Of theſe Athalia doubtleſs was one; whoſe miſchievous purpoſes it will ſhortly be needful, for explanation of ſome difficulties ariſing, that we diligently conſider and examine.

SECT. VI.

How Ahazia periſhed with the houſe of Ahab: and how that Family was deſtroyed by Jehu.

THe whole Army of Iſrael, with all the principal Captains, lying in Ramoth Gilead, a Diſciple of Elizeus the Prophet came in among the Captains that were ſitting together; who calling out among them Jehu, a principal man, took him apart, and anointed him King over Iſrael, rehearſing unto him the Prophecy of Elias againſt the houſe of Ahab, and letting him underſtand that it was the pleaſure of God to make him executioner of that ſentence. The faſhion of the Meſſenger was ſuch as bred in the Captains a deſire to know the errand, which Jehu thought meet to let them know, as doubting whether they had overheard all the talk or no. When he had acquainted them with the whole matter, they made no delay, but forthwith proclaimed him King. For the Prophecy of Elias was well known among them, neither durſt any one oppoſe himſelf againſt him, that was by God ordained to perform it.

Jehu, who had upon the ſudden this great honour thrown upon him, was not ſlow to put himſelf in poſſeſſion of it, but uſed the firſt heat of their affections, who joyned with him, in ſetting on foot the buſineſs which nearly concerned him, and was not to be fore-ſlowed, being no more his own than Gods.

The firſt care was that no news of the revolt might be carried to Jezreel, whereby the King might have had warning either to fight or flee: this being foreſeen, he marched ſwiftly away, to take the Court while it was yet ſecure. King Jehoram was now ſo well recovered of his Wounds, that he could endure to ride abroad, for which cauſe it ſeems that there was much feaſting, and joy made, eſpecially by Queen Jezabel, who kept her ſtate ſo well, that the brethren of Ahazia coming thither at this time, did make it as well their errand to ſalute the Queen, as to viſit the King.

Certain it is, that ſince the rebellion of Moab againſt Iſrael, the houſe of Ahab did never ſo much flouriſh as at this time. Seventy Princes of the bloud Royal there were that lived in Samaria; Jehoram the ſon of Queen Jezabel had won Ramoth Gilead, which his Father had attempted in vain, with loſs of his life; and he won it by valiant fight, wherein he received wounds, of which the danger was now paſt, but the honour likely to continue. The amity was ſo great between Iſrael and Juda, that it might ſuffice to daunt all their common enemies, leaving no hope of ſucceſs to any rebellious enterprizer: ſo that now the prophecy of Elias might be forgotten, or no otherwiſe remembred, than as an unlikely tale by them that beheld the majeſtical face of the Court, wherein ſo great a friend as the King of Juda was entertained, and forty Princes of his blood expected.

In the middeſt of this ſecurity, whileſt theſe great Eſtates were (perhaps) either conſulting about proſecution of their intents, firſt againſt the Aramites, and then againſt Moab, Edom, and other rebels and enemies: or elſe were triumphing in joy of that which was already atchieved, and the Queen-mother dreſſing her ſelf in the braveſt manner to come down amongſt them; tidings were brought in, that the watchman had from a Tower diſcovered a company coming. Theſe news were not very troubleſome: for the Army that lay in Ramoth Gilead, to be ready againſt all attempts of the Aramites, was likely enough to be diſcharged upon ſome notice taken that the enemy would not, or could not ſtir. Only the King ſent out an Horſe-man to know what the matter was, and to bring him word. The meſſenger coming to Jehu, and asking whether all were well, was retained by him, who intended to give the King as little warning as might be. The ſeeming negligence of this fellow in not returning with an anſwer, might argue the matter to be of ſmall importance: yet the King to be ſatisfied, ſent out another that ſhould bring him word how all went; and he was likewiſe detained by Jehu. Theſe dumb ſhews bred ſome ſuſpicion in Jehoram, whom the Watchman certified of all that happened. And now the company drew ſo near, that they might, though not perfectly, be diſcerned, and notice taken of Jehu himſelf by the furious manner of his marching. Wherefore the King that was loth to diſcover any weakneſs, cauſed his Chariot to be made ready, and iſſued forth with Ahazia King of Juda in his company, whoſe preſence added majeſty to his train; when ſtrength to reſiſt, or expedition to flee, had been more needful. This could not be done ſo haſtily, but that Jehu was come even to the towns end, and there they met each other in the field of Naboth. Jehoram began to ſalute Jehu with terms of peace, but receiving a bitter anſwer, his heart failed him, ſo that crying out upon the treaſon to his fellow King, he turned away to have fled. But Jehu ſoon overtook him with an arrow, wherewith he ſtruck him dead, and threw his carkaſs into that field, which, purchaſed with the bloud of the rightful owner, was to be watered with the bloud of the unjuſt poſſeſſor. Neither did Ahazia eſcape ſo well, but that he was arreſted by a Wound, which held him till death did ſeize upon him.

The Kings Palace was joyning to the wall, by the gate of the City, where Jezabel might ſoon be advertiſed of this calamity, if ſhe did not with her own eyes behold it. Now it was high time for her to call to God for mercy, whoſe judgment, pronounced againſt her long before, had overtaken her, when ſhe leaſt expected it. But ſhe, full of indignation and proud thoughts, made her ſelf ready in all haſte, and painted her face, hoping with her ſtately and imperious looks to daunt the Traitor, or at leaſt to utter ſome Apothegme that ſhould expreſs her brave ſpirit, and brand him with ſuch a reproach as might make him odious for ever. Little did ſhe think upon the hungry dogs that were ordained to devour her, whoſe paunches the ſtibium, with which ſhe be beſmeared her eyes, would more offend, than the ſcolding language wherewith ſhe armed her tongue could trouble the ears of him that had her in his power. As Jehu drew near, ſhe opened her window, and looking out upon him, began to put him in mind of Zimri, that had not long enjoyed the fruits of his treaſon, and murther of the King his Maſter. This was in meer humane valuation ſtoutly ſpoken, but was indeed a part of miſerable folly; as are all things, howſoever laudable, if they have an ill relation to God the Lord of all. Her own Eunuchs that ſtood by and heard her, were not affected ſo much as with any compaſſion of her fortune; much leſs was her enemy daunted with her proud ſpirit. When Jehu ſaw that ſhe did uſe the little remainder of her life in ſeeking to vex him, he made her preſently to underſtand her own eſtate, by deeds and not by words. He only called to her ſervants to know which of them would be on his ſide, and ſoon found them ready to offer their ſervice before the very face of their proud Lady. Hereupon he commanded them to caſt her down head-long: which immediately they performed, without all regard of her greatneſs and eſtate, wherein ſhe had a few hours before ſhined ſo glorioufly in the eyes of men; of men that conſidered not the judgments of God that had been denounced againſt her.

So periſhed this accurſed woman by the rude hands of her own ſervants, at the commandment of her greateſt enemy, that was yeſterday her ſubject, but now her Lord: and ſhe periſhed miſerably, ſtrugling in vain with baſe grooms, who contumeliouſly did hale and thruſt her, whileſt her inſulting enemy ſate on horſe-back, adding indignity to her grief by ſcornful beholding the ſhameful manner of her fall, and trampling her body under foot. Her dead carkaſs that was left without the Walls, was devoured by dogs, and her very memory was odious. Thus the vengeance of God rewarded her Idolatry, murther, and oppreſſion, with ſlow, but ſure payment, and full intereſt.

Ahazia King of Juda fleeing a-pace from Jehu, was overtaken by the way where he lurked; and receiving his deadly Wound in the Kingdom of Samaria, was ſuffered to get him gone (which he did in all haſte) and ſeek his burial in his own Kingdom: and this favour he obtained for his Grandfathers ſake, not for his Fathers nor his own. He died at Megiddo, and was thence carried to Jeruſalem, where he was enterred with his Anceſtors, having reigned about one year.

CHAP. XXI.

Of Athalia; and whoſe ſon he was that ſucceeded her.

SECT. I.

Of Athalia's uſurping the Kingdom, and what pretences ſhe might forge.

2 Chron. 22. 9. AFter the death of Ahazia, it is ſaid that his houſe was not able to retain the Kingdom: which Note, and the proceedings of Athalia upon the death of her ſon, have given occaſion to divers opinions concerning the Pedigree of Joas, who reigned ſhortly after. For Athalia being thus diſpoiled of her ſon, under whoſe name ſhe had ruled at her pleaſure, did forthwith lay hold upon all the Princes of the bloud, and ſlew them, that ſo ſhe might occupy the Royal Throne her ſelf, and reign as Queen, rather than live a Subject. She had before-hand put into great place, and made Counſellors unto her ſon, ſuch as were fitteſt for her purpoſe, and ready at all times to execute her will: that ſhe kept a ſtrong guard about her, it is very likely; and as likely it is that the great execution done by Jehoram, upon the Princes, and many of the Nobility, had made the people tame, and fearful to ſtir, whatſoever they ſaw or heard.

Yet ambition, how violent ſoever it be, is ſeldom or never ſo ſhameleſs as to refuſe the commodity of goodly pretences offering themſelves; but rather ſcrapes together all that will any way ſerve to colour her proceedings. Wherefore it were not abſurd for us to think, that Athalia, when ſhe ſaw the Princes of the Royal bloud, all of them in a manner, ſlain by her husband, and afterwards his own children deſtroyed by the Philiſtims, began even to play her own game, reducing by artificial practice, into fair likelihoods, thoſe poſſibilities wherewith her husbands bad fortune had preſented her. Not without great ſhew of reaſon, either by her own mouth, or by ſome truſty creature of hers might ſhe give him to underſtand, how needful it were to take the beſt order whilſt as yet he might, for fear of the worſt that might happen. If the iſſue of David, which now remained only in his family, ſhould by any accident fail (as woful experience had already ſhewed what might after come to paſs) the people of Juda were not unlikely to chooſe a King of ſome new ſtock, a popular ſeditious man peradventure, one that to countenance his own unworthineſs, would not care what aſperſions he laid upon that Royal houſe, which was fallen down. And who could aſſure him, that ſome ambitious ſpirit, foreſeeing what might be gotten thereby, did not already contrive the deſtruction of him, and all his ſeed? Wherefore it were the wiſeſt way to deſign by his authority, not only his ſucceſſor, but alſo the reverſioner, and ſo to provide, that the Crown might never be ſubject to any rifling, but remain in the diſpoſition of them that loved him beſt, if the worſt that might be feared comming to paſs, his own poſterity could not retain it.

Such perſwaſions being urged, and earneſtly followed, by the importunate ſollicitation of her that governed his affections, were able to make the jealous Tyrant think, that the only way to fruſtrate all devices of ſuch as gaped after a change, was to make her heir, the laſt and youngeſt of his houſe, whom it moſt concerned, as being the Queen Mother, to uphold the firſt and eldeſt.

If Athalia took no ſuch courſe as this in her husbands time, yet might ſhe do it in her ſons. For Ahazia (beſides that he was wholly ruled by his mother) was not like to take much care for the ſecurity of his half-brethren, thren, or their children; as accounting his Fathers other wives, in respect of his own-born-mother, little better than Concubines, and their children basely begotten. But if this mischievous woman forgat her self so far in her wicked policy, that she lost all opportunity which the weakness of her husband and son did afford, of procuring unto her self some seeming Title; yet could she afterwards feign some such matter, as boldly she might: being sure that none would ask to see her evidence, for fear of being sent to learn the certainty of her son or husband in another World. But I rather think that she took order for her affairs before-hand. For though she had no reason to suspect or fear the sudden death of her son, yet it was the wisest way to provide betimes against all that might happen, whilest her husbands issue by other women was young and unable to resist. We plainly find that the Brethren or Nephews of Ahazia, to the number of two and forty, were sent to the Court of Israel, only to salute the children of the King, and the children of the Queen. The slender occasion of which long journey, considered together with the quality of these persons (being in effect all the stock of Jehoram that could be grown to any strength) makes it very suspicious, that their entertainment in Jezabels house would only have been more formal, but little differing in substance, from that which they found at the hand of Jehu. He that looks into the courses held both before and after by these two Queens, will find cause enough to think no less. Of such as have aspired unto Lordships not belonging to them, and thrust out the right Heirs by pretence of Testaments, that had no other validity than the sword of such as claimed by them could give, Histories of late, yea of many Ages, afford plentiful examples: and the rule of Solomon is true: Is there any thing whereof one may say, Behold, this is new? It hath been already in the old time that was before us. That a King might shed his brothers blood, was proved by Solomon upon Adonija; that he might alien the Crown from his natural Heirs, David had given proof; but these had good ground of their doings. They which follow examples that please them, will neglect the reasons of those examples, if they please them not, and rest contented with the practice, as more willing by shewing what they may do, than acknowledging why Solomon slew his brother that had begun one rebellion, and was entring into another. Jehoram slew all his brethren, which were better than he: David purchased the Kingdom, and might the more freely dispose of it, yet he disposed of it as the Lord appointed: if Jehoram, who had lost much and gotten nothing, thought that he might alien the remainder at his pleasure, or if Ahazia sought to cut off the succession of his brethren, or of their issue; either of these was to be answered with the words which Jehojada the Priest used afterwards, in declaring the title of Joash: Behold, the Kings son must reign; as the Lord hath said of the son of David. Wherefore though I hold it very probable, that Athalia did pretend some title, whatsoever it might be, to the Crown of Juda; yet it is most certain that she had thereunto no right at all, but only got it by treachery, murder, and open violence, and so she held it six whole years, and a part of the seventh, in good seeming security.

2 Chro. 21. 13.

SECT. II.

How Jehu spent his time in Israel, so that he could not molest Athalia.

IN all this time Jehu did never go about to disturb her; which in reason he was likely to desire, being an enemy to her whole House. But he was occupied at the first in establishing himself, rooting out the posterity of Ahab, and reforming somewhat in Religion: afterwards in wars against the Aramites, wherein he was so far overcharged, that hardly he could retain his own, much less attempt upon others. Of the line of Ahab there were seventy living in Samaria, out of which number Jehu by letter advised the Citizens to set up some one as King, and to prepare themselves to fight in his defence. Hereby might they gather how confident he was; which they well understood to proceed from greater power about him, than they could gather to resist him. Wherefore they took example by the two Kings whom he had slain, and being exceedingly afraid of him, they offered him their service; wherein they so readily shewed themselves obedient, that in less than one days warning, they sent him the heads of all those Princes, as they were enjoyned by a second letter from him. After this he surprized all the Priests of Baal by a subtilty, feigning a great sacrifice to their god, by which means he drew them all together into one Temple, where he slew them: and in the same zeal to God utterly demolished all the monuments of that impiety.

Concerning the Idolatry devised by Jeroboam, no King of Israel had ever greater reason than Jehu to destroy it. For he needed not to fear lest the people should be allured unto the house of David; it was (in appearance) quite rooted up, and the Crown of Juda in the possession of a cruel Tyranness: he had received his kingdom by the unexpected grace of God; and further in regard of his zeal expressed in destroying Baal out of Israel, he was promised notwithstanding his following the sin of Jeroboam, that the kingdom should remain in his Family to the fourth Generation. But all this would not serve; he would needs help to piece out Gods providence with his own circumspection; doing therein like a foolish greedy gamester, who by stealing a needless Card to assure himself of winning a stake, forfeits his whole test. He had questionless displeased many, by that which he did against Baal; and many more he should offend by taking from them the use of superstition, so long practised as was that Idolatry of Jeroboam. Yet all these, how many soever they were, had never once thought upon making him King, if God, whom (to retain them) he now forsook, had not given him the Crown, when more difficulties appeared in the way of getting it, that could at any time after be found in the means of holding it.

This ingratitude of Jehu drew terrible vengeance of God upon Israel, whereof Hazael King of Damascus was the executioner. The cruelty of this barbarous Prince we may find in the Prophecy of Elizeus, who fore-told it, saying: Their strong Cities shalt thou set on fire; and their young men shalt thou slay with the sword, and shalt dash their Infants against the stones, and rend in pieces their women with child. So did not only the wickedness of Ahab cause the ruine of his whole house, but the obstinate Idolatry of the people bring a lamentable misery upon all the Land. For the fury of Hazaels victory was not quenched with the destruction of a few towns, nor wearied with one invasion;

but he ſmote them in all the coaſt of Iſrael, and waſted
2 King. 10. 32. all the Country beyond the River of Jordan. Notwithſtanding all theſe calamities, it ſeems that the people repented not of their Idolatry (For in thoſe days the Lord began to loath Iſrael;) but rather it is likely, that they bemoaned the noble houſe of Ahab, under which they had beaten thoſe enemies to whom they were now a prey, and had bravely fought for the conqueſt of Syria, where they had enlarged their border, by winning Ramoth Gilead, and compelled Benhadad to reſtore the Cities which his Father had won: whereas now they were fain to make woful ſhifts, living under a Lord that had better fortune and courage in murdering his maſter that had put him in truſt, than in defending his people from their cruel enemies. Thus it commonly falls out, that they who can find all manner of difficulties in ſerving him, to whom nothing is difficult, are, in ſtead of the eaſe and the pleaſure to themſelves propounded by contrary courſes, overwhelmed with the troubles which they ſought to avoid; and therein by God, whom they firſt forſook, forſaken, and left unto the wretched labours of their own blind wiſdom, wherein they had repoſed all their confidence.

SECT. III.

Of Athaliah's Government.

THeſe calamities falling upon Iſrael, kept Athalia ſafe on that ſide, giving her leiſure to look to things at home: as having little to do abroad, unleſs it were ſo that ſhe held ſome correſpondency with Hazael, pretending therein to imitate her Husbands Grand-father King Aſa, who had done the like. And ſome probability that ſhe did ſo, may be gathered out of that which is recorded of her doings. For 2 Chro. 24. 7. we find, that this wicked Athalia and her children brake up the houſe of God, and all things that were dedicate for the houſe of the Lord, did they beſtow upon Baalim. Such a ſacriledge, though it proceeded from a deſire to ſet out her own Idolatry, with ſuch pomp as might make it the more glorious in the peoples eyes, was not likely to want ſome fair pretext of neceſſity of the State ſo requiring? in which caſe others before her had made bold with that holy place, and her next ſucceſſour was fain to do the like, being thereunto forced by Hazael, who perhaps was delighted with the taſte of that which was formerly thence extracted for his ſake.

Under this impious government of Athalia, the devotion of the Prieſts and Levites was very notable, and ſerved (no doubt) very much to retain the people in the Religion taught by God himſelf, howſoever the Queens proceedings advanced the contrary. For the poverty of that ſacred Tribe of Levi muſt needs have been exceeding great at this time, all their lands and poſſeſſions in the ten Tribes being utterly loſt, the oblations and other perquiſites, by which they lived, being now very few and ſmall; and the ſtore, laid up in better times under godly Kings, being all taken away by ſhameful robbery. Yet they up-held in all this miſery the ſervice of God, and the daily ſacrifice, keeping daily their courſes, and performing obedience to the high Prieſt, no leſs than in thoſe days wherein their entertainment was far better.

SECT. IV.

Of the preſervation of Joas.

JEhojada then occupied the high Prieſthood, an honourable, wiſe, and religious man. To his carefulneſs it may be aſcribed, that the ſtate of the Church was in ſome ſlender ſort up-held in thoſe unhappy times. His Wife was Jehoſhabeth, who was daughter of King Jehoram, and ſiſter to Ahazia, a godly Lady and vertuous, whoſe piety makes it ſeem that Athalia was not her Mother, though her acceſs to the Court argues the contrary: but her diſcreet carriage might more eaſily procure her welcome to her own Fathers houſe, than the education under ſuch a Mother could have permitted her to be ſuch as ſhe was. By her care Joaſh the young Prince that reigned ſoon after, was conveyed out of the nurſery, when Athalia deſtroyed all the Kings children, and was carried ſecretly into the Temple, where as ſecretly he was brought up. How it came to paſs that this young child was not hunted out, when his body was miſſing; nor any great reckoning (for ought that we find) made of his eſcape, I will not ſtand to examine: for it was not good in policy, that the people ſhould hear ſay, that one of the children had avoided that cruel blow; it might have made them hearken after innovations, and ſo be the leſs conformable to their preſent government. So Joaſh was delivered out of that ſlaughter, he and his nurſe being gone no man could tell whither, and might be thought peradventure to be caſt away, as having no other guard than a poor Woman that gave him ſuck, who fooliſhly doubting that ſhe her ſelf ſhould have been ſlain, was fled away with him into ſome deſolate place, where it was like enough that ſhe and he ſhould periſh. In ſuch caſes flatterers, or men deſirous of reward, eaſily coyn ſuch tales, and rather ſwear them to be true in their own knowledge, than they will loſe the thanks due to their joyful tidings.

SECT. V.

Whoſe Son Joas was.

¶. I.

Whether Joas may be thought likely to have been the Son of Ahazia.

NOw concerning this Joaſh, whoſe ſon he was, it is a thing of much difficulty to affirm, and hath cauſed much controverſie among Writers. The places of Scripture, which call him the ſon of Ahazia, 2 King. 11. 2. & 2 Chr. 22. 11. ſeem plain enough. How any figure of the Hebrew language might give title of Son unto him, in regard that he was his Succeſſour, I neither by my ſelf can find, nor can by any help of Authors learn how to anſwer the difficulties appearing in the contrary opinions of them, that think him to have been, or not, the natural ſon of Ahaziah. For whereas it is ſaid, that the houſe of Ahazia was not able to retain the Kingdom; ſome do infer that this Joaſh was not properly called his ſon, but was the next of his kindred, and therefore ſucceeded him, as ſon in the inheritance of his Father. And hereunto the 2 Chro. 22. 9.

murder committed by Athalia, doth very well agree. For ſhe perceiving that the Kingdom was to fall into their hands, in whom ſhe had no intereſt, might eaſily find cauſe to fear, that the Tyranny exerciſed by her Husband at her inſtigation upon ſo many noble Houſes, would now be revenged upon her ſelf. The ruine of her Idolatrous Religion might in this caſe terrifie both her and her Minions; the ſentence of the Law rewarding that offence with death; and the Tragedy of Jezabel teaching her what might happen to another Queen. All this had little concerned her, if her own Grand-child had been heir to the Crown; for ſhe that had power enough to make her ſelf Queen, could with more eaſe, and leſs envy, have taken upon her the office of a Protector, by which authority ſhe might have done her pleaſure, and been the more both obeyed by others, and ſecure of her own Eſtate, as not wanting an Heir. Wherefore it was not needful, that ſhe ſhould be ſo unnatural, as to deſtroy the Child of her own Son, of whoſe life ſhe might have made greater uſe than ſhe could of his death: whereas indeed, the love of Grand-mothers to their Nephews, is little leſs than the Mothers to their children.

This argument is very ſtrong. For it may ſeem incredible, that all natural affection ſhould be caſt aſide, when as neither neceſſity urgeth, nor any commodity thereby gotten requireth it, yea, when all humane policy doth teach one the ſame, which nature without reaſon would have perſwaded.

§. II.

That Joas did not deſcend from Nathan.

But (as it is more eaſie to find a difficulty in that which is related, than to ſhew how it might have otherwiſe been) the pedigree of this Joaſh is, by them which think him not the ſon of Ahazia, ſet down in ſuch ſort, that it may very juſtly be ſuſpected. They ſay, that he deſcended from Nathan the ſon of David, and not from Solomon: to which purpoſe they bring a Hiſtory (I know not whence) of two Families of the race of David, ſaying, that the line of Solomon held the Kingdom with this condition, that if at any time it failed, the Family of Nathan ſhould ſucceed it. Concerning this Nathan the ſon of David, there are that would have him to be Nathan the Prophet, who, as they think, was by David adopted. And of this opinion was Origen, as alſo St. Auguſtine ſometimes was, but afterward he revoked it, as was meet; for this Nathan is reckoned among the ſons of David, by Bethſua the daughter of Ammes, and therefore could not be the Prophet. Gregory Nazianzen (as I find him cited by Peter Martyr) and after him Eraſmus, and Faber Stapulenſis, have likewiſe held the ſame of Joaſh, deriving him from Nathan. But Nathan and thoſe other brethren of Solomon by the ſame Mother, are thought, upon good likelihoods to have been the Children of Uriah the Hittite: and ſo are they accounted by ſundry of the Fathers, and by Lyra, and Abulenſis, who follow the Hebrew Expoſitors of that place in the firſt of Chronicles. The words of Solomon calling himſelf the only begotten of his Mother, do approve this Expoſition: For we read no more than two ſons which Bethſua or Bethſheba did bear unto David, whereof one begotten in Adultery, died an Infant, and Solomon only of her Children by the King did live. So that the reſt muſt needs have been the Children of Uriah, and are thought to have been Davids only by adoption. Wherefore if Joas had not been the ſon of Ahazia, then muſt that pedigree have been falſe, wherein S. Matthew deriveth him lineally from Solomon; yea, then had not our bleſſed Saviour iſſued from the loins of David, according to the fleſh, but had only been of his line by courteſie of the Nation, and form of Law, as any other might have been. As for the authority of Philo, which hath drawn many late Writers into the opinion that Joaſh was not of the poſterity of Solomon, it is enough to ſay, that this was Friar Annius his Philo: For no other Edition of Philo, hath any ſuch matter; but Annius can make Authors to ſpeak what he liſt.

1 Chron. 3. 5.

§. III.

That Joas may probably be thought to have been the ſon of Jehoram.

In ſo doubtful a caſe, if it ſeem lawful to hold an opinion that no man hath yet thought upon, methinks it were not amiſs to open at once, and peruſe together two places of Scripture, whereof the one telling the wickedneſs of Jehoram the ſon of Jehoſaphat King of Juda, for which he and his Children periſhed, rehearſeth it as one of Gods Mercies towards the houſe of David, that according to his promiſe he would give him a Light, and to his Children for ever: the other doth ſay, that for the offences of the ſame Jehoram, there was not a ſon left him, ſave Jehoahas the youngeſt of his Sons. Now if it were in regard of Gods promiſe to David, that after thoſe Maſſacres of Jehoram upon all his Brethren, and of the Philiſtims and Arabians upon the children of Jehoram, one of the ſeed of David eſcaped; why may it not be thought that he was ſaid to have eſcaped, in whom the line of David was preſerved? For had all the race of Solomon been rooted up in theſe woeful Tragedies, and the progeny of Nathan ſucceeded in place thereof; like enough it is that ſome remembrance more particular would have been extant, of an event ſo memorable. That the race of Nathan was not extinguiſhed, it is indeed apparent by the Genealogie of our Lord, as it is recounted by St. Luke: But the preſervation of the Houſe of David, mentioned in the Book of Kings and Chronicles, was performed in the perſon of Jehoahas, in whom the Royal branch of Solomon, the natural, and not only legal iſſue remaining of David was kept alive. Wherefore it may be thought that this Joaſh, who followed Athalia in the Kingdom, was the youngeſt ſon of Jehoram, whoſe life Athalia, as a Step-dame, was not likely to purſue. For it were not eaſily underſtood, why the preſervation of Davids line, by Gods eſpecial Mercy, in regard of his Promiſe made, ſhould pertain rather to that time, when beſides Ahazia himſelf, there were two and forty of his Brethren, or (as in another place they are called) ſons of his Brethren remaining alive, which afterwards were all ſlain by Jehu; than have reference to the lamentable deſtruction, and little leſs than extirpation of that Progeny, wherein one only did eſcape. Certainly that inhumane Murther which Jehoram committed upon his brethren, if it were (as appeareth in the Hiſtory) revenged upon his own children; then was not this vengeance of God accompliſhed by the Philiſtims and Arabians, but being only begun by them, was afterwards proſecuted by Jehu, and finally took effect by the hands of that ſame wicked Woman, at whoſe inſtigation he had committed ſuch barbarous outrage. And from this execution of Gods heavy judgment laid upon Jehoram and all his children, only Jehoahas his youngeſt ſon was exempted; whom therefore I ſhould affirm to be the ſame with Joas, which is called the ſon of Ahazia, I ſhould ſhould not want good probability. Some further appearance of neceſſity there is, which doth argue that it could no otherwiſe have been. For it was the youngeſt ſon of Jehoram, in whom the race was preſerved; which could not in any likelihood be Ahazia, ſeeing that he was twenty years old at the leaſt (as is already noted) when he began to reign, and conſequently, was born in the eighteenth or twentieth year of his Fathers age. Now I know not whether of the two is more unlikely, either that Jehoram ſhould have begotten many Children before he was eighteen years old, or that having (as he had) many Wives and Children, he ſhould upon the ſudden, at his eighteenth year, become unfruitful, and beget no more in twenty years following: each of which muſt had been true, if this were true that Ahazia was the ſame Jehoahas which was his youngeſt ſon. But this inconvenience is taken away, and thoſe other doubts ariſing from the cauſleſs cruelty of Athalia, in ſeeking the life of Joas are eaſily cleared, if Joas and Jehoahas were one. Neither doth his age withſtand this opinion; For he was ſeven years old when he began to reign; which if we underſtood of years compleat, he might have been a year old at the death of Jehoram, being begotten ſomewhat after the beginning of his ſickneſs. Neither is it more abſurd to ſay that he was the natural ſon of Jehoram, though called the ſon of Ahazia, than it were to ſay, as great Authors have done, this difficulty notwithſtanding, that he was of the Poſterity of Nathan. One thing indeed I know not how to anſwer; which, had it concurred with the reſt, might have ſerved as the foundation of this opinion. The name of Jehoahas, that ſoundeth much more near to Joas, than to Ahaziah, in an Engliſh ear, doth in the Hebrew (as I am informed by ſome, skilful in that language) through the diverſity of certain Letters, differ much from that which it moſt reſembleth in our Weſtern manner of writing, and little from the other. Now, although it be ſo that Ahazia himſelf be alſo called Azaria, and moſt have had three names, if he were the ſame with Jehoahas; in which manner Joas might alſo have had ſeveral names; yet, becauſe I find no other warrant hereof than a bare poſſibility, I will not preſume to build an opinion upon the weak foundation of mine own conjecture, but leave all to the conſideration of ſuch as have more ability to judg, and leiſure to conſider of this point.

§. IV.

Upon what reaſons Athalia might ſeek to deſtroy Joas, if he were her own Grand-child.

IF therefore we ſhall follow that which is commonly received, and interpret the Text according to the Letter, it may be ſaid, that Athalia was not only blinded by the paſſions of Ambition and Zeal to her Idolatrous worſhip of Baalam, but purſued the accompliſhment of ſome unnatural deſires, in ſeeking the deſtruction of her Grand-child, and the reſt of the Blood-Royal. For whether it were ſo that Athalia (as proud and cruel Wome are not always chaſt) had imitated the liberty of Jezabel her Siſter in Law, whoſe Whoredoms were upbraided by Jehu to her ſon; or whether ſhe had Children by ſome former Husband, before ſhe was married unto Jehoram (which is not unlikely, in regard of her age, who was daughter of Omri, and Siſter to Ahab) certain it is that ſhe had Sons of her own, and thoſe old enough to be employed, as they were, in robbing of the Temple. So it is not greatly to be wondred at, that to ſettle the Crown upon her own Children, ſhe did ſeek to cut off, by wicked policy, all other claims. As for Joas, if ſhe were his Grand-mother, yet ſhe might miſtruſt the intereſt which his Mother would have in him, leſt when he came to years, it might draw him from her devotion. And hereof (beſides that Women do commonly better love their Daughters Husbands, than their Sons Wives) there is ſome appearance in the reign of her Son; for ſhe made him ſpend all his time in idle journeys, to no other apparent end, than that ſhe might rule at home; and he living abroad be eſtranged from his Wife, and entertain ſome new fancies, wherein Jezabel had cunning enough to be his Tutoreſs. But when the ſword of Jehu had rudely cut in ſunder all theſe fine devices, then was Athalia fain to go roundly to work, and do as ſhe did, whereby ſhe thought to make all ſure. Otherwiſe, if (as I could rather think) ſhe were only Step-dame to Joas, we need not ſeek into the reaſons moving her to take away his life; her own hatred was cauſe enough to diſpatch him among the firſt.

2 Kings 9. 22.

SECT. VI.

A digreſſion, wherein is maintained the liberty of uſing conjecture in Hiſtories.

THus much concerning the Perſon of Joas, from whom, as from a new root, the Tree of David was propagated into many Branches. In handling of which Matter, the more I conſider the nature of this Hiſtory, and the diverſity between it and others, the leſs me-thinks I need to ſuſpect mine own preſumption, as deſerving blame, for curioſity in matter of doubt, or boldneſs in liberty of conjecture. For all Hiſtories do give us information of humane counſels and events, as far forth as the knowledg and faith of the Writers can afford; but of Gods Will, by which all things are ordered, they ſpeak only at random, and many times falſly. This we often find in prophane Writers, who aſcribe the ill ſucceſs of great undertakings, to the neglect of ſome impious Rites, whereof indeed God abhorred the performance as vehemently, as they thought him to be highly offended with the omiſſion. Hereat we may the leſs wonder, if we conſider the anſwer made by the Jews in Egypt unto Jeremy the Prophet, reprehending their Idolatry. For howſoever the written Law of God was known unto the People, and his puniſhments laid upon them for contempt thereof were very terrible, and even then but newly executed; yet were they ſo obſtinately bent unto their Wills, that they would not by any means be drawn to acknowledg the true cauſe of their affliction, but they told the Prophet roundly, that they would worſhip the Queen of Heaven, as they and their Fathers, their Kings and their Princes had uſed to do: For then (ſaid they) had we plenty of Victuals, and were well, and felt no evil: Adding, that all manner of miſeries were befaln them, ſince they left off that ſervice of the Queen of Heaven. So blind is the wiſdom of Man, in looking into the Counſel of God, which to find out, there is no better nor other guide than his own written Will not perverted by vain additions.

Jer. 44. 17, 18.

But this Hiſtory of the Kings of Iſrael and Juda hath herein a ſingular prerogative above all that have been written by the moſt ſufficient of meerely humane Authors: it ſetteth down expreſly the true, and firſt cauſes that happened; not in imputing the death of Ahab to his over-frowardneſs in Battel; the ruine of his Family, to the ſecurity of Jehoram,

in

in Jezreel; not the Victories of Hazael, to the great commotions raised in Israel by the coming of Jehu; but referring all unto the Will of God, I mean, to his revealed Will, from which that his hidden purposes do not vary, this Story, by many great examples, gives most notable proof. True it is, that the concurrence of second causes with their effects, is in these Books nothing largely described; nor perhaps exactly in any of those Histories that are in these points most copious. For it was well noted by that worthy Gentleman, Sir Philip Sidney, that Historians do borrow of Poets, not only much of their Ornament, but somewhat of their substance. Informations are often false, Records not always true, and notorious Actions commonly insufficient to discover the Passions which do set them first on foot, Wherefore they are fain (I speak of the best, and in that which is allowed; for to take out of Livy every one circumstance of Claudius his Journey against Asdrubal in Italy, fitting all to another Business, or any Practice of that kind, is neither Historical, nor Poetical) to search into the particular humour of Princes, and of those which have Governed their Affections, or the Instruments by which they wrought; from whence they do collect the most likely motives or impediments of every business; and so figuring as near to the life as they can imagine, the matter in hand, they judiciously consider the defects in counsel, or obliquity in proceeding.

Sir Philip Sid. in his Apol. for Poetry.

Yet all this, for the most part, is not enough to give assurance, howsoever it may give satisfaction. For the heart of Man is unsearchable: and Princes, howsoever their intents be seldom hidden from some of those many eyes which pry both into them, and into such as live about them; yet sometimes either by their own close temper, by some subtil mists, they conceal the truth from all reports. Yea, many times the affections themselves lie dead, and buried in oblivion, when the preparations which they begat, are converted to another use. The industry of an Historian, having so many things to weary it, may well be excused, when finding apparent cause enough of things done, it forbeareth to make further search; though it often fall out, where sundry occasions work to the same end, that one small matter in a weak mind is more effectual, than many that seem far greater. So comes it many times to pass, that great fires, which consume whole Houses or Towns, begin with a few straws, that are wasted or not seen; when the flame is discovered, having fastened upon some Wood-pile, that catcheth all about it. Questionless it is, that the War commenced by Darius, and pursued by Xerxes against the Greeks, proceeded from desire of the Persians to enlarge their Empire: Howsoever the enterprize of the Athenians upon Sardes, was noised abroad as the Ground of that Quarrel; yet Herodotus telleth us, that the wanton desire of the Queen Atossa, to have the Grecian dames her Bond-women, did first move Darius to prepare for this War before he had received any injury, and when he did not yet so much desire to get more, as to enjoy what was already gotten.

Hero. l. 1.

I will not here stand to argue whether Herodotus be more justly reprehended by some, or defended by others, for alledging the vain appetite, and secret speech of the Queen in Bed with her Husband, as the cause of those great evils following; this I may boldly affirm (having, I think, in every estate some sufficient witness) that matters of much consequence, founded in all seeming upon substantial reasons, have issued indeed from such petty trifles, as no Historian would either think upon, or could well search out.

Therefore it was a good answer that Sixtus Quintus the Pope, made to a certain Friar, coming to visit him in his Popedom, as having long before in his meaner estate, been his familiar Friend. This poor Friar, being emboldened by the Pope to use his old liberty of speech, adventured to tell him, that he very much wondered how it was possible for his Holiness, whom he rather took for a direct honest Man, than any cunning Polititian, to attain unto the Papacy; in compassing of which, all the subtilty (said he) of the most crafty brains, find work enough: and therefore the more I think upon the Art of the Conclave, and your unaptness thereto, the more I needs must wonder. Pope Sixtus to satisfie the plain dealing Friar, dealt with him again as plainly, saying; Hadst thou lived abroad as I have done, and seen by what folly this World is Governed, thou wouldst wonder at nothing.

Surely, if this be referred unto those exorbitant Engines, by which the course of affairs is moved, the Pope said true. For the wisest of Men are not without their Vanities, which requiring and finding mutual Toleration, work more closely, and earnestly, than right reason either needs or can. But if we lift up our thoughts to that Supreme Governour, of whose Empire all that is true, which by the Poet was said of Jupiter.

Qui terram inertem, qui mare temperat
Ventosum, & urbes, regnaque tristia,
Divosque mortalesque turmas,
Imperio regit unus æquo.

Who rules the duller Earth, the Wind swoln streams,
The civil Cities, and th'infernal Realms,
Who th'Host of Heaven, and the mortal Band,
Alone doth Govern by his just Command.

Then shall we find the quite contrary. In him there is no uncertainty nor change, he foreseeth all things, and all things disposeth to his own Honour; He neither deceiveth nor can be deceived; but continuing one and the same for ever, doth constantly Govern all Creatures by that Law, which He hath prescribed, and will never alter. The vanities of Men beguile their vain contrivers, and the prosperity of the wicked, is the way leading to their destruction: yea, this broad and head-long passage to Hell, is not so delightful as it seems at the first entrance, but hath growing in it, besides the poysons which infect the soul, many cruel thorns deeply wounding the Body; all which if any few escape, they have only this miserable advantage of others, that their descent was the more swift and expedite. But the Service of God is the Path guiding us to perfect happiness, and hath in it a true, though not compleat felicity, yielding such abundance of joy to the Conscience, as doth easily countervail all afflictions whatsoever; though indeed those brambles that sometimes tears the skin of such as walk in this blessed Way, do commonly lay hold upon them at such time as they sit down to take their ease, and make them wish themselves at their journeys end, in the presence of their Lord whom they faithfully serve, in whose presence is the fulness of joy, and at whose right Hand are pleasures for ever. Psal. 65. 11.

Wherefore it being the end and scope of all History, to teach by example of times past, such Wisdom as may guide our desires and actions, we should not marvel though the Chronicles of the Kings of Juda and Israel, being written by Men inspired with the Spirit of God, instruct us chiefly, in that which is moſt requiſite for us to know; as the means to attain unto true felicity, both here, and hereafter, propounding examples which illuſtrate this infallible rule, The fear of the Lord is the beginning of Wiſdom. Had the expedition of Xerxes (as it was foretold by Daniel) been written by ſome Prophet after the captivity: we may well believe that the Counſel of God therein, and the Executioners of his righteous Will, ſhould have occupied either the whole or the principal room in that Narration. Yet had not the purpoſe of Darius, the deſire of his Wife, and the buſineſs at Sardes, with other occurrents, been the leſs true, though they might have been omitted, as the leſs material: But theſe things it had been lawful for any Man to gather out of prophane Hiſtories, or out of Circumſtances otherwiſe appearing, wherein he ſhould not have done injury to the Sacred Writings, as long as he had forborn to derogate from the firſt cauſes, by aſcribing to the ſecond more than was due.

Such, or little different, is the buſineſs that I have now in hand: wherein I cannot believe that any Man of judgment will tax me, as either fabulous or preſumptuous. For he doth not feign, that rehearſeth probabilities as bare conjectures; neither doth he deprave the Text, that ſeeketh to illuſtrate and make good in humane reaſon, thoſe things which Authority alone, without further Circumſtance, ought to have confirmed in every Mans belief. And this may ſuffice in defence of the liberty which I have uſed in conjectures, and may hereafter uſe when occaſion ſhall require, as neither unlawful, nor miſ-beſeeming an Hiſtorian.

SECT. VII.

The conſpiracy againſt Athalia.

WHen Athalia had now ſix years and longer worn the Crown of Juda, and had found neither any forreign Enemy, nor domeſtical Adverſary to diſturb her poſſeſſion, ſuddenly the period of her Glory, and reward of her wickedneſs meeting together, took her away without any warning, by a violent and ſhameful death. For the growth of the young Prince began to be ſuch, as permitted him no longer to be concealed, and it had been very unfitting that his Education ſhould be ſimple, to make him ſeem the Child of ſome poor Man (as for his ſafety it was requiſite) when his Capacity required to have been indued with the ſtomack and qualities meet for a King. All this Jehojada the Prieſt conſidered, and withal, the great increaſe of Impiety, which taking deep root in the Court, was likely to ſpread it ſelf over all the Country, if care were not uſed to weed it up very ſpeedily. Wherefore he aſſociated unto himſelf five of the Captains, in whoſe fidelity he had beſt aſſurance; and having taken an oath of them, and ſhewed them the Kings ſon, he made a Covenant with them, to advance him to the Kingdom. Theſe drew in others of the principal Men, to countenance the action, procuring at the firſt only that they ſhould repair to Jeruſalem, where they were further acquainted with the whole Matter. There needed not many perſwaſions to win them to the buſineſs: The promiſe of the Lord unto the Houſe of David, was enough to aſſure them that the action was both lawful, and likely to ſucceed as they deſired.

But in compaſſing their intent, ſome difficulties appeared: For it was not to be hoped, that with open force they ſhould bring their purpoſe to good iſſue; neither were the Captains, and other Aſſociates of Jehojada able by cloſe working, to draw together ſo many truſty and ſerviceable hands as would ſuffice to mannage the buſineſs. To help in this caſe, the Prieſt gave order to ſuch of the Levites that had finiſhed their courſes waiting on the Divine Service at the Temple, and were now relieved by others that ſucceeded in their turns, that they ſhould not depart until they knew his further diſpleaſure. So by admitting the new comers, and not diſcharging the old, he had, without any noiſe, made up ſuch a number, as would be able to deal with the Queens ordinary Guard, and that was enough: for if the Tyranneſs did not prevail againſt them at the firſt brunt, the favour of the People was like to ſhew it ſelf on their ſide, who made head againſt her. Theſe Levites were placed in the inner Court of the Temple, about the perſon of the King, who as yet was kept cloſe; the followers of the Captains, and other Adherents, were beſtowed in the outer Courts: As for Weapons, the Temple it ſelf had ſtore enough; King David had left an Armory to the place, which was now employed in defence of his iſſue.

All things being in readineſs, and the day come, wherein this high deſign was to be put in execution; Jehojada delivered unto the Captains, Armour for them and their adherents, appointed a Guard unto the Kings perſon, produced him openly, and gave unto him the Crown; uſing all ceremonies accuſtomed in ſuch Solemnities, with great applauſe of the People. Of theſe doings, the Queen was the laſt that heard any word. Which is not ſo ſtrange as it may ſeem: for inſolent natures, by dealing outragiouſly with ſuch as bring them ill-tidings, do commonly loſe the benefit of hearing what is to be feared, whilſt yet it may be prevented, and have no information of danger, till their own eyes, amazed with the ſuddenneſs, behold it in the ſhape of inevitable miſchief.

All Jeruſalem was full of the rumour, and entertained it with very good liking. Some carried home the news, others ran forth to ſee, and the common joy was ſo great, that without apprehenſion of peril, under the windows of the Court, were the People running and praiſing the King. Athalia hearing and beholding the extraordinary concourſe, and noiſe of folks in the ſtreets, making towards the Temple, with much unuſual paſſion in their looks, did preſently conceive, that ſomewhat worthy of her care was happened; though, what it might be, ſhe did not apprehend. Howſoever it were, ſhe meant to uſe her own wiſdom in looking into the matter, and ordering all as the occaſion might happen to require. It may be, that ſhe thought it ſome eſpecial ſolemnity uſed in the Divine Service, which cauſed this much adoe; and hereof the unaccuſtomed number of Levites, and of other devout Men, about the Town, might give ſome preſumption. 2 Chron. 23. 12.

Many things argue that ſhe little thought upon her own Tragedy; although Joſephus would make it ſeem otherwiſe. For we find in the Text, She came to the People in the Houſe of the Lord, (which was near to her Palace) and that when ſhe looked and ſaw the King ſtand by his Pillar, as the manner was with the Princes, or Great Men of the Land by him, and the Trumpeters proclaiming him; ſhe rent her cloths, and cried Treaſon, Treaſon. Hereby it appears that ſhe was quietly going, without any miſtruſt or fear, to take her place; which when ſhe found occupied by another, then ſhe began to afflict her ſelf, as one caſt away, and cried out in vain upon the Treaſon, whereby ſhe ſaw that ſhe muſt periſh. But that ſhe came with a Guard of armed Men to the Temple, (as 2 Chron. 23. 12. & 13. 2. 1 Kings c. 11. 7. & 13. 14.

Joſephus

Josephus reporteth) and that her company being beaten back, she entred alone, and commanded the people to kill the young Tyrant, I find no where in Scripture, neither do I hold it credible. For had she truly known how things went, she should surely have gathered her friends about her, and used those forces in defence of her Crown, by which she gat it, and hitherto had held it. Certainly, if it were granted, that she, like a new Semiramis, did march in the head of her troop, yet it had been meer madness in her, to enter the place alone, when her assistants were kept out; but if she, perceiving that neither her authority, nor their own weapons, could prevail to let in her guard, would nevertheless take upon her to command the death of the new King, calling a child of seven years old a Conspirator, and bidding them to kill him, whom she saw to be armed in his defence, may we not think that she was mad in the most extreme degree? Certain it is that the counsel of God would have taken effect, in her destruction, had she used the most likely means to disappoint it: yet we need not so cut her throat with any moral impossibilities. It is enough to say, that the godly zeal of Jehojada found more easie success, through her indiscretion, than otherwise could have been expected; so that at his appointment, she was without more ado, carried out of the Temple and slain, yea so, that no bloud, save her own, was shed in that quarrel; her small train that she brought along with her, not daring to stand in her defence.

SECT. VIII.

The death of Athalia, with a comparison of her and Jezabel.

MOst like it is, that Athalia had many times, with great indignation, bewailed the rashness of her Nephew Jehoram the Israelite, who did foolishly cast himself into the very throat of danger, gaping upon him, only through his eager desire of quickly knowing what the matter meant: yet she her self, by the like bait, was taken in the like trap, and having lived such a life as Jezabel had don, was rewarded with a suitable death. These two Queens were in many points much alike, each of them was Daughter, Wife, and Mother to a King; each of them ruled her Husband; was an Idolatress and a Murdress. The onely difference appearing in their condition, is, that Jezabel is more noted as incontinent of body, Athalia as ambitious: So that each of them surviving her Husband about eight years, did spend their time in satisfying her own affections; the one using tyranny, as the exercise of her haughty mind; the other painting her face, for the ornament of her unchaste body. In the manner of their death little difference there was, or in those things which may seem in this world to pertain unto the dead when they are gone. Each of them was taken on the sudden by Conspirators, and each of them exclaiming upon the Treason, received sentence from the mouth of one that had lived under her subjection; in execution whereof, Jezabel was trampled under the feet of her enemies horses; Athalia slain at her own horse-gate; the death of Athalia having (though not much) the more leisure to vex her proud heart; that of Jezabel the more indignity, and shame of body. Touching their burial, Jezabel was devoured by Dogs, as the Lord had threatned by the Prophet Elias; what became of Athalia we do not find. Like enough it is, that she was buried, as having not persecuted and slain the Lords Prophets, but suffered the Priests to exercise their function; yet of her burial there is no monument, for she was a Church-robber. The service of Baal erected by these two Queens, was destroyed as soon as they were gone, and their Chaplains, the Priests of that Religion, slain. Herein also it came to pass, alike, as touching them both when they were dead; the Kings who slew them, were afterwards afflicted, both of them by the same hand of Hazael the Syrian; in which point Athalia had the greater honour, if the Syrian (who seems to have been her good friend) pretended her revenge, as any part of his quarrel to Juda. Concerning children, all belonging to Jezabel perished in few days after her: whether Athalia left any behind her, it is uncertain; she had sons living after she was Queen, of whom, or of any other, that they were slain with her, we do not find.

This is a matter not unworthy of consideration, in regard of much that may depend upon it. For if the children of Athalia had been in Jerusalem when their Mother fell, their death would surely have followed hers as nearly, and been registred, as well as the death of Mattan the Priest of Baal. That Law by which God forbad that the children should die for the fathers, could not have saved these ungracious Imps, whom the clause following would have cut off, which commands, that every man should die for his own sin. Seeing therefore that they had been professors and advancers of that vile and Idolatrous worship of Baal, yea had robbed the Temple of the Lord, and enriched the house of Baal with the spoil of it; likely it is, that they should not have escaped with life, if Jehojada the Priest could have gotten them into his hands. As there was lawful cause enough requiring their death, so the security of the King and his friends, that is, of all the Land, craved as much, and that very earnestly. For these had been esteemed as heirs of their mothers Crown, and being reckoned as her assistants in that particular business of robbing the Temple, may be thought to have carried a great sway in other matters, as Princes, and fellows with their Mother in the Kingdom. Therefore it is evident, that either they were now dead, or (perhaps following Hazael in his Wars against Jehu) absent from Jerusalem; whereby Jehojada might, with the more confidence, adventure to take Arms against their Mother, that was desolate. Deut. 24. 16.

SECT. I.

Of Joas his doings, whilst Jehojada the Priest lived.

BY the death of Athalia, the whole Country of Juda was filled with great joy and quietness; wherein Joas, a child of seven years old, or there-about, began his reign, which continued almost forty years. During his minority, he lived under the protection of that honourable man Jehojada the Priest, who did as faithfully govern the Kingdom, as he had before carefully preserved the Kings life, and restored him unto the Throne of his ancestors. When he came to mans estate, he took by appointment of Jehojada two Wives, and begat Sons and Daughters, repairing the Family of David which was almost worn out. The first Act that he took in hand, when he began to rule without a Protector, was the reparation of the Temple. It was a needful piece of work, in regard of the decay wherein that holy place was fallen, through the wickedness of ungodly Tyrants; and requisite it was that he should uphold the Temple, whom the Temple had upheld. This business he followed with so earnest a zeal, that not only the Levites were more slack than he, but even Jehojada was fain to be quickned by his admonition. Money was gathered for the charges of the work; partly out of the tax imposed by Moses, partly out of the liberality of the people; who gave so freely, that the Temple, besides all reparations, was enriched with vessels of gold and silver; and with all other Utensils. The sacrifices likewise were offered, as under godly Kings they had been, and the service of God was magnificently celebrated.

2 Chron. 24. 14.

SECT. II.

The Death of Jehojada, and Apostasie of Joas.

BUt this endured no longer than the life of Jehojada the Priest: who having lived an hundred and thirty years, dyed before his Country could have spared him. He was buried among the Kings of Juda, as he well deserved, having preserved the race of them, and restored the true Religion, which the late Princes of that house, by attempting to eradicate, failed but a little of rooting up themselves, and all their issue. Yet this honourable Funeral seems to have been given to him, at the motion of the people; it being said, They buried him in the City of David. As for the King himself, who did owe to him no less than his Crown and life, he is not likely to have been Author of it, seeing that he was as easily comforted after his death, as if he had thereby been discharged of some heavy debt.

For after the death of Jehojada, when the Princes of Juda began to flatter their King, he soon forgat, not only the benefits received by this worthy man his old Counsellor, but also the good precepts which he had received from him, yea and God himself, the Author of all goodness. These Princes drew him to the worship of Idols, wherewith Jehoram and Athalia had so infected the Country, in fifteen or sixteen Years, that thirty Years, or thereabout, of the reign of Joas, wherein the true Religion was exercised, were not able to clear it from that mischief. The King himself, when once he was entred into these courses, ran on head-long, as one that thought it a token of his liberty, to despise the service of God; and a manifest proof of his being now King indeed, that he regarded no longer the sowr admonitions of devout Priests. Hereby it appears, that his former zeal was only counterfeited, wherein like an Actor upon the stage, he had striven to express much more lively affection, than they could shew, that were indeed religious.

SECT. III.

The causes and times of the Syrians invading Juda in the days of Joas.

BUt God, from whom he was broken loose, gave him over into the hands of men, that would not easily be shaken off. Hazael King of Aram, having taken Gath, a Town of the Philistims, addressed himself towards Jerusalem, whither the little distance of way, and great hope of a rich booty, did invite him. He had an Army heartned by many victories, to hope for more; and for ground of the war (if his ambition cared for pretences) it was enough that the Kings of Juda had assisted the Israelites, in their enterprises upon Aram, at Ramoth Gilead. Yet I think he did not want some further instigation. For if the Kingdom of Juda had molested the Aramites in the time of his predecessour, this was throughly recompenced, by forbearing to succour Israel, and leaving the ten Tribes in their extream misery, to the fury of Hazael himself. Nether is it likely, that Hazael should have gone about to awake a sleeping Dog, and stir up against himself a powerful enemy, before he had assured the conquest of Israel, that lay between Jerusalem and his own Kingdom, if some opportunity had not performed such easie and good success as might rather advance, than any way disturb his future proceedings against the ten Tribes. Wherefore I hold it probable, that the sons of Athalia, mentioned before, were with him in this action, promising (as men expelled their Countries usually do) to draw many partakers of their own to his side; and not to remain, as Joas did, a neutral in the war between him and Israel, but to joyn all their forces with his, as they had cause, for the rooting out of Jehu his posterity, who like a bloody Traitor, had utterly destroyed all the kindred of the Queens, their mother, even the whole house of Ahab, to which he was a subject. If this were so, Hazael had the more apparent reason to invade the Kingdom of Juda. Howsoever we find, that Joas was afraid of him, and therefore took all the hallowed things, and all the gold that was found in the treasure of the house of the Lord, or in his own house, with which present he redeemed his peace: the Syrian (questionless) thinking it a better bargain, to

to get so much readily paid into his hand for nothing, than to hazzard the assurance of this for the possibility of not much more. So Hazael departed with a rich booty of unhappy treasure, which belonging to the living God, remained a small while in the possession of this mighty, yet corruptible man, but sent him quickly to the grave. For in the thirty seventh year of Joas, which was the fifteenth of Jehoahaz, he made this purchase; but in the same or very next year he died, leaving all that he had unto his son Benhadad, with whom these treasures prospered no otherwise, than ill-gotten goods are wont.

This enterprise of Hazaels, is, by some, confounded with that war of the Aramites upon Juda, mentioned in the second book of Chronicles. But the reasons alledged by them that hold the contrary opinion, do forcibly prove, that it was not all one war. For the former was compounded without blood-shed or fight; in the latter, Joas tried the fortune of a battel, wherein being put to the worst, he lost all his Princes, and hardly escaped with life. In the one Hazael himself was present; in the other, he was not named: but contrariwise, the King of Aram then reigning (who may seem to have been the son of Hazael) is said to have been at Damascus. The first Army came to conquer, and was so great, that it terrified the King of Juda; The second was a small company of men, which did animate Joas (in vain, for God was against him) to deal with them, as having a very great Army. 2 Chro. 24.

Now, concerning the time of this former invasion, I cannot perceive that God forsook him, till he had first forsaken God. There are indeed some, very learned, who think that this expedition of Hazael was in the time of Jehojada the Priest, because that story is joyned to the restauration of the Temple. This had been probable, if the death of Jehojada had been afterwards mentioned in that place of the second book of Kings; or if the Apostasie of Joas, or any other matter implying so much, had followed in the relation. For it is not indeed to be doubted, that the Lord of all may dispose of all things, according to his own will and pleasure; neither was he more unjust in the afflictions of Job that righteous man, or the death of Josias that godly King, than in the plagues which he laid upon Pharaoh, or his judgment upon the house of Ahab. But it appears plainly, that the rich furniture of the Temple, and the magnificent service of God therewithall, which are joyned together, were used in the house of the Lord continually all the days of Jehojada; soon after whose death, if not immediately upon it, that is (as some very learnedly collect) in the sixth, or thirty seventh year of this Joas his reign, the King falling away from the God of his Fathers, became a foul Idolater. 2 Chro. 24. 11.

And indeed we commonly observe, that the crosses which it hath pleased God sometimes to lay upon his servants without any cause notorious in the eyes of men, have always tended unto the bettering of their good. In which respect, even the sufferings of the blessed Martyrs (the death of his Saints being precious in the sight of the Lord) are to their great advantage. But with evil and rebellious men, God keepeth a more even and strict account; permitting usually their faults to get the start of their punishment; and either delaying his vengeance (as with the Amorites) till their wickedness be full; or not working their amendment by his correction, but suffering them to run on in their wicked courses, to their greater misery. So hath he dealt with many; and so it appears that he dealt with Joas. For this unhappy man did not only continue an obstinate Idolater, but grew so forgetful of God and all goodness, as if he had stroven to exceed the wickedness of all that went before him, and to leave such a villanous pattern unto others, as few or none of the most barbarous Tyrants should endure to imitate. Psal. 115. 15.

SECT. IV.

How Zacharia was murthered by Joas.

SUndry Prophets having laboured in vain to reclaim the people from their superstition, Zacharia the son of Jehojada the Priest, was stirred up at length by the Spirit of God, to admonish them of their wickedness, and make them understand the punishment due unto it, whereof they stood in danger. This Zacharia was a man so much honoured, and son to a man so exceedingly beloved in his life time, and reverenced, that if Joas had reputed him (as Ahab did Elias) his open enemy, yet ought he in common honesty to have cloaked his ill affection, and have used at least some part of the respect that was due to such a person: On the other side, the singular affection which he and his father had born unto the King, and the unrecountable benefits which they had done unto him, from his first infancy, were such, as should have placed Zacharia in the most hearty and assured love of Joas, yea though he had been otherwise a man of very small mark, and not very good condition. The truth is, that the message of a Prophet sent from God, should be heard with reverence, how simple soever he appears that brings it. But this King Joas, having already scorned the admonitions and protestations of such Prophets as first were sent, did now deal with Zacharia, like as the wicked husbandmen, in that parable of our Saviour, dealt with the heir of the Vineyard; who said, This is the heir, come let us kill him, that the inheritance may be ours. By killing Zacharia he thought to become an absolute Commander, supposing belike that he was no free Prince, as long as one durst tell him the plain truth, how great soever that mans deservings were, that did so, yea though Gods commandment required it. So they conspired against this holy Prophet, and stoned him to death at the Kings appoinment; but whether by any form of open Law, as was practised upon Naboth; or whether surprising him by any close treachery, I do neither read, nor can conjecture. The dignity of his person, considered together with their treacherous conspiracy, makes it probable, that they durst not call him into publick judgment, though that the manner of his death, being such as was commonly, and by order of Law, inflicted upon malefactors, may argue the contrary. Most likely it is, that the Kings commandment, by which he suffered, took place in stead of Law: which exercise of meer power (as hath been already noted) was nothing strange amongst the Kings of Juda. Luke 20. 14.

SECT. V.

How Joas was shamefully beaten by the Amorites, and of his death.

THis odious murther, committed by an unthankful snake upon the man in whose bosom he had been fostered, as of it self alone it sufficed to make the wretched Tyrant hateful to men of his own time, and his memory detested in all ages; so had it the well well described curse of the blessed Martyr, to accompany it unto the Throne of God, and to call for vengeance from thence, which fell down swiftly, and heavily upon the head of that ungrateful monster. It was the last year of his reign; the end of his time coming then upon him, when he thought himself beginning to live, how he listed without controulment. When that year was expired the Aramites came into the Country, rather as may seem to get pillage, than to perform any great action; for they came with a small company of men: but God had intended to do more by them, than they themselves did hope for. 2 Chro. 24. 24.

That Joas naturally was a coward, his bloudy malice against his best friends, is, in my judgment proof sufficient: though otherwise his base composition with Hazael, when he might have levied (as his son after him did muster) three hundred thousand chosen men for the war, doth well enough shew his temper. Yet now he would needs be valiant, and make his people know, how stout of disposition their King was, when he might have his own will. But his timorous heart was not well cloaked. For to encounter with a few bands of Rovers, he took a very great Army, so that wise men might well perceive, that he knew what he did, making shew as if he would fight for his Country, and expose himself to danger of war, when as indeed all was meer ostentation and no peril to be feared; he going forth so strongly appointed, against so weak enemies. Thus might wise men think, and laugh at him in secret; considering what ado he made about that, which in all apparent reason was (as they say) a thing of nothing. But God, before whom the wisdom of this world is foolishness, did laugh not only at this vain-glorious King, but at them that thought their King secure, by reason of the multitude that he drew along with him.

When the Aramites and King Joas met, whether it were by some folly of the Leaders or by some amazement happening among the souldiers, or by whatsoever means it pleased God to work, so it was, that that great Army of Juda received a notable overthrow, and all the Princes were destroyed: the Princes of Juda, at whose perswasion the King had become a Rebel to the King of Kings. As for Joas himself (as Abulensis and others expound the story) he was sorely beaten and hurt by them, being (as they think) taken and shamefully tormented, to wring out of him an excessive ransom.

And surely, all circumstances do greatly strengthen this conjecture: for the Text (in the old translation) saith, they exercised upon Joas ignominious judgments; and that departing from him, they dismissed him in great languor. All which argues, that they had him in their hands, and handled him ill-favouredly. Now at that time Joas the son of Jehoahaz reigned over Israel, and Benhadad the son of Hazael over the Syrians, in Damascus: the one a valiant undertaking Prince, raised up by God to restore the State of his miserable Country, the other inferiour every way to his father, of whose purchases he lost a great part, for want of skill to keep it. The difference in condition found between these two Princes, promising no other event than such as afterward followed, might have given to the King of Juda good cause to be bold, and pluck up his spirits, which Hazael had beaten down, if God had not been against him. But his fearful heart being likely to quake upon any apprehension of danger, was able to put the Syrian King in hope, that by terrifying him with some shew of war at his doors, it were easie to make him crave any tolerable conditions of peace. The unexpected good success hereof, already related, and the (perhaps as unsuspected) ill success, which the Aramites found in their following wars against the King of Israel, sheweth plainly the weakness of all earthly might, resisting the power of the Almighty. For by his Ordinance, both the Kingdom of Juda, after more than forty Years time of gathering strength, was unable to drive out a small company of Enemies; and the Kingdom of Israel, having so been trodden down by Hazael, that only fifty Horsemen, ten Chariots, and ten thousand footmen were left; prevailed against his Son, and recovered all from the victorious Aramites. But examples hereof are every-where found, and therefore I will not insist upon this; though indeed we should not, if we be Gods children, think it more tedious to hear long and frequent reports of our heavenly Fathers honour, than of the noble acts performed by our fore-fathers upon earth.

When the Aramites had what they listed, and saw that they were not able, being so few, to take any possession of the Country, they departed out of Juda loaden with spoil, which they sent to Damascus, themselves belike falling upon the ten Tribes, where it is to be thought that they sped not half so well. The King of Juda being in ill case, was killed on his bed when he came home, by the sons of an Ammonitess, and of a Moabitess, whom some (because only their Mothers names, being strangers, are expressed) think to have been bondmen. Whether it were contempt of his fortune, or fear, lest (as Tyrants use) he should revenge disaster upon them, imputing it to their fault, or whatsoever else it were that animated them to murder their King; the Scripture tells us plainly, that, For the bloud of the children of Jehojada, this befell him. And the same appears to have been used as the pretence of their conspiracy, in excuse of the fact when it was done. For Amazia, the son and successor of Joas, durst not punish them, till his Kingdom was established: but contrariwise his body was judged unworthy of burial in the Sepulchres of the Kings: whereby it appears, that the death of Zacharia caused the treason, wrought against the King, to find more approbation, than was requisite, among the people, though afterwards it was recompenced by his son, upon the Traytors, which well deserved death. 2 Chro. 24. 25.

SECT. VI.

Of the Princes living in the time of Joas: of the time when Carthage was built: and of Dido.

THere lived with Joas, Mezades, and Diognetus in Athens: Eudemus and Aristomedes in Corinth: about which time Agrippa Sylvius, and after him Sylvius Alladius, were Kings of the Albans in Italy. Ocrazapes, commonly called Anacyndaraxes, the thirty seventh King, succeeded unto Ophratanes, began his reign over the Assyrians, about the eighteenth year of Joas, which lasted forty two years. In the sixteenth of Joas, Cephrenes, the fourth from Sesac, succeeded unto Cheops in the Kingdom of Egypt, and held it fifty years.

In this time of Joas, was likewise the reign of Pigmalion in Tyre, and the foundation of Carthage by Dido, the building of which City is, by divers Authors, placed in divers ages, some reporting it to be 70 years younger than Rome, others above 400 Years elder, few or none of them giving any reason of their assertions, but leaving us uncertain whom to follow:

Josephus,

Joseph. cont. App. l. 1. Josephus, who had read the Annals of Tyre, counting one hundred forty and three years and eight months from the building of Solomons Temple, in the twelfth year of Hyram King of Tyre, to the founding of Carthage by Dido, in the seventh of Pigmalion. The particulars of this accompt (which is not rare in Josephus) are very perplexed, and serve not very well to make clear the total sum. But whether it were so that Josephus did omit, or else that he did mis-write some number of the years, which he reckoned in Fractions, as they were divided among the Kings of Tyre, from Hyram to Pigmalion, we may well enough believe, that the Tyrian writers, out of whose Books he gives us the whole sum, had good means to know the truth, and could rightly reckon the difference of time, between two works no longer following one the other than the memory of three or four Generations might easily reach. This hundred forty and four years current, after the building of Solomons Temple, being the eleventh year of Joas, was an hundred forty and three years before the birth of Rome; and after the destruction of Troy, two hundred eighty and nine: A time so long after the death of Æneas, that we might truly conclude all to be fabulous which Virgil hath written of Dido, as Ausonius noteth, who doth honour her Statua with this Epigram:

Auson. ep. 117.

Illa ego sum Dido vultu quam conspicis hospes,
Assimulata modis pulchraque mirificis.
Talis eram, sed non Maro quam mihi finxit erat mens,
Vita nec incestis læta cupidinibus:
(Namque nec Æneas vidit me Troius unquam,
Nec Lybiam advenit, classibus Iliacis.
Sed furias fugiens, atque arma procacis Iarbæ,
Servavi, fateor, morte pudicitiam;
Pectore transfixo castos quod pertulit enses:)
Non furor, aut læso crudus amore dolor.
Sic cecidisse juvat: Vixi sine vulnere famæ,
Ulta virum, positis mœnibus oppetii.
Invida cur in me stimulasti Musa Maronem,
Fingeret ut nostræ damna pudicitiæ?
Vos magis Historicis lectores credite de me
Quam qui furta Deum concubitusque canunt,
Falsidici vates: Temerant qui carmine verum,
Humanisque deos assimulant vitiis.

Which in effect is this:

I Am that Dido which thou here dost see,
Cunningly fram'd in beauteous Imag'rie,
Like this I was, but had not such a soul,
As Maro feign'd, incestuous and foul.
Æneas never with his Trojan Hoast
Beheld my face, or landed on this coast.
But flying proud Iarbas villany,
Not mov'd by furious love or jealousie,
I did with weapon chaste, to save my fame,
Make way for death untimely, ere it came.
This was my end; but first I built a Town,
Reveng'd my Husbands death, liv'd with renown.
Why didst thou stir up Virgil, envious Muse,
Falsly my name and honour to abuse?
Readers, believe Historians; not those.
Who to the World Joves thefts and vice expose.
Poets are Liars, and for Verses sake,
Will make the Gods of humane Crimes partake.

From the time of Dido unto the first Punick War, that Carthage grew and flourished in Wealth and Conquests, we find in many Histories: But in particular we find little of the Carthaginian affairs before that War, excepting those few things that are Recorded of their attempts of the Isle of Sicil. We will therefore defer the Relation of Matters concerning that mighty City, until such time as they shall encounter with the State of Rome, by which it was finally destroyed; and prosecute in the mean while the History that is now in hand.

SECT. VII.

The beginning of Amazia his reign: Of Joas King of Israel, and Elisha the Prophet.

Amazia, the son of Joash, being twenty five years old when his Father died, took possession of the Kingdom of Juda, wherein he laboured so to demean himself, as his new beginning reign might be least offensive. The Law of Moses he professed to observe; which howsoever it had been secretly despised since the time of Jehoram, by many great Persons of the Land, yet had it by provision of good Princes, yea, and of bad ones (in their best times) imitating the good, but especially by the care of holy Priests, taken such deep root in the Peoples hearts, that no King might hope to be very plausible, who did not conform himself unto it. And at that present time, the slaughter which the Aramites had made of all the Princes, who had withdrawn the late King from the Service of God, being seconded by the death of the King himself, even whilst that execrable Murther, committed by the King upon Zacharia, was yet fresh in Memory, did serve as a notable example of Gods Justice against Idolaters, both to animate the better sort of the People in holding the Religion of their Fathers, and to discourage Amazia from following the way, which led to such an evil end. He therefore, having learned of his Father the art of Dissimulation, did not only forbear to punish the Traytors that had slain King Joas, but gave way to the time, and suffered the dead body to be interred, as that of Jehoram formerly had been in the City of David, yet not among the Sepulchres of the Kings of Juda. Nevertheless, after this, when (belike) the noise of the People having wearied it self into silence, it was found that the Conspirators (howsoever their deed done, was applauded as the handy-work of God) had neither any mighty partakers in their fact, nor strong maintainers of their persons, but rested secure, as having done well, seeing it was not ill taken: The King, who perceived his Government well established, called them into question, at such a time, as the heat of Mens affections being well allayed, it was easie to distinguish between their Treasons and Gods Judgments, which by their Treasons, had taken plausible effect. So they were put to death without any tumult, and their Children (as the Law did require) were suffered to live: which could not but give contentment to the People, seeing that their King did the office of a just Prince, rather than of a revenging son. This being done, and his own life better secured by such exemplary Justice, against the like attempts, Amazia carried himself outwardly as a Prince well affected to Religion, and so continued in rest, about twelve or thirteen years.

As Amazia gathered strength in Juda by the commodity of a long peace, so Joas the Israelite grew as fast in power, by following the war hotly against the Aramites.

Aramites. He was a valiant and fortunate Prince, yet an Idolater, as his Predeceſſors had been, worſhipping the Calves of Jeroboam. For this ſin had God ſo plagued the houſe of Jehu, that the ten tribes wanted little of being utterly conſumed, by Hazael and Benhadad, in the time of Jehu and his ſon Jehoahaz. But as Gods benefits to Jehu, ſufficed not to withdraw him from this politick Idolatry, ſo were the miſeries, rewarding that impiety, unable to reclaim Jehoahaz from the ſame impious courſe: yet the mercy of God beholding the trouble of Iſrael, did condeſcend unto the prayers of this ungodly Prince, even then when he and his miſerable Subjects, were obſtinate in following their own abominable ways. Therefore in temporal matters the ten Tribes recovered apace; but the favour of God which had been infinitely more worth, I do not find, nor believe that they ſought: that they had it not, I find in the words of the Prophet, ſaying plainly to Amazia, The Lord is not with Iſrael, neither with all the houſe of Ephraim.

2 Chron. 25. 7.

Whether it were ſo, that the great Prophet Eliſha, who lived in thoſe times, did foretel the proſperity of the Iſraelites under the reign of Joas; or whether Jehoahaz, wearied and broken with long adverſity, thought it the wiſeſt way, to diſcharge himſelf in part of the heavy cares attending thoſe unhappy Syrian Wars, by laying the burthen upon his hopeful ſon; we find that in the thirty ſeventh year of Joas, King of Juda, Joas the ſon of Jehoahaz began to reign over Iſrael in Samaria; which was in the 15th year of his Fathers reign, and ſome two or three years before his death.

2 Kings 13. 10.

It appears that this young Prince, even from the beginning of his Rule, did ſo well husband that poor ſtock that he received from his Father, of ten Chariots, fifty Horſemen, and ten thouſand Foot, that he might ſeem likely to prove a thriver. Amongſt other circumſtances, the words which he ſpake to Eliſha the Prophet, argue no leſs. For Joas viſiting the Prophet, who lay ſick, ſpake unto him thus, O my Father, my Father, the Chariots of Iſrael, and the Horſemen of the ſame: by which manner of ſpeech he did acknowledg, that the prayers of this holy Man had ſtood his Kingdom in more ſtead than all the Horſes and Chariots could do.

2 Kings 13. 14.

This Prophet who ſucceeded unto Elias, about the firſt year of Joram the ſon of Ahab King of Iſrael died (as ſome have probably collected) about the third or fourth year of this Joas, the Nephew of Jehu. To ſhew how the ſpirit of Elias was doubled, or did reſt upon him, it exceedeth my faculty. This is recorded of him, that he did not only raiſe a dead Child unto life, as Elias had done, but when he himſelf was dead, it pleaſed God that his dead Bones ſhould reſtore life unto a Carcaſe, which touched them in the Grave. In fine, he beſtowed as a Legacy, three Victories upon King Joas, who thereby did ſet Iſrael in a fair way of recovering all that the Aramites had uſurped, and weakning the Kings of Damaſco in ſuch ſort, that they were never after terrible to Samaria.

SECT. VIII.

Of Amazia his War againſt Edom; His Apoſtacy and overthrow by Joas.

THe happy ſucceſs which Joas had found in his War againſt the Aramites, was ſuch as might kindle in Amazia a deſire of undertaking ſome expedition, wherein himſelf might purchaſe the like Honour. His Kingdom could furniſh three hundred thouſand ſerviceable Men for the Wars, and his Treaſures were ſufficient for the payment of theſe, and the hire of many more. Cauſe of War he had very juſt againſt the Edomites, who having rebelled in the time of his Grand-father Jehoram, had about fifty years been unreclaimed, partly by reaſon of the troubles happening in Juda, partly through the ſloth and timerouſneſs of his Father Joas. Yet, foraſmuch as the Men of Juda had in many years been without all exerciſe of War (excepting that unhappy fight wherein they were beaten by a few Bands of the Aramites) he held it a point of wiſdom to increaſe his Forces, with Souldiers waged out of Iſrael, whence he hired for an hundred talents of Silver, an hundred thouſand valiant men, as the Scripture telleth us, though Joſephus diminiſheth the number, ſaying that they were but twenty thouſand.

2 Chron. 25. 6. Joſ. Antiq. Jud. l. 9. c. 10.

This great Army, which with ſo much coſt Amazia had hired out of Iſrael, he was fain to diſmiſs before he had imployed it, being threatned by a Prophet with ill ſucceſs, if he ſtrengthened himſelf with the help of thoſe Men, whom God (though in Mercy he gave them Victory againſt the cruel Aramites) did not love, becauſe they were Idolaters. The Iſraelites therefore departed in great anger, taking in ill part this diſmiſſion, as an high diſgrace, which to revenge, they fell upon a piece of Juda in their return, and ſhewed their malice in the ſlaughter of three thouſand Men, and ſome ſpoil, which they carried away. But Amazia with his own Forces, knowing that God would be aſſiſtant to their journey, entred couragiouſly into the Edomites Country; over whom obtaining Victory, he ſlew ten thouſand, and took other ten thouſand Priſoners, all which he threw from an high Rock; holding them, it ſeems, rather as Traytors, than as juſt Enemies. This Victory did not ſeem to reduce Edom under the ſubjection of the Crown of Juda, which might be the cauſe of that ſeverity, which was uſed to the Priſoners; the Edomites that had eſcaped, refuſing to buy the lives of their friends and kinſmen at ſo dear a rate, as the loſs of their own liberty. Some Towns in Mount Seir, Amazia took, as appears by his carrying away the Idols thence; but it is like they were the places moſt indefenſible, in that he left no Garriſons there, whereby he might another year the better have purſued the Conqueſt of the whole Country. Howſoever it were, he got both Honour by the Journey, and Gains enough, had he not loſt himſelf.

Among other ſpoils of the Edomites, were carried away their Gods; which being vanquiſhed and taken Priſoners, did deſerve well to be led in triumph. But they contrariwiſe, I know not by what ſtrange witchcraft, ſo beſotted this unworthy King Amazia, that he ſet them up to be his gods, and worſhipped them, and burned incenſe unto them.

2 Chron. 25. 14.

For this, when he was rebuked by a Prophet ſent from God, he gave a churliſh and threatning anſwer; asking the Prophet, who made him a Counſeller and bidding him hold his peace for fear of the worſt. If either the coſtly ſtuff, whereof theſe Idols were made, or the curious workmanſhip and beauty, with which they were adorned by Artificers, had raviſhed the Kings fancie; me-thinks, he ſhould have rather turned them to matter of Profit, or kept them as houſhold Ornaments and things of Pleaſure, than thereby have ſuffered himſelf to be blinded, with ſuch unreaſonable devotion towards them. If the ſuperſtitious account wherein the Edomites had held them, were able to work much upon his imagination; much more ſhould the bad ſervice which they had done to their old Clients, have moved him thereupon to laugh, both at the Edomites, and them. Wherefore it seems to me, that the same affections carried him from God, unto the service of Idols, which afterwards moved him to walk so roughly to the Prophet reprehending him. He had already obeyed the warning of God by a Prophet, and sent away such Auxiliary Forces as he had gathered out of Israel; which done, it is said, that he was encouraged, and led forth his People, thinking belike, that God would now rather assist him by Miracle, than let him fail of obtaining all his hearts desire. But with better reason he should have limitted his desires by the Will of God, whose pleasure it was that Esau having broken the yoak of Jacob from his neck, according as Isaac had foretold, should no more become his servant. If therefore Amazia did hope to reconquer all the Country of Edom, he failed of his expectation; yet so, that he brought home both Profit and Honour, which might have well contended with him.

2 Chron. 25. 11.

But there is a foolish and a wretched Pride, wherewith Men being transported, can ill endure to ascribe unto God the Honour of those Actions, in which it hath pleased him to use their own Industry, Courage, or fore-sight. Therefore it is commonly seen, that they who entring into Battel, are careful to pray for aid from Heaven, with due acknowledgment of his Power, who is the Giver of Victory; when the Field is won, do vaunt of their own exploits; one telling how he got such a ground of advantage; another, how he gave check to such a Battalion; a third, how he seized on the Enemies Canon; every one striving to magnifie himself, whilst all forget God, as one that had not been present in the Action. To ascribe to fortune the effects of another Mans vertue, is, I confess, an argument of malice. Yet this is true, that as he which findeth better success, than he did, or in reason might expect, is deeply bound to acknowledg God the Author of his happiness; so He whose meer Wisdom and Labour hath brought things to a prosperous issue, is doubly bound to shew himself thankful, both for the Victory, and for those vertues by which the Victory was gotten. And indeed so far from weakness is the nature of such thanksgiving, that it may well be called the heighth of Magnanimity; no Vertue being so truly Heroical, as that by which the spirit of Man advanceth it self with confidence of acceptation, unto the love of God. In which sense it is a brave speech that Evander in Virgil useth to Æneas, none but a Christian being capable of the admonition.

Aude hostes contemnere opes, & te quoque dignum
Finge Deo.

With this Philosophy Amazia (as appears by his carriage) troubled not his head: he had shewed himself a better Man of War than any King of Juda, since the time of Jehosaphat, and could be well contented, that his People should think him little inferiour to David; of which honour he saw no reason why the Prophets should rob him, who had made him loose an hundred talents, and done him no pleasure; he having prevailed by plain force and good conduct, without any Miracle at all. That he was distempered with such vain thoughts as these (besides the witness of his impiety following) Josephus doth testifie, saying, That he despised God, and that being puft up with his good success, of which nevertheless he would not acknowledg God to be the Author, he commanded Joas King of Israel to become his Subject, and to let the ten Tribes acknowledg him their Soveraign, as they had done his Ancestours King David and Solomon.

Joseph. ant. 9. c. 10.

Some think that his quarrel to Joas was rather grounded upon the injury done to him by the Israelites, whom he dismissed in the Journey against Mount Seir. And likely it is, that the sense of a late wrong had more power to stir him up, than the remembrance of an old Title, forgotten long since, and by himself neglected thirteen or fourteen years. Nevertheless it might so be, that when he was thus provoked, he thought it not enough to requite new wrongs, but would also call old Matters into question; that so the Kings of Israel might, at the lest, learn to keep their subjects from offending Juda, for fear of endangering their own Crowns. Had Amazia desired only recompence for the injury done to him, it is not improbable that he should have had some reasonable answer from Joas, who was not desirous to fight with him. But the answer which Joas returned, likening himself to a Cedar, and Amazia in respect of him to no better than a Thistle, shews that the challenge was made in insolent terms, stuft perhaps with such proud comparison of Nobility, as might be made (according to that which Josephus hath written) between a King of ancient Race, and one of less Nobility than Vertue.

It is by Sophocles reported of Ajax, that when going to the War of Troy, his Father did bid him to be valiant, and get Victory by Gods assistance, he made answer, That by Gods assistance a Coward could get Victory, but he would also get it without such help: After which proud speech, though he did many valiant Acts, he had small thanks, and finally, killing himself in a madness, whereunto he fell upon disgrace received, was hardly allowed the honour of Burial. That Amazia did utter such words, I do not find, but having once entertained the thoughts, which are parents of such words, he was rewarded with success accordingly. The very first counsel wherein this War was concluded, serves to prove that he was a wise Prince indeed at Jerusalem, among his Parasites, but a fool when he had to deal with his equals abroad. For it was not all one, to fight with the Edomites, a weak People, trusting more in the seat of their Country, than the valour of their Souldiers; and to encounter with Joas, who from so poor beginnings had raised himself to such strength, that he was able to lend his Friend a hundred thousand Men, and had all his Nation exercised, and trained up in a long victorious War. But as Amazia discovered much want of judgment, in undertaking such a match; so in prosecuting the Business, when it was set on foot, he behaved himself as a Man of little experience, who having once only tried his fortune, and found it to be good, thought that in War there was nothing else to do, than send a Defiance, Fight, and Win. Joas on the contrary side, having been accustomed to deal with a stronger Enemy than the King of Juda, used that celerity, which peradventure had often stood him in good stead against the Aramite. He did not sit waiting till the enemies brake in and wasted his Country, but presented himself with an Army in Juda, ready to bid Battel to Amazia, and save him the labour of a long Journey. This could not but greatly discourage those of Juda, who (besides the impression of fear which an invasion beats into People, not inured in the like) having devoured in their greedy hopes, the spoil of Israel, fully perswading themselves to get as much, and at as easie a rate, as in the journey of Edom; were so far disappointed of their expectation that well they might suspect all new assurance of good luck, when the old had thus beguiled them. All this notwithstanding, their King that had stomack enough to challenge the Patrimony of Solomon, thought like another David to win it by the Sword. The iſſue of which Fool-hardineſs might eaſily have been foreſeen in humane Reaſon; comparing together, either the two Kings, or the quality of their Armies, or the firſt ominous beginning of the War. But meer Humane Wiſdom, howſoever it might fore-ſee much, could not have prognoſticated all the miſchief that fell upon Amazia. For as ſoon as the two Armies came in ſight, God, whoſe help this wretched Man had ſo diſpiſed, did (as Joſephus reports it) ſtrike ſuch terrour and amazement into the Men of Juda, that without one blow given, they fled all away, leaving their King to ſhift for himſelf; which he did ſo ill, that his Enemy had ſoon caught him, and made him change his glorious Humour into moſt abject Baſeneſs. That the Army which fled, ſuſtained any other loſs than of honour; I neither find in the Scriptures, nor in Joſephus, it being likely that the ſoon beginning of their flight, which made it the more ſhameful, made it alſo the more ſafe. But of the miſchief that followed this overthrow, it was Gods Will that Amazia himſelf ſhould ſuſtain the whole diſgrace. For Joas carried him directly to Jeruſalem, where he had him procure that the Gates may be opened to let him in and his Army; threatning him otherwiſe with preſent death. So much amazed was the miſerable Captive, with theſe dreadful words, that he durſt do no other than perſwade the Citizens, to yield themſelves to the mercy of the Conqueror. The Town, which afterwards being in weaker ſtate held out two years againſt Nebuchadnezzar, was utterly diſmaied, when the King that ſhould have given his life to ſave it, uſed all his force of command and intreaty to betray it. So the Gates of Jeruſalem were opened to Joas, with which honour (greater than any King of Iſrael had ever obtained) he could not reſt contented, but the more to deſpiſe Amazia and his People, he cauſed 400 cubits of the Wall to be thrown down, and entred the City in his Chariot through that breach, carrying the King before him as in triumph. This done, he ſack'd the Temple, and the Kings Palace, and ſo taking Hoſtages of Amazia, he diſmiſſed the poor Creature that was glad of his life, and returned to Samaria.

SECT. IX.

A diſcourſe of the reaſons hindring Joas from uniting Juda to the Crown of Iſrael, when he had won Jeruſalem, and held Amazia priſoner. The end of Joas his reign.

WE may juſtly marvel how it came to paſs, that Joas, being thus in poſſeſſion of Jeruſalem, having the King in his hands, his Enemies forces broken, and his own entire, could be ſo content to depart quietly with a little ſpoil, when he might have ſeized upon the whole Kingdom. The reign of Athalia had given him cauſe to hope that the iſſue of David might be diſpoſſeſſed of that Crown; his own nobility, being the Son and Grand-child of Kings, together with the famous acts that he had done, were enough to make the People of Juda think highly of him; who might alſo have preferred his form of Government before that of their own Kings, eſpecially at ſuch a time, when a long ſucceſſion of wicked Princes had ſmothered the thanks which were due to the memory of a few good ones. The commodity that would have enſued upon the union of all the twelve Tribes under one Prince, is ſo apparent, that I need not to inſiſt on it. That any meſſage from God, forbade the Iſraelite (as afterwards in the victory which Peka the ſon of Romelia got upon Ahaz) to turn his preſent advantage to the beſt uſe, we do not read. All this makes it the more difficult to reſolve the queſtion, why a Prince ſo well exerciſed as Joas had been in recovering his own, and winning from the Enemy, ſhould forſake the poſſeſſion of Jeruſalem, and wilfully neglect the poſſibilities, or rather caſt away the full aſſurance of ſo fair a conqueſt, as the Kingdom of Juda.

But concerning that point, which of all others had been moſt material, I mean the deſire of the vanquiſhed People to accept the Iſraelite for their King, it is plainly ſeen, that entring Jeruſalem in triumphant manner, Joas was unable to concoct his own proſperity. For, the opening of the Gates had been enough to have let him not only into the City, but into the Royal Throne, and the Peoples hearts, whom by fair intreaty (eſpecially having ſure means of compulſion) he might have made his own, when they ſaw themſelves betrayed, and baſely given away by him whoſe they had been before. The fair mark which this opportunity preſented, he did not aim at, becauſe his ambition was otherwiſe, and more meanly buſied, in levelling at the Glory of a triumphant entry through a breach. Yet this error might afterwards have been corrected well enough, if entring as an Enemy, and ſhewing what he could do, by ſpending his anger upon the Walls, he had within the City done offices of a Friend, and laboured to ſhew good will to the Inhabitants. But when his pride had done, his covetouſneſs began, and ſought to pleaſe it ſelf with that which is commonly moſt ready to the ſpoyler, yet ſhould be moſt forborn. The Treaſure wherewith Seſac, Hazael, and the Philiſtims, Men ignorant of the true God and his Religion, had quenched their greedy thirſt, ought not to have tempted the appetite of Joas, who though an Idolater, yet acknowledged alſo and worſhipped the Eternal God, whoſe Temple was at Jeruſalem. Therefore when the People ſaw him take his way directly to ſeiſe that holy place, and lay his ravenous hands upon the conſecrated Veſſels, calling the Family of Obed Edom (whoſe children had hereditary charge of the treaſure) to a ſtrict account, as if they had been Officers of his own Exchequer; they conſidered him rather as an execrable Church-robber, than as a noble Prince, an Iſraelite, and their Brother, though of another Tribe. Thus following that courſe, which the moſt vertuous King of our Age (taxing it with the ſame phraſe) hath wiſely avoided; by ſtealing a few Apples, he loſt the inheritance of the whole Orchard. The People deteſted him, and after the reſpite of a few days, might, by comparing themſelves one to one, perceive his Souldiers to be no better than Men of their own mould, and inferiour in number to the Inhabitants of ſo great a City. It is not ſo eaſie to hold by force a mighty Town entred by Capitulation, as to enter the Gates opened by unadviſed fear. For when the Citizens, not being diſarmed, recover their ſpirits, and begin to underſtand their firſt Error, they will think upon every advantage, of Place, of Proviſions, of Multitude, yea, Women armed with Tile-ſtones; and rather chooſe by deſperate Reſolution, to correct the evils grown out of their former Cowardiſe, than ſuffer thoſe Miſchiefs to poyſon the Body, which in ſuch Half-Conqueſt, are eaſily taſted in the Mouth. A more lively Example hereof cannot be deſired, than the City of Florence, which through the weakneſs of Peter de Medices, Governing therein as a Prince, was reduced into ſuch hard Terms, that it opened

the gates unto the French King Charles the eighth, who not plainly profeſſing himſelf either friend or foe to the State, entred the Town, withhis Army, in triumphant manner, himſelf and his Horſe armed, with his Lance upon his Thigh. Many inſolences were therein committed by the French, and much argument of quarrel miniſtred between them and the Towns-men: ſo far forth that the Florentines, to preſerve their liberty, were driven to prepare for fight. To conclude the matter, Charles propounds intollerable conditions, demanding huge ſums of ready Money, and the abſolute Seigniory of the State, as conquered by him, who entred the City in Arms. But Peter Caponi, a principal Citizen, catching theſe Articles from the Kings Secretary, and tearing them before his face, bad him ſound his Trumpets, and they would ring their Bells: which peremptory words made the French bethink themſelves, and come readily to this agreement, that for forty thouſand pounds, and not half of that Money to be paid in hand, Charles ſhould not only depart in peace, but reſtore whatſoever he had of their Dominion, and continue their aſſured Friend. So dangerous a matter did it ſeem for that brave Army, which in few Months after wan the Kingdom of Naples, to fight in the Streets, againſt the armed multitude of that populous City. It is true, that Charles had other buſineſs (and ſo perhaps had Joas, as ſhall anon be ſhewed) that called him away: but it was the apprehenſion of imminent danger that made him come to reaſon. In ſuch caſes the firing of houſes, uſually draws every Citizen to ſave his own, leaving victory to the Souldier: yet where the people are prepared and reſolved, Women can quench, as faſt as the enemy, having other things to look unto, can ſet on fire. And indeed that Commander is more given to anger than regardful of profit, who upon the uncertain hope of deſtroying a Town, forſakes the aſſurance of a good compoſition. Diverſity of circumſtance may alter the caſe: it is enough to ſay, that it might be in Jeruſalem, as we know it was in Florence.

How ſtrongly ſoever Joas might hold himſelf within Jeruſalem, he could not eaſily depart from thence, with his booty ſafe, if the Army of Juda, which had been more terrified than weakened in the late encounter, ſhould re-inforce it ſelf, and give him a check upon the way. Wherefore it was wiſely done of him, to take hoſtages for his better ſecurity, his Army being upon return, and better loaden than when it came forth; for which cauſes it was the more unapt to fight.

Beſides theſe impediments, within the City and without, ſerving to cool the ambition of Joas, and keep it down from aſpiring to the Crown of Juda; it appears that ſomewhat was newly fallen out, which had reference to the anger of Eliſha the Prophet; who, when this Joas had ſmitten the ground with his Arrows thrice, told him that he ſhould no oftner ſmite the Aramites. The three victories which Iſrael had againſt Aram, are by ſome, and with great probability, referred unto the fifth, ſixth, and ſeventh years of Joas: after which time, if any loſſes enſuing had blemiſhed the former good ſucceſs, ill might the King of Iſrael have likened himſelf to a ſtately Cedar, and worſe could he have either lent the Judæan one hundred thouſand Men, or meet him in battel, who was able to bring into the Field three hundred thouſand of his own. Seeing therefore it is made plain by the words of Eliſha, that after three victories Joaſh ſhould find ſome change of fortune and ſuffer loſs; we we muſt needs conclude. That the Aramite prevailed upon him this year, it being the laſt of his Reign. That this was ſo, and that the Syrians, taking advantage of Joas his abſence gave ſuch a blow to Iſrael, as the King at his return was not able to remedy, but rather fell himſelf into new misfortunes which increaſed the calamity; we may evidently perceive in that which is ſpoken of Jeroboam his Son. For it is ſaid, That the Lord ſaw the exceeding bitter affliction of Iſrael, and that having not decreed to put out the name of Iſrael from under the Heaven, he preſerved them by the hand of Jeroboam the Son of Joas. This is enough to prove, that the victorious Reign of Joas was concluded with a ſad cataſtrophe; the riches of the Temple haſtening his miſery and death, as they had done with Seſac, Athalia, and Hazael, and as afterwards they wrought with Antiochus Craſſus, and other ſacrilegious Potentates.

Thus either through indignation conceived againſt him, by the people of Jeruſalem, and courage which they took to ſet upon him within the Walls; or through preparation of the Army that lay abroad in the Country to bid him battel in open Field, and recover by a new charge the honour which was loſt at the former encounter; or through the miſeries daily brought upon his own Country, by the Syrian in his abſence (if not by all of theſe) Joas was driven to lay aſide all thought of winning the Kingdom of Juda; and taking hoſtages for his quiet paſſage, made all haſt homewards, where he found a ſad wel-come, and being utterly forſaken of his wonted proſperity, forſook alſo his life in few months after, leaving his Kingdom to Jeroboam the ſecond, his fortunate and valiant Son.

SECT. X.

The end of Amazia his Reign and life.

ANy Man is able to gueſs how Amazia looked, when the enemy had left him. He that had vaunted ſo much of his own great proweſs and skill in Arms, threatning to work wonders, and ſet up a-new the glorious Empire of David, was now uncaſed of his Lions hide, and appeared nothing ſo terrible a Beaſt as he had been painted. Much argument of ſcoffing at him he had miniſtred unto ſuch as held him in diſlike; which at this time doubtleſs were very many: for the ſhame that falls upon an inſolent Man, ſeldom fails of meeting with abundance of reproach. As for Amazia, (beſides that the multude are always prone to lay the blame upon their Governours, even of thoſe calamities which happen by their own default) there was no Child in all Jeruſalem, but knew him to be the root of all this miſchief. He had not only challenged a good Man of War, being himſelf a Daſtard; but when he was beaten and taken by him, had baſely pleaded for the common enemy, to have him let into the City, that with his own eyes he might ſee what ſpoil there was, and not make a bad bargain by hear-ſay. The Father of this Amazia was a beaſtly Man; yet when the Aramites took him and tormented him, he did not offer to buy his own life at ſo dear a rate, as the City and Temple of Jeruſalem. Had he offered, ſhould they have made his promiſe good? ſurely the haſt which they had made in condeſcending to this hard match, was very unfortunate: for by keeping out the Iſraelites (which was eaſie enough) any little while, they ſhould ſoon have been rid of him, ſeeing that the Aramites would have made him run home, with greater ſpeed than he came forth. Then alſo, when having truſsed up his baggage, he was ready to be gone, a little courage would have ſerved to perſwade him to leave his load behind; had not their good King delivered up hoſtages, to ſecure his return, as loath to defraud him of the recompence due to his pains taken.

Such exprobations could not but vex the heart of this unhappy King: it had been well for him, if they had made him acknowledge his fault unto God, that had puniſhed him by all this diſhonour. But we find no mention of his amendment. Rather it appears, that he continued an Idolater to the very laſt. For it is ſaid of him, that after his turning away from the 2 Chro 25. 27. Lord, they wrought treaſon againſt him in Jeruſalem: a manifeſt proof that he was not reclaimed unto his lives end. And certainly, they which tell a Man in his adverſity of his faults paſſed, ſhall ſooner be thought to upbraid him with his fortune, than to ſeek his reformation. Wherefore it is no marvel, that Prieſts and Prophets were leſs welcome to him, than ever they had been. On the other ſide, flatterers, and ſuch as were deſirous to put a heart into him, whereof themſelves might always be maſters, wanted not plauſible matter to revive him. For he was not the firſt, nor ſecond of the Kings of Juda, that had been overcome in battel. David himſelf had abandoned the City, leaving it before the enemy was in ſight, unto Abſalom his rebellious Son. Many beſides him had received loſſes, wherein the Temple bare a part. If Joas might ſo eaſily have been kept out; why did their Anceſtors let Seſac in? Aſa was reputed a vertuous Prince, yet with his own hands he emptied the Temple, and was not blamed, but held excuſable by neceſſity of the State. Belike theſe traducers would commend no Actions but of dead Princes: if ſo, he ſhould rather live to puniſh them, than die to pleaſe them. Though wherein had he given them any cauſe of diſpleaſure? It was he indeed that commanded to ſet open the Gates to Joas; but it was the people that did it. Good ſervants ought not to have obeyed their Maſters Commandments to his diſadvantage, when they ſaw him not maſter of his own Perſon. As his captivity did acquit him from blame of all things that he did or ſuffered in that condition; ſo was that misfortune it ſelf, in true eſtimation, as highly to his honour, as deeply to his loſs. For had he been as haſty to fly as others were, he might have eſcaped as well as others did. But ſeeking to teach the baſe multitude courage by his Royal example, he was ſhamefully betrayed by thoſe in whom he truſted. Unworthy creatures, that could readily obey him, when ſpeaking another Mans words, being priſoner, he commanded them to yield; having neglected his charge, when leading them into the Field, he bad them ſtand to it and fight like Men. The beſt was, that they muſt needs acknowledge his miſchance, as the occaſion whereby many thouſand lives were ſaved; the enemy having wiſely preferred the ſurpriſe of a Lion that was Captain, before the chaſe and ſlaughter of an Army of Stags that followed him.

Theſe or the like words comforting Amazia, were able to perſwade him, that it was even ſo indeed. And ſuch excuſes might have ſerved well enough to pleaſe the people, if the King had firſt ſtudied how to pleaſe God. But he that was unwilling to aſcribe unto God the good ſucceſs foretold by a Prophet; could eaſily find how to impute this late diſaſter unto fortune, and the fault of others. Now concerning fortune, it ſeems that he meant to keep himſelf ſafe from her by ſitting ſtill; for in fifteen years following (ſo long he out lived his honour) we find not that he ſtirred. As for his ſubjects, though nothing henceforth be recorded of his government, yet we may ſee by his end, that the middle time was ill ſpent among them, increaſing their hatred to his own ruine. He that ſuſpecteth his own worth or other Mens opinions, thinking the leſs regard is had of his Perſon than he believeth to be due to his place, will commonly ſpend all the force of his authority in purchaſing the name of a ſevere Man. For the affected ſowreneſs of a vain fellow, doth many times reſemble the gravity of one that is wiſe: and the fear wherein they live, which are ſubject unto oppreſſion, carries a ſhew of reverence to him that does the wrong; at leaſt it ſerves to dazle the eyes of underlings, keeping them from prying into the weakneſs of ſuch as have juriſdiction over them. Thus the time, wherein, by well uſing it, Men might attain to ſuch as they ought, they do uſually miſ pend, in ſeeking to appear ſuch as they are not. This is a vain and deceivable courſe; procuring, in ſtead of the reſpect that was hoped for, more indignation than was feared. Which is a thing of dangerous conſequence; eſpecially when an unable Spirit, being over-perted with ſo high authority, is too paſſionate in the execution of ſuch an office, as cannot be checked but by violence. If therefore Amazia thought by extream rigour to hold up his reputation, what did he elſe than ſtrive to make the people think he hated them, when of themſelves they were apt enough to believe that he did not love them? the beſt was, that he had, by revenging his Fathers death, provided well enough for his own ſecurity: but who ſhould take vengeance (or upon whom?) of ſuch a murther, wherein every one had a part? Surely God himſelf, who had not given commandment or leave unto the people, to take his office out of his hand, in ſhedding the blood of his Anointed. Yet as Amazia careleſs of God, was carried headlong by his own affections; ſo his ſubjects, following the ſame ill example, without requiring what belonged unto their duties, roſe up againſt him, with ſuch head long fury, that being unable to defend himſelf in Jeruſalem, he was driven to forſake the City, and fly to Lachis, for ſafeguard of his life. But ſo extream was the hatred conceived againſt him, and ſo general, that neither his abſence could allay the rage of it in the Capital City, nor his preſence in the Country abroad procure friends to defend his life. Queſtionleſs he choſe the Town of Lachis for his refuge, as a place of all other beſt affected to him; yet found he there none other favour, than that the people did not kill him with their own hands; for when the Conſpirators (who troubled not themſelves about raiſing an Army for the matter) ſent purſuers after, he was abandoned to death. Lachis was the utmoſt City of his Dominion Weſtward, ſtanding ſomewhat without the border of Juda; ſo that he might have made an eaſie eſcape (if he durſt adventure) into the Territory of the Philiſtims, or the Kingdom of Iſrael. Therefore it may ſeem that he was detained there, where certain it is that he found no kind of favour: for had not the people of this Town added their own treaſon to the general inſurrection; the murderers could not at ſo good leiſure as they did, have carried away his body to Jeruſalem, where they gave him burial with his Fathers.

SECT. XI.

Of the Inter-regnum, or vacancy, that was in the Kingdom of Juda, after the death of Amazia.

IT hath already been shewed, that the Reigns of the Kings of Juda and Israel were sometimes to be measured by compleat years, otherwhiles, by years current: and that the time of one King is now and then confounded with the last year of his Fathers Reign, or the foremost of his Sons, But we are now arrived at a meer vacation, wherein the Crown of Juda lay void eleven whole years: a thing not plainly set down in Scriptures, nor yet remembred by Josephus, and therefore hard to be believed, were it not proved by necessary consequence.

Twice we find it written, that Amazia, King of Juda, lived after the death of Joas King of Israel, fifteen years; whereupon it follows, that the death of Amazia, was about the end of fifteen years compleat, which Jeroboam the second (who in the fifteenth year of Amazia was made King over Israel) had reigned in Samaria. But the succession of Uzzia, who is also called Azaria, unto his Father in the Kingdom of Juda, was eleven years later than the sixteenth of Jeroboam: for it is expressed, that Azaria began to reign in the seven and twentieth year of Jeroboam; the sixteenth year of his life, being joyned with the first of two and fifty that he reigned. So the Inter-regnum of eleven years cannot be divided, without some hard means used, of interpreting the Text otherwise than the letter sounds.

2 Chron. 25. 2. & 2 Kin. 14. 17.

2 King. 14. 23.

2 King. 15. 1.

Yet some conjectures there are made, which tend to keep all even, without acknowledging any void time. For it is thought that in the place last of all cited, by the seven and twentieth year of Jeroboam, we should perhaps understand the seven and twentieth year of his life; or else (because the like words are no where else interpreted in the like sense) that Azaria was eleven years under age, that is five years old, when his Father died, and so his sixteenth year might concur with the seven and twentieth of Jeroboam; or that the Text it self might have suffered some wrong, by miswriting twenty seven for seventeen years; and so by making the seventeenth year of Jeroboam to be newly begun, all may be salved. These are the conjectures of that worthy Man Gerard Mercator: concerning the first of which it may suffice, that the Author himself doth easily let it pass, as improbable; the last is followed by none that I know, neither is it fit, that upon every doubt, we should call the text in question; which could not be falsified in all copies, if perhaps it were in one, as for the second it may be held with some qualification, that Azaria began his Reign being five years old; but then must we add those eleven years which passed in his minority, to the two and fifty that followed his sixteenth year, which is all one in a manner, with allowing an Inter-regnum.

But why should we be so careful to avoid an Inter-regnum in Juda, seing that the like necessity hath inforced all good Writers to acknowledg the like vacancy, twice happening within few years, in the Kingdom of Israel? The space of time between Jeroboam's death, and the beginning of Zachariah's reign, and such another gap found between the death of Peka, and the beginning of Hosea, have made it easily to be admitted into Samaria; which the consideration of things as they stood in Juda, when Amazia was slain, doth make more probable to have happened there, yea, although the necessity of computation were not so apparent.

For the publick fury having so far extended it self, as unto the destruction of the Kings own person, was not likely to be appeased without order taken for obtaining some redress of those matters, which had caused it at the first to break forth into such extremity. We need not therefore wonder how it came to pass, that they which already had thrown themselves into such an horrible treason, should afterwards dare to withhold the Crown from a Prince of that age, which being invested in all ornaments of Regality, is nevertheless exposed to many injuries, proceeding from head-strong, and forgetful subjects.

As for their conjecture, who make Azaria to have been King but one and forty years after he came out of his non-age; I dare not allow it, because it agrees too harshly with the Text. The best opinion were that which gives unto Jeroboam eleven years of reign with his Father, before he began to reign single in the fifteenth of Amazia; did it not swallow up almost the whole reign of Joas, and extending the years of those which reigned in Israel (by making such of them compleat as were only current) and take at the shortest the reigns of Princes ruling in other Nations. But I will not stand to dispute further of this: every Man may follow his own opinion, and see mine more plainly in the Chronological Table, drawn for these purposes.

SECT. XII.

Of Princes Contemporary with Amazia, and more particularly of Sardanapalus.

THe Princes living with Amazia, and in the eleven years that followed his death, were Joas and Jeroboam in Israel; Cephrenes and Mycerinus in Egypt; Sylvius Alladius, and Sylvius Aventinus in Alba; Agamemnon in Corinth; Diognetus Pheredus, and Ariphron in Athens; in Lacedæmon Theleclus, in whose time the Spartans wan from the Achaians, Garanthæ, Amyclæ, and some other Towns.

But more notable than all these, was Assyrian Sardanapalus, who in the one and twentieth year of Amazia, succeeding his Father Ocrazapes or Anacyndaraxes, reigned twenty years, and was slain the last of the eleven void years which fore-went the reign of Azaria. In him ended (as most agree) the line of Ninus, which had held that Empire one thousand two hundred and forty years. A most luxurious and effeminate Palliard he was, passing away his time among strumpets, whom he imitated both in apparel and behaviour.

In these voluptuous courses he lived an unhappy life, knowing himself to be so vile, that he durst not let any Man have a sight of him; yet seen he was at length, and the sight of him was so odious, that it procured his ruine. For Arbaces, who governed Media under him, finding means to behold the person of his King, was so incensed with that beastly spectacle, of a Man disguised in Womans attire, and striving to counterfeit an Harlot, that he thought it a great shame to live under the command of so unworthy a Creature. Purposing therefore to free himself and others from so base subjection, he was much encouraged by the prediction of Belesis or Belosus a Chaldæan, who told him plainly, that the Kingdom of Sardanapalus should fall into his hands. Arbaces well pleased with the Prophecy, did promise unto Belosus himself the government of Babylon; and so concluding how to handle the business, one of them stirred up the Medes, and allured the Persians into the quarrel, the other perswaded the Babylonians and Arabians to venture themselves in the same cause. These four Nations armed forty thousand Men against Sardanapalus, who in this danger was not wanting to himself, but gathering such forces as he could out of other Nations, encountred the rebels, as one that would by deeds refute the tales that they had told of him. Neither did his carriage in the beginning of that War, answer to the manner of his retiredness. For in three battels he carried away the better, driving Arbaces and his followers into such fearful terms, that had not Belosus promised them constantly some unexpected succours, they would forthwith have broken up their Camp. About the same time, an Army out of Bactria was coming to assist the King; but Arbaces encountring it upon the way, perswaded so strongly by promise of liberty, that those forces joyned themselves with his. The sudden departure of the enemy seeming to be a flight, caused Sardanapalus to feast his Army, triumphing before victory. But the Rebels being strengthened with this new supply, came upon him by night, and forced his Camp, which through over-great security was unprepared for resistance.

This overthrow did so weaken the Kings heart, that leaving his Wives Brother Salamenus to keep the Field, he withdrew himself into the City of Nineve; which, till new aids that he sent for should come, he thought easily to defend; it having been prophesied, that Nineve should never be taken, till the River were Enemy to the Town. Of the greatness and strength of Nineve, enough hath been spoken in our discourse of Ninus. It was so well victualled, that Arbaces (having in two battels overthrown the Kings Army, and slain Salamenus) was fain to lye two whole years before it, in hope to win it by famine; whereof yet he saw no appearance. It seems that he wanted Engines and skill to force those Walls, which were an hundred foot high, and thick enough for three Chariots in front to pass upon the rampire. But that which he could not do in two years, the River of Tigris did in the third: for being high swoln with rains, it not only drowned a part of the City through which it ran, but threw down twenty furlongs of the Wall, and made a fair breach for Arbaces to enter.

Sardanapalus, either terrified with the accomplishment of the old Oracle, or seeing no means of resistance left, shutting up himself into his Palace, with his Wives, Eunuchs, and all his Treasures, did set the house on fire, wherewith he and they were together consumed. Strabo speaks of a Monument of his, that was in Anchiale, a City of Cilicia, whereon was found an inscription, shewing that he built that City and Tharsus upon one day: but the addition hereto, bidding Men eat and drink, and make merry, encouraged others with verses well known, to a voluptuous life, by his own example testified that his nature was more prone to sensuality, than to any vertue beseeming a Prince. Strab. l. 9.

There are some that faintly report otherwise of his end, saying that Arbaces, when he first found him among his Concubines, was so enraged, that suddenly he slew him with a dagger. But the more general consent of Writers agrees with this relation of Diodorus Siculus, who citeth Ctesias a Greek Writer, that lived in the Court of Persia, where the truth might best be known. Diod. Sic. l. 2. c. 7.

Concerning the Princes which reigned in Assyria, from the time of Semiramis, unto Sardanapalus, though I believe that they were sometimes (yet not, as Orosius hath it, incessantly) busied in offensive, or else defensive arms; yet for the most part of them I do better trust Diodorus Siculus, who saith that their names were over passed by Ctesias, because they did nothing worthy of memory. Whatsoever they did, that which Theophilus Antiochenus hath said of them is very true; Silence and Oblivion have oppressed them. Diod. l. 2. c. 6. Theophilus Antiochenus l. 2.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of UZZIAH.

SECT. I.

The Prosperity of Uzziah and of Jeroboam the second, who reigned with him in Israel. Of the Anarchy that was in the ten Tribes after the death of Jeroboam. Of Zachariah, Sallum, Menahem, and Pekahiah.

UZzia, who is called Ahazia, the son of Jotham, was made King of Juda, when he was sixteen years old, in the seven and twentieth year of Jeroboam the son of Joas King of Israel. He served the God of his father David, and had therefore good success in all his enterprises. He built Eloth, a Town that stood near to the Red Sea, and restored it to Juda. He overcame the Philistims, of whose Towns he dismantled some, and built others in sundry parts of their Territories: Also he got the mastery over some parts of Arabia, and brought the Ammonites to pay him Tribute. Such was the fruits of his prosperous Wars, wherein (as Josephus rehearseth his acts) he began with the Philistims, and then proceeded unto the Arabians and Ammonites. His Army consisted of three hundred and seven thousand men of War, over which were appointed two thousand and six hundred Captains. For all this multitude the King prepared shields, and spears, and helmets, and other Arms requisite; following therein happily a course quite opposite unto that which some of his late Predecessours had held, who thought it better policy to use the service of the Nobility, than of the multitude; carrying forth to war the Princes, and all the Chariots.

2 Chro. 26. 14.

2. Chro. c. 21. v. 9.

As the Victories of Uzzia were far more important, than the atcheivments of all that had reigned in Juda, since the time of David; so were his riches and magnificent workes, equal, if not superiour to any of theirs that had been Kings between him and Solomon. For, besides that great conquests are wont to repay the charges of War with triple interest, he had the skil to use, as well as the happiness to get. He turned his lands to the best use, keeping Plough-men and Dressers of Vines, in grounds convenient for such husbandry. In other places he had Cattel feeding; whereof he might well keep great store, having won so much from the Ammonties and Arabians, that had abundance of wast ground serving for pasturage. For defence of his Cattel and Heardsmen, he built Towers in the Wilderness. He also digged many Cisterns or Ponds. Josephus calls them Water-courses; but in such dry grounds, it was enough that he found water, by digging in the most likely places. If by these Towers he so commanded the water, that none could without his consent, relieve themselves therewith, questionless he took the onely course, by which he might securely hold the Lordship over all the Wilderness; it being hardly passable, by reason of the extream drought, when the few Springs therein found, are left free to the use of Travellers.

Besides all this cost, and the building both of Eloth by the Red Sea, and of sundry Towns among the Philistims; he repaired the wall of Jerusalem, which Joas had broken down, and fortified it with Towers, whereof some were an hundred and fifty Cubits high.

The state of Israel did never so flourish, as at this time, since the division of the twelve Tribes into two Kingdoms. For as Uzzia prevailed in the South, so (if not more) Jeroboam the son of Joas, King of the ten Tribes, enlarged his border on the North; where obtaining many victories against the Syrians, he wan the Royal City of Damascus, and he wan Hamath, with all the country thereabout, from the entring of Hamath, unto the Sea of the Wilderness, that is (as the most expound it) unto the vast desarts of Arabia, the end whereof was undiscovered. So the bounds of Israel in those parts, were in time of this Jeroboam, the same (or not much narrower) which they had been in the reign of David.

2 King. 14. 25, 28.

But it was not for the piety of Jeroboam, that he thrived so well, for he was an Idolater, it was only the compassion which the Lord had on Israel, seeing the exceeding bitter affliction whereinto the Aramites had brought his people, which caused him to alter the succession of war, and to throw the victorious Aramites under the feet of those whom they had so cruelly oppressed. The line of Jehu to which God had promised the Kingdom of Israel unto the fourth generation, was now not far from the end; and now again it was invited to repentance by new benefits, as it hath been at the beginning. But the sin of Jeroboam the son of Nebat was held so precious, that neither the Kingdom it self given to him by God, was able to draw Jehu from that politick Idolatry: nor the misery falling upon him and his posterity, to bring them to a better Course of Religion; nor yet, at the last, this great Prosperity of Jeroboam the son of Joas, to make him render the honour that was due to the onely Giver of victory. Wherefore the promise of God made unto Jehu, that his sons, unto the fourth generation, should sit on the throne of Israel, was not enlarged; but being almost expired, gave warning of the approaching end, by an accident (so strange, that we who find no particulars recorded, can hardly guess at the occasions) foregoing the last accomplishment.

1 Reg. 10. 13.

When Jeroboam the son of Joas, after a victorious reign of one and forty years, had ended his life; it seems in all reason that Zacharia his son should forthwith have been admitted to reign in his stead; the Nobility of that race having gotten such a lustre by the immediate succession of four Kings, that any Competitor, had the Crown passed by election, must needs have appeared base; and the vertue of the last King having been so great, as might well serve to lay the foundation of a new house, much more to establish the already confirmed right of a family ſo rooted in poſſeſſion. All this notwithſtanding, two or three and twenty years did paſs before Zacharia the Son of Jeroboam was, by uniform conſent, recieved as King. The true original cauſes hereof were to be found at Dan and Bethel, where the golden Calves did ſtand; yet ſecond Inſtruments of this diſturbance are likely not to have been wanting, upon which the wiſdom of man was ready to caſt an eye. Probable it is, that the Captains of the army (who afterwards ſlew one another ſo faſt, that in fourteen years there reigned five Kings) did now by head-ſtrong violence, rend the Kingdom aſunder, holding each what he could, and either deſpiſing or hating ſome qualities in Zacharia; until, after many years, being wearied with diſſention, and the principal of them perhaps, being taken out of the way by death, for want of any other eminent man, they conſented to yeild all quietly to the ſon of Jeroboam. That this Anarchy laſted almoſt three and twenty years, we find by the difference of time between the fifteenth year of Uzzia, which was the laſt of Jeroboam his one and fortieth (his ſeven and twentieth concurring with the firſt of Uzzia) and the eight and thirtieth of the ſame Uzzia, in the laſt ſix months whereof Zacharia reigned in Samaria. There are ſome indeed that by ſuppoſing Jeroboam to have reigned with his father eleven years, do cut of the interregnum in Juda (before mentioned) and by the ſame reaſon abridge this Anarchy that was before the reign of Zacharia in Iſrael. Yet they leave it twelve years long: which is time to prove that the Kingdom of the ten tribes was no leſs diſtempered than as is already noted. But I chooſe rather to follow the more common opinion, as concurring more exactly with the times of other Princes reigning abroad in the World, than this doubtfull conjecture, that gives to Jeroboam two and fifty years, by adding three quarters of his fathers reign unto his own; which was it ſelf indeed ſo long, that he may well ſeem to have begun it very young: for I do not think that God bleſſed this Idolater both with a longer reign, and with a longer life than he did his ſervant David.

Thus much being ſpoken of the time wherein the throne of Iſrael was void, before the reign of Zachariah; little may ſuffice to be ſaid of his reign it ſelf, which laſted but a little while, Six months only was he King; in which time he declared himſelf a worſhipper of the golden Calves; which was enough to juſtifie the judgment of God; whereby he was ſlain. He was the laſt of Jehu's houſe, being (incluſively) the firſt of that line; which may have been ſome cauſe of the troubles impeaching his orderly ſucceſſion: the propheſie having determined that race in the fourth generation. But (beſides that Gods promiſe was extended to the utmoſt) there was no warrant given to Sallum, or to any other, for the death of Zacharia, as had been given to Jehu for the ſlaughter of Jeboram, and for the eradication of Ahab's houſe.

2 King. 15. 13. Zacharia having been ſix months a King, was then ſlain by Sallum, who reigned after him, the ſpace of a moneth in Samaria. What this Sallum was I do not find; ſave only that he was a Traytor, and the ſon of one Jabeſh, whereby his father got no honour. It ſeems that he was one of thoſe who in time of faction had laboured for himſelf, and now, when all other Competitors were ſitten down, thought eaſily to prevail againſt that King in whoſe perſon the race of Jehu was to fail. Manifeſt it is that Shallum had a ſtrong party, for Tiphſah or Thapſah, and the coaſt thereof even from Tirzah, where Menahem, his enemy and ſupplanter, then lay, refuſed to admit, as King in his ſtead, the man that murdered him. Yet at the end of one month, Sallum received the reward of his treaſon, and was ſlain by Menahem who reigned in his place.

Menahem the ſon of Gadi, reigned after Sallum ten years. In oppoſition to Sallum, his hatred was deadly, and inhumane, for he not onely deſtroyed Tiphſah, and all that were therein, or thereabouts, but he ript up all their women with child, becauſe they did not open their gates and let him in. Had this cruelty been uſed in reveng of Zacharia's death, it is like that he would have been as earneſt, in procuring unto him his fathers Crown when it was firſt due. But in performing that office, there was uſed ſuch long deliberation, that we may plainly diſcover Ambition, Diſdain, and other private paſſions, to have been the cauſes of this beaſtly outrage.

In the time of Menahem, and (as it ſeems) in the beginning of his reign, Pul, King of Aſſyria, came againſt the land of Iſrael, whom this new King appeaſed, with a thouſand talents of ſilver, levied upon all the ſubſtantial men in his countrey. With this money the Iſraelite purchaſed, not only the peace of his Kingdom; but his own eſtabliſhment therein: ſome factious man (belike) having either invited Pul thither, or (if he came uncalled) ſought to uſe his help, in depoſing this ill-beloved King. Joſephus reports of this Menahem, that his reign was no milder than his entrance. But after ten years, his Tyranny ended with his life: and Pekahia his Son occupied his room. Joſ. Ant. l. 9. c. 11.

Of this Pekahia the ſtory is ſhort: for he reigned only two years, at the end whereof he was ſlain by Peka the ſon of Ramalia, whoſe treaſon was rewarded with the Crown of Iſrael, as in time coming, another mans Treaſon againſt himſelf ſhall be. There needs no more to be ſaid of Menahem and his ſon, ſave that they were both of them Idolaters, and the ſon (as we find in Joſephus) like to his father in cruelty. Concerning Pul the Aſſyrian King, who firſt opened unto thoſe Northern Nations the way into Paleſtina; it will ſhortly follow in order of the Story, to deliver our opinion: whether he were that Beloſus (called alſo Beleſes, and by ſome Phul Belochus) who joyned with Arbaces the Median againſt Sardanapalus, or whether he was ſome other man. At the preſent it is more fit that we relate the end of Uzzia's life, who out lived the happineſs wherein we left him. Joſ. ibid.

SECT. II.

The end of Uzzia his Reign and Life.

AS the zeal of Jehojada that godly Prieſt was the mean to preſerve the lineage of David in the perſon of Joas, ſo it appears; that the care of holy men was not wanting to Uzzia, to bring him up and advance him to the Crown of Juda, when the hatred born to his Father Amazia had endangered his ſucceſſion. For it is ſaid of Uzzia, That he ſought God in the days of Zacharia (which underſtood the viſions of God) and when as he ſought the Lord, God made him proſper. 2 Chron. 26. 5.

But, when he was ſtrong, his heart was lifted up to his deſtruction: for he tranſgreſſed againſt the Lord his God, and went into the Temple of the Lord to burn incenſe upon the Altar of incenſe. Thus he thought to enlarge his own authority, by medling in the Prieſts office, whoſe power had in every extremity been ſo helpful to the Kings of Juda, that meer gratitude and civil policy, ſhould have held back Uzzia from Verſ. 16.

incroaching thereupon; yea, though the Law of God hath been silent in this case, and not forbidding it. Howsoever, the King forgot his Duty, the Priests remembred theirs, and God forgat not to assist them. Azariah the high Priest interrupted the Kings purpose, and gave him to understand how little to his honour it would prove, that he took upon him the Office of the sons of Aaron. There were with Azariah fourscore other Priests, valiant men, but their valour was shewed only in assisting the high Priest, when (according to his duty) he reprehended the Kings presumption. This was enough, the rest God himself performed.

We read in Josephus, that the King had apparreled himself in Priestly habit, and that he threatned Azariah and his Companions, to punish them with death, unless they would be quiet. Josephus indeed inlargeth the Story, by inserting a great Earthquake, which did tear down half an Hill, that rowled four furlongs, till it rested against another Hill, stopping up the high-wayes, and spoiling the Kings Garden in the Passage. With this Earth-quake, he saith, that the Roof of the Temple did cleave, and that a Sun-beam did light upon the Kings face, which was presently infected with Leprosie. All this may have been true, and some there are who think that this Earth-quake is the same, which is mentioned by the Prophet Amos; wherein they do much misreckon the times. For the Earth-quake spoken of by Amos, was in the dayes of Jeroboam King of Israel, who dyed seven and thirty years before Uzziah, so that Jotham the son of Uzziah, which supplied his Fathers place in government of the Land, should, by this accompt, have been then unborn: for he was but five and twenty years old, when he began to reign as King. Therefore thus far only we have assurance; that while Uzzia was wroth with the Priests, the Leprosie rose up in his forehead, before the Priests. Hereupon he was caused in all haste to depart the place, and to live in a house by himself until he died, the rule over the Kings House, and over all the Land, being committed to Jotham his Son and Successour. Jotham took not upon himself the stile of a King, till his Father was dead: whom they buried in the same Field wherein his Ancestors lay interred, yet in a Monument apart from the rest, because he was a Leper.

SECT. III.

Of the Prophets which lived in the time of Uzzia; and of Princes then ruling in Egypt, and in some other Countries.

IN the time of Uzzia were the first of the lesser Prophets, Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadia and Jonas. It is not indeed set down, when Joel or Obadia did prophecy, but if the Prophets, whose times are not expressed, ought to be ranged (according to Saint Hierom's rule) with the next before them; then must these two be judged contemporary with Hosea and Amos, who lived under King Uzzia. To enquire which of these five was the most ancient, it may perhaps be thought, at least, a superfluous labour; yet if the age wherein Homer lived hath so plentifully been sought, without reprehension, how can he be taxed, which offers to search out the antiquity of these holy Prophets?

It seems to me that the first of these in order of time, was the Prophet Jonas; who foretold the great Victories of Jeroboam King of Israel, and therefore is likely to have propheſied in the dayes of Joas, whilst the afflictions of Israel was exceeding bitter; the Text it self intimating no less: by which consequence he was elder than the other Prophets, whose works are now extant. But his Prophecies that concerned the Kingdom of Israel are now lost. that which remaineth of him, seems, not without reason unto some very learned, to have belonged unto the time of Sardanapalus, in whose dayes Ninive was first of all destroyed. This Prophet rather taught Christ by his Sufferings, than by his Writings, now extant: in all the rest are found express promises of the Messias.

2. Chro. c. 24. v. 25. 26.

In the Reign of Uzzia likewise it was, that Esay the first of the four great Prophets, began to see his Visions. This difference of Greater and Lesser Prophets is taken from the Volumns which they have left written, (as S. Augustine gives reason of the distinction) because the greater hath written larger Books. The Prophet Esay was great indeed, not only in regard of his much writing, or of his Nobility, (for their opinion is rejected, who think him to have been the Son of Amos, the Prophet) and the high account wherein he lived; but for the excellency both of his stile and argument, wherin he so plainly foretelleth the Birth, Miracles, Passion, and whole History of our Saviour, with the Calling of the Gentiles, that he might as well be called an Evangelist, as a Prophet; having written in such wise, That (as Hierome saith) one would think he did not foretel of things to come, but compile an History of matters already past.

Hier. in præf. super Isaiam.

Bocchoris was King of Egypt, and the ninth year of his reign, by our computation (whereof in due place we will give reason) was current, when Uzzia took possession of the Kingdom of Juda.

After the death of Bocchoris, Aschis followed in the Kingdom of Egypt: unto him succeeded Amyſis, and these two occupied that Crown six years. Then Sabacus, an Æthiopian became King of Egypt, and held it fifty years, whereof the ten first ran along with the last of Uzzia his reign and life. Of these and other Egyptian Kings, more shall be spoken, when their affairs shall come to be intermedled with the business of Juda.

In Athens, the two last years of Aripbron his twenty, the seven and twentieth of Thespaius, the twentieth of Agamnestor, and the three first of Æschylus his three and twenty, made even with the two and fifty of Uzzia: as likewise did in Alba the last seven of Silvius Aventinus his seven and thirty, together with the three and twenty of Silvius Procas, and two and twenty the first of Silvius Amulius. In Media, Arbaces began his new Kingdom in the first of Uzzia, wherein, after eight and twenty years, his son Sosarmus succeeded him, and reigned thirty years. Of this Arbaces, and the division of the Assyrian Empire, between him and others, when they had oppressed Sardanapalus, I hold it convenient to use more particular discourse, that we may not wander in too great uncertainty in the story of the Assyrian Kings, who have already found the way into Palestina, and are not likely to forget it.

SECT. IV.

Of the Assyrian Kings, descending from Phul: Whether Phul and Belosus were one person, or heads of sundry families, that reigned a part in Nineve and Babylon.

BY that which hath formerly been shewed of Sardanapalus his death, it is apparent, that the chief therein was Arbaces the Median; to whom the rest of the Confederates did not onely submit themselves in that War, but were contented afterwards to be judged by him, receiving by his Authority, sentence of death or pardon of their forfeited lives. The first example of his power was shewn upon Belosus the Babylonian, by whose special advice and help, Arbaces himself was become so great: Yet was not this power of Arbaces exercised in so tyrannical a manner, as might give offence in that great alteration of things, either to the Princes that had assisted him, or to the generality of the people. For in the condemnation of Belosus, he used the counsel of his other Captains, and then pardoned him of his own grace; allowing him to hold not onely the City and Province of Babylon, but also those treasures, for the embezelling whereof his life had been endangered.

In like manner, he gave rewards to the rest of his partakers, and made them Rulers of Provinces: retaining (as it appears) onely the Soveraignty to himself, which to use immoderately, he did naturally abhor. He is said, indeed, to have excited the Medes against Sardanapalus, by propounding unto them hope of transferring the Empire to their Nation. And to make good this his promise, he destroyed the City of Nineve, permitting the Citizens nevertheless to carry away every one his own goods. The other Nations that joyned with him, as the Persians and Bactrians he drew to his side, by the allurement of liberty; which he himself so greatly loved, that by slackning too much the reins of his own Soveraignty, he did more harm to the general estate of Media than the pleasure of the freedom, which it enjoyed, could recompence. For both the Territory of that Country was pared narrower by Salmanassar, (or perhaps by some of his progenitours) whom we find in the Scriptures to have held some Towns of the Medes; and the civil administration was so disorderly, that the people themselves were glad to see that reformation, which Deioces the fift of Arbaces his Line, did make in that government, by reducing them into stricter terms of obedience.

How the force of the Assyrians grew to be such as might in fourscore years, if not sooner, both extend it self unto the conquest of Israel, and tear away some part of Media, it is a question hardly to be answered; not onely in regard of the destruction of Nineve, and the subversion of the Assyrian Kingdom, whereof the Medes, under Arbaces, had the honour, who may seem at that time to have kept the Assyrians under their subjection, when the rest of the Provinces were set at liberty; but in consideration of the Kings themselves, who reigning afterwards in Babylon and Nineve, are confounded by some, and distinguished by others; whereby their History is made uncertain.

I will first therefore deliver the opinion generally received, and the grounds whereupon it stands: then, producing the objections made against it, I will compare together the determination of that worthy man Joseph Scaliger, with those learned, that subscribe thereunto, and the judgement of others that were more ancient Writers, or have followed the Ancients in this doubtfull case. Neither shall it be needfull to set down a-part the several authorities and arguments of sundry men, adding somewhat of weight, or of clearnes one to another: it will be enough to relate the whole substance of each discourse: which I will do as briefly as I can, and without fear to be taxed of partiality, as being no more addicted to the one opinion than to the other, by any fancie of my own, but meerly led by those reasons, which upon examination of each part, seemed to me most forceable, though to others they may perhaps appear weak.

That which, until of late, hath passed as current, is this; That Belosus was the same King, who, first of the Assyrians, entred Palestina with an Armie; being called Pul, or Phul, in the Scriptures, and by Annius his authors with such as follow them, Phul Belochus. Of this man it is said, that he was a skilful Astrologer, subtile, and ambitious; that he got Babylon by composition made with Arbaces; and not therewith content, he got into his hand part of Assyria: finally that he reigned eight and fortie years, and then dying, left the Kingdom to Teglat-phalassar his son, in whose Posterity it continued some few descents, till the house of Merodach prevailed. The truth of this, if Annius his Metasthenes were sufficient proof, could not be gainsaid; for that Author (such as he is) is peremptorie herein. But howsoever Annius his Authors deserve to be suspected, it stands with no reason, that we should conclude all to be false which they affirme. They, who maintain this Tradition, justifie it by divers good Allegations, as a matter confirmed by circumstances found in all Authors, and repugnant unto no historie at all. For it is manifest by the relation of Diodorus (which is indeed the foundation whereupon all have built) that Arbaces and Belosus were partners in the action against Sardanapalus; and that the Bactrians, who joyned with them, were thought well rewarded with liberty, as likewise other Captains were with governments: but that any third person was so eminent, as to have Assyria it self, the cheife Countrey of the Empire, bestowed upon him, it is a thing whereof not the least appearance is found in any Historie. And certainly it stood with little reason, that the Assyrians should be committed unto a peculiar King, at such time as it was not meet to trust them in their own walls and houses. Rather it is apparent, that the destruction of Nineve by Arbaces, and the transplantation of the Citizens, was held a needfull policy, because thereby the people of that Nation might be kept down from aspiring to recover the Soveraignty, which else they would have thought to belong, as of right, unto the Seat of the Empire.

Upon such considerations did the Romans, in ages long after following, destroy Carthage and dissolve the Corporation, or body politick, of the Citizens of Capua; because those two Towns were capable of the Empire: a matter esteemed over-dangerous, even to Rome it self, that was Mistresse of them both. This being so, how can it be thought that the Assyrians in three or four years had erected their Kingdom a-new, under one Pul? or what must this Pul have been (of whose deservings or intermedling, or indeed of whose very name, we find no mention in the War against Sardanapalus) to whom the principal parts of the Empire fell either by general consent in the division of the Provinces, or by his own power and purchase very soon after? Surely he was none other then Belosus; whose neer neighbourhood gave him opportunity (as he was wise enough to to play his own game) both to get Assyria to himself, and to impeach any other man that should have attempted to seize upon it. The Province of Babylon, which Belosus held, being as (Herodotus reports) in riches and power, as good as the third part of the Persian Empire, was able to furnish him with all that was requisite for such a business: if that were not enough, he had gotten into his own hands all the gold and silver that had been in the Palace of Nineve. And questionless, to restore such a City as Nineve, was an enterprise fit for none to take in hand, except he had such means, as Belosus had, which Pul, if he were not Belosus, is likely to have wanted.

Herodot. l. 1.

Besides all this, had Pul been a distinct person from Belosus, and Lord of Assyria, which lay beyond the Countries of Babylon and Mesopotamia, it would not have been an easie matter for him, to pass quite through another mans Kingdom with an Army, seeking booty afar off in Israel: the onely action by which the name of Phul is known. But if we grant, that he, whom the Scriptures call Pul or Phul, was the same whom prophane writers have called Belosus, Beleses, or Belestis (in like manner as Josephus acknowledgeth, that he whom the Scriptures called never otherwise then Darius the Mede, was the son of Astiages, and called of the Greeks by another name, that is, Cyaxeres) then is this scruple utterly removed. For Babylon and Mesopotamia did border upon Syria and Palestina: so that Belosus having settled his affairs in Assyria towards the East and North, might with good leisure encroach upon the Countries that lay on the other side of his Kingdom, to the South and West. He that looks into all particulars, may find every one circumstance concurring, to prove that Phul, who invaded Israel, was no other then Belosus. For the Prince of the Arabians, who joyned with Arbaces, and brought no small part of the forces wherewith Sardanapalus was overthrown, did enter into that action, meerly for the love of Belosus. The friendship of these Arabians was a thing of main importance, to those that were to pass over Euphrates with an Army into Syria. Wherefore Belosus, that held good correspondence with them, and whose most fruitfull Province, adjoyning to their barren quarters, might yearly do them inestimable pleasures, was not only likely to have quiet passage through their borders, but their utmost assistance: yea it stands with good reason, that they who loved not Israel, should for their own behoof have given him intelligence of the destructions and civil broyles among the ten Tribes; whereby as this Pul got a thousand talents, so it seems that the Syrians and Arabians, that had felt an heavy neighbour of Jeroboam, recovered their own, setting up a new King in Damasco, and clearing the coast of Arabia, (from the Sea of the Wilderness to Hamath) of the Hebrew Garrisons. Neither was it any new acquaintance, that made the Nations, divided by Euphrates, hold together in so good terms of friendship: it was ancient consanguinity, the memory whereof was availeable to the Syrians, the time of David, when the Aramites beyond the river came over willingly, to the succour of Hadadezer, and the Aramites about Damasco. So Belosus had good reason to look into those parts: what a King reigning so far off as Nineve, should have to do in Syria, if the other end of his Kingdom had not reached to Euphrates, it were hard to shew.

Joseph. Ant. l. 10. c. 12.

But concerning this last Argument of the business which might allure the Chaldeans into Palestina, it may be doubted, lest it should seem to have ill coherence with that which hath been said of the long Anarchy that was in the ten Tribes. For if the Crown of Israel were worn by no man in three and twenty years, then it is likely that Belosus was either unwilling to stir, or unable to take the advantage when it was fairest and first discovered. This might have compelled those, who alone were not strong enough to seek after help from some Prince that lay further off; and so the opinion of those that distinguish Phul from Belosus, would be somewhat confirmed.

On the other side, if we say, that Belosus did pass the river of Euphrates, as soon as he found likelyhood of making a prosperous journey, then may it seem that the inter-regnum in Israel was not so long as we have made it: for three and twenty years leisure would have afforded better opportunity, which ought not to have been lost.

For answer hereunto, we are to consider, what Orosius and Eusebius have written concerning the Chaldees: the one, that after the departure of Arbaces into Media, they laid hold on a part of the Empire: the other, that they prevailed and grew mighty, between the times of Arbaces and Deioces, the Medes: Now, though it be held an errour of Orosius, where he supposeth that the occupying of Babylonia by the Chaldeans was in a manner of a rebellion from the Medes; yet herein he and Eusebius do concur, that the authority of Arbaces did restrain the ambition, which by his absence grew bold, and by his death, regardfull onely of it self. Now, though some have conjectured that all Assyria was given to Belosus (as an overplus, besides the Provinces of Babylon which was his, by plain bargain made aforehand) in regard of his high deservings; yet the opinion more commonly received, is, that he did onely encroach upon that Province by little and little, whilest Arbaces lived, and afterwards by dealing more openly, got it all himself. Seeing therefore, that there passed but twelve years between the death of Arbaces, and the beginning of Menahem his Reign; manifest it is, that the conquest of Assyria, and settling of that Countrey, was work enough to hold Belosus occupied, besides the restauration of Nineve, which thing alone was able to take up all the time remaining of his reign, if perhaps he lived to see it finished in his own days. So that this argument may rather serve to prove that Phul and Belosus were one person. Forasmuch as the journey of Phul against Israel was not made until Belosus could find leisure; and the time of advantage which Belosus did let slip, argued his busines in some other quarter, namely, in that province of which Phul is called King. Briefly, it may be said, that he who conquered Assyria, and performed somewhat upon a Country so far distant as Palestina, was likely to have been, at least, named in some History, or, if not himself, yet his Country to have been spoken of, for those victories: but we neither hear of Phul, in any prophane Author; neither doth any Writer, sacred or prophane, once mention the victories or acts whatsoever of the Assyrians, done in those times; whereas of Belosus, and the power of the Chaldeans, we find good Record.

Surely that great slaughter of so many thousand Assyrians, in the quarrel of Sardanapalus, together with other calamities of that long and unfortunate war, which overwhelmed the whole Country, ending but with the ruine and utter desolation of Nineve, must needs have so weakned the state of Assyria, that it could not in thirty years space be able to invade Palestina, which the ancient Kings, reigning in Nineve, had, in all their greatness, forborn to attempt. Yet these afflictions, disabling that Country, did help to enable Belosus to subdue it; who having once extended his Dominion to the borders of Media, and being (especially if he had compounded with the Medes) by the interposition of that Countrey, ſecure of the Scythians, and other warlike Nations on that ſide, might very well turn Southward, and try his fortune in thoſe Kingdoms, whereinto civil diſſention of the inhabitants, and the bordering envy of the Arabians and Aramites about Damaſco, Friends and Couſins to the Chaldeans and Meſopotamians, did invite him. For theſe, and the other before alledged reaſons, it may be concluded, That what is ſaid of Pul in the Scriptures, ought to be underſtood of Beloſus; even as by the names of Nebuchadnezzar, Darius the Mede, Artaſhaſht, and Ahaſhueroſh, with the like, are thought, or known to be meant the ſame, whom prophane Hiſtorians, by names better known in their own Countries, have called Nabopollaſſar, Cyaxares, and Artaxerxes: eſpecially conſidering, that hereby we ſhall neither contradict any thing that hath been written of old, or need to trouble our ſelves or others with framing new conjectures. This in effect, is that which they alledge in maintenance of the opinion commonly received.

Now this being once granted, other things of more importance will of themſelves eaſily follow. For it is a matter of no great conſequence to know the truth of this point (conſidering it apart from that which depends thereon) Whether Pul were Beloſus, or ſome other man: the whole race of theſe Aſſyrian and Babylonian Kings, wherein are found thoſe famous Princes, Nabonaſſar, Mardocempadus, and Nabopollaſſar (famous for the Aſtronomical obſervations recorded from their times) is the main ground of this contention. If therefore Beloſus or Beleſes were that Phul that invaded Iſrael; if he and his poſterity reigned both in Nineve and in Babylon, if he were father of Teglat-phul-Aſer, from whom Salmanaſſar, Senacherib, and Aſarhaddon deſcended; then it is manifeſt, that we muſt ſeek Nabonaſſar, the Babylonian King, among thoſe Princes, yea and conclude him to be none other than Salmanaſſar, who is known to have reigned in thoſe years which Ptolomy the Mathematitian hath aſſigned unto Nabonaſſar. As for Merodech, who ſupplanted Aſar-haddon, manifeſt it is, that he and his ſucceſſors were of another houſe. This is the ſcope and end of all his Diſputation.

But they that maintain the contrary part, will not be ſatisfied with ſuch Conjectures. They lay hold upon the Concluſion, and by ſhaking that into pieces, hope to overthrow all the Premiſes upon which it is inferred. For (ſay they) if Nabonaſſar that reigned in Babylon, could not be Salmanaſſar, or any of thoſe Aſſyrian Kings, then it is manifeſt that the races were diſtinct, and that Phul and Beloſus were ſeveral Kings. This conſequence is ſo plain, that it needs no confirmation. To prove that Nabonaſſar was a diſtinct perſon from Salmanaſſar, are brought ſuch Arguments as would ſtagger the reſolution of him that had ſworn to hold the contrary.

For firſt, Nabonaſſar was King of Babylon, and not of Aſſyria; this is proved by his Name, which is meerly Chaldean, whereas Salman, the firſt part of Salmanaſſar's name is proper to the Aſſyrians.

It is likewiſe proved by the Aſtronomical obſervations, which proceeding from the Babylonians, not from the Aſſyrians, do ſhew that Nabonaſſar, from whom Ptolomy draws that Epocha, or account of times, was a Babylonian and no Aſſyrian.

Thirdly, and more ſtrongly, it is confirmed by the ſucceſſor of Nabonaſſar, which was Mardocempadus, Eſay 39. 1. called in his own language Merodac-ken-pad, but more briefly in Eſay his Prophecy, Merodac, by the former part of his Name; or Merodach Baladan, the ſon of Baladan. Now if Merodach the ſon of Baladan King of Babel were the ſon of Nabonaſſar, then was Nabonaſſar none other than Baladan King of Babel, and not Salmanaſſar King of Aſſyria.

What can be plainer? As for the cadence of theſe two names, Nabonaſſar and Salmanaſſar, which in Greek or Latine writing, hath no difference, we are taught by Scaliger, that in the Hebrew letters there is found no affinity therein.

So concerning the places of Babylonia, whereinto Salmanaſſar carried captive ſome part of the ten Tribes, it may well be granted, that in the Province of Babylon, Salmanaſſar had gotten ſomewhat, yet will it not follow that he was King of Babylon it ſelf.

To conclude, Merodach began his reign over Babylon in the ſixth year of Hezekia, at which time Salmanaſſar took Samaria; therefore if Salmanaſſar were King of Babylon, then muſt we ſay that he and Merodach, yea, and Nabonaſſar, were all one man. Theſe are the arguments of that noble and learned Writer Joſeph Scaliger; who not contented to follow the common opinion founded upon likelihood of conjectures, hath drawn his proofes from matter of more neceſſary inference.

Touching all that was ſaid before of Phul Beloſus, for the proving that Phul and Beloſus were not ſundry Kings; Joſeph Scaliger pities their ignorance, that have ſpent their labour to ſo little purpoſe. Honeſt and painfull men he confeſſeth that they were, who by their diligence might have won the good liking of their Readers, had they not by mentioning Annius his Authors, given ſuch offences that men refuſed thereupon to read their Books and Chronologies. A ſhort anſwer.

For mine own part, howſoever I believe nothing that Annius his Beroſus, Metaſthenes, and others of that ſtamp affirm, in reſpect of their bare authority; yet am I not ſo ſqeamiſh, but that I can well enough digeſt a good book, though I find the names of one or two of theſe good fellows alledged in it: I have (ſomewhat peradventure too often) already ſpoken my mind of Annius his Authors: Nevertheleſſe, I may ſay here again, that where other Hiſtories are ſilent, or ſpeak not enough, there may we, without ſhame, borrow of theſe, as much as agrees with that little which elſewhere we find, and ſerveth to explain or inlarge it without improbabilities.

Neither indeed are thoſe honeſt and painfull men (as Scaliger terms them, meaning, if I miſtake him not, good ſilly fellows) who ſet down the Aſſyrian Kings from Pul forwards, as Lords alſo of Babylon; taking Pul for Beloſus, and Salmonaſſar for Nabonaſſar, ſuch Writers, as a man ſhould be aſhamed or unwilling to read. For (to omit a multitude of others, that herein follow Annius, though diſliking him in general) Gerard Mercator is not ſo ſlight a Chronologer, that he ſhould be laughed out of doors with the name of an honeſt meaning fellow.

But I will not make compariſons between Scaliger and Mercator; they were both of them men notably learned: let us examine the arguments of Scaliger, and ſee whether they be of ſuch force as cannot either be reſiſted or avoided. It will eaſily be granted, that Nabonaſſar was King of Babylon; that he was not King of Aſſyria, ſome men doubt whether Scaliger's reaſons be enough to prove. For though Nabonaſſar be a Chaldean name, and Salmanaſſar an Aſſyrian; yet what hinders us from believing that one man in two languages might be called by two ſeveral names? That Aſtronomy flouriſhed among the Chaldees, is not enough to prove Nabonaſſar either an Aſtrologer or a Chaldean. So it is, that Scaliger himſelf calls them. Prophetas neſcio quos, qui Nabonaſſarum Aſtronomum fuiſſe in ſomniis viderunt; Prophets I know not who, that in their ſleep have dreamt of Nabonaſſar, that he was an Aſtrologer. Scal. Canon l. 3.

Whether

Whether Nabonaſſar were an Aſtrologer or no, I cannot tell; it is hard to maintain the negative: But as his being Lord over the Chaldeans, doth not prove him to have been learned in their ſciences; ſo doth it not prove him not to have been alſo King of Aſſyria. The Emperour Charles the fift, who was born in Gant, and Philip his ſon, King of Spain, and Lords of the Netherlands, had men far more learned in all Sciences, and particularly in the Mathematicks, among their Subjects of the Low Countries, than were any that I read of then living in Spain, if Spain at that time had any; yet I think, Poſterity will not uſe this as an argument, to prove that Spain was none of theirs. It may well be, that Salmanaſſar or Nabonaſſar did uſe the Aſſyrian Souldiers, and Babylonian Scholars; but it ſeems, that he and his poſterity, by giving themſelves wholly to the more warlike Nation; loſt the richer, out of which they firſt iſſued, as likewiſe King Philip loſt partly, and partly did put to a dangerous hazard all the Netherlands, by ſuch a courſe. As for the two unanſwerable arguments (as Scaliger terms them, being methinks none other then anſwers to ſomewhat that is or might be alledged on the contrary ſide) one of them which is drawn from the unlike ſound and writing of thoſe names Salmanaſſar and Nabonaſſar in the Hebrew, I hold a point, about which no man will diſpute; for it is not likeneſs of ſound, but agreement of time, and many circumſtances elſe, that muſt take away the diſtinction of perſons: the other likewiſe may be granted, which is, that Salmanaſſar might be Lord of ſome places in the Province of Babylon, yet not King of Babylon it ſelf: this indeed might be ſo, and it might be otherwiſe. Hitherto there is nothing ſave conjecture. But in that which is alledged out of the Prophet Eſay concerning Merodach the ſon of Baladan; and in that which is ſaid of this Merodach, and Mardokenpadus, his being the ſucceſſor of Nabonaſſar, and his beginning to reign in the ſixth year of Hezekia, I find matter of more difficulty, than can be anſwered in haſt. I wil therefore defer the handling of theſe objections until I meet with their ſubject in his proper place; which will be when we come to the time of Hezekia, wherein Merodach lived, and was King. Yet that I may not leave too great a ſcruple in the mind of the Reader, thus far will I here ſatisfie him; that how ſtrong ſoever this argument may ſeem, Scaliger himſelf did live to retract it, ingenuouſly confeſſing, that in thinking Merodach to be the ſon of Nabonaſſar, he had been deceived.

Now therefore let us conſider, in what ſort they have faſhioned their Story, who taking Pul to be a diſtinct perſon from Beloſus or Beleſis, have in like ſort, as was neceſſary, diſtinguiſhed their off-ſpring, making that of Pul to fail in Aſarhaddon, which left all to Merodach the Babylonian. And here I muſt firſt confeſs my want of Books, if perhaps there be many, that have gone about to reduce this narration into ſome ſuch order, as might preſent unto us the body of this Hiſtory, in one view. Divers, indeed, there are, whom I have ſeen, that ſince Joſeph Scaliger delivered his opinion, have written in favour of ſome one or other point thereof: but Setbus Calviſius himſelf, who hath abridged Scaliger's learned Work, De emendatione Temporum, hath not been careful to give us notice, how long Beloſus, Baladan, Pul, or Tiglat Pulaſſar did reign (perhaps becauſe he found it not expreſſed in Scaliger) but is content to ſet down Baladan, for the ſame perſon with Nabonaſſar, which Scaliger himſelf revoked.

In this caſe therefore I muſt lay down the plot of theſe divided Kingdoms, in ſuch ſort as I find it conceived by Auguſtinus Torniellus; who onely of all that I have ſeen, ſets down the ſucceſſion, continuance, and acts, of thoſe that reigned in Aſſyria after Sardanapalus, diſtinguiſhing them from Beloſus, and his Poſterity, of whom he hath the like remembrance. This Torniellus is a regular Clark of the congregation of S. Paul, whoſe Annals were printed the laſt year; he appears to me a man of a curious induſtry, ſound judgement, and free Spirit; yet many times (and I take it wilfully) forgetfull of thanking, or mentioning thoſe Proteſtant Writers, by whoſe Books he hath received good information, and enriched his works by inſerting ſome what of theirs. But in this buſineſs he hath openly profeſſed to follow Scaliger, whoſe help, without wrong or diſhonour to himſelf, he hath both uſed and acknowledged. For mine own part, I will not ſpare to do right unto Torniellus; but confeſs my ſelf to have received benefit by his writing; and wiſh that his Annals had ſooner come to light; for that as he hath confirmed me in ſome things, ſo would he have inſtructed me and imboldened me to write more fully and leſs timerously in other things, which now I have no leiſure to reviſe. Particularly in that conjecture (which I had faintly delivered, and yet feared leſt it had over haſtily paſſed out of my hand, and been expoſed to other mens conſtructions) of the four Kings that invaded the Valley of Siddim, and were ſlain by Abraham, I find him adventuring as I have done, to ſay, that they may propably be thought to have been ſome petty Lords; the contrary opinion of all Writers notwithſtanding. Cap. 1. Sect. 13. But now let us conſider how he hath ordered theſe laſt Aſſyrian and Babylonian Kings. After the deſtruction of Sardanapalus, Arbaces, being the moſt mighty, ſought to get all to himſelf, but was oppoſed by Beloſus; in which contention, one Phul, a powerfull man in Aſſyria, ſided with Beloſus, and they two prevailid ſo far, that finally Arbaces was content to ſhare the Empire with them, making ſuch a diviſion thereof, as was long after made of the Roman Empire between Octavian, Anthony, and Lepidus.

Another conjecture is (for Torniellus offers not this, or the reſt as matter of certainty) that Arbaces made himſelf Soveraign Lord of all, and placed the ſeat of his Empire in Media, appointing Beloſus his Lieutenant in Babylonia, and Phul in Aſſyria. But in ſhort ſpace, that is, in four years, it came to paſs by the juſt judgement of God, that Phul and Beloſus rebelled againſt Arbaces, like as Arbaces had done againſt Sardanapalus; and inſtead of being Viceroys, made themſelves abſolute Kings. And to this latter opinion Torniellus himſelf leans, holding it much the more probable, as being more agreeable to that which is found in prophane Hiſtories. Why he did make and publiſh the former ſuppoſing, reſolving to hold the latter, I ſhall anon, without any wrong to him make bold to gheſs. Having thus deviſed how Phul and Beloſus might, at the firſt, attain to be Kings, he orders their time and their ſucceſſours in this manner.

Four years after Arbaces, Phul begins to reign, and continues eight and forty years. Teglatphalaſſar (whoſe name, and the names of other Princes, I write diverſly, according to the Authors whom I have in hand are pleaſed to diverſifie them) ſucceeding unto Phul, reigned three and twenty. Salmanaſſar followed him, and reigned ten. After him Senacherib reigned ſeven: and when he was ſlain, Aſarhadden his ſon, ten years: in whom that line failed.

The ſame time that Phul took upon him as King of Aſſyria, or not long after (why not rather afore? for for ſo it had been more likely) Beloſus uſurped the Kingdom of Babylon, and held it threeſcore and eight years; at the leaſt, threeſcore and eight years did paſs before Nabonaſſar followed him in the poſſeſſion.

To Nabonaſſar, whom (with Scaliger) he thinks to be Baladen, are aſſigned ſix and twenty years: then two and fifty to Merodach, or Mardocempadus: four and twenty to Ben Merodach: and laſtly, one and twenty to Nabolaſſar the father of Nebuchodonoſor; who is like to offer matter of further diſputation.

Concerning the original of theſe Aſſyrian and Babylonian Kingdoms, I may truly ſay, That the conjectures of other men, who give all to Beloſus, and confound him with Phul, appear to me more nearly reſembling the truth. Neither do I think, that Torniellus would have conceived two different waies, by which Phul might have gotten Aſſyria (for how Beloſus came to get Babylon, it is plain enough) if either of them alone could have contented him. He adheres to the latter of the two, as better agreeing with Diodore, and other Hiſtorians. But he perceived, that to make Phul on a ſudden King of Aſſyria; or to give him ſo noble a Province, as would, of it ſelf, invite him to accept the name and power of a King, was a thing moſt unlikely to have happened, unleſs his deſerts (whereof we find no mention) had been proportionable to ſo high a reward. And for this cauſe (as I take it) hath he deviſed the means, whereby Phul might be made capable of ſo great a ſhare in the Empire. If this were a true or probable ſuppoſition, then would a new doubt ariſe,, Why this Phul being one of the three that divided all between them, was utterly forgotten by all Hiſtorians? yea, why this diviſion it ſelf, and the civil wars that cauſed it, were never heard of? Queſtionleſs; the interverting of ſome treaſures by Beloſus, with his Judgment, Condemnation, and Pardon following, were matters of farre leſſe note. Therefore I do not ſee, how one of the two inconveniences can this way be avoided; but that either we muſt confeſs the Dominion given to Phul to have been exceeding his merits; or elſe his merits, and name withal, to have been ſtrangely forgotten: either of which is enough to make us think, that rather the conjecture, inferring ſuch a ſequel, is wide of the truth. As for the rebellion of Phul, and Beloſus, againſt Arbaces, it was almoſt impoſſible for the Aſſyrians to recover ſuch ſtrength in foure yeares, as might ſerve to hold out in rebellion: for Beloſus it was needleſs to rebell, conſidering, that Arbaces did not ſeek to moleſt him, but rather permitted (as being an over great-favourer of liberty) even the Medes that were under his own Government, to do what they liſted.

But it is now fit that we peruſe the Catalogue of theſe Kings, not paſſing through them all (for ſome will require a large diſcourſe in their own times) but ſpeaking of their order and time in general. If it be ſo unlawful to think, that ſome of Annius his tales (let them all be counted his tales, which are not found in other Authors as well as in his) may be true, eſpecially ſuch as contradict no acknowledged truth, or apparent likelihood; why then is it ſaid, that Phul did reign in Aſſyria eight and forty years? For this hath no other ground then Annius. It is true that painful and judicious Writers have found this number of years to agree fitly with the courſe of things in Hiſtory: yet all of them took it from Annius. Let it therefore be the puniſhment of Annius his forgery (as queſtionleſs he is often guilty of this crime) that when he tells truth, or probability, he be not believed for his own ſake; though for our own ſakes we make uſe of his boldneſs, taking his words for good, whereas (nothing elſe being offered) we are unwilling our ſelves to be Authors of new, though not unprofitable conjectures. Herein we ſhall have this commodity, that we may without bluſhing after a little, to help our own opinions, and lay the blame upon Annius, againſt whom we ſhall be ſure to find friends that will take our part.

The reigns of Theglathalaſar and Salmanaſſar did reach, by Annius his meaſure, to the length of five and twenty years the one, and ſeventeen the other; Torniellus hath cut off two from the former, and ſeven from the latter of them, to fit (as I think) his own compuration; uſing the liberty whereof I ſpake laſt: for that any Author, ſave our good Metaſthenes, or thoſe that borrowed of him, hath gone about to tell how long each of theſe did reign, it is more than I have yet found. To Senacherib and Aſarhaddon, Torniellus gives the ſame length of reign, which is found in Metaſthenes, I think there are not many, that will arrogate ſo much unto themſelves, as may very well be allowed unto a man ſo judicious as is Torniellus: and yet I could wiſh that he had forborn to condemn the followers of Annius in this buſineſs, wherein he himſelf hath choſen, in part, rather to become one of them, than to ſay, as elſe he muſt have done, almoſt nothing.

The like liberty we find that he uſed in the meaſuring the reigns of the Chaldeans, filling up all the ſpace between the end of Sardanapalus and the beginning of Nabonaſſar, with the threeſcore and eight years of Beloſus. In this reſpect it was, perhaps, that he thought Beloſus might have begun his reign ſomewhat later than Phul: for threeſcore and eight years would ſeem a long time for him to hold a Kingdom, that was no young man when he took poſſeſſion of it. But how is any whit of his age abated by ſhortning his reign, ſeeing his life reacheth to the end of ſuch a time, as were alone without adding the time wherein he was a private man, enough for a long liver? Indeed eight and forty years had been ſomewhat of the moſt, conſidering that he ſeems by the ſtory to have been a little leſs at ſuch time as he joyned with Arbaces; and therefore the addition of twenty years, did well deſerve that note (which Torniellus adviſedly gives) that if his reign extended not ſo far, then the reign of ſuch as came after him, occupied the middle time, unto Nabonaſſar.

I neither do reprehend the boldneſs of Torniellus, in conjecturing, nor the modeſty of Scaliger and Sethus Calviſius, in forbearing to ſet down as warrantable, ſuch things as depend onely upon likelihood. For things, whereof the perfect knowledg is taken away from us by Antiquity, muſt be deſcribed in Hiſtory, as Geographers in their Maps deſcribe thoſe Countreys, whereof as yet there is made no true diſcovery, that is, either by leaving ſome part blank, or by inſerting the land of Pigmies, Rocks of Load-ſtone, with Head lands, Bayes, great Rivers, and other particularities, agreeable to common report, though many times controlled by following experience, and found contrary to truth. Yet indeed the ignorance growing from diſtance of place, allows not ſuch liberty to a Deſcriber, as that which ariſeth from the remedileſs oblivion of conſuming time. For it is true that the Poet ſaith.

——Neque fervidis
Pars incluſa caloribus
Mundi, nec Boreæ finitimum latus,
Duratæque Sole Nives,
Mercatorem abigunt; horrida calidi
Vincunt æquora Navitæ,

Nor

Nor Southern heat, nor Northern Snow
That freezing to the ground doth grow,
The Subjects Regions can fence,
And keep the greedy Merchant thence:
The subtile Shipmen way to find,
Storm never so the Seas with Wind.

Therefore the fictions (or let them be called conjectures) painted in Maps, do serve only to mis-lead such discoverers as rashly believe them, drawing upon the publishers, either some angry curses or well deserved scorn; but to keep their own credit, they cannot serve alwayes. To which purpose I remember a pretty jest of Don Pedro de Sarmiento, a worthy Spanish Gentleman, who had been employed by his King in planting a Colony upon the Streights of Megellan: for when I asked him, being then my Prisoner, some questions about an Island in those Streights, which, me-thought, might have done either benefit or displeasure to his enterprise, he told me merrily that it was to be called the Painters wives Island; saying, That whilest the fellow drew that Map, his wife sitting by, desired him, to put in one Countrey for her, that she in imagination, might have an Island of her own. But in filling up the blankes of old Histories, we need not be so scrupulous. For it is not to be feared, that time shall run backward, and by restoring the things themselves to knowledge, make our conjectures appear ridiculous: What if some good copy of any ancient Author, could be found, shewing (if we have it not already) the perfect truth of these uncertainties? would it be more shame to have believed in the mean while, Annius or Torniellus, than to have believed nothing? Here I will not say, that the credit which we gave to Annius, may chance otherwhiles to be given to one of those Authors whose names he pretendeth. Let it suffice, that in regard of authority, I had rather trust Scaliger or Torniellus, than Annius, yet him than them, if his assertion be more probable, and more agreeable to approved Histories than their conjecture, as in this point it seems to me; it having moreover gotten some credit, by the approbation of many, and those not meanly learned.

To end this tedious disputation; I hold it a sure course in examination of such opinions as have once gotten the credit of being general, so to deal as Pacuvius in Capua did with the multitude, finding them desirous to put all the Senatours of the City to death. He lockt the Senatours up within the Statehouse, and offered their lives to the peoples mercy; obtaining thus much, that none of them should perish, until the Commonalty had both pronounced him worthy of death, and elected a better in his place. The condemnation was hasty; for as fast as every name was read, all the town cried, Let him dye: but the execution required more leisure; for in substituting of another, some notorious vice of the person, or baseness of his condition, or sufficiency of his quality, made each new one that was offered, to be rejected: so that finding the worse and less choice, the further and the more that they sought, it was finally agreed, that the old should be kept for lack of better.

SECT. V.

Of the Olympiads, and the time when they began.

After the division of the Assyrian Empire, follows the instauration of the Olympian games, by Iphitus, in the reign of the same King Uzzia and in his one and fiftieth year. It is, I know, the general opinion, that these games were established by Iphitus in the first of Jotham: yet is not that opinion so general, but that Authors, weighty enough, have given to them a more early beginning. The truth is, that in fitting those things unto the sacred History, which are found in prophane Authors, we should not be too careful of drawing the Hebrews to those works of time, which had no reference to their affairs, it is enough, that setting in good order these beginnings of accounts, we joyn them to matters of Israel and Juda, where occasion requires.

These Olympian games and exercises of activity, were first instituted by Hercules, who measured the length of the race by his own foot; by which Pythagoras found out the state and likely strength of Hercules his body. They took name not from the Mountain Olympus, but from the City Olympia, otherwise Pisa, near unto Elis; where also Jupiter's Temple in Elis, famous among the Grecians, and reputed among the Wonders of the World, was known by the name of the Temple of Jupiter Olympius. These games were exercised from every fourth year compleat, in the Plains of Elis, a City of Peloponnesus, near the River Alpheus.

After the death of Hercules, these meetings were discontinued for many years, till Iphitus, by advice from the Oracle of Apollo, re-established them, Licurgus the Law-giver then living: from which time they were continued by the Grecians, till the reign of Theodosius the Emperour, according to Cedrenus: others think that they were dissolved under Constantine the Great. Aul. Gel. l. 1. ex Plut. Plut. ex Hermip.

From this institution, Varro acompted the Grecian times and their stories to be certain: but reckoned all before, either doubtful or fabulous: and yet Pliny gives little credit to all that is written of Greece, till the reign of Cyrus, who began in the five and fiftieth Olympiad, as Eusebius out of Diodore, Castor, Polybius, and others, hath gathered, in whose time the seven wise Grecians flourished. For Solon had speech with Cræsus, and Cræsus was overthrown and taken by Cyrus. Plin. l. 36. cap. 4.

Many patient and piercing brains have laboured to find out the certain beginning of these Olympiads, namely, to set them in the true year of the World, and the reign of such and such Kings: but seeing they all differ in the first accompt, that is, of the Worlds year, they can hardly jump in particulars thereon depending.

Cyril against Julian, and Dydimus begin the Olympiads the nine and fortieth of Ozias, or Azariah.

Eusebius, who is contrary to himself in this reckoning, accounts with those that find the very first Olympiad in the beginning of the four hundredth and sixth year after Troy; yet he telleth us that it was in the fiftieth year of Uzzia, which is (as I find it) two years later. Euseb. de Prap. Evang. lib. 10. cap. 3.

Eratosthenes placeth the first Olympiad four hundred and seven years after Troy, reckoning the years that passed between; to whom Dionysius Halicarnassæus, Eratost. apud Clem. Alex. strom. lib. 1.

nasſæus, Diodorus Siculus, Solinus, and many others adhere.

The diſtance between the deſtruction of Troy and the firſt Olympiad, is thus collected by Eratoſthenes. From the taking of Troy to the deſcent of Hercules his poſterity into Peloponneſus, were fourſcore years; thence to the Ionian expedition, threeſcore years; from that expedition to the time of Lycurgus his government in Sparta, one hundred fifty nine; and thence to the firſt Olympiad, one hundred and eight years. In this account the firſt year of the firſt Olympiad is not included.

But vain labour it were to ſeek the beginning of the Olympiads by numbring the years from the taking of Troy, which is of date far more uncertain. Let it ſuffice that by knowing the inſtauration of theſe games to have been in the four hundred and eighth year current after Troy, we may reckon back to the taking of that City, ſetting that, and other accidents which have reference thereto, in their proper times. The certainty of things following the Olympiads muſt needs teach us how to find when they began.

To this good uſe we have the enſuing years unto the death of Alexander the Great, thus divided by the ſame Eratoſthenes. From the beginning of the Olympiads to the paſſage of Xerxes into Greece, two hundred fourſcore and ſeventeen years; from thence to the beginning of the Peloponneſian War, eight and forty years; forwards to the victory of Lyſander, ſeven and twenty; to the battel of Leuctra, thirty four; to the death of Philip King of Macedon, five and thirty; and finally to the death of Alexander, twelve. The whole ſum ariſeth to 453 years; which number he otherwiſe alſo collecteth, and it is allowed by the moſt.

Now for placing the inſtitution of the Olympiads in the one and fiftieth year of Uzzia, we have arguments grounded upon that which is certain, concerning the beginning of Cyrus his reign, and the death of Alexander; as alſo upon the Aſtronomical calculation of ſundry Eclipſes of the Sun; as of that which happened when Xerxes ſet out of Sardis with his Army to invade Greece; and of divers other.

Touching Cyrus, it is generally agreed that his reign as King, before he was Lord of the great Monarchy, began the firſt year of the five and fiftieth Olympiad, and that he reigned thirty years: they who give him but twenty nine years of reign (following Herodotus rather then Tully, Juſtin, Euſebius, and others) begin a year later, which comes all to one reckoning. So is the death of Alexander ſet by all good Writers in the firſt year of the hundred and fourteenth Olympiad. This latter note of Alexanders death ſerveth well to lead us back to the beginning of Cyrus; as many the like obſervations do. For if we reckon upwards from the time of Alexander, we ſhall find all to agree with the years of the Olympiads; wherein Cyrus began his reign, either as King, (or taking the word Monarch to ſignifie a Lord of many Kingdoms) as a great Monarch. From the beginning of Cyrus, in the firſt year of the five and fiftieth Olympiad, unto the end of the Perſian Empire, which was in the third of the hundred and twelfth Olympiad, we find two hundred and thirty years compleat: from the beginning of Cyrus his Monarchy, which laſted but ſeven years, we find compleat two hundred and ſeven years, which was the continuance of the Perſian Empire.

Now therefore ſeeing that the firſt year of Cyrus his Monarchy (which was the laſt of the ſixtieth Olympiad, and the two hundred and fortieth year from the inſtitution of thoſe games by Iphitus) followed the laſt of the ſeventy years captivity of Juda, and deſolation of the land of Iſrael. Manifeſt it is, that we muſt reckon back thoſe ſeventy years, and one hundred and threeſcore, and ten years more, the laſt which paſſed under the Kings of Juda, to find the firſt of theſe Olympiads; which by this accompt, is the one and fiftieth of Uzzia, as we have already noted.

The Eclipſes whereof we made mention, ſerve well to the ſame purpoſe. For example ſake; that which was ſeen when Xerxes muſtered his Army at Sardis, in the two hundred threeſcore and ſeventh year of Nabonaſſar, being the laſt of the threeſcore and fourteenth Olympiad, leads us back unto the beginning of Xerxes, and from him to Cyrus, whence we have a fair way through the three-ſcore and ten years, unto the deſtruction of Jeruſalem; and ſo upwards through the reigns of the laſt Kings of Juda, to the one and fiftieth year of Uzzia.

Thus much may ſuffice concerning the time wherein theſe Olympiads began.

To tell the great ſolemnity of them, and with what exceeding great concourſe of all Greece, they were celebrated, I hold it a ſuperfluous labour. It is enough to ſay, that all bodily exerciſes, or the moſt of them, were therein practiſed; as Running, Wreſtling, Fighting, and the like. Neither did they only contend for the Maſtery in thoſe feats, whereof there was good uſe, but in running of Chariots, fighting with Whorle-bats, and other the like ancient kinds of Exerciſes, that ſerved only for oſtentation. Thither alſo repaired Orators, Poets, Muſicians, and all that thought themſelves excellent in any laudable quality, to make tryal of their skill. Yea, the very Cryers which proclaimed the Victories, contended which of them ſhould get the honour of having plaid the beſt part.

The Ælans were Preſidents of thoſe Games, whoſe juſtice, in pronouncing without partiality who did beſt, is highly commended. As for the Rewards given to the Victors, they were none other than Garlands of Palm or Olive, without any other commodity following than the Reputation. Indeed there needed no more. For that was held ſo much, that when Diagoras had ſeen his three ſons crowned for their ſeveral Victories in thoſe Games, one came running to him with this gratulation: Morere Diagoras, non enim in Cœlum aſcenſurus es, that is, Die, Diagoras, for thou ſhalt not climb up to Heaven: as if there could be no greater happineſs on earth, than what already had befallen him.

In like ſence Horace ſpeaks of theſe Victories, calling them,

Quos Elæa domum reducit
Palma Cœleſtes.

Horat. Carm. l. 4. Ode. 2.

Such as like heavenly wights do come
With an Elean Garland home.

Neither was it only the voyce of the People, or ſongs of Poets, that ſo highly extolled them, which had won theſe Olimpian prizes; but even grave Hiſtorians thought it a matter worthy their noting. Such was (as Tully counts it) the vanity of the Greeks that have eſteemed it almoſt as great an honour to have won the Victory at Running or Wreſtling in thoſe Games, as to have triumphed in Rome for ſome famous Victory or conqueſt of a Province.

That theſe Olympian Games were celebrated at the full of the Moon; and upon the fifteenth day of the Month Hecatombæon, which doth anſwer to our June; and what means they uſed to make the Month begin with the new Moon, that the fifteenth day might be the full, I have shewed in another place. Wherefore I may now return unto the Kings of Juda, and leave the merry Greeks at their games, whom I shall meet in more serious imployments, when the Persian quarrels draw the Body of the History into the Coasts of Ionia and Hellespont.

w it

SECT. VI.

Of Jotham and his Contemporaries.

JOtham the son of Uzziah, when he was five and twenty years old, and in the second of Pekah King of Israel, was anointed King in Jerusalem, his Father yet living. He built an exceeding high Gate to the Temple, of threescore cubits upright, and therefore called Ophel: besides divers Cities in the Hills of Juda, and in the Forrest, Towers and Palaces: He enforced the Ammonites to pay him Tribute, to wit, of Silver, an hundred talents, and of Wheat and Barly, two thousand measures. He reigned six and twenty years: of whom Josephus gives this testimony. Ejusmodi vero Princeps hic fuit, ut nullum in eo virtutis genus desideres: ut qui Deum adeo pie coluerit, hominibus suis adeo juste præfuerit, urbem ipsam tantæ sibi curæ esse passus sit, & tantopere auxerit, ut universum regnum hostibus quidem minimè contemnendum, domesticis autem ejus incolis atque civibus fœlix, faustum & fortunatum sua virtute effecerit. This was such a Prince, as a man could find no kind of virtue wanting in him: He worshipped God so religiously, he governed his men so righteously, he was so provident for the City and did so greatly amplify it, that by his virtue and proweſs he made his whole Kingdom not contemptible to his Enemies, but to his Servants, Inhabitants and Citizens prosperous and happy. 2 King. 15. 33.

This is all that I find of Jotham: His reign was not long, but as happy in all things as he himself was devout and virtuous.

Auchomenes about this time succeeded Pheleſtes in Corinth: after whom the Corinthians erected Magistrates which Governed from year to year. And yet Pausanias in his second Book, with Strabo and Plutarch, in many places are of opinion, That Corinth was governed by Kings of the race of the Bacidæ, to the time of Cypselus, who drove them out.

Teglathphalassar, or Teglathpeleser, the son of Phul the second of the Babylonians and Assyrians, that was of this new Race, about this time invaded Israel, while Pekah (who murdered his Master Pekeiah) was King thereof. In which expedition he took most of the Cities of Nephali and Galilee, with those of Gilead over Jordan, and carried the Inhabitants captive. This Tiglath, reigned twenty five years according to Metasthenes. But Krentzhemius finds, that with his son Salmanassar he reigned yet two years longer; which years I would not ascribe to the son, because the Æra of Nabonassar begins with his single reign, but reckon them to Tiglath Phulassar himself, who therewith reigned 27 years. 2 King. 15.

Æschylus, the son of Agamnestor, about the same time, the twelfth Archon in Athens, ruled twenty five years.

Alcamenes governed Sparta, after whom the Estate changed, according to Eusebius: But therein surely Eusebius is mistaken; for Diodore, Plutarch, Pausanias, and others witness the contrary.

Pausanias affirmeth, That Polydorus, a Prince of eminent virtues, succeeded his Father, and reigned sixty years; and out-lived the Messeniack War; which was ended by Theopompus, the son of Nicander, his Royal companion. Paus. l. 3.

At this time, lived Nahum the Prophet, who foretold the destruction of the Assyrian Empire, and of the City of Ninive, which succeded, (saith Josephus) a hundred and fifteen years after.

The Cities of Cyrene and of Aradus were built at this time, while in Media, Sosarmus and Medidus reigned, being the second and third Kings of those parts.

SECT. VII.

Of Achaz and his Contemporaries.

AHAS or Achaz, succeded unto Jotham in the seventeenth year of Peka, the son of Remaliah: the same being also the last of his Fathers reign, who began in the second of the same Peka, and reigned sixteen, but not compleat years. This Ahaz was an Idolater, exceeding all his predecessors. He made molten Images for Baalim, and burnt his Son for sacrifice before the Idol Moloch, or Saturn, which was represented by a man-like brazen body, bearing the head of a Calf, set up not far from Jerusalem, in a Valley shadowed with Woods, called Gehinnom or Tophet, from whence the word Gehenna is used for Hell. The Children offered, were inclosed within the Carkass of this Idol, and as the fire encreased, so the Sacrificers, with a noise of Cymbals, and other Instruments, filled the air to the end, the pittiful cryes of the Children might not be heard: Which unnatural, cruel and divilish Oblation, Jeremy the Prophet vehemently reprehendeth, and of which S. Hierom upon the tenth of Matthew hath written at large. By the prohibition in Leviticus the eighteenth, it appeareth that this horrible sin was ancient. In the twelfth of Deuteronomy, it is called an Abomination which God hateth. 2 King. 16. 11. 2 Chron. 28. c. 7. 9 32.

That it was also practised elsewhere, and by many Nations remote from Judæa, divers Authors witness, as Virgil in the second Æneids, ——— Sanguine Placastis, &c.

And Silvius, ——— Poscere cæde Deos.

Saturn is said to have bronght this Custom into Italy; besides the casting of many souls into the River of Tyber, in stead of which, Hercules commanded that the waxen Images of men should be thrown in and drowned.

The Devil also taught the Carthaginians this kind of butchery, insomuch that when their City was besieged, and in distress, the Priest made them believe that because they had spared their own Children, and had bought and brought up others to be offered, that therefore Saturn had stirred up and strengthened their Enemies against them: whereupon they presently caused two hundred of the noblest youths of their City to be slain, and offered to Saturn, or Satan, to appease him: who, besides these forenamed Nations, had instructed the Rhodians, the People of Crete, and Chios, of Messena, of Galatia, with the Massagetes, and others, in these his services. Further, as if he were not content to destroy the souls of many Nations in Europe, Asia, and Africa (as Acosta writeth) the Mexicans and other People of America, were brought by the Devil under this fearful servitude, in which he also holdeth the Floridans and Virginians at this day. Euseb. de Præp. Evan. l. 6. Diod. l. 3. Diod. l. 20. Acost. de Hist. nat. & mor. Ind.

For the wickedness of this King Ahaz, God stirred up Rezin of Damascus, and Pekah the Son of Remaliah, King of Israel against him, who invaded Judea, and besieged Jerusalem, but entred it not.

The King of Syria, Rezin, poſſeſt himſelf of Elah by the Red Sea, and caſt the Jewes out of it; and Pekah ſlaughtered in one day an hundred and twenty thouſand Judæans, of the ableſt of the Kingdome, at which time Maaſeiah, the Son of Achaz, was alſo ſlain by Zichri, with Azrikam the Governour of his houſe, and Elcanath the ſecond perſon unto the King. Beſides all this, two hundred thouſand priſoners of women and children, the Iſraelites lead away to Samaria: but by the counſel of the Prophet Oded, they were returned and delivered back again.

2 Chron. 28. 6.

As Iſrael and Aram vexed Juda on the North, ſo the Edomites and the Philiſtims, who evermore attended the ruine of Judæa, entred upon them from the South, and took Bethſemes, Ajalon, Gaderoth, Shocho. Timnah, and Gemzo, ſlew many people, and carried away many priſoners. Whereupon when Achaz ſaw himſelf environed on all ſides, and that his Idols and dead gods gave him no comfort, he ſent to the Aſſyrian Teglathpileſer, to deſire ſome aid from him againſt the Iſraelites and Aramites, preſenting him with the ſilver and gold both of the Temple, and Kings houſe.

2 King. 16

Tiglathpileſer wanted not a good example to follow, in making profit of the trouble that roſe in Paleſtina. His father having lately made himſelf from a Provincial Lieutenant, King of Babylon and Aſſyria, had a little before led him the way into Judæa, invited by Menahem, King of Iſrael. Wherefore now the ſon willingly harkened to Achaz, and embraced the advantage. As for Belochus himſelf, he was content to aſſign ſome other time for going through with this enterprize: becauſe (as I have ſaid before) he was not firmly ſettled at home, and the Syrian Kings lay directly in his way, who were yet ſtrong both in men and fame. But Tiglath, having now, with the treaſures of Jeruſalem, prepared his Army, firſt invaded the Territory of Damaſcus, wan the City, and killed Rezin the laſt of the race of the Adads, who began with David, and ended with this Achaz. At Damaſcus, Achaz met Tiglath, and and taking thence a pattern of the Altar, ſent it to Uriah the Prieſt, commanding the like to be made at Jeruſalem, whereon at his return he burnt Sacrifice to the gods of the Syrians. In the mean while Tiglath poſſeſt all Baſan, and the reſt beyond Jordan, which belonged to the Tribes of Reuben, Gad, and Manaſſe. And then paſſing the River, he maſtered the Cities of Galilee, invaded Ephraim, and the Kingdom of Iſrael, and made them his Vaſſals. And notwithſtanding that he was invited and waged by Achaz, yet after the ſpoil of Iſrael, he poſſeſt himſelf of the greater part of Juda, and, as it ſeemeth, inforced Achaz to pay him tribute, For in the ſecond of Kings, the eighteenth, it is written of Ezechia, that he revolted from Aſſur, or rebelled againſt him, and therefore was invaded by Senacherib. After Achaz had beheld and born theſe miſeries, in the end of the ſixteenth year of his reign he died; but was not buried in the Sepulchres of the Kings of Juda.

With Ahaz lived Medidus, the third Prince in Media, who governed 40. years, ſaith Euſebius: Diodorus and Cteſius find Anticarmus inſtead of this Medidus, to have been Soſarmus his ſucceſſor, to whom they give 50. years.

Euſeb. in Chron.

Tiglath-Pileſer held the Kingdom of Aſſyria, all the reign of Ahaz: yet ſo, that Salmanaſſar his Son may ſeem to have reigned with him ſome part of the time. For we find that Ahaz did ſend unto the Kings of Aſſhur to help him. The Geneva note ſays, that theſe Kings of Aſſhur, were Tiglath-Pileſer, and thoſe Kings that were under his Dominion, But that he or his Father had hitherto made ſuch conqueſts, as might give him the Lordſhip over other Kings, I do neither find any Hiſtory, nor circumſtance that proveth. Wherefore I think that theſe Kings of Aſſhur, were Tiglath, and Salmanaſſar his Son, who reigned with his father, as hath been ſaid before: though how long he reigned with his Father, it had been hard to define.

2 Kings 28.16.

At this time began the Ephori in Lacedæmon, a hundred and thirty years after Lycurgus, according to Plutarch. Euſebius makes their beginning far later, namely, in the fifteenth Olympiad. Of theſe Ephori, Elalus was the firſt; Theopompus and Polydorus, being then joynt Kings. Theſe Ephori, choſen every year, were controllers, as well of their Senators, as of their Kings, nothing being done without their advice and conſent. For (ſaith Cicero) they were oppoſed againſt their Kings as the Roman Tribunes againſt the Conſuls.

Plutarch in vita Solo.

In the time of Ahaz died Æſchylus, who had ruled in Athens ever ſince the fiftieth year of Uzzia. Alcamenon the thirtieth of the Medontidæ, or Governours of the Athenians (ſo called of Medon who followed Codrus) ſucceeded his Father Æſchylus, and was the laſt of their Governours: he ruled only two years. For the Athenians changed firſt from Kings (after Codrus) to Governours for life; which ending in this Alcamenon, they erected a Magiſtrate, whom they termed an Archon, who was a kind of Burgho-Maſter or Governour of their City for ten years.

This alteration, Pauſanias in his fourth Book begins in the firſt year of the eighth Olympiad, Euſebius and Halicarnaſſeus in the firſt of the ſeventh Olympiad: at which time indeed, Carops the firſt of theſe, began his ten years rule.

The Kingdom of the Latines, governed about three hundred year by the Sylvii, of the race of Æneas, took end in the ſame Ahaz's time: the foundation of Rome being laid by Romulus and Remus in the eighth year of the ſame King, Codoman builds it in the eleventh of Achaz. Bucholzer in the eighth as I think he ſhould; others ſomewhat later, and in the reign of Ezechias, Cicero, Eutropius, Oroſius, and others ſquare the time of the foundation to the third year of the ſixth Olympiad.

But Halicarnaſſeus, Solinus, Antiochenus, Clemens Alexandrinus, and Euſebius to the firſt year of the ſeventh; who ſeem not only to me, but to many very learned Chronologers, to have kept herein the beſt account.

CHAP. XXIV.

Of the Antiquity of Italy, and the Foundation of Rome in the time of Ahaz.

SECT. I.

Of the Inhabitants, and the Name of Italy.

AND here to speak of the more Ancient times of Italy, and what Nations possest it before the arrival of Æneas, the place may seem to invite us: the rather, because much fabulous matter hath been mixed with the truth of those elder Plantations.

Italy, before the fall of Troy, was known to the Greeks by divers Names; as first Hesperia, then Ausonia; the one name arising of the Seat, the other of the Ausones, a People inhabiting part of it: One ancient name of it was also Oenotria, which it had of the Oenotrii, whom Halicarnassæus thinks to have been the first that brought a Colony of Arcadians into that Land. After it was called Italy of Italus; concerning which changes of Names, Virgil speaks thus:

Halicarn. lib. 1.

Est locus, Hesperiam Graii cognomine dicunt,
Terra antiqua, potens armis, atque ubere gleba:
Oenotrii coluere viri, nunc fama, minores
Italiam dixisse, Ducis de nomine, gentem.

There is a Land which Greeks Hesperia name;
Ancient, and strong, of much fertility:
Oenotrians held it, but we hear by fame,
That by late ages of Posterity,
'Tis from a Captains name call'd Italy.

Who this Captain or King may have been, it is very uncertain. For Virgil speaks no more of him, and the opinions of others are many and repugnant. But like enough it is, that the name which hath continued so long upon the whole Country, and worn out all other denominations, was not at the first accepted without good cause. Therefore to find out the original of this name, and the first Planters of this noble Country, Reyneccius hath made a very painful search, and not improbable conjecture.

Halicarn. lib. 1. And first of all, he grounds upon that of Halicarnassæus, who speaks of a Colony which the Eleans did lead in Italy, before the name of Italy was given unto it.

Just. l. 12. Secondly, Upon that of Justine, who saith, that Brundusium was a Colony of the Ætolians.

Strabo. lib. 6. Thirdly, Upon that of Strabo, who affirms the same of Temesa, or Tempsa, a City of the Brutii in Italy.

Plin. lib. 3. cap. 5. Lastly, Upon the authority of Pliny, who shews that the Italians did inhabit only one Region of the Land, whence afterward the Name was derived over all.

Concerning that which is said of the Eleans and Ætolians who (as he shews) had one original; from them he brings the Name of Italy. For the word Italia, differs in nothing from Aitolia, save that the first Letter is cast away, which in the Greek words is common; and the letter (o) is changed into (a) which change is found in the name of Æthalia, an Island near Italy, peopled by the Ætholians: and the like changes are very familiar in the Æolick Dialect; of which Dialect (being almost proper to the Ætolians) the accent and pronunciation, together with many words little altered, were retained by the Latines, as Dionysius, Halicarnassæus, Quintilian, and Priscian the Grammarian teach.

Hereunto appertains that of Julian the Apostata, who called the Greeks cousins of the Latines. Also the common Original of the Greeks and Latines from Javan; and the fable of Janus, whose image had two faces, looking East and West, as Greece and Italy lay, and was stamped on Coins, with a Ship on the other side, all which is, by interpretation, referred to Javan, father of the Greeks and Latines; who sayling over the Ionian Sea, that lies between Ætolia and the Western parts of Greece and Italy, planted Colonies in both. Now whereas Reineccius thinks, that the names of Atlas and Italus belonged both to one man, and thereto applyes that of Berosus, who called Sethim, Italus; though it may seem strengthened by the marriage of Dardanus, whilest he abode at Italy with Electra, the daughter of Atlas, yet is it by arguments (in my valuation) greater and stronger, easily disproved. For they who make mention of Atlas, place him before the time of Moses: and if Atlas were Cethim, or Kittim, then was he the son of Javan, and Nephew of Japheth, the eldest son of Noah, which antiquity far exceeds the name of Italy, that began after the departure of Hercules out of the Countrey, not long before the War of Troy.

Likewise Virgil, who speaks of Atlas, and of Dardanus, his marriage with Electra, hath nothing of his meeting with her in Italy, but calleth Electra and her sister Maia (poetically) the daughters of the Mountain in Africa, naming Italus among the Kings of the Aborigenes; which he would not have done, had Atlas and Italus been one person.

As for the authority of Berosus in this case, we need the less to regard it, for that Reineccius himself, whose conjectures are more to be valued than the dreams wherewith Annius hath filled Berosus, holds it but a figment.

That the name of Italy began long after Atlas, it appears by the verses of Virgil last rehearsed, wherein he would not have said,

——Nunc fama, minores
Italiam dixisse, Ducis de nomine, gentem, had that name been heard of ere Dardanus left the Countrey. But seeing that, when Hercules, who died a few years before the War of Troy, had left in Italy

Italy a Colony of the Eleans (who in a manner were one and the ſame Nation with the Ætolians, as Strabo, Herodotus, and Pauſanias teach) then the name of Italy began: and ſeeing Virgil makes mention of Italus among the Italian Kings, it were no great boldneſs to ſay, that Italus was a Commander of theſe Eleans. For though I remember not that I have read of any ſuch Greek as was named Italus; yet the name of Ætolus written in Greek Aitolus, was very famous among the Ætolians, and among the Eleans, he being ſon of a King of Elis, and founder of the Ætolian Kingdom. Neither is it more hard to derive the name of Italus from Ætolus, than Italia from Ætolia. So may Virgils authority ſtand well with the collections of Reyneccius; the name of Italy being taken both from a Captain, and from the Nation, of which he and his people were.

SECT II.

Of the Aborigines, and other Inhabitants of Latium, and of the reaſon of the names of Latini and Latium.

IN Italy the Latines and Hetrurians were moſt famous; the Hetrurians having held the greateſt part of it under their ſubjection; and the Latines by the vertue and felicity of the Romans, who were a branch of them, ſubduing all Italy, and in a few ages whatſoever nation was known in Europe: together with all the Weſtern parts of Aſia, and North of Africk.

The Region called Latium, was firſt inhabited by the Aborigenes, whom Halicarnaſſæus, Varro, and Reyneccius (following them) think to have been Arcadians: and this name of Aborigenes (to omit other ſignifications that are ſtrained) imports as much as Original, or Native of the place, which they poſſeſſed: which title the Arcadians are known in vaunting manner to have alwaies uſurped, fetching their antiquity from beyond the Moon; becauſe indeed, neither were the inhabitants of Peloponneſus inforced to forſake their ſeats ſo oft as other Greeks were, who did dwell without that half Iſland, neither had the Arcadians ſo unſure a dwelling as the reſt of the Peloponneſians, becauſe the Countrey was leſs fruitfull in land, mountainous, and hard of acceſs, and they themſelves (as in ſuch places commonly are found) very warlike men. Some of theſe therefore having occupied a great part of Latium, and held it long, did according to the Arcadian manner, ſtile themſelves Aborigenes, in that language, which either their new Seat, or their Neighbours thereby had taught them. How it might be that the Arcadians, who dwelt ſomewhat farr from the Sea, and are alwaies noted as unapt men to prove good Mariners, ſhould have been Authors of new diſcoveries, were a queſtion not eaſie to be anſwered, were it not ſo, that both fruitfulneſs of children, in which thoſe ages abounded, inforced the ſuperfluous company to ſeek another ſeat, and that ſome expeditions of the Arcadians, as eſpecially that of Evander, into the ſame parts of Italy, are generally acknowledged.

After the Aborigenes, were the Pelaſgi, an ancient Nation, who ſometimes gave name to all Greece: but their antiquities are long ſince dead, for lack of good records. Neither was their glory ſuch in Italy, as could long ſuſtain the name of their own Tribe; for they were in ſhort ſpace accounted one people with the former inhabitants. The Sicani, Auſones, Arunci, Rutili, and other people, did in ages following, diſturbe the peace of Latium, which by Saturne was brought to ſome civility; and he therefore canonized as a god.

This Saturne, S. Auguſtine calleth Sterces or Sterculius, others term him Stercutius, and ſay, that he taught the people to dung their grounds. That Latium took his name of Saturn, becauſe he did latere, that is, lie hidden there, when he fled from Jupiter, it is queſtionleſs, a fable. For as in Heatheniſh ſuperſtition, it was great vanity to think that any thing could be hidden from God, or that there were many gods of whom one fled from another; ſo in the truth of Hiſtory, it is well known, that no king reigning in thoſe parts was ſo mighty, that it ſhould be hard to find one Countrey or another, wherein a man might be ſafe from his purſuit: And yet, as moſt fables and poetical fictions were occaſioned by ſome ancient truth, which either by ambiguity of ſpeech, or ſome alluſion, they did maimedly and darkly expreſſe (for ſo they feigned a paſſage over a River in Hell) becauſe death is a paſſage to another life: and becauſe this paſſage is hatefull, lamentable, and painfull, therefore they named the River Styx, of hate; Cocytus of lamentation, and Acheron, of pain: ſo alſo becauſe men are ſtonie hearted; and becauſe the Greek λαοὶ, people, and λᾶες, ſtones, are neer in ſound, therefore they feigned in the time of Deucalion, ſtones converted into men, as at other times men into ſtones: in like manner it may be, that the original of Saturus hiding himſelf, was ſome alluſion to that old opinion of the wiſeſt of the Heathen, that the true God was ignotus Deus, as it is noted in the Acts; whence alſo Eſay of the true God ſayes, tu Deus abdens te. For it cannot be in vain, that the word Saturnus ſhould alſo have this very ſignification, if it be derived (as ſome think) from the Hebrew Satar, which is to hide: Howbeit I deny not but that the original of this word, Latium, ought rather to be ſought elſe where,

See lib. 1. cap. 6. ſect. 1 & ſeq.

Act. 7. 2, 3. Eſay 45. 15.

Reyneccius doth conjecture that the Ceteans, who deſcended of Cethim, the ſon of Javan, were the men who gave the name to Latium. For theſe Ceteans, are remembred by Homer as aiders of the Trojans in their war. Strabo, interpreting the place of Homer, calls them ſubjects to the Crown of Troy. Hereupon Reyneccius gathers, that their abode was in Aſia: viz. in agro Elaitico, in the Elaitian Territory, which agreeth with Strabo. Of a City, which the Æolians held in Aſia, called Elæa or Elaia, Pauſanias makes mention: Stephanus calls it Cydæmis, or (according to the Greek writing) Cidamis, which name laſt rehearſed, hath a very near ſound to Cethim, Citim, or Cithim; the Greek Letter (D) having (as many teach) a pronunciation very like to (TH) differing onely in the ſtrength or weakneſs of utterance, which is found between many Engliſh words, written with the ſame letters. Wherefore that theſe Ceteans, being deſcended of Cethim, Cittim, or Kittim, the ſon of Javan, who was Progenitour of the Greeks, might very well take a denomination from the City, and Region, which they inhabited, and from thence be called Eleites, or Elaites, it is very likely, conſidering that among the Arcadians, Phocians, Ætolians, and Eleans, who all were of the Æolique Tribe, are found the names of the Mountain Elæus, the Haven Elæus, the people Elaitæ, the City Elæus, Elaia, and Elateia, of which laſt, it were ſomewhat harſh in the Latine tongue to call the Inhabitants by any other name then Elatini, from whence Latini may come. Now whereas both the Cetei and Arcadians, had their original from Cethim, it is nothing unlikely, that agreeing in language and ſimilitude of names, they might nevertheleſs differ in ſound and pronunciation of one and the ſame word. So that as he is by many called Sabinus, to whom ſome (deriving the Sabines from him) give the name of Sabus: in the like manner might he whom the Arcadians would call Elatus (of which name they had a Prince that founded the City Elateja) be named of the Ceteans Latinus. Reyneccius, purſuing this likelihood, thinks that when Euripylus, Lord of the Ceteans, (being the ſon of Telephus, whom Hercules begat upon Auge, the daughter of Aleus King of Arcadia) was ſlain by Achilles in the Trojan War: then did Telephus brother to Euripylus, conduct the Ceteans, who (fearing what evil might befall themſelves by the Greeks, if the affairs of Troy ſhould go ill) paſſed into that part of Italy, whereas the Arcadians were planted by Oenotrius. And Reyneccius farther thinks, that Telephus, being the more gracious among the Oenotrian Arcadians, by the memory of his Grand-mother Auge, an Arcadian Lady, was well contented to take an Arcadian name, and to be called Elatus, which in the dialect and pronunciation either of the Ceteans, or of the Oenotrians, was firſt Elatinus, and then Latinus. That this name of Elatus may have been taken or impoſed by the Arcadians, it is the more eaſie to be thought, for that there were then two Families, the one of Iphidas, the other of Elatus, who were ſons of Arcas King of Arcadia, which gave name unto the Countrey: and between theſe two families the the ſucceſſion in that Kingdom did paſs, almoſt interchangeably, for many ages, till at the end of the Trojan War it fell into the hand of Hippotheus of the race of Elatus, in whoſe Poſterity it continued untill the laſt. Again the name of Latinus, having a derivative ſound, agrees the better with the ſuppoſition of ſuch an accident. This is the conjecture of Reyneccius, which if he made over-boldly, yet others may follow it with the leſs reproofe, conſidering that it is not eaſie to find either an apparent truth, or fair probability among theſe diſagreeing Authors, which have written the originals of Latium.

SECT. VI.

Of the ancient Kings of the Latines until Æneas his coming.

THe Kings which reigned in Latium before the the arrival of Æneas, were Saturnus, Picus, Faunus, & Latinus. Of Saturn there is nothing remembred, ſave what is mentioned already, and many Fables of the Greeks, which whether they be applyable to this man, it is for him to judge, who ſhall be able to determine, whether this were the Saturn of the Greeks called by them Κρόνος, or ſome other, ſtiled Saturn by the Aborigenes. For the age wherein he lived, may very well admit him to have been the ſame: but the names of Sterces, and Stercutius (for it may be, this name was not borrowed from the skill which he taught the people, but rather the ſoil which they laid on their grounds had that appellation from him) do rather make him ſeem ſome other man.

Of Picus it is ſaid that he wa a good horſe-man. The fable of his being changed into a Bird, which we call a Py, may well ſeem (as it is interpreted) to have grown from the skill which he had in ſouth-ſaying, or divination, by the flight and chattering of Fowles. Faunus, the ſon of Picus, reigned after his Father: He gave to Evander the Arcadian (who having ſlain by miſchance his father Echemus King of Arcadia, fled into Italy) the waſt grounds on which Rome was afterward built.

Fauna, called Fatua, the ſiſter of Faunus, who was alſo his wife, as all Hiſtorians agree, ſhe was held a Propheteſs and highly commended for her chaſtity, which praiſe in her muſt needs have been much blemiſhed by her marriage, it ſelf being meerly inceſtuous.

It is not mentioned that Faunus, had by his ſiſter any child, neither do we read of any other Wife which he had, ſave only that Virgil gives unto him Latinus as his ſon, by a Nymph called Marica.

But who this Marica was, it is not found, ſave only that her aboad was about the River Lyris near Minturnæ.

Of the name Latinus, there are by Pomponius Sabinus recounted four: one, the Son of Faunus, another of Hercules, a third of Ulyſſes by Circe, the fourth of Telemachus. Suidas takes notice only of the ſecond, of whom he ſaith, that his name was Telephus, and the people anciently named the Cetii, were from his ſurname called Latini, This agrees in effect with the opinion of Reyneccius, the difference conſiſting almoſt in this only, that Suidas cals Telephus the ſon of Hercules, whereas Reyneccius makes him his Nephew, by a ſon of the ſame name. This Latinus having obtained the ſucceſſion in that Kingdom after Faunus, did promiſe his only Daughter and Heir Lavinia, to Turnus the Son of Venilia, who was ſiſter to Amata, Latinus his Wife.

Suidas in the word Latini.

But when Æneas arrived in thoſe parts with fifteen ſhips, or perhaps fewer, wherein might be imbarked, according to the rate which Thucydides allows to the Veſſels then uſed, about one thouſand and two hundred men: then Latinus finding that it would ſtand beſt with his aſſurance, to make alliance with the Trojan, and moved with the great reputation of Æneas, which himſelf had heard of in the war of Troy, gave his Daughter to him, breaking off the former appointment with Turnus: who incenſed herewith, ſought to avenge himſelf by war: which was ſoon ended with his own death.

Of Amata the wife of Latinus, it is very certain, that were ſhe an Italian, ſhe could not have born a Daughter marriageable at the arrival of Æneas; unleſs we ſhould wholly follow Suidas, and rather give the conduct of the Cetei into Italy, to Telephus the father, than to his Son, who ſerved in the laſt year of the Trojan War. But Reyneccius holds her an Aſiatique, and thinks withall, that Lavinia was born before Telephus came into Italy. That this name Amata, by which Virgil and Halicarnaſſeus call her, was not proper, but rather a ſurname, it may ſeem by Varro; who calleth her Palatia: which name very well might be derived from the Greek name Pallas. Amata, which ſignifieth beloved, or dear, was the name by which the High Prieſt called every Virgin whom he took to ſerve as a Nun of Veſta; wherefore it is the more eaſie to be thought a ſurname, howſoever Virgil diſcourſe of her and Venilia her ſiſter.

Lavinia, the Daughter of Latinus, being given in marriage to Æneas, the Kingdom of Latium, or the greateſt part of that Country, was eſtabliſhed in that race: wherein it continued until it was overgrown by the might and greatneſs of the Romans.

Ezekiel often calls the Idols of the Heathen, deos ſtercoreos. And hence it may be that in the Evangelift we read of Belzebub, Belzebul, which is interpreted Dominus ſtercoreus: and it may be that after that, Saturn became the name of an Idol, it pleaſed God that in a like ſence this name Stercutius ſhould ſtick unto him. Æneid.7.

SECT.

SECT. IV.

Of Æneas, and of the Kings and Governours of Alba

Æneas himself being of the Royal bloud of Troy, had the command of the Dardanians, he was a valiant man, very rich, and highly honoured among the Trojans. By his Wife Creusa, the Daughter of Priamus, he had a Son called Ascanius; whose surname was Julus, having before the ruine of Troy (as Virgil notes) been surnamed Ilus. But when Æneas was dead, his Wife Lavinia, the Daughter of Latinus, being great with child by him, and fearing the power of this Ascanius, fled into the Woods, where she was delivered of a Son, called thereupon Sylvius, and surnamed Posthumus, because he was born after his fathers Funeral. This flight of Lavinia was so evil taken by the people, that Ascanius procured her return, entreated her honourably, and using her as a Queen, did foster her young Son, his half-brother Sylvius. Yet afterwards whether to avoid all occasions of disagreement, or delighted with the situation of the place; Ascanius leaving to his Mother in law the City Lavinium, which Æneas had built and called after his new Wives name, founded the City Alba Longa and therein reigned. The time of his reign was, according to some, eight and twenty years: Virgil gives him thirty; others five and thirty, and eight and thirty. After his decease, there arose a contention between Sylvius, the son of Æneas, and Julus the son of Ascanius, about the Kingdom: but the people inclining to the Son of Lavinia, Julus was contented to hold the Priesthood, which he and his race enjoyed, leaving the Kingdom to Sylvius Posthumus, whose posterity were afterwards called Sylvii.

The reign of the Alban Kings, with the continuance of each mans reign, I find thus set down:

1	Sylvius Posthumus.	29	Years.
2	Sylvius Æneas.	31
3	Sylvius Latinus.	50
4	Sylvius Alba.	39
5	Sylvius Atis.	26
6	Sylvius Capys.	28
7	Sylvius Capetus.	13
8	Sylvius Tiberinus.	8
9	Sylvius Agrippa.	41
10	Sylvius Alladius.	19
11	Sylvius Aventinus.	37
12	Sylvius Procas.	23
13	Sylvius Amulius.	44
	Sylvius Numitor.

Ilia, called also Rhea and Sylvia.
Romulus. Remus.

The most of these Kings lived in peace, and did little or nothing worthy of remembrance.

Latinus founded many Towns in the borders of Latium: who standing much upon the honour of their original, grew thereby to be called Proles Latii. Of Tiberinus some think, that the River Tiber had name, being formerly called Albula: but Virgil gives it that denomination of another called Tybris: before the coming of Æneas into Italy. The Mountain Aventinus had name (as many write) from Aventinus King of the Albanes, who was buried therein: but Virgil hath it otherwise. Julius the brother of Aventinus, is named by Eusebius as father of another Julius, and grandfather of Julius Proculus, who leaving Alba, dwelt with Romulus in Rome: Numitor, the elder Son of Procas, was deprived of his Kingdom by his brother Amulius; by whom also his Son Ægesthus was slain, and Ilia his daughter made a Nun of Vesta, that thereby the issue of Numitor might be cut off. But she conceived two Sons, either by her Uncle Amulius, as some think, or by Mars, as the Poets feign; or perhaps by some man of war. Both the children their Uncle commanded to be drowned, and the mother buried quick, according to the law, which so ordained, when the Vestal Virgins brake their chastity. Whether it was so, that the mother was pardoned at the entreaty of Antho, the Daughter of Amulius, or punished as the Law required (for Authors herein do vary) it is agreed by all, that the two children were preserved, who afterward revenged the cruelty of their Uncle, with the slaughter of him and all his; and restored Numitor their Grandfather to the Kingdom: wherein how long he reigned, I find not, neither is it greatly material to know; for as much as the Estates of Alba and of Latinum were presently eclipsed by the swift increase of Rome; upon which the computation of Time following (as far as concerns the things of Italy) is dependant. After the death of Numitor, the Kingdom of Alba ceased; for Numitor left no male issue. Romulus chose rather to live in Rome; and of the Line of Sylvius none else remained. So the Albanes were governed by Magistrates; of whom onely two Dictators are mentioned, namely Caius Cluilius, who in the dayes of Tullus Hostilius, King of the Romans, making War upon Rome, dyed in the Camp; and Metius Suffetius, the successor of Cluilius, who surrendred the Estate of Alba unto the Romans, having committed the hazard of both Seigniories to the success of three men of each side, who decided the quarrel by Combat: in which, the three brethren Horatii, the Champions of the Romans, prevailed against the Curiatii, Champions of the Albans. After this Combat, when Metius (following Tullus Hostilius with the Albane forces against the Veientes and Fidenates) withdrew his Companies out of the battel, hoping thereby to leave the Romans to such an overthrow, as might make them weak enough for the Albanes to deal with; Tullus, who notwithstanding this falshood, obtained the victory, did reward Metius with a cruel death, causing him to be tyed to two Chariots, and so torn in pieces. Then was Alba destroyed, and the Citizens carried to Rome, where they made free Denizens, the noble Families being made Patricians; among which were the Julii: of whom C. Julius Cæsar being descended, not onely gloried in his ancient, royal, and forgotten pedigree, in full assembly of the Romans, then governed by a free Estate of the People: but by his rare industry, valour, and judgment, obtained the Soveraignty of the Roman Empire (much by him enlarged) to himself and his posterity; whereby the name of Æneas, and honour of the Trojan and Alban Race, was so revived, that seldom, if ever, any one Family hath attained to a proportionable height of glory.

SECT.

SECT. V.

Of the beginning of Rome, and of Romulus his Birth and Death.

OF Rome, which devoured the Alban Kingdom, I may here beſt ſhew the beginnings, which (though ſomewhat uncertain) depend much upon the birth and education of Romulus, the Grand-child of Numitor, the laſt that reigned in Alba. For how not onely the bordering people, but all Nations between Euphrates and the Ocean, were broken in pieces by the iron teeth of this fourth Beaſt, it is not to be deſcribed in one place, having been the work of many ages; whereof I now do handle onely the firſt, as incident unto the diſcourſe preceding. Q. Fabius Pictor, Portius Cato, Calphurnius, Piſo, Sempronius, and others, ſeek to derive the Romans from Janus: but Herodotus, Marſylus, and many others of equal credit, give the Grecians for their Anceſtors: and as Strabo reporteth in his fifth Book, Cæcilius rerum Romanarum Scriptor, eo argumento colligit, Romam a Græcis eſſe conditam, quod Romani Græco ritu, antiquo inſtituto, Herculi rem ſacram faciunt: matrem quoque Evandri venerantur Romani: Cæcilius (ſaith he) a Roman Hiſtoriographer, doth by this argument gather, that Rome was built by the Greeks, becauſe the Romans, after Greekiſh faſhion, by ancient ordinance, do ſacrifice to Hercules, the Romans alſo worſhip the Mother of Evander, Strab. 5. f. 159.

Plutarch in the life of Romulus remembreth many Founders of that City: as Romanus the Son of Ulyſſes and Circe; Romus the Son of Emathion, whom Diomedes ſent thither from Troy; or that one Romus, a Tyrant of the Latines, who drave the Tuſcans out of that Countrey, built it. Solinus beſtows the honour of building Rome upon Evander, ſaying, That it was beforetimes called Valentia. Heraclides gives the denomination to a captive Lady, brought thither by the Grecians: others ſay, That it was anciently called Febris, after the name of Februa, the Mother of Mars; witneſs S. Auguſtine in his third Book de Civitate Dei. But Livie will have it to be the work of Romulus, even from the foundation: of whom and his conſort, Juvenal to a Roman Citizen, vaunting of their original, anſwered in theſe Verſes:

Attamen ut longe repetas longeque revolvas,
Majorum quiſquis primus fuit ille tuorum,
Aut paſtor fuit, aut illud quod dicere nolo.

Yet though thou fetch thy pedigree ſo far;
Thy firſt Progenitor, who ere he were,
Some Shepheard was, or elſe, that I'll forbear.
meaning, either a Shepheard or a Thief.

Now of Romulus begetting, of his education and preſervation, it is ſaid, That he had Rhea for his mother, and Mars ſuppoſed to be his father; that he was nurſt by a Wolf, found and taken away by Fauſtula a Shepheards Wife. The ſame unnatural nurſing had Cyrus, the ſame incredible foſtering had Semiramis; the one by a Bitch, the other by Birds. But as Plutarch ſaith, it is like enough that Amulius came covered with armour to Rhea, the mother of Romulus, when he begat her with child: and therein it ſeemeth to me that he might have two purpoſes; the one to deſtroy her, becauſe ſhe was the daughter and heir of his elder brother, from whom he injuriouſly held the Kingdom; the other, to ſatisfie his appetite, becauſe ſhe was fair and goodly. For ſhe being made a Nun of the goddeſs Veſta, it was death in her, by the law, to break her chaſtity. I alſo find in Fauchet his Antiquitez de Gaule, that Meroüee, King of the Francs, was begotten by a Monſter of the Sea: but Fauchet ſaies, Let them believe it that liſt; Il le croira qui voudra: Alſo of Alexander, and of Scipio African, there are poetical inventions: But to anſwer theſe imaginations in general, It is true, that in thoſe times, when the World was full of this barbarous Idolatry, and when there were as many gods as there were Kings, or paſſions of the mind, or as there were of vices and virtues, then did many women greatly born, cover ſuch ſlips as they made, by proteſting to be forced by more then humane power: ſo did Oenone confeſs to Paris, that ſhe had been raviſhed by Apollo, And Anchiſes boaſted that he had known Venus. But Rhea was made with child by ſome man of War, or other, and therefore called Mars, the god of battel, according to the ſenſe of the time. Oenone was overcome by a ſtrong wit, and by ſuch a one as had thoſe properties aſcribed to Apollo. The Mother of Meroüee might fancy a Sea-Captain, to be gotten with young by ſuch a one: as the Daughter of Inachus fancied, according to Herodotus. Æneas was a baſtard, and begotten upon ſome fair Harlot, called for her beauty Venus. And was therefore the Child of Luſt, which is Venus. Romulus was nurſt by a Wolf, which was Lupa, or Lupina; for the Curteſans in thoſe dayes were called Wolfs, Quæ nunc (ſaith Halicarnaſſæus) honeſtiori vocabulo amicæ appellantur; Which are now by a honeſter name called friends.

Fauchet. f. 114.

It is alſo written, that Romulus was in the end of his life taken up into heaven, or rather out of the world, by his father Mars, in a great ſtorm of thunder and lightning: ſo it was ſaid that Æneas vaniſhed away by the River Numicus: but thereof Livie ſpeaketh modeſtly; for he rehearſeth the other opinion that the ſtorm was the fury of the Senators, but ſeemeth to adhere partially to this taking up; and many Authors agree, that there was an unnatural darkneſs, both at his birth, and at his death; and that he might be ſlain by thunder or lightning, it is not unlikely. For the Emperor Anaſtaſius was ſlain with lightning; ſo was Strabo the Father of Pompey ſlain with a thunderbolt: ſo Carus the Emperor (who ſucceeded Probus) whileſt he lodged with his Army upon the River Tygris, was there ſlain with lightning. But a Mars of the ſame Kind might end him that began him; for he was begotten by a man of War, and by violence deſtroyed. And that he died by violence (which deſtiny followed moſt of the Roman Emperors) it appeareth by Tarquinius Superbus, who was the ſeventh King after him: who when he had murthered his Father-in-law, commanded that he ſhould not be buried, for (ſaid he) Romulus himſelf died and was not buried. But let Halicarnaſſæus end this diſpute; whoſe words are theſe:

They (ſaith he) who drew neareſt to the truth, ſay that he was ſlain by his own Citizens; and that his cruelties in puniſhment of offenders, together with his arroganey, were the cauſe of his ſlaughter. For it is reported, that both when his mother was raviſhed, whether by ſome man, or by a god, the whole body of the Sun was eclipſed, and all the earth covered with darkneſs like unto night, and that the ſame did happen at his death.

Such were the birth and death of Romulus: whoſe life hiſtorified by Plutarch, doth contain (beſides what is here already ſpoken of him) the conqueſt of a few miles, which had ſoon been forgotten, if the Roman greatneſs built upon that foundation, had not given it memory in all ages following, even unto this day. A valiant man he was, very ſtrong of body, patient of travel, and temperate in diet, as forbearing the uſe of wine and delicacies: but his raging ambition he knew not how to temper, which cauſed him to ſlay his brother, and neglect to revenge the death of Tatius, his companion in the Kingdom, that he himſelf might be Lord alone in thoſe narrow Territories. He reigned 37. years, firſt alone, then with Tatius, and after his death, ſingle, till he was ſlain, as is already ſhewed: after which time, the Soveraignty fell into the hands of Numa, a man to him unknown, and more Prieſt-like than King like: wherein Rome it ſelf in her latter times hath ſomewhat reſembled this King. For having long been ſole Governeſs, till Conſtantinople ſhared with her: afterwards, when as the Greek Emperour was cruſhed by forreign enemies, and the Latines diſpoyled of Imperial power, ſhe fell into the ſubjection of a Prelate, ſwelling by degrees from the Sheep-hook to the Sword, and therewith victorious to exceſſive magnificence, from whence by the ſame degrees it fell, being driven from luxury to defenſive arms, and therein having been unfortunate, at length betakes her ſelf again to the Croſier ſtaff.

And thus much of Rome in this place, by occaſion of the ſtory of the times of King Ahaz, during whoſe reign in Jury, the foundations of this famous City were laid.

CHAP. XXV.

Of EZECHIA, and his Contemporaries.

SECT. I.

Of the beginning of Ezechias, and of the agreeing of Ptolomy, Nabonaſſar, Nabopolaſſar, and Mardocempadus, with the Hiſtory of the Bible.

AS the firſt year of Ahaz his reign was confounded with the laſt of his father Jotham, ſo was the latter end of his ſixteen years taken up in the three firſt of Ezechias, his ſon. This appears by the Reign of Hoſea, over Iſrael, which began in the twelfth of Ahaz, and therefore, the third thereof was concurrent with Ahaz, his fourteenth. But the third of Hoſea, was the firſt of Ezechia; ſo it follows, that Ezechia began to reign in his Fathers fourteenth year. Like enough it is, that the third year of Hoſea, the ſame being the fourteenth of Ahaz, was almoſt ſpent when Ezechia began, and ſo the fifteenth year of Ahaz may have been concurrent, for the moſt part, with the firſt of Ezechia.

By ſuppoſing that Hoſea began his Kingdom, when the twelfth year of Ahaz was almoſt compleat, ſome would find the means how to diſ-joyn the firſt of Ezechia from the fifteenth of Ahaz, placing him yet one year later, of which year, Ahaz may perhaps have lived not many daies. But ſeeing that the fourteenth and fifteenth years of Ezechia may not be removed out of their places, it is vain labour to alter the firſt year.

2 Kin. 19. 35. In the fourteenth year of Ezechia, Senacherib, invaded Juda and the Countries adjoyning, loſt his Army by a miraculous ſtroak from Heaven, fled home, and was ſlain.

The year following it was that God added ſixteen years to the life of Ezechia, when he had already reigned fourteen of his nine and twenty, and the ſame year was that miracle ſeen of the Suns going back; of which wonder (as I hear) one Bartholomew Scultet, who is much commended for skill in Aſtronomy, hath by calculation found the very day, which anſwered to the twenty fift of April, in the Julian year, being then Thurſday. I have not ſeen any works of Scultet, but ſurely to find a motion ſo irregular and miraculous, it is neceſſary that he produce ſome Record of obſervation made at ſuch a time. Howſoever it be, the fifteenth year of Ezechia agreed upon: and therefore we may not alter the firſt. As for that ſaying, which is uſual in like caſes, that Ahaz ſlept with his fathers, and Ezechia his ſon reigned in his ſtead, it doth no more prove that Ezechia reigned not with his Father, than the like ſaying doth infer the like at the death of Jehoſaphat, and ſucceſſion of Jehoram; whereof, as concerning the beginning of the Son to reign whileſt his Father lived, we have already ſaid enough. 1 Chro. 28. 17.

Of this godly King Ezechias, we find, that his very beginning teſtified his devotion and zeale. For whether it were ſo, that his unfortunate and ungracious Father (who had outworn his reputation) gave way to his Sons proceedings, which perhaps it lay not in him to hinder; or whether (as I rather think) the firſt year and firſt month of his reign, wherein Ezechias opened the doors of the Temple, were to be underſtood as the beginning of his ſole government; we plainly find it to have been his firſt work, that he opened the doors of the houſe of the Lord, which Achaz had ſhut up, cleanſed the City and Kingdom of the Idols, reſtored the Prieſts to their offices and eſtates, commanded the Sacrifices to be offered which had been for many years neglected, and brake down the braſen ſerpent of Moſes, becauſe the people burnt incenſe before it, and he called it Nehuſhtan, which ſignifieth a lumpe of braſſe. He did alſo celebrate the paſſe-over with great magnificence, inviting thereinto the Iſraelites of the ten Tribes. Many there were, even out of thoſe Tribes, that came up to Jeruſalem, to this feaſt; But the general multitude of Iſrael did laugh the Meſſengers of Ezechias to ſcorn. 2 Chro. 29. v. 3. 2 Chro. 30.

It was not long ere they that ſcorned to ſolemnize the memorial of their deliverance out of the Egyptian ſervitude, fell into a new ſervitude; out of which they never were delivered. For in the fourth of Ezechia his reign, Salmanaſſar the Son of Tiglath, the Son of Belochus, hearing that Hoſea King of Iſrael had practiſed with So King of Egypt, againſt him, invaded Iſrael, beſieged Samaria, and in the third year (after

(after the inhabitants had endured all sorts of miseries) forced it, and carried thence the ten Idolatrous Tribes into Assyria and Media: among whom Tobias and his Son of the same name, with Anna his Wife, were sent to Nineve; in whose seats and places the Assyrians sent strangers of other Nations, and among them many of the ancient enemies of the Israelites, as those of Cutha, Ava, Hamah, and Sepharvaim, besides Babylonians; whose Places and Nations I have formerly described in the Treatise of the Holy Land.

These latter Assyrian Kings, and the Persians, which followed them, are the first of whom we find mention made both in Prophane and Sacred books. These therefore serve aptly to joyn the times of the old World, (whereof none but the Prophets have written otherwise than fabulously) with the Ages following that were better known, and described in course of History. True it is, that of Cyrus and some other Persians, we find in the Bible the same names by which other Authors have recorded them: but of Phul and Salmanassar, with other Assyrian, Chaldean Kings, diversity of name hath bred question of the persons. Therefore, whereas the Scriptures do speak of Salmanassar, King of Assur, who reigned in the time of Ahaz and Ezechia, Kings of Juda, and of Hosea King of Israel, whom he carried into captivity: and whereas Ptolomy makes mention of Nabonassar, speaking precisely of the time wherein he lived; it is very pertinent to shew, that Salmanassar and Nabonassar were one and the same man. The like reason also requireth, that it be shewed of Nebuchadnezzar, that he was the same whom Ptolomy calleth Nabopolassar.

Of both these points Bucholerus hath well collected sufficient proof from the exact calculations of sundry good Mathematicians, For by them it appears, that between Nabonassar and the birth of Christ, there passed seven hundred forty and six years: at which distance of time the reign of Salmanassar was. One great proofe hereof is this, which the same Bucholerus alledgeth out of Erasmus Reinboldus, in the Prutenick Tables. Mardocempadus, King of Babylon (whom Ptolomy, speaking of three Eclipses of the Moon, which were in his time, doth mention) was the same whom the Scriptures call Merodach, who sent Embassadors to Hezekia King of Juda. So that if we reckon backward to the difference of time between Merodach and Salmanassar, we shall find it the same which is between Mardocempadus and Nabonassar. Likewise Functius doth shew, that whereas from the destruction of Samaria, to the destruction of Jerusalem, in the nineteenth of Nebuchadnezzar, we collect out of the Scriptures, the distance of one hundred thirty and three years: the self-same distance of time is found in Ptolomy, between Nabonassar and Nabopolassar. For whereas Ptolomy seems to suffer from this accompt, making Nabonassar more ancient by an hundred and forty years, than the destruction of Jerusalem, we are to understand that he took Samaria in the eighth year of his reign; so that the seven foregoing years added to these one hundred thirty and three, make the accompt of the Scriptures to fall even with that of Ptolomy. Ptolomy's computation is, that from the first of Nabonassar, to the fifth of Nabopolassar, there passed a hundred twenty seven years. Now if we add to these one hundred twenty seven, the thirteen ensuing of Nebuchadnezzers years, before the City and Temple were destroyed, we have the sum of one hundred and forty years. In so plain a case more proofes are needless, though many are brought, of which this may serve for all, that Ptolomy placeth the first of Nabopolassar, one hundred twenty and two years after the first of Nabonassar, which agreeth exactly with the Scriptures. To these notes are added the consent of all Mathematicians: which in accompt of times I hold more sure than the authority of any History; and therefore I think it folly to make doubt; whereas Historians and Mathematical observations do so throughly concur.

Yet forasmuch as that argument of the learned Scaliger doth rest unanswered, whereby he proved Baladan the Father of Merodach, to have been this Nabonassar, I will not spare to lose a word or two in giving the Reader satisfaction herein. It is true, that the next observations of the heavenly Bodies, which Ptolomy recorded, after the time of Nabonassar, were in the reign of Mardocempadus; the second year of whose reign, is, according to Ptolomy, concurrent in part with the twenty seven of Nabonassar. For the second of three ancient Eclipses which he calculates, being in the second year of Mardocempadus, was from the beginning of Nabonassar twenty seven years, seventeen dayes, and eleven hours: the accompt from Nabonassar, beginning at high-noon the first day of the Egyptian Moneth Thot, then answering to the twenty sixth of February; and this Eclipse being fifty minutes before mid-night, on the eighteenth day of that Month, when the first day thereof agreed with the nineteenth of February; so that the difference of time between the two Kings Nabonassar and Mardocempadus, is noted by Ptolomy, according to the Egyptian years. But how doth this prove that Mardocempadus or Merodach, was the Son of Nabonassar? yea, how doth it prove, that he was his next successor, or any way of his lineage? it was enough to satisfie me, in this argument, that Scaliger himself did afterwards believe Mardocempadus to have been rather the Nephew than the Son of Baladan, or Nabonassar. For if he might be either the Nephew, or the Son; he might perhaps be neither the one, nor the other. But because our Countryman Lydiat hath reprehended Scaliger for changing his opinion; and that both Torniellus, who follows Scaliger herein, and Sethus Calvisius, who hath drawn into form of Chronology, that learned work, De Emendatione Temporum, to hold up the same assertion, confounding Baladan with Nabonassar, I have taken the pains to search, as far as my leisure and diligence could reach, after any sentence that might prove the Kindred or Succession of these two: Yet cannot I find in the Almageſt (for the Scriptures are either silent in this point, or adverse to Scaliger; and other good authority, I know none, in this business) any sentence more nearly proving the succession of Merodach to Nabonassar, than the place now last rehearsed: which makes no more, to shew that the one of these was farther to the other, than (that I may use a like example) the as near succession of William the Conqueror, declares him, to have been Son, or Grand-child to Edward the Confessor. This considered, we may safely go on with our account from Nabonassar, taking him from Salmanassar; and not fearing, that the Readers will be driven from our Book, when they find something in it, agreeing with Annius, forasmuch as these Kings mentioned in Scriptures, reigned in Babylon and Assyria, in those very times which by Diodorus and Ptolomy are assigned to Belosus, Nabonassar, and Mardocempadus, and the rest: no good History naming any others that reigned there in those ages; and all Astronomical observations, fitly concurring with the years that are attributed to these, or numbred from them.

Ptol. Almag. l. 4. c. 8.

SECT II.

Of the danger and deliverance of Judæa from Senacherib.

WHen Salmanaſſar was dead, and his ſon Senacherib in poſſeſſion of the Empire, in the fourteenth year of Ezechias, he demanded of him ſuch Tribute as was agreed on, at ſuch time as Tiglath, the Grandfather of Senacherib, and Father of Salmanaſſar, invited by Ahaz, invaded Rezin, King of Damaſcus, and delivered him from the dangerous War which Iſrael had undertaken againſt him. This Tribute and acknowledgment when Ezechias denied, Senacherib, having (as it ſeems) a purpoſe to invade Egypt, ſent one part of his Army to lye before Jeruſalem. Now though Ezechias (fearing this powerful Prince) had acknowledged his fault, and purchaſed his peace, as he hoped, with thirty hundred talents of ſilver, and gold, wherewith he preſented Senacherib, now ſet down before Lachis in Judæa: yet under the colour of better aſſurance, and to force the King of Judæa to deliver Hoſtages, the Aſſyrian environed Jeruſalem with a groſs Army, and having the ſword in his hand, thought it the fitteſt time to write his own conditions. 2 Kin. 18. 21.

Ezechias directed his three great Counſellers, to parly with Rabſaces over the Wall; and to receive his demands: who uſed three principal arguments to perſwade the people to yeild themſeves to his maſter Senacherib. For though the Chancellour, Steward, and Secretary, ſent by Ezechias, deſired Rabſaces to ſpeak to them in the Syrian tongue, and not in the Jewiſh, yet he with a louder voice directed his ſpeech unto the multitude in their own language. And for the firſt, he made them know, That if they continued obſtinate, and adhered to their King, that they would in a ſhort time be inforced to eat their own dung, and drink their own urine: Secondly, he altogether diſabled the King of Egypt, from whom the Judæans hoped for ſuccour; and compared him to a broken ſtaffe, on which whoſoever leaneth, pierceth his own hand: Thirdly, that the gods who ſhould help them, Ezechias had formerly broken and defaced, meaning chiefly (as it is thought by ſome) the braſen Serpent, which had been preſerved ever ſince Moſes's time: and withall he bad them remember the gods of other Nations, whom, notwithſtanding any power of theirs, his Maſter had conquered and thrown down; and for God himſelf, in whom they truſted, he perſwaded them by no means to rely upon him, for he would deceive them. But finding the people ſilent (for ſo the King had commanded them) after a while, when he had underſtood that the King of Arabia was marching on with a powerfull Army, he himſelf left the Aſſyrian forces in charge to others, and ſought Senacherib at Libna in Judæa, either to inform him of their reſolution in Jeruſalem, or to confer with him concerning the Army of Tarbaca the Arabian. Soon upon this there came letters from Senacherib to Ezechias, whom he partly adviſed, and partly threatned to ſubmit himſelf, uſing the ſame blaſphemous outrage againſt the all-powerful God, as before. But Ezechias ſending thoſe Counſellers to the Prophet Eſay, which had lately been ſent to Rabſaces, received from him comfort, and aſſurance, that this heathen Idolater ſhould not prevail; againſt whom the King alſo beſought aid from Almighty God, repeating the moſt inſolent and blaſphemous parts of Senacherib's letter, before the Altar of God in the Temple, confeſſing this part thereof to be true, That the King of Aſſhur had deſtroyed the Nations and their Lands, and had ſet fire on their gods, for they were no gods, but the work of mens hands, even wood and ſtone, &c. 2 Kin. 19.

The reaſon that moved Senacherib to deſire to poſſeſs himſelf in haſt of Jeruſalem was, that he might thereinto have retraited his Army, which was departed as it ſeemeth from the ſiege of Peluſium in Egypt, for fear of Terbaca: and though the Scriptures are ſilent of that enterpriſe (which in theſe Books of the Kings, and of the Chronicles or Paralipomenon, ſpeak but of the affairs of the Jews in effect) yet the ancient Beroſus, and out of him Joſephus and Saint Hierom, together with Herodotus, remember it as followeth. Herodotus calleth Senachirib King of Arabia and Aſſyria: which he might juſtly do, becauſe Tiglath his Grand-father held a great part thereof, which he wreſted from Pekah King of Iſrael: as Gilead over Jordan, and the reſt of Arabia Petræa adjoyning: the ſame Herodotus alſo maketh Sethon King of Egypt, to be Vulcan's Prieſt; and reporteth that the reaſon of Senacherib's return from Peluſium in Egypt, which he alſo beſieged, was, that an innumerable multitude of Rats had in one night eaten in ſunder the Bow-ſtrings of his Archers, and ſpoiled the reſt of their Weapons in that kind, which no doubt might greatly amaze him: but the approach of Tarbaca, remembred by Joſephus and Beroſus, was the more urgent. Saint Hierome upon the ſeven and thirtieth of Eſay, out of the ſame Beroſus, as alſo in part out of Herodotus, whom Joſephus citeth ſomewhat otherwiſe than his words lye, reports Senacherib's retrait in theſe words: Pugnaſſe autem Senacherib Regem Aſſyriorum contra Ægyptios, & obſediſſe Peluſium, jamque extructis aggeribus urbi capiendæ, veniſſe Tarhacam Regem Æthiopum in auxilium, & una nocte juxta Jeruſalem, centum octoginta quinque millia exercitus Aſſyrii peſtilentia corruiſſe, narrat Herodotus: & pleniſſime Beroſus Chaldaicæ Scriptor Hiſtoriæ, quorum fides de propriis libris petenda eſt. That Senacherib King of the Aſſyrians fought againſt the Ægyptians, and beſieged Peluſium, and that when his Mounts were built for the taking of the City, Tarhacas King of the Æthiopians came to help them, and that in one night, near Jeruſalem, one hundred eighty five thouſand of the Aſſyrian Army periſhed by peſtilence; of theſe things (ſaith Hierome) * Herodotus reports, and more at large Beroſus a writer of Chaldæan Story, whoſe credit is to be taken from their own Books. Out of Eſay it is gathered, that this deſtruction of the Aſſyrian Army was in this manner: Thou ſhalt be viſited of the Lord of Hoſts with thunder, and ſhaking, and a great noiſe, a whirlewind, and a tempeſt, and a flame of devouring fire. But Joſephus hath it more largely out of the ſame Beroſus, an authority (becauſe ſo well agreeing with the Scriptures) not to be omitted; Senacheribus autem ab Ægyptiaco bello revertens, offendit ibi exercitum quem ſub Rabſacis imperio relinquerat peſte divinitus immiſſa deletum, prima nocte poſt ea quam Urbem oppugnare cœperat, abſumptis cum Ducibus et Tribunis centum octoginta quinque millibus Militum; qua clade territus, & de reliquis copiis ſollicitus, maximis itineribus in regnum ſuum contendit ad regiam, quæ Ninus dicitur. Ubi paulo poſt per inſidias Seniorum e filiis ſuis, Adrameleehi & Selennari, vitam amiſit: occiſus in ipſo Templo quod dicitur Araſci, quem præcipuo cultu dignabitur; quibus ob patricidium a popularibus pulſis, & in Armeniam fugientibus, Aſaracoldas minor filius in Regnum ſucceſſit. Senacherib (ſaith Joſephus) returning from the Ægyptian War, found there his Army which he had left under the command of Rabſaces, deſtroyed by a peſtilence ſent from God, the firſt night that he had begun to aſſault the Town:

Town: one hundred fourscore and five thousand of the Souldiers being consumed with their Chieftains and Colonels. With which destruction being terrified, and withall afraid what might become of the rest of his Army, he made great marches into his Kingdom, to his Royal City, which is called Ninus, where shortly after by the treason of two of the eldest of his Sons, Adramelech and Selennor or Sharezer, he lost his life in the Temple dedicated to Arasces, or Nesroth; Whom he especially worshipped. These his Sons being for their paricide chased away by the people, and flying into Armenia, Asaracoldas his younger Son succeeded in the Kingdome. Who in the beginning of his reign sent new troops out of Assyria to Samaria, to fortifie the Colony therein planted by his Grand-father Salmanassar. What this Nesroth was, it is uncertain: Hierome in his Hebrew Traditions hath somewhat of him, but nothing positively. It is certain, that Venus Urania was worshipped by the Assyrians; and so was Jupiter Belus, as Dion, Eusebius, and Cyrillus witness. Many fancies there are, what cause his Sons had to murther him, but the most likely it is, that he had formerly dis-inherited those two, and conferred the Empire on Assarhaddon. Tobit tels us, that it was fiftie five dayes after Senacherib's returne, ere he was murthered by his Sons, during which time he slew great numbers of the Israelites in Nineve, till the most just God turned the sword against his own breast.

SECT. III.

Of Ezechiah*'s sickness and recovery: and of the* Babylonian King that congratulated him.

After this marvellous delivery, Ezechias sickned, and was told by Isaiah that he must dye: but after he had besought God with tears for his delivery, Isaiah, as he was going from him, returned again, and had warrant from the Spirit of God to promise him recovery after three dayes, and a prolongation of life for fifteen years. But Ezechias somewhat doubtful of this exceeding grace, prayeth for a sign to confirm him: whereupon, at the prayer of Isaiah, the shadow of the Sun cast it self the contrary way, and went back ten degrees, upon the Dyall of Achaz. The cause that moved Ezechias to lament (saith Saint Hierome) was, because he had as yet no Son, and then in despair that the Messias should come out of the house of David, or at least of his Seed. His disease seemeth to be the pestilence, by the medicine given him by the Prophet, to wit, a masse of figs, laid to the Botch or Sore.

2 King. 20.

This wonder when the Wise-men of Chaldæa had told to Merodach, King of Babylon, the first of that house, he sent to Ezechias, to be informed of the cause: at which time Ezechias shewed him all the Treasure he had, both in the Court and in the Kingdome, for which he was reprehended by the Prophet Isaiah, who told him: The dayes are at hand that all that is in thy house, and whatsoever thy Fathers have laid up in store to this day, shall be carried into Babel; nothing shall be left, saith the Lord. It may seem strange, how Ezechia should have got any treasure worth the shewing: for Senacherib had robbed him of all, the year before. But the spoyl of the same Senacherib his Camp repayed all with advantage, and made Ezechia richer upon the sudden than ever he had been: which unexpected wealth was a strong temptation to boasting. After this time Ezechia had rest, and spending without noise that addition which God had made unto his life, he dyed having reigned nine and twenty years. One only offensive War he made, which was against the Philistims, with good success. Among his other acts (shortly remembred in Ecclesiasticus) he devised to bring water to Jerusalem.

Eccluſ. 28.

In two respects they say that he offended God: the one, that he rejoyced too much at the destruction and lamentable end of his enemy: the other, that he so much gloried in his riches, as he could not forbear to shew them to strangers. But the reason which moved Ezechias (speaking humanely) to entertain the Embassadours of Merodach in this friendly and familiar manner, was because he came to visit him, and brought him a present, congratulating the recovery of his health; as also in that Merodach had weakned the house of Senacherib, his fearful enemy. For Merodach, who was Commander and Lieutenant under Senacherib in Babylon, usurped that State himself, in the last year of that King, and held it by strong hand against his Son Assarhaddon; who was not only simple, but impaired in strength, by the molestation of his brothers. This advantage Merodach espied, and remembring that their ancestor Phul Belochus had set his own Master Sardanapalus besides the cushion, thought it as lawful for himself to take the opportunity which this Kings weakness did offer, as it had been for Belochus to make use of the others wickedness, and so, finding himself beloved of the Babylonians, and sufficiently powerful he did put the matter to hazard, and prevailed: the assertion of this history is made by the same arguments that were in maintaining the common opinion of Writers, touching Phul Belochus; which I will not here again rehearse. So of this new race, which cut asunder the Line of Ninus, there were onely five Kings.

But forasmuch as the last year of Salmanassar was also the first of Senacherib his Son, we reckon the time, wherein the house of Phul held the Assyrian Kingdom, to have been one hundred and one years, of which, the last five and twenty were spent with Ezechia, under Salmanassar, Senacherib, and Assarhaddon.

Of the Kings that were in Media during the Reign of Ezechia: of the difference found between ſundry Authors in rehearſing the Median Kings. Other Contemporaries of Hezekia. Of Candaules, Gyges, and the Kings deſcended from Hercules.

IN the time of Ezekia, Medidus, and after him Cardiceas, reigned in Media. Whether it were ſo, that variety of Names, by which theſe Kings were called in ſeveral Hiſtories, hath cauſed them to ſeem more than indeed they were; or whether the Sons reigning with the Fathers, have cauſed not only the names of Kings, but the length of Time wherein they governed Media, to exceed the due proportion, or whether the Copies themſelves of Cteſias and Annius with Metaſthenes, have been faulty, as neither of theſe two Authors is over-highly commended of truſtineſs; ſo it is that the names, number, and length of reign are all very diverſly reported of theſe Median Kings, that follow Arbaces: therefore it need not ſeem ſtrange, that I reckon Medidus and Cardiceas as Contemporaries with Ezechia. For to reconcile ſo great a difference, as is found in thoſe Writers that vary from Euſebius, is more than I dare undertake. I will only here ſet down the Roll of Kings that reigned in Media, accordingly as ſundry Authors have delivered it. Annius his Metaſthenes orders them and their reigns thus.

Mercator hath laboured, with much diligence, to reconcile theſe Catalogues, and to make them alſo agree with Euſebius. But forasmuch as it ſeems to me an impoſſible matter, to attain unto the truth of his forgotten times, by conjectures founded upon Cteſias and Metaſthenes, I will lay the burden upon Euſebius, who lived in an age better furniſhed than ours, with Books of this Argument. Let it therefore ſuffice, that theſe two kings (whom I have reckoned as contemporaries with Ezekia) Medidus and Cardiceas, are found in Euſebius: for whether Cardiceas were Diodorus his Arbianes, I will not ſtay to ſearch. The Kings of Media, according to Euſebius, reigned in this order.

Theſe names, and this courſe of Suceſſion I retain, but add unto theſe, Cyaxares, the ſon of Aſtyages, according to Xenophon; and ſometimes follow Herodotus, in ſetting down the length of a Kings reign, otherwiſe than Euſebius hath it, of which variations I will render my reaſons in due place.

The twenty nine years of Ezekia were concurrent, in part, with the rule of the four firſt that were choſen Governours of Athens for ten years, that is, of Charops, Æſimedes, Elidicus, and Hippones. Touching the firſt of theſe I hear nothing, ſave that Rome was built in his firſt year; of which perhaps himſelf did not hear. Of the ſecond and third I find only the Names. The fourth made himſelf known by a ſtrange example of juſtice, or rather of cruelty, that he ſhewed upon his own Daughter. For he finding that ſhe had offended in unchaſtity, cauſed her to be lockt up with an Horſe, giving to neither of them any food: ſo the Horſe, conſtrained by hunger devoured the unhappy Woman.

In Rome, the firſt King, and Founder of that City was Romulus, he reigned both before and ſomewhat after Ezekiah.

In Lydia, Candaules the laſt King ruled in the ſame age.

This Region was firſt called Mæonia. Lydus, the the ſon of Atys reigning in it, gave the name of Lydia, if we believe ſuch authority as we find.

This Kingdom was afterward, by the appointment of an Oracle conferred upon Argon, who came of Alceus the ſon of Hercules by Jardana a bondwoman.

The race of theſe Heiraclida continued reigning fifty five years (in which two and twenty Generations paſſed) the Son continually ſucceeding the Father. Candaules the ſon of Myrſus was the laſt of his race, who doated ſo much upon the beauty of his own Wife, that he could not be content to enjoy her, but would needs enforce one Gyges the ſon of Daſcylus to behold her naked body, and placed the unwilling man ſecretly in her chamber, where he might ſee her preparing to bedward. This was not ſo cloſely carried, but that the Queen perceived Gyges at his going forth and underſtanding the matter, took it in ſuch high diſdain, that ſhe forced him the next day to requite the Kings folly with treaſon. So Gyges being brought again into the ſame Chamber by the Queen, ſlew Candaules, and was rewarded not only with his Wife but with the Kingdom of Lydia. He reigned thirty eight years, beginning in the laſt of Ezekia, one year before the death of Romulus.

After Gyges, his ſon Ardys, reigned nine and forty years; then Sadiattes twelve; Halyattes fifty ſeven; and finally Cræſus the ſon of Halyattes fourteen years: who loſt the Kingdom, and was taken by Cyrus of Perſia.

And here by the way we may note, that as the Lydian Kings whom Cræſus his Progenitor diſpoſſeſt, are deduced from Hercules, ſo of the ſame Hercules there there ſprang many other Kings, which governed ſeveral countries very long; as in Aſia, the Myſians, in Greece, the Lacedemonians, Meſſenians, Rodians, Corinthians and Argives; and from the Argives, the Macedonians, as likewiſe from the Corinthians, the Syracuſians: beſides many great and famous, though private families. But of the Heraclidæ that reigned in Lydia, I have not troubled my ſelf to take notice of the time of their ſeveral reigns: for little is found of them beſides the bare names, and the folly of this laſt King Candaules.

CHAP. XXVI.

Of the Kings that reigned in Egypt, between the deliverance of Iſrael from thence, and the reign of Ezechia in Juda when Ægypt and Juda made a League againſt the Aſſyrians.

SECT. I.

That many names of Egyptian Kings, found in Hiſtory, are like to have belonged only to Viceroys. An Example proving this out of William of Tyre his Hiſtory of the Holy War.

THE emulation and quarrels ariſing in theſe times between the mighty Kingdoms of Egypt and Aſſyrians, do require our pains, in collecting the moſt memorable things in Egypt, and ſetting down briefly the ſtate of that Country, which had coutinued long a flouriſhing Region, and was of great power, when it contended with Aſſyria for the Maſtery.

Of Cham the ſon of Noah, who firſt planted that Country, and of Oſiris, Orus and other ancient Kings that reigned there, untill the Iſraelites were thence delivered, more hath been ſaid already than I can ſtand too: Though I hold it no ſhame to fail in ſuch Conjectures. That which I have delivered, in ſpeaking mine opinion of the Egyptian Dynaſties, muſt here again help me. For it may truly be affirmed, That the great number of Kings, which are ſaid to have reigned in Egypt, were none other than Vice-roys or Stewards, ſuch as Joſeph was, and ſuch as were the Soldans in later ages. Therefore I will not only forbear to ſeek after thoſe, whom Herodotus and Diodorus have reckoned up, from the mouthes of Egyptian Prieſts, delivering them by number, without rehearſing their Names; but will ſave the labour of marſhalling them in order, whoſe names only are found; the years of their reigns, and other circumſtances proving them to have been Kings indeed, being not recorded.

But that I may not ſeem before hand to lay an imaginarie ground, whereupon after I may build what I liſt; it were not amiſſe, to give unto the Reader ſuch ſatisfaction in this point, as apparent reaſon, and truth of Hiſtory doth afford: Firſt therefore, we ought not to believe thoſe numbers of Generations, which the lying Prieſts have reckoned up, to magnifie their Antiquities. For we know that from Abraham, our Saviour Chriſt was removed onely forty two deſcents; which makes it evident, that in far ſhorter time, namely before the Perſian Empire, there could not have paſſed away twice as many ſucceſſions in Ægypt: eſpecially conſidering, that many of theſe, whoſe continuance is expreſſed, having reigned longer than forty years. It follows that we ſhould ſquare the number of the Egyptian Kings in ſome even proportion, to thoſe which did bear rule in other Countries. As for the reſt whoſe names we find ſcattered here and there; any man that will take the paines to read the 19th Book of the Holy War, written by William Archbiſhop of Tyre, may eaſily perſwade himſelf, that it is not hard to find names enough, of ſuch as might be thought to have reigned in Egypt, being none other than Regents or Viceroyes. Yet will I here inſert as briefly as I can, ſome things making to that purpoſe, for the pleaſure and information of ſuch as will not trouble themſelves with turning over many Authors.

When Elahdech the Caliph ruled in Egypt, one Dargan a powerfull and a ſubtile man, made himſelf Soldan, by force and cunning, chaſing away Sanar an Arabian, who was Soldan before and after him. This Dargan miniſtred matter of quarrel to Amalrick King of Jeruſalem, and ſuſtained, with little loſſe, an invaſion, which Amalrick made upon Egypt. Whereupon he grew ſo inſolent and proud, that Sanar the former Soldan hoped to make his party good againſt him, if he could get any forces wherewith to enter Egypt. Briefly, Sanar ſueth to Noradine, King of Damaſco, for ayde, who ſends an Army of his Turks, under the command of Syracon, againſt the Soldan Dargan. So Dargan and Sanar met, and fought: The Victory was Dargans; but he enjoyed it not: For in few dayes after he was ſlain by treaſon, whereby Sanar did recover his dignity: which to eſtabliſh, he ſlew all the kindred and friends of Dargan, that he he could find in the great City of Cairo.

To all theſe doings, the Caliph Elhadech gave little regard: for he thought it little concerned him, which of them lived, and had the adminiſtration of the Kingdome, whileſt he might have the profit of it and his pleaſure. But new troubles preſently ariſe, which (one would think) do nearly touch the Caliph himſelf. Syracon with his Turks, whom Sanar had gotten to come into Egypt, will not now be intreated there to leave him, and quietly go their way home. They ſeize upon the Town of Belbeis, which they fortifie, and there attend the arrival of more company from Damaſco for the conqueſt of all Egypt. The Soldan perceives their intent, and finds himſelf not ſtrong enough to expell them, much leſs to expel the Turkiſh Army that was likely to ſecond them: He therefore ſends Meſſengers to King Almarick of Jeruſalem, whom with large promiſes he he gets to bring him ayde, and ſo drives out the Turks: Of all this trouble the great Caliph hears nothing, or not ſo much as ſhould make him look to the playing of his own game.

A greater miſchief ariſeth, concerning the Caliph Elhadech particularly in his own Title. Syracon Captain of the Turks that had been in Egypt, goes to the Caliph of Baldach (who was oppoſite to him of Egypt, each of them claiming as heir to Mahomet that falſe Prophet, the Soveraignty over all that were of the Saracen Law) and tels him the weakneſs of the Egyptian, with his own ability of doing ſervice in thoſe parts; offering his beſt means for the extirpation of the Schiſmatical Caliph, and the reduction of all Egypt, with the Weſtern parts, under the ſubjection of the Babylonian. This motion is readily and joyfully entertained; all the Eaſtern Provinces are up in Arms and Syracon, with a mighty power, deſcendeth into Egypt. The noyſe of this great expedition ſo affrighteth King Alnarick, that with all his forces he hatteth into Egypt, well knowing how neerly it concerned him and his Kingdom of Jeruſalem, to keep the Saracens from joyning all under one head. Sanar the Soldan percieving the faithful care of the Chriſtians his friends, welcomes them, and beſtirs himſelf in giving them all manner of content, as it behoved him: for by their admirable valour, he finally drave the enemies out of the Country. But this victory was not ſo ſoon gotten, as it is quickly told.

Strange it is (which moſt concerns our preſent purpoſe) that of ſo deſperate a danger, the Caliph, as yet, ſeems to know nothing. May we not think him to have been King in Title only, who medled ſo little in the Government? The Soldan, finding that the Chriſtians (without whoſe help all was loſt) could not well ſtay ſo long as his neceſſities required, makes large offers to King Almarick, upon condition that he ſhould abide by it. He promiſeth a great Tribute (William of Tyre calls it a Tribute; the Sarazens perhaps, called it a Penſion) which the Kings of Jeruſalem ſhould receive out of Egypt, for this behoveful aſſiſtance. But the Chriſtians underſtanding that the Soldan (how much ſoever he took upon him) was ſubject to a higher Lord, would make no bargain of ſuch importance with any other than the Caliph himſelf. Hereupon Hugh the Earl of Cæſarea, and a Knight of the Templers, are ſent unto Elhadech to ratifie the covenants. Now ſhall we leave the greatneſs of the Caliph and his eſtate.

Theſe Embaſſadours were conveighed by the Soldan to Cairo, where arriving at the Palace, they found it guarded by great Troops of Souldiers. The firſt entrance was through dark Porches, that were kept by many armed bands of Ethiopians, which with all diligence did reverence to the Soldan as he paſſed along. Through theſe ſtreights the Warders lead them into goodly open Courts, of ſuch beauty and riches, that they could not retain the gravity of Embaſſadours, but were inforced to admire the things which detained their eyes. For there they ſaw goodly Marble Pillars, gilded Beams, all wrought over with Emboſſed Works, curious Pavements, Fiſh-ponds of Marble with clear Waters, and many ſorts of ſtrange Birds, unknown in thoſe parts of the World, as coming perhaps from the Eaſt Indies, which then was undiſcovered. The further they went, the greater was their magnifence; for the Caliph his Eunuches conveyed them into other Courts within theſe, as far excelling the former, as the former did ſurpaſs ordinary houſes. It were tedious perhaps to rehearſe how the further they entred, the more high ſtate they found, and cauſe of marvail; ſuffice it, that the good Archbiſhop, who wrote theſe things, was never held a vain Author. Finally they were brought into the Caliph's own lodgings, which were yet more ſtately and better guarded; where entring the Preſence, the Soldan having twice proſtrated himſelf, did the third time caſt off his Sword, that he wore about his neck, and throw himſelf on the ground before the Curtain, behind which the Caliph ſate. Preſently the traverſe wrought with Gold and Pearls was opened, and the Caliph himſelf diſcovered, ſitting with great Majeſty on a Throne of Gold, having few of his moſt inward Servants and Eunuches about him. When the Soldan had humbly kiſſed his Maſters feet, he briefly told the cauſe of his coming, the danger wherein the Land ſtood, and the offers that he made unto King Almerick, deſiring the Caliph himſelf to ratifie them in the preſence of the Embaſſadors. The Caliph anſwered, That he would throughly perform all which was promiſed. But this contented not the Embaſſadors: They would have him to give his hand upon the bargain; which the Egyptians that ſtood by thought an impudent requeſt. Yet his greatneſs condeſcended at length, after much deliberation, at the earneſt requeſt of the Soldan to reach out his hand. When the Earl of Cæſarea ſaw that the Caliph gave his hand neither willingly nor bare, he told them roundly thus much in effect: Sir, Truth ſeeks no holes to hide it ſelf; Princes that will hold Covenant, muſt deal openly, nakedly, and ſincerely; Give us therefore your bare hand, if you mean that we ſhall truſt you, for we will make no bargain with your Glove. Much ado there was about this: for it ſeemed againſt the Majeſty of ſuch a Prince to yield ſo far. But when it would none otherwiſe be, with a ſmiling chear (though to the great grief of his Servants) he vouchſafed to let the Earl take him by the bare hand; and ſo rehearſing the covenants word by word, as the Earl ſpake them, he ratified all; diſmiſſing finally the Embaſſadors with ſuch rewards as teſtified his greatneſs.

In this Caliph and his Sultan, we may diſcern the Image of the ancient Pharaoh, and his Viceroy: we ſee a Prince of great eſtate, ſitting in his Palace, and not vexing himſelf with the great preparations made againſt him which terrifie the neighbour Countries: we ſee his Viceroy, in the mean ſeaſon, uſing all Royall power; making War and Peace, entertaining and repelling Armies of ſtrangers; yea, making the Land of Egypt tributary to a forrain Prince. What greater authority was given to Joſeph, when Pharaoh ſaid unto him, Thou ſhalt be over mine houſe, and at thy word ſhall all my people be armed, only in the Kings throne will I be above thee. Behold I have ſet thee over all the Land of Egypt.

I do not commend this form of government; neither can I approve the conjecture of mine Author, where he thinks that the Egyptians, ever ſince Joſeph's time, have felt the burthen of that ſervitude which he brought upon them. when he bought them and their Lands for Pharaoh. Herein I find his judgment good: that he affirms this manner of the Egyptian Kings, in taking their eaſe, and ruling by a Viceroy, to be part of the ancient cuſtoms practiſed by the Pharaohs. For we find, that even the Ptolomies (excepting Ptolomæus Lagi, and his Son Philadelphus, Founder and eſtabliſher of that race) were given, all of them wholly, to pleaſe their own appetites, leaving the charge of the Kingdom to Women, Eunuches, and other Miniſters of their deſires. The pleaſures which that Country afforded, were indeed ſufficient to invite the Kings thereof unto a volup uous life, and the awful regard wherein the Egyptians held their Princes, gave them ſecurity, whereby they might the better truſt their Officers with ſo ample commiſſion. But of this matter, I will not ſtand any longer to diſpute. It is enough to have ſhewed, that the great and almoſt abſolute power of the Viceroys governing Egypt, is ſet down by Moſes, and that a lively example of the ſame is found in William of Tyre, who lived in the ſame age, was in few years after Chancellor of the Kingdom of Jeruſalem, and had full diſcourſe with Hugh Earl of Cæſaria touching all theſe matters. Wherefore it remains that we be not carried away with a vain opinion, to believe that all they were Kings, whom reports of the fabulous Egyptians have honoured with that ſtile; but reſt contented with a Catalogue of ſuch, as we find by circumſtance, likely to have reigned in that Country; after whom it follows that we ſhould make inquiry.

SECT. II.

Of Acherres; whether he were Uchoreus that was the eighth from Oſymandyas. Of Oſymandyas and his Tomb.

IN this buſineſs I hold it vain to be too curious. For who can hope to attain to the perfect knowledge of the truth, when as Diodorus varies from Herodotus, Euſebius from both of them; and late Writers that have ſought to gather the truth out of theſe and others, find no one with whom they can agree? In this caſe Annius would do good ſervice, if a man could truſt him. But it is enough to be beholding to him when others do either ſay nothing, or that which may juſtly be ſuſpected. I will therefore hold my ſelf contented with the pleaſure that he hath done me, in ſaying ſomewhat of Oſiris, Iſis, Orus, and thoſe antiquities removed ſo far out of ſight: as for the Kings following the departure of Iſrael out of Egypt, it ſhall ſuffice that Herodotus, Diodorus, and Euſebius have not been ſilent, and that Reyneccius hath taken pains to range into ſome good order the names that are extant in theſe, or elſe found ſcattering in others.

From the departure of Iſrael out of Egypt, unto the reign of Thuoris (who is generally taken to be the ſame that the Greeks call Proteus) there is little or no diſagreement about the Egyptian Kings. Wherefore I ſet down the ſame which are found in Euſebius, and give to every one the ſame length of reign.

Acherres was the firſt of theſe, who ſucceeded unto Chencres, that periſhed in the Red Sea. This King ſeems to Reyneccius to be the ſame whom Diodorus calls Uchoreus, the founder of Memphis. But whereas mention is found in Diodorus of a great King named Oſymandyas, from whom Uchoreus is ſaid to be the eighth; it will either hardly follow, that Timaus (as Reyneccius conjectures) was the great Oſymandyas; or elſe that this Acherres was Uchoreus: for the diſtance between them was more than eight generations.

Mercator judgeth Oſymandyas to have been the huſband of Ancheres, Orus the ſeconds daughter; thinking that Manethon (cited by Joſephus) doth omit his name, and inſert his Wifes into the Catalogue of Kings, becauſe he was King in his Wifes right. As for Uchoreus, it troubles not Mercator to find him the eighth from this man: for he takes Ogdous, not to ſignifie in this place of Diodore (as that Greek word elſe doth) the eighth, but to be an Egyptian name, belonging alſo to Uchoreus, who might have had two names, as many of the reſt had. I will not vex my braines in the unprofitable uſe of this, and the like inextricable doubts.

All that Diodore hath found of this Oſymandyas, was wrought upon his monument; the moſt thereof in figures, which I think the Egyptians did fabulouſly expound. For whereas there was portrayed a great Army, with the ſiege of a Town, the captivity of the people, and the triumph of the Conqueror; all this the Egyptians ſaid to denote the conqueſt of Bactria made by that King: which how likely it was, let others judge. I hold this goodly piece of work which Diodore ſo particularly deſcribes, to have been erected for a common place of burial to the ancient Kings and Queens of Egypt, and to their Viceroyes; whileſt yet they were not ſo ambitous, as every one to have his own particular monument, ſtriving therein to exceed all others. This appears by the many ſtatues therein placed, by the Wars, the judgment ſeate, the recieving of tribute, the offering ſacrifice to God, the account of revenues, and plenty of cattel and food: all which were there curiouſly wrought, ſhewing the ſeveral Offices of a Governor. On the Tomb of Oſymandyas was this Inſcription.

> I am Oſymandyas King of Kings; if any deſire to know what I am, or where I lye, let him exceed ſome of my works.

Let them that hope to exceed his works, labour to know what he was. But ſince by thoſe words, Or where I lye, it ſhould ſeem, that he lay not there interred, we may lawfully ſuſpect that it was. Joſeph, whoſe bodie was preſerved among the Hebrews, to be buried in the land of Canaan, and this empty monument might King Orus, who outlived him, erect in honour of his high deſerts, among the royal ſepulchres. To which purpoſe the plenty of cattel and all manner of Viands, had good reference. The name of Oſymandyas doth not hinder this conjecture; ſeeing Joſeph had one new name given him by Pharaoh, for the expounding the dream, and might, upon further occaſions, have another to his increaſe of honour. As for that ſtile, King of Kings, it was perhaps no more then Beglerberg, as the Turkiſh Baſſas, are called, that is, Great above the Great.

Now although it be ſo, that the reckoning fals out right, between the times of Joſeph and Acherres (for Acherres was the eighth in order, that reigned after the great Orus, whoſe Viceroy Joſeph was) yet will I hereby ſeek, neither to fortifie mine own conjecture, as touching Joſeph, nor to infer any likelihood of Acherres his being Uchoreus: For it might well be that Memphis was built by ſome ſuch King as was Gehoar, Lieutenant unto the Caliph Elcain; who having to his Maſters uſe conquered Egypt, and many other Countries, did build, not farr from old Memphis, the great City of Cairo (corruptly ſo pronounced) naming it El Cahira, that is, an enforcing or an imperious Miſtreſſe, though he himſelf were a Dalmatian ſlave. John Leo. Hiſt. fric. l. 8.

SECT. III.

Of Cherres, Armeus, Rameſſes, and Amenophis. Of Myris, and the Lake that bears his name.

WHen Archerres had reigned eight years, Cherres ſucceeded and held the Kingdom fifteen years: then reigned Armeus five years, and after him Rameſſes threeſcore and eight. Of Armeus and Rameſſes is that Hiſtory underſtood by Euſebius, which is common among the Greeks, under the names of Danaus and Egyptus. For it is ſaid that Danaus, being expelled out of Egypt by his brother, fled into Greece, where he obtained the Kingdom of Argos: that he had fifty Daughters, whom upon ſeeming reconciliation, he gave in marriage to his brothers fifty ſons, but commanded every one of them to kill her husband the firſt night: that onely Hipermeneſtra, one of his daughters, did ſave her husband Linceus, and ſuffered him to eſcape; finally, That for this fact, all the bloody ſiſters, when they died, were enjoyned this fooliſh puniſhment in Hell, to fill a leaking veſſel with water.

The reign of Danaus in Argos was indeed in this age; but that Armeus was Danaus, and Rameſſes, Egyptus, is more than Reyneccius believes: he rather takes Armeus to have been Myris, or Meris, who cauſed the great lake to be made which bears his name. For my own part, as I can eaſily believe, that he which fled out of Egypt into Greece, was a man of ſuch quality as the Soldan Sanar, of whom we ſpake before; ſo do I not find how in ſo ſhort a reign, as five years, a work of that labour could be finiſhed, which was required unto the Lake of Myris, and the Monument therein; whereof his own ſepulchre and his wives being ſome part, it is manifeſt that he was not buried in Argos. Wherefore of Myris, and of all other Kings, whoſe age is uncertain, and of whoſe reigns we have no aſſurance, I may truly ſay, that their great works are not enough to prove them like thoſe of Joſeph's, who bought all the people of Egypt as bondmen, and all their land for bread; of Geboar, who founded Cairo; and of Sanar, who made the Country Tributary; were performed by none of them.

It ſhall therefore be enough to ſet down the length of their reigns whom we find to have followed one another in order of ſucceſſion: but in rehearſing the great acts which were performed, I will not ſtand to examine whether they that did them were Kings or no.

The Lake of Myris, is by the report of Diodore and Herodotus, three thouſand ſix hundred furlongs in compaſs, and fifty fathoms deep. It ſerved to recieve the waters of Nilus, when the overflow being too great, was harmful to the Country: and to ſupply the defect, by letting out the waters of the lake, when the River did not riſe high enough. In opening the ſluces of this Lake, for the letting in or out of waters, were ſpent fifty talents; but the lake it ſelf defrayed that coſt; ſeeing the tribute impoſed upon fiſh taken therein, was every day one talent, which Myris gave to his Wife to buy ſweet oyntments and other Ornaments for her body. In the middeſt of it was left an Iſland, wherein were the Sepulchres of Myris and his Wife, and over each of them a Pyramis that was a furlong, or (according to Herodotus) fifty paces high; having on the tops their ſtatues, ſitting in Thrones. I find not the deſcription of this Lake in Maps, anſwerable to the report of Hiſtorians: yet it is very great. The years of Armeus are by Menathon divided, by inſerting one Armeſis (whom Euſebius omits) that ſhould have reigned one year and odd months of the time: but I hold not this difference worthy of examination.

After Rameſſes, his ſon Amenophis held the Kingdom forty years. Some give him only nineteen years; and Mercator thinks him to have been the King that was drowned in the Red Sea: whereof I have already ſpoken in the firſt Book.

SECT. IV.

Of the Kings that reigned in the Dynaſty of the Larthes.

SEthoſis, or Zethus, reigned after his Father Amenophis, fifty five years. To him are aſcribed the famous acts of that ancient Seſoſtris. But the ſtate of the world was not ſuch at theſe times, that ſo great an expedition as the old Seſoſtris made, could have been either eaſily performed, or forgotten in the Countries through which he paſſed, had it now been performed; as any man will percieve, if he look upon my Chronological Table, and conſider who lived with this Zethus. With this King began the Dynaſty of the Larthes; which Reyneccius conjectures to have had the ſame ſignification, wherein the old Kings of Hetruria were called Lartes, (the Hetrurians being iſſued out of Lydia, the Lydians out of Egypt) and to have ſignified as much as Imperator, or General. The Wars in which theſe Kings were Generals, I take to have been againſt the Æthiopians, for ſure I am, that they troubled not the Country of Paleſtina, that lay next unto them on the one hand; nor is it likely that they travelled over the deſart ſands, on the other hand, to ſeek matter of conqueſt, in the poor Countries of Africa. But theſe Generals (if the Larthes were ſuch) were not many. Five only had that title; and the laſt of theſe took it perhaps, as hereditary from the firſt; in ſuch ſort as the Roman Emperors were proud, for a while, to be called Antonini, till the moſt unſuitable conditions of Heliogabalus, made his ſucceſſors forbear the name.

Here it may be objected, that the Dynaſties (as appears by this particular) took name from the Kings; that the Kings alſo did adminiſter the government themſelves, and that therefore I am decieved in aſcribing too much unto the Viceroys. But it is to be conſidered, that what is ſaid of theſe Larthes, depends wholly upon conjecture, and that the authority of the Regents, or Viceroys, might be great enough, though ſome few Kings took the conduct of Armies into their own hands. For ſo we find in John Leo, that the Soldan of Egypt (after ſuch time as the Soldan Saladine, murdering the Caliph, got the ſoveraignty to himſelf) had under him a Viceroy, ſtiled Eddaguadare, who had authority to place, or diſplace any Magiſtrates or Officers; and that this mans Family was almoſt as great as the Soldans own. Yet was there alſo the Amir Cabir, or Lord General of the Soldans forces, who had the charge of defending the Land, and might, as he thought good, ſpend of the Soldans treaſure. So might the office of the Viceroys continue, though the Kings themſelves, taking the charge, or title of Generals upon them, did ſomewhat abridge the greatneſs of the ſecond place. As for the names of the Dynaſties, it ſkills not whence they were drawn; whether from their Country, as thoſe of the Thebans and Diapolitans; John Leo 8.

or from some eminent men, or man, who ruled in that time; as many think, that the seventeenth Dynasty was called of the Shepheards, because Joseph governed in part thereof; or from the Kings themselves that reigned; as this was said to be of the Larthes or Generals.

The next, as Manetho (but Annius his Manetho) hath it, was without any Larthes, or Generals, yet was it not without Kings, forasmuch as Vaphres, and Sesac, reigned therein, if many others did not. But let us now return to the business which we now left.

Rameses was King after Zethus, or Sethosis, threescore and six years. He is mistaken for that second Sesostris, of whom I have spoken in the first Book. I find nothing worth rehearsing of this Rameses, or of Amenophis and Annemenes, that followed him in order, the former of which reigned fourty, the latter six and twenty years. Wherefore it may very well be, that the name which Zethus had from valour, was taken by these as hereditary.

Thuoris, the last of the Larthes, reigned only seven years, yet he is thought to have been that Proteus, of whom Herodotus hath mention, saying, That he took Helena from Paris, and after the sack of Troy, restored her to Menelaus.

I need say no more in refutation of this, than that the time of Thuoris his reign lasted not so long as from the Rape of Helen to her restitution.

This Proteus or Cetes (as he is named by some) together with Thou, and others mentioned by Greek Writers in this business, or in other such matters, may seem to be under-Officers: for such only are like to have had their residence about Pharos, and the Sea-coast where Menelaus arrived.

Of Proteus who detained Helen, it is said that he could foretel things to come, and that he could change himself into all shapes: whereby is signified his crafty head. For which he is, grown into a Proverb. The Poets feigned him a Sea-god, and keeper of Neptune's Seal-fishes, for belike he was some under-Officer to the Admiral, having charge of the Fishing about the Isle of Pharos, as was said before.

Remphes the son of Proteus is reckoned the next King, by Diodore, as also by Herodotus, who calls him Ramsinitus, and tells a long tale fit to please children, of his covetousness, and how his Treasure-house was robb'd by a cunning Thief, that at last married his Daughter. But of this a man may believe what he list. How long this King reigned I know not, nor think that either he or his Father did reign at all.

SECT. V.

Of the Egyptian Kings, whose names are found scattering in sundry Authors, their times being not recorded. The Kings of Egypt, according to Cedrenus. Of Vaphres and Sesac.

MAny other names of Egyptian Kings are found scattered here and there: as Toneperſobis, of whom Suidas delivers only the bare name and title: Senemures, or Senepos, mentioned in Macrobius, who perhaps was the same that by Suidas is called Senyes, or Enenes, noted by occasion of a great Physician that lived under him; Banchyris, recorded by the same Suidas for his great justice; and Thulis, of whom Suidas tells great matters; as that his Empire extended to the Ocean Sea; that he gave Name to the Isle of Thule, which some take to be Iseland, and that he consulted with the Devil, or (which is all one) with Seraphis, desiring to know, who before him had been, or after him should be, so mighty as himself. The Answer or confession of the Devil was remarkable; which I find Englished in the translation of Plessis, in his Work, Of the trueness of the Christian Religion. The Greek Verses are somewhat otherwise, and much more imperfect in those Copies that I have of Cedrenus and Suidas, but the sense is all one; which is this:

First God, and next The Word, and then The Spirit,
Which Three be One, and joyn in One all Three:
Whose force is endless. Get thee hence frail Wight,
The man of Life unknown, excelleth thee.

I should have thought that Suidas had borrowed all this of Cedrenus, had I not found somewhat more in Suidas than Cedrenus hath hereof; as the form of invocation which Thulis used, and that clause of his, giving name to the Island: though in this last point I hold Suidas to be deceived; as also Cedrenus is, or (at least) seems to me, in giving to this King such profound antiquity of reign. Indeed the very name of that Book, cited often by Cedrenus, which he calls Little Genesis, is alone enough to breed suspicion of some imposture: But the Frierly stuff that he alledgeth out of it, is such as would serve to discredit himself, were it not otherwise apparent that he was a man both devout and of good judgement, in matters that fell within his compass.

I will here set down a list of old Egyptian Kings delivered by him, and leave the censure to others.

The first King of Egypt, that he sets down, is Mizraim the son of Cham. After him, he finds many of a new race, deriving their pedigree thus. Nimrod the son of Chus, was also called Orion, and further took upon him the name of the Planet Saturn, had to Wife Semiramis, who was of his own Lineage, and by her, three sons; Picus, sirnamed Jupiter, Belus, and Ninus.

Picus chasing his Father out of Assyria into Italy, reigned in his stead thirty years, and then gave up that Kingdom to Juno his sister and wife, and to Belus his son: after which Belus, who reigned only two years, Ninus had the Kingdom, and married his own Mother Semiramis. But Picus went into Italy to visit his old Father Saturn; Saturn forthwith resigned the Kingdom unto him. Picus Jupiter reigned in Italy threescore and two years, had threescore and ten Wives or Concubines, and about as many Children: finally died, and lies buried in the Isle of Crete.

The Principal of Jupiter's Sons were Faunus, Perseus, and Apollo.

Faunus was called by the name of the Planet Mercury: He reigned in Italy after his Father, five and thirty years, and then (finding that all his Brethren conspired against him) he went into Egypt, with abundance of Treasure, where, after the death of Misraim, he got the Kingdom, and held it nine and thirty years.

After Mercury, Vulcan reigned in Egypt, four years and a half. Then Sol, the son of Vulcan, reigned twenty years and a half.

There followed in order Sosis, Osiris, Orus and Thules, of whom we spake before: the length of their several reigns is not set down.

After Thules, was the great Seſoſtris King, twenty years.

His Succeſſor was Pharaoh, called Narecho, that held the Crown fifty years, with which there paſſed from him the ſurname of Pharaoh, to a very long poſterity.

Theſe reports of Cedrenus I hold it enough to ſet down as I find them: let their credit reſt upon the Author.

Others yet we find, that are ſaid to have reigned in Egypt, without any certain note when, or how long: about whom I will not labour, as fearing more to be reprehended of vain curioſity, in the ſearch made after theſe already rehearſed, than of negligence, in omitting ſuch as might have been added.

Clem. Strom. l. 1. Euſeb. de Præp. Evang. l. 9. c. 4. Vaphres, the father in law to Solomon and Seſac, the afflicter of Rehoboam, led us again into fair way, but not far.

1 Kings 9 16. and 11. 18, 19, &c. The name of Vaphres is not found in the Scriptures; but we are beholding to Clemens Alexandrinus and Euſebius for it. Theſe give us not the length of his reign; but we know that he lived in the times of David and of Solomon. He came into Paleſtina with an Army, took Gezar from the Canaanites, and gave it to his daughter, Solomon's Wife: though for her ſake perhaps it was, that in time following either he, or (as I rather take it) Seſac his ſon did favour the Enemies of Solomon, who kept ſo many Wives and Concubines, beſides this Egyptian Princeſs. In the life of Rehoboam all hath been written, that I find of Seſac, excepting the length of his reign, which muſt have been ſix and twenty years, if he were that Smendis, with whom, Euſebius begins the one and twentieth Dynaſty.

Now foraſmuch as it would ſerve to no great purpoſe, that we knew the length of Seſac his reign, and of theirs that followed him, unleſs therewithall we knew the beginning of Seſac, upon which the reſt have dependance; this courſe I take.

From the fourth year of Jehojakim King of Juda, in which Pharaoh Neco was ſlain, I reckon upwards the years of the ſame Neco, and of his Predeceſſors, unto the beginning of Seſac: by which account, the firſt year of Seſac is found concurrent with the twentieth of Solomon's reign, and the twenty ſixth of Seſac with the fifth of Rehoboam, wherein Seſac ſpoiled the Temple, and dyed, enjoying the fruits of his Sacriledge no longer than Joas the Iſraelite, and Craſſus the Roman did; who after him ſpoiled the Temple of Jeruſalem.

To fill up the time between Seſac and Neco, I have rather taken thoſe Kings that I find in the Greek Hiſtorians, than them which are in Euſebius his Catalogue. For of thoſe that are delivered by Euſebius, we find no Name nor Act recorded elſewhere, ſave only of Bocchoris, who is remembred by Diodore, Plutarch, and others, much being ſpoken of him, that makes him appear to have been a King.

Hereunto I may add, that the Succeſſion is often interrupted in Euſebius by Æthiopians, which got the Kingdom often and held it long: whereas contrariwiſe it appears by the Prophet Eſay, that the Counſellors of Pharaoh did vaunt of the long and flouriſhing continuance of that houſe, inſomuch that they Eſay 19.11. ſaid of Pharaoh, I am the ſon of the Wiſe, I am the ſon of the Ancient King.

But that which overthrows the reckoning of Euſebius, is the good agreement of it with his miſtaken times of the Kings of Juda. For though it pleaſe him well to ſee how the reigns of Joſias and Neco meet by his computation, yet this indeed mars all, the reign of Joſias being miſplaced. This error grows from his omitting to compare the reigns of the Kings of Juda with theirs of Iſrael: by which occaſion Joram King of Iſrael is made to reign three years after Ahazia of Juda; Samaria is taken by Salmanaſſar before Hezechia was King: and in a word, all, or moſt of the Kings have their beginnings placed in ſome other year of their collaterals, than the Scriptures have determined.

SECT. VI.

Of Chemnis, Cheops, Cephrenes, and other Kings recited by Herodotus and Diodorus Siculus, which reigned between the times of Rehoboam and Ezechia.

FOllowing therefore the Greek Hiſtorians, I place Chemnis, or (according to Diodore, Chembis, firſt in the rank of thoſe that were Kings after Seſac. He reigned fifty years, and built the greateſt of the three Pyramids, which was accounted one of this Worlds Wonders. The Pyramis hath his name from the ſhape, in that it reſembleth a flame of fire, growing from the bottom upwards narrower and narrower to the top. This of Chemnis being four-ſquare, had a Baſe of ſeven Acres every way, and was about ſix acres high. It was of a very hard and durable ſtone, which laſted, when Diodore ſaw it, about a thouſand years, without complaining of any injury that it had ſuffered by weather in ſo long ſpace. From the reign of Chemnis, unto the age of Auguſtus Cæſar, wherein Diodore lived, are indeed a thouſand years: which do give the better likelihood unto this time wherein Chemnis is placed. As for this and other Pyramids, late Writers do teſtifie, that they have ſeen them yet ſtanding.

After Chemnis, Diodore placeth Cephrenes his Brother, but doubtfully, and enclining rather to the opinion, that his ſon Chabreus ſucceeded. Herodotus hath Cheops (who might be Chabreas) and Cephrenes after him. Theſe are ſaid to have been brethren; but the length of their reigns may argue the latter to have been ſon to the former: for Cheops reigned fifty years; Cephrenes fifty ſix. Theſe were, as Chemnis had been, builders of Pyramids, whereby they purchaſed great hatred of their people, who already had overlaboured themſelves in erecting the firſt. Theſe Pyramids were ordained to be Tombs for thoſe that raiſed them; but the malice of the Egyptians is ſaid to have caſt out their bodies, and to have called their Mounments by the name of an Herdſman, that kept his Beaſts thereabouts. It may be, that the robbing them of the honour, and entiteling a poor fellow to their works, was held to be caſting out of their bodies; otherwiſe it is hard to conceive how it might be, that they, who had not power to avoid the like ſlavery laid upon them by the younger brother or ſon, ſhould have power or leiſure to take ſuch revenge upon his Predeceſſor. To the like malice may be aſcribed the tale deviſed againſt Cheops his Daughter; That her Father wanting mony, did proſtitute her, and that ſhe getting of every man that accompanied her, one ſtone, did build with them a fourth Pyramis, that ſtood in the midſt of the other three. Belike ſhe was an inſolent Lady and made them follow their drudgery for her ſake, longer a while then they thought to have done, in raiſing a Monument with the ſuperfluity of her Fathers proviſions. Diodor. l. 1. Herod. l. 2.

Mycerinus the ſon of Cephrenes, reigned after his Father ther six years. He would have built as his fore-goers did, but prevented by death, finished not what he had begun. The people thought him a good King, for that he did set open the Temples, which Cheops and Cephrenes had kept shut. But an Oracle threatned him with a short life of six years only, because of this his devotion; For (said the Oracle) Egypt should have been afflicted an hundred and fifty years, which thy Predecessors knew, and performed for their parts; but thou hast released it, therefore shalt thou live but six years. It is very strange, that the gods should be offended with a King for his piety; or that they should decree to make a Country impious, when the people were desirous to serve them; or that they having so decreed, it should lye in the power of a King to alter destiny, and make the ordinance of the gods to fail in taking full effect. But these were Egyptian gods. The true God was doubtless more offended with the institution of such Idolatry, than with the interruption. And who knows whether Chemnis did not learn somewhat at Jerusalem in the last year of his Father Sesac, that made him perceive, and deliver to those that followed him, the vanity of his Egyptian superstition? Most sure it is that in his reign, and the reigns of Cheops and Cephrenes, were more long and more happy than that of Mycerinas, who to delude the Oracle, revelled away both days and nights, as if by keeping candles lighted, he had changed his nights into dayes, and so doubled the time appointed: a service more pleasing to the Devil, than the restitution of Idolatry durst then seem, when it could speed no better. I find in Reyneccius, fifty years assigned to this King; which I verily believe to have been some error of the print, though I find it not corrected among other such over-sights: For I know no Author that gives him so many years, and Reyneccius himself takes notice of the Oracle, that threatned Mycerinas with a short life, as is before shewed.

Bochorus is placed next unto Mycerinas, by Diodore, who speaks no more of him than this, that he was a strong man of body, and excelling his predecessors in wit. He is spoken of by divers Authors as one that loved justice; and may be taken for that Banchyris, whom Suidas commends in that kind: Eusebius reckons 44 years of his reign.

After Bocchorus, one Sabacus an Æthiopian, follows in the Catalogue of Diodore; but certain ages after him. Herodotus quite omitting Bochorus, hath Asychis; who made a sharp law (as it was then held) against bad debtors, that their dead bodies should be in the creditors disposition, till the debt were paid. This Asychis made a Pyramis of brick, more costly and fair, in his own judgment, than any of those that the former Kings had raised. Besides this Asychis, Herodotus placeth one Anysis, a blind man, before the Æthiopian. The reigns of these two are perhaps those many ages which the Egyptians, to magnifie their antiquities, accounted between Bocchorus and him that followed them. But all this could make but six years; and so long doth Functius, so long doth Reyneccius hold, that these two Kings between them both did govern. If any man would lengthen this time, holding it unprobable that the reigns of two Kings should have been so soon spent; he may do it by taking some years from Sethon or Psammiticus, and adding them to either of these. To add unto these, without substracting from some other, would breed a manifest inconvenience: forasmuch as part of Sesac his reign, must have been in the fifth of Roboam, as also the last of Pharao Neco was the fourth of Jehojakim, and the first of Nebuchadnezzar. For mine own part I like it better to allow six years only to these two Kings, than to lose the witness of Herodotus, who concurring herein with the Scriptures, doth speak of Senacherib's war, at which time Sethon was King of Egypt. I will not therefore add years unto these obscure names; for by adding unto these men, three years, we shall thrust the beginning of Sethon out of place, and make it later than the death of Senacherib. In regard of this agreement of Herodotus with the Scriptures, I am the more willing to hold with him in his Egyptian Kings. Otherwise it were a matter of no great envy to leave both Asychis and Anysis out of the roll, which were eatily done by placing Sesac lower, and extending his life yet six years further, or more (if abridgement shall be required of Psammiticus his reign) into the years of Roboboam.

2 Chro. 12. v. 2.

Of Sabachus the Æthiopian, who took the Kingdom from Anysis, it is agreed by the most, that he reigned fifty years: He was a merciful Prince, not punishing all capital offences with death, but imposing bondage and bodily labour upon malefactors; by whose toil he both got much wealth into his own hands, letting out their service to hire, and performed many works of more use than pomp, to the singular benefit of the Country.

Zonoras calls this King Sua; the Scriptures call him So.

Hosea, the last King of Israel, made a league with him against Salmanassar, little to his good: for the Egyptian was more rich than warlike, and therefore his friendship could not preserve the Israelite from destruction.

It seems, that the encroaching power of the Assyrian grew terrible to Egypt about these times; the victories of Tiglath-Phulassar and Salmanassar having eaten so far into Syria, in the reign of this one King So or Sabacus. Yea, perhaps it was in his dayes (for his reign began in the fourth of Menahem) that Phul himself did make the first entrance into Palestina. This caused So to animate the half-subdued people against their Conquerors; but the help which he and his Successor gave them was so faint, that Senacherib's Embassadour compared the Egyptian succour to a broken staffe of Reed. Such indeed had Hosea found it, and such Ezechia might have found it, had he not been supported by the strong staffe of him, that ruleth all thing with a rod of iron. 2 Kings 18. 25.

It appeareth by the words of Rabsake, that the opinion was great in Juda, of the Egyptian forces, for Chariots and Horse-men; but this power, whatsoever it was, grew needful, within a litle while, for the defence of Egypt it self, which So left unto Sethon his Successor, having now fulfilled the fifty years of his reign.

Herodotus and Diodorus have both one tale, from relation of Egyptian Priests, concerning the departure of this King; saying, that he left the Country, and willingly retired into Æthiopia, because it was often signified unto him in his dreams, by the god which was worshipped at Thebes, that his reign should be neither long nor prosperous, unless he slew all the Priests in Egypt; which rather than to do, he resigned his Kingdom. Surely, these Egyptian gods were of a strange quality, that so ill rewarded their servants, and invited Kings to do them wrong. Well might the Egyptians (as they likewise did) worship Dogs as gods, when their chief gods had the property of Dogs, which love their Masters the better for beating them.

Yet to what end the Priests should have feigned this tale, I cannot tell; and therefore I think that it might be some device of the fearful old man, who seeing his Realm in danger of an Invasion, sought an honest honeſt excuſe for his departure out of it, and withdrawing himſelf into Æthiopia, where he had been bred in his youth. What if I ſhould ſay, that the Æthiopia into which he went, was none other than Arabia, whereof Tirhaka the King (perhaps at the inſtigation of this man) raiſed an Army againſt Sennacherib, when he meant to invade Egypt within two or three years after? But I will not trouble my ſelf with much enquiry. This I hold, that So, or Sabacus was not indeed an Æthiopian (for in his time lived the Prophet Eſay, who mentioneth the antiquity of Pharaohs houſe) but onely ſo ſurnamed for his education, and becauſe iſſuing from thence, he got the Kingdom from Anyſis, who was his oppoſite. The quiet and mild form of his government, his holding the Kingdom ſo long without an Army, and many other circumſtances argue no leſs. But whether finally he betook to a private life, or whether he fore-went his life and Kingdom at once, being now very old, it is time that we leave him, and ſpeak of Sethon his next Succeſſor, who is omitted by Diodore, but remembred by Herodotus, by a ſure token of his having been King.

SECT VII.

Of Sethon who reigned with Ezechia, and ſided with him againſt Sennacherib.

THe firſt year of Sethon's reign falls into the twelfth of Ezechia, which was the fifth of Sennacherib. It was a troubleſom age, and full of danger: the two great Kingdoms of Aſſyria and Egypt, being then ingaged in a War, the iſſue whereof was to determine whether of them ſhould rule or ſerve. The Aſſyrian had the better men of War; the Egyptian better proviſion of neceſſaries: the Aſſyrian more Subjects; the Egyptian more Friends: and among the new conquered, half Subjects of Aſſur, many that were Egyptian in heart, though Aſſyrian in outward ſhew.

Of this laſt ſort, were Ezechia and his people; who knowing how much it concerned Pharaoh to protect them againſt his own great Enemy, preferred the friendſhip of ſo near and mighty a Neighbour, before the ſervice of a terrible, yet far removed King. But herein was great difference between Ezechia and his Subjects: For the good King fixing his eſpecial confidence in God, held that courſe of policy, which he thought moſt likely to turn to the benefit of his Country; the multitude of Judæa looking into the fair hopes which this Egyptian league promiſed, were puffed up with vain conceits, thinking that all was ſafe, and that now they ſhould not need to fear any more of thoſe injuries which they had ſuffered by the Aſſyrians; and ſo became forgetfull of God, taking counſel, but not of him. The Prophet Eſay complaining much of this preſumption, giving the people of Juda to underſtand, That the Egyptians were men, and not God, and their Horſes fleſh, and not ſpirit; that God himſelf ſhould defend Iſrael upon repentance, and that Aſſur ſhould fall by the ſword, but not of man. As for the Egyptians (ſaid the Prophet) they are vanity, and they ſhall help in vain, their ſtrength is to ſit ſtill.

Eſay 31. v. 3. and 8.
Eſay 30. 7.
Eſay 34.

According to the Prophets words, it came to paſs. For in the treaty of Confederacy that was held at Zoan, all manner of contentment and aſſurance was given to the Jews by Sethon, or his Agents, who filled them with ſuch reports, of Horſes and Chariots, that they did not look (as Eſay ſaith) unto the holy One of Iſrael, nor ſeek unto the Lord. But he yet is wiſeſt. Eſay 31. 1, 2

After a while came Sennacherib with his Army, and wakened them out of theſe dreams; for Sethon their good Neighbour, as near as he was, did ſeem far off, being unready when his help was moſt needfull. It may ſeem that he purpoſed rather to make Paleſtina, than Egypt the Stage, whereon this great War ſhould be acted, and was not without hope, that the Aſſyrians and Jews, weakning one another, ſhould yeild unto him a fair advantage over both. Yet he fought with money; for he ſent Horſes and Camels laden with treaſure, to hire the Arabians, whom Eſay calleth A people that cannot profit. Eſay 30. 6.

Theſe Arabians did not profit indeed; (for beſides that it ſeems by the ſame place of Eſay, that the rich treaſures miſcarried, and fell into the Enemies hands, before any help appeared from Tirhaca) all the ſtrong Cities of Juda were taken by Sennacherib, except Libna, Lachis and Jeruſalem it ſelf, till the Sword of God and not of Man, defeated the Aſſyrian, who did go, for fear, to his Tower, that is, he fled to Ninive, where he was ſlain. Eſay 31. 9

Concerning this expedition of Sennacherib, Herodotus takes this notice of it: That it was purpoſed againſt Egypt, where the men of War, being offended with Sethon their King, who had taken away their allowance, refuſed to bear Arms in defence of Him and their Country; that Sethon being Vulcan's Prieſt, bemoaned himſelf to his god, who by dream promiſed to ſend him helpers, that hereupon Sethon, with ſuch as would follow him (which were craftſmen, ſhop-keepers, and the like) marched towards Peluſium; and that a great multitude of Field-Mice entering the Camp of Sennacherib by night, did ſo gnaw the Bows, Quivers, and ſtraps of his mens Armour, that they were fain the next day to fly away in all haſte finding themſelves diſarmed.

In memory hereof (ſaith Herodotus) the Statue of this King is ſet up in the Temple of Vulcan, holding a Mouſe in his hand, with this Inſcription, Let him that holds me, Serve God.

Such was the relation of the Egyptian Prieſts, wherein how far they ſwerved from the truth, being deſirous to magnifie their own King, it may eaſily be perceived. It ſeems that this Image of Sethon was fallen down, and the tale forgotten in Diodorus his time, or elſe perhaps, the Prieſts did forbear to tell it him (which cauſed him to omit it) for that the nation of the Jews was then well known to the world, whereof every child could have told how much falſhood had been mingled with the truth.

We find this Hiſtory agreeable to the Scriptures, thus far forth; That Sennacherib King of the Aſſyrians and Arabians, (ſo Herodotus calleth him: the Syrians, or peraduenture ſome borderers upon Syria, being meant by the name of Arabians) lived in this age, made War upon Egypt, and was miraculouſly driven home. As for that exploit of the Mice, and the great pleaſure that Vulcan did unto his Prieſt, happy it was (if Sethon were a Prieſt) that he took his god now in ſo good a mood: For within three or four years before this, all the Prieſts in Egypt ſhould have been ſlain, if the merciful King had not ſpared their lives, as it were half againſt the gods will. Therefore this laſt good turn was not enough to ſerve as an example, that might ſtir up the Egyptians tians to piety, ſeeing that their devotion, which had laſted ſo long before, did bring all the Prieſts into danger of ſuch a bad reward. Rather I think, that this Image did repreſent Sennacherib himſelf, and that the Mouſe in his hand, ſignified Hieroglyphically (as was the Egyptian manner of expreſſing things) the ſhamefull iſſue of his terrible expedition, or the deſtruction of his Army, by means, which came, no man knew from whence. For the vengeance of God, ſhewed upon this ungodly King, was indeed a very good motive to piety. But the Emblem, together with the Temple of Vulcan (being perhaps the chief Temple in that Town where this Image was erected) might give occaſion to ſuch a fable; the Divel helping to change the truth into a lie, that God might be robbed of his honour.

Yet that we may not belie the Divel, I hold it very likely, that Sethon finding himſelf in danger, did call upon his gods, that is, upon Vulcan, Serapis, or any to whom he had moſt devotion. But ſo had other of his predeceſſors done in the like need: yet which of them had obtained ſuccour by the like miracle? Surely the Jews (even ſuch of them as were moſt given to Idolatry) would have been aſhamed Eſay 31. 1 of the confidence which they repoſed in the Chariots of Egypt, becauſe they were many, and in the Horſemen, becauſe they were very ſtrong; had it been told them, that Sethon, inſtead of ſending thoſe Horſemen and Chariots, was beſeeching Vulcan to ſend him and them good luck; or elſe (for theſe alſo were Egyptian gods) addreſſing their prayers to ſome Onyon or Cat.

Howſoever it was, doubtleſs the Prophecy of Eſay took effect, which ſaid, They ſhall be all aſhamed of the people that cannot profit them, nor help, nor do them good, but ſhall be a ſhame and alſo a reproach. Such is commonly the iſſue of humane wiſdom, when reſting ſecure upon proviſion which it ſelf hath made, it will no longer ſeem to ſtand in need of God.

Some there are who take Sethon to have been ſet down by Euſebius under the name of Tarachus the Æthiopian; and therefore the twenty years which are given to Tarachus, they allow to the reign of Sethon.

Theſe have well obſerved that Tarachus the Æthiopian is mentioned in the Scriptures, not as a King of Egypt, but as a friend to that Countrey, or at leaſt an enemy to Sennacherib, in the War laſt ſpoken of; the Æthiopians (as they are engliſhed) over which he reigned, being indeed Cuſhites or Arabians.

Hereupon they ſuppoſe aright, that Euſebius hath miſtaken one King for another. But whereas they think that this Tarachus or Tirhaka is placed in the room of Sethon, and therefore give to Sethon the twenty years of Tarachus, I hold them to have erred on the other hand. For this Æthiopian (as he is called) began his reign over Egypt, by Euſebius his accompt, after the death of Sennacherib and of Ezechia, in the firſt year of Manaſſes King of Juda. Therefore he or his years have no reference to Sethon.

Herodotus forgets to tell how long Sethon reigned; Funčius peremptorily citing no Author, nor alledging reaſon for it, ſets him down thirty three years: many omit him quite; and they that name him are not careful to examine his continuance. In this caſe, I follow that Rule which I propounded unto my ſelf at the firſt, for meaſuring the reigns of theſe Egyptian Kings.

The years which paſſed from the fifth of Rehoboam, unto the fourth of Jehojakim, I ſo divide among the Egyptians, that giving to every one the proportion allowed unto him by the Author, in whom he is found, the reſt is to be conferred upon him whoſe length of reign is uncertain: that is, upon this Sethon.

By this accompt I find the thirty three years that are ſet down by Funčius, to agree very nearly, if not preciſely, with the time of Sethon's reign; therefore I conform my own reckoning to his, though I could be content to have it one year leſs.

The reaſon of this computation I ſhall render more at large, when I arrive at the time of Pſammiticus, whereupon it hath much dependance, and whereunto the courſe of this Hiſtory will ſhortly bring me, the Egyptian affairs growing now to be interlaced with the matters of Juda, to which it is meet that I return.

CHAP. XXVII.

Of MANASSES, and his Contemporaries.

SECT. I.

The wickedneſs of Manaſſes. His Impriſonment, Repentance, and Death.

MAnaſſe the Son of Ezechias, forgetting the piety of his Father, and the proſperity which followed him, ſet up, repaired, adorned and furniſhed all the Altars, Temples and high Places, in which the Devil was by the Heathen worſhipped. Beſides, he himſelf eſteemed the Sun, the Moon, and the Stars, with all the Hoſt of Heaven, as Gods, and worſhipped them. and of all his acts the moſt abominable was, that he burnt his Sons for a Sacrifice to the Devil Moloch or Melchor, in the Valley of Hinnon, or Benhinnon: wherein was kindled the fire of Sacrifice to the Devils.

He alſo gave himſelf to all kind of Witch-craft and Sorcery, accompanied and maintained thoſe that had familiar Spirits, and all ſorts of Enchanters: beſides, he ſhed ſo much innocent bloud, as Jeruſalem was repleniſhed therewith, from corner to corner. For all his vices and abominations, when he was reprehended by that aged and reverend Prophet Eſay (who was alſo of the Kings race, and as the Jews affirm, the Father-in-law of the King) he cauſed the Prophet near unto the Fountain of Siloe, to be ſawn in ſunder with a wooden Saw, in the eightieth year of his life: a cruelty more barbarous and monſtrous than hath been heard of. The Scriptures indeed are ſilent hereof, yet the ſame is confirmed by Epiphanius, Iſidore, Euſebius, and others, too many to rehearſe, and too good to be ſuſpected. Therefore the Lord brought upon them the Captains of the Hoſt of the Kings of Aſhur, which took Manaſſe, and put him in fetters, and bound him in chains, and carried him to Babel: Where, after he had lyen twenty years as a captive, and diſpoyled of all honour and hope; yet to his hearty repentance and continual prayer, the God of infinite mercy had reſpect, and moved the Aſſyrians heart to deliver him:

2 Chron. 33. 11.

It is alſo likely that Merodach, becauſe he loved his father Ezechias, was the eaſelier perſwaded to reſtore Manaſſe to his liberty and eſtate. After which, and when he was again eſtabliſhed, remembring the miſeries which followed his wickedneſs, and Gods great mercies towards him, he changed form, deteſted his former fooliſh and devilliſh Idolatry, and caſt down the Idols of his own erecting, prepared the Altar of God, and ſacrificed thereon. He repaired a great part of Jeruſalem: and dyed after the long reign of fifty five years. Glycas and Suidas report, that Manaſſe was held in a Cage of iron by the Aſſyrians: and therein fed with bread of bran and water, which men may believe as it ſhall pleaſe their fancies.

SECT. II.

Of troubles in Egypt following the death of Sethon. The reign of Pſammiticus.

THat the wickedneſs of King Manaſſes was the cauſe of the evil which fell upon his Kingdom and perſon, any Chriſtian muſt needs believe: for it is affirmed in the Scriptures. Yet was the ſtate of things in thoſe parts of the World ſuch, at that time, as would have invited any Prince (and did perhaps invite Merodach, who fulfilled Gods pleaſure, upon reſpect born unto his own ends, deſirous to enlarge his Empire) to make attempt upon Juda. For the Kingdom of Egypt, which was become the pillar whereon the ſtate of Juda leaned, about theſe times was miſerably diſtracted with civil diſſention, and after two years ill amended by a diviſion of the government between twelve Princes. After ſome good agreement between theſe, eleven of them fell out with the twelfth of their collegues, and were all finally ſubdued by him, who made himſelf abſolute King of all.

This Inter-regnum, or meer Anarchy that was in Egypt, with the diviſion of the Kingdom following it, is placed by Diodore who omitteth Sethon, between the reign of Sabacus and Pſammiticus: but Herodotus doth ſet the Ariſtocracie, or twelve Governors immediatly before Pſammiticus, who was one of them, and after Sethon.

The occaſion of this diſſention ſeems to have been the uncertainty of Title to that Kingdom (for that the Crown of Egypt paſſed by ſucceſſion of blood, I have often ſhewed) which ended for a while, by the partition of all among twelve, though things were not ſettled until one had obtained the Soveraignty.

Theſe twelve Rulers governed fifteen years in good ſeeming agreement, which to preſerve, they made ſtrait covenant and alliances one with another, being jealous of their eſtate, becauſe an Oracle had foretold, that one of them ſhould depoſe all the reſt, noting him by this token, that he ſhould make a drink-offering in Vulcan's Temple, out of a Copper goblet. Whileſt this unity laſted, they joyned together in raiſing a Monument of their Dominion; which was a Labyrinth, built near unto the Lake of Meris; a work ſo admirable, that (as Herodotus, who beholding it, affirms) no words could give it commendation anſwerable to the ſtatelineſs of the work it ſelf, I will not here ſet down that unperfect deſcription which Herodotus maketh of it, but think enough to ſay that he prefers it very far before the Pyramides, one of which (as he ſaith) excelled the Temple of Diana at Epheſus, or any of the fairest works in Greece. Diodorus reports this Labyrinth to have been the work of Marus or Menides, a King which lived five generations before Proteus, that is before the War of Troy, and from this Labyrinth (saith he) Dædalus took the pattern of that which he made for Minos in Crete. Who this Marus, or Menides was, I cannot tell. Reyneccius takes him to have been Annemenes, which reigned immediately before Thuoris. But this agrees not with Diodore, for Dædalus and Minos were both dead long before Annemenes was King. Belike Reyneccius, desiring to accomodate the fabulous relations of Manethon, Cheremon and others, that are found in Josephus, touching Amenophis and his children, to the story of Amasis and Actesanes the Æthiopian mentioned by Diodore; held it consequent, after he had conjectured Manethon's Amenophis to be Diodorus his Amasis; that Sethon should be Actisanes, and that Annemenes should be Marus. If in this case I might intrude a conjecture, the times which we now handle are those about which Reyneccius hath erred in making search; Amasis was Anysis, Actisanes was Sabacus; and Marus was one of these twelve Princes to whom Herodotus gives the honour of building this famous Labyrinth. For Actisanes the Æthiopian, deposed Amasis; Sabacus the Æthiopian, deposed Anysis; Actisanes governed well, and was mild in punishing offenders; so likewise was Sabacus; Marus the next King after Actisanes, built this Labyrinth; and the next (saving Sethon, whom Diodore omits, as having not heard of him) that ruled after Sabacus, performed the same work, according to Herodotus, who was more likely to hear the truth, as living nearer to the Age wherein it was performed. The variety of names, and difference of times wherein Diodore believed the Priests, might be a part of the Egyptian vanity, which was familiar with them in multiplying their Kings, and boasting of their antiquities. Here I might add, that the twelve great Halls, Parlours, and other circumstances remembred by Herodotus, in speaking of this building, do help to prove that it was the work of these twelve Princes. But I hasten to their end.

At a solemn feast in Vulcan's Temple, when they were to make their drink-offerings, the Priest, forgetting himself, brought forth no more than eleven Cups, Hereupon, Psammiticus, who standing last, had not a Cup, took off his brazen Helmet; and therewith supplyed the want, This caused all the rest to remember the Oracle, and to suspect him as a Traytor, yet, when they found that it was done by him upon set purpose or ill intent, they forbear to kill him, but being jealous of their estate, they banished him into the marish Countries by the Sea side. This Oracle, and the event is held by Diodore as a fable, which I believe to have been none other: In the rest, Herodotus and Diodore agree, saying that Psammiticus hired Souldiers out of Caria and Ionia, by whose aid he vanquisht his Companions, and made himself sole King.

The years of his reign, according to Herodotus, were fifty four; according to Eusebius, forty four; Mercator, to reconcile these two, gives forty four years to his single reign, and ten to his ruling joyntly with the Princes before spoken of. Indeed, he that was admitted, being a man grown (for he cannot in reason be supposed to have been then a young fellow) into the number of the twelve Governors, must be thought to have lived unto extream age, if he ruled partly with others, partly alone, threescore and nine years. I therefore yield rather to Eusebius, but will not adventure to cut five years from the Aristocracy: though peradventure Psammiticus was not at first one of the twelve, but succeeded (either by election, or as next in blood) into the place of some Prince that dyed, and was ten years companion in that government.

Another scruple there is, though not great, which troubles this reckoning. The years of the Egyptians, as we find them set down, are more by one, than serve to fill up the time between the fifth of Rehoboam and the fourth of Jehojakim. This may not be. Wherefore either we must abate one year from Sethon's reign, that was of uncertain length, or else (which I had rather do, because Functius may have followed better authority than I know, or than himself alledgeth, in giving to Sethon a time so nearly agreeing with the truth) we must confound the last year of one reign with the first of another. Such a supposition were not insolent. For no man can suppose, that all the Kings, or any great part of them, which are set down in Chronological tables, reigned precisely so many years as are ascribed unto them, without any fractions: it is enough to think that the surplusage of one mans time supplyed the defect of anothers. Wherefore I confound the last year of those fifteen, wherein the twelve Princes ruled, with the first of Psammiticus; who surely did not fall out with his Companions, fight with them, and make himself Lord alone all in one day.

Concerning this King, it is recorded, that he was the first in Egypt who entertained any strait amity with the Greeks; that he retained in pay his Mercenaries of Caria, Ionia, and Arabia, to whom he gave large rewards and possessions; and that he greatly offended his Egyptian Souldiers, by bestowing them in the left wing of his Army, whilest his Mercenaries held the right wing (which was the more honourable place) in an expedition that he made in Syria. Upon this disgrace it is said, that his Souldiers, to the number of two hundred thousand, forsook their natural Country of Egypt, and went into Æthiopia, to dwell there: neither could they be revoked by kind Messages, nor by the King himself, who overtook them on the way; but when he told them of their Country, their Wives and Children, they answered, that their weapons should get them a Country, and that nature had enabled them to get other Wives and Children,.

It is also reported of him. That he caused two Infants to be brought up in such sort, as they might not hear any word spoken; by which means, he hoped to find out what Nation or Language was most ancient; forasmuch as it seemed likely, that nature would teach the children to speak that Language which men spake at the first. The issue hereof was that the children cryed, Beccus, Beccus, which word being found to signifie Bread in the Phrygian tongue, served greatly to magnifie the Phrygian antiquity, Goropius Becanus makes no small matter of this, for the honour of his Low-Dutch; in which the word Becker signifies (as Baker in English) a maker of bread. He that will turn over any part of Goropius his works, may find enough of this kind, to perswade a willing man, that Adam and all the Patriarchs used none other language than the Low-Dutch, before the confusion of Languages at Babel, the name it self Babel being also Dutch, and given by occasion of this confusion; for that there they began to babble and talk one knew not what.

But I will not insist upon all that is written of Psammiticus. The most regardable of his acts was the siege of Azotus in Palæstina, about which he spent nine and twenty years. Never have we heard (ſaith Herodotus) that any City endured ſo long a ſiege as this; yet Pſammiticus carryed it at the laſt. This Town of Azotus had been won by Tartan a Captain of Sennacherib's, and was now, as it ſeemeth, relieved, but in vain, by the Babylonian, which made it hold out ſo well.

SECT. III.

What reference theſe Egyptian matters might have to the impriſonment and enlargement of Manaſſes. In what part of his reign Manaſſes was taken priſoner.

WEre it certainly known, in what year of his reign Manaſſes was taken priſoner, and how long it was before he obtained liberty, I think we ſhould find theſe Egyptian troubles to have been no ſmall occaſion both of his captivity and enlargment: God ſo diſpoſing of humane actions, that even they who intended only their own buſineſs, fulfilled onely his high pleaſure. For either the civil Wars of Egypt that followed upon the death of Sethon, or the renting of the Kingdom, as it were into twelve pieces, or the War between Pſammiticus and his Collegues, or the expedition of Pſammiticus into Syria, and the ſiege of Azotus, might miniſter unto the Babylonian, either ſuch cauſe of hope to enlarge his Dominion in the South parts, or ſuch neceſſity of ſending an Army into thoſe parts, to defend his own, as would greatly tempt him to make ſure work with the King of Juda. The ſame occaſion ſufficed alſo to procure the delivery of Manaſſes, after he was taken. For he was taken (as Joſephus hath it) by ſubtilty, not by open force, neither did they that apprehended him, win his Country, but only waſt it. So that the Jews, having learned wit by the ill ſucceſs of their folly, in redeeming Amazia, were like to be more circumſpect, in making their bargain upon ſuch another accident: and the Babylonian (to whom the Egyptian matters preſented more weighty argument of hope and fear, than the little Kingdom of Juda could afford) had no reaſon to ſpend his forces in purſuing a ſmall conqueſt, but as full of difficulty as a greater, whereby he ſhould compell his mightieſt enemies to come to ſome good agreement; when by quiting his preſent advantage over the Jews, he might make his way the fairer into Egypt.

Now concerning the year of Manaſſes his reign, wherein he was taken priſoner; or concerning his captivity it ſelf, how long it laſted, the Scriptures are ſilent, and Joſephus gives no information. Yet I find cited by Torniellus three opinions: the one of Bellarmine, who thinkes that Manaſſes was taken in the fifteenth year of his reign; the other of the greater Hebrew Chronology, who affirms, that it was in his twenty ſeventh year; the third of Rabbi Kimki upon Ezechiel, who ſaith, that he was forty years an Idolater, and lived fifteen years after his repentance. The firſt of their conjectures is upheld by Torniellus, who rejects the ſecond, as more unprobable, and condemns the third as moſt falſe. Yet the reaſons alledged by Torniellus in defence of the firſt, and refutation of the opinion, are ſuch as may rather prove him to favour the Cardinal as far as he may, (for where need requires, he doth freely diſſent from him) than to have uſed his accuſtomed diligence in examining the matter, before he gave his judgment. Two arguments he brings to maintain the opinion of Bellarmine, the one, that Ammon the Son of Manaſſes, is ſaid by Joſephus to have followed the works of his fathers youth; the other, that had Manaſſes grown old in his ſins, it is like that he ſhould have continued as he did, in his amendment unto the end of his life. Touching the former of theſe arguments, I ſee no reaſon why the ſins of Manaſſes might not be diſtinguiſhed from his repentance in his old age, by calling them works of his youth, which appeared when he was twelve years old; though it were granted that he continued in them (according to that of Rabbi Kimki) until he was but fifteen years from death. Touching the ſecond; howſoever it be a fearfull thing, to caſt off unto the laſt thoſe good motions unto repentance, which we know not whether ever God will offer unto us again; yet were it a terrible hearing, That the ſins which are not forſaken before the age of two and fifty years, ſhall be puniſhed with final impenitency. But againſt theſe two collections of Torniellus, I will lay two places of Scripture, whence it may be inferred, as not unlikely, That Manaſſes continued longer in his wickedneſs than Bellarmine hath intimated, if not as long as Rabbi Kimki hath affirmed. In the ſecond book of Kings, the evil which Manaſſes did, is remembred at large, and his repentance utterly omitted; ſo that his amendment may ſeem to have taken up no great part of his life. The ſtory of him being thus concluded in the one and twentieth Chapter: Concern- 2 Kings the reſt of the Acts of Manaſſes, and all that he did, 21. 17. and the ſin that he ſinned, are they not written in the Book of the Chronicles of the Kings of Juda? The other place is in the four and twentieth Chapter of the ſame Book, where, in rehearſing the calamities with which that Nation was puniſhed in the time of Jehojakim, the great Grand-child of this Manaſſes, it is ſaid; Surely by the commandment of the Lord came this upon Juda, that he might put them out of his ſight, for the ſins of Manaſſes, according to all that he did, and for the innocent blood that he ſhed (for he filled Jeruſalem with innocent blood) therefore the Lord would not pardon it. Who ſo conſiders well theſe places, may find ſmall cauſe to pronounce it moſt falſe, That the repentance and amendment of Manaſſes was no earlier than fifteen years before his death; or moſt probable, That when he was twenty ſeven years old, he repented, and becoming a new man, lived in the fear of God forty years after. I will no longer diſpute about this matter, ſeeing that the truth cannot be diſcovered. It ſufficeth to ſay, that two years of civil diſſentions in Egypt, fourteen or fifteen years following, wherein that Kingdom was weakned by partition of the Soveraignty: the War of Pſammiticus againſt his Aſſociates: and four and twenty years of the nine and twenty, wherein the ſiege of Azotus continued, being all within the time of Manaſſes, did leave no one part of his reign (after the firſt fifteen years) free from the danger of being oppreſſed by the Babylonian, whoſe men of war had continual occaſions of viſiting his Country. All which I will add hereto, is this; that the fifteenth of Manaſſes was the laſt year of Sethon in Egypt, and the one and thirtieth of Merodach his reign, or (accounting from the death of Aſarhaddon) the twentieth: The ſeven and twentieth of Manaſſes was the tenth of the twelve Princes, and the three and fortieth of Merodach: his fortieth was the twenty third of Pſammiticus, and the fifth of Nabulaſſar, the ſon of Merodach, in Babylon: but which of theſe was the year of his impriſonment, or whether any other, I forbear to ſhew mine opinion, leaſt I ſhould thereby ſeem to draw all matters over-violently to mine own computation.

2 Kin. 24. 3, 4.

This was the firſt great maſtery that the Babylonians

nians had of the Kingdom of Juda. For though Achaz promised Tribute to Salmanassar, yet Ezechias never paid it. True it is, that he hoped to stay Senacherib's enterprise against him, by presenting him with three hundred talents of silver, and thirty of gold, besides the plate which covered the doors and pillars of the Temple. 2 King. 18

But Manasses being pressed with great necessity, could refuse no tolerable conditions, that the Babylonian would impose upon him; among which it seems that this was one, (which was indeed a point of servitude) that he might not hold peace with the Egyptians, whilst they were enemies to Babylon. This appears not only by his fortifying with men of War all the strong Cities of Juda after his return (which was rather against Psammiticus, whose party he had forsaken, than against the Babylonian, with whom he had thenceforth no more controversie) but likewise by that opposition, which Josias made afterwards to Pharao Neco, in favour of Nabulassar, which had been against all reason or policy, if it had not been his duty by covenant. Of this I will speak more in convenient place.

SECT. IV.

Of the first and second Messenian Wars, which were in the reigns of Ezechia and Manasses, Kings of Juda.

NOW concerning such actions as were performed abroad in the World, about these times of Manasses, the most remarkable were the Messenian Wars; which hapned in this age, and being the greatest action performed in Greece, between the Trojan and Persian Wars, deserve not to be passed over with silence.

The first Messenian War began and ended in the dayes of Ezechias; the second in the reign of Manasses: but to avoid the trouble of interrupting our History, I have thought it best to rehearse them both in this place. Other Introduction is needless, than to say, that the posterity of Hercules, driving the issue of Pelops, and the Achæans out of their seats, divided their lands between themselves, and erected the kingdoms of Lacedemon, Argos, Messene and Corinth; all which agreeing well together awhile, did afterwards forget the bond of kindred, and sought one anothers ruine with bloody wars; whereof these Messenian were the greatest.

The pretended grounds of the Messenian War are scarce worth remembrance, they were so slight. Ambition was the true cause of it: wherewith the Lacedemonians were so transported, that any thing served them as a colour to accomplish their greedy desires. Yet other matter was alledged; namely, that one Polychares a Messenian had slain many Lacedemonians, for which the Magistrates of Sparta desiring to have him yeilded into their hands, could not obtain it. The Messenians on the other side, excused Polychares, for that he was grown frantick, through injuries received from Euæphnes a Lacedemonian. This Euæphnes had bargained to give pasture to the Cattle of Polychares, and was therefore to receive part of the increase: but not contented with the gain appointed, he sold the Cattel, and slaves that kept them, to Merchants; which done, he came with a fair tale to his friend, saying, that they were stolen. Whilst the lye was yet scarce out of his mouth, one of the slaves that had escaped from the Merchants came in with a true report of all. The Lacedemonian being thus deprehended, confessed all, and promised large amends; which to receive, he carried the son of Polychares home with him, but having him at home, he villanously slew him. Wherefore the Lacedemonians having refused, after long sute made by the wretched Father, to do him right against this Thief and Murderer, ought not to pick matter of quarrel out of those things which he did in that madness, whereinto they themselves had cast him. So said the Messenians, and further offered to put the matter to compremise, or stand unto the judgement of the Amphictyones, who were as the general Council of Greece, or to any other fair course. But the Lacedemonians, who had a great desire to occupy the fair Country of Messene, that lay close by them, were not content with such allegations. They thought it enough to have some shew for their doings; which the better to colour, they reckoned up many old injuries, and so without sending any defiance, secretly took an oath to hold War with Messene till they had mastered it: which done, they seised upon Amphia, a frontier Town of that Province, wherein they put all to the sword without mercy, very few escaped.

Hereupon the Messenians took Armes, and were met by the Enemy. A furious Battel was fought between them, which ended not until dark night, with uncertain Victory. The Messenians did strongly encamp themselves; The Lacedemonians, unable to force their Camp, returned home.

This War began in the second year of the ninth Olympiad, and ended in the first of the fourteenth Olympiad, having lasted twenty years. The two enemy Nations tried the matter for a while, with their proper forces, the Lacedemonians wasting the in-land parts of Messene, and the Messenians, the Sea-coast of Laconia. But it was not long ere friends on both sides, were called in to help. The Arcadians, Argives, and Sicyonians took part with Messene; the Spartans had, besides many Subjects of their own, aid from Corinth, and hired Souldiers out of Crete. So a second, third, and fourth battel were fought, with as great obstinacy as the first; saving that in the fourth battel the Lacedemonians were enforced to turn their backs; in the other fights, the Victory was still uncertain, though in one of them the Messenians lost Euphaes their King, in whose stead they chose Aristodemus.

Many years were spent ere all this bloud was shed; for pestilent Diseases, and want of money to entertain Souldiers, caused the War to linger. And for the same reasons, did the Messenians forsake all their in-land Towns, excepting Ithome, which was a Mountain with a Town upon it, able to endure more than the enemies were likely to do. But as some Authors tell us, the Lacedemonians were so obstinate in this War, because of their Vow, that having absented themselves ten years from Sparta, their Wives sent them word, that their City would grow unpeopled, by reason that no children had been born them in all that time: Whereupon they sent back all their ablest young men, promiscuously to accompany the young women, who got so many of them with child, as they became a great part of their Nation, and were called Parthenians. Strab. l. 6. Oros. l. 2. c. 21. Diod. l. 15.

Diodorus refers the begetting of these Parthenians to a former time.

But in process of this Messenian War, when the Devil in an Oracle had advised the Messenians to sacrifice a Virgin of the stock of * Ægyptus, that so they might be Victorious against the Lacedemonians; the lot falling upon the Daughter of one Lyciscus, Epibolus the Priest, willing to save her, said, she was only a fostered child, and not born of the wife of Lyciscus: which which answer giving delay to the execution of the Maid, Lyciscus secretly fled away with her into Sparta. Then Aristodemus, which afterwards was King, voluntarily offered his own Daughter: but a young Nobleman, being in love with the Maid, when otherwise he could not prevail, said openly that she was no Virgin, but that he had defloured her, and got her with child: whereupon the Father in a rage ripped up his innocent Daughters belly to disprove the Lovers slander: at the grave of which Daughter of his, afterwards falling, by other superstitions, into dispair of prevailing against the Lacedemonians, he slew himself to the great hurt of his Country, which he loved most dearly. For after his death, the Messenians lost their courage, and finding themselves distressed by many wants, especially of victuals, they craved peace, which they obtained with most rigorous conditions. Half the yearly fruits of their Lands they were bound to send unto Sparta; and they, with their Wives, to make solemn lamentations at the death of every Spartan King; they were also sworn to live in true subjection to the Lacedemonians; and part of their Territory was taken from them, which was given unto the Asinæi, and such as had followed the Spartans in this War.

This peace being made upon so uneven terms, was not like to hold long. Yet nine and thirty years it continued (the Messenians not finding how to help themselves) and then brake out into a new and more furious War than the former. The able young men, that were grown up in the room of those Messenians whom the former War had consumed, began to consider their own strength and multitude, thinking themselves equal to the Lacedemonians, and therefore scorned to serve such Masters as had against all right oppressed their Fathers.

The chief of these was Aristomenes, a Noble Gentleman of the house of Egyptus; who perceiving the uniform desires of his Country-men, adventured to become their Leader. He therefore sounding the the affections of the Argives and the Arcadians, which he found throughly answerable to his purpose, began open War upon the State of Lacedemon. This was in the fourth year of the three and twentieth Olympiad, when the Lacedemonians hasted to quench the fire before it should grow too hot, with such forces as they could raise of their own without troubling their friends, meaning to deal with their enemies, ere any succour were lent them. So a strong battel was fought between them and a doubtfull; save that the Messenians were pleased with the issue, forasmuch as they had thereby taught their late proud Lords to think them their equals. Particularly; the valour of Aristomenes appeared such in this fight, that his people would have made him their King: but he, refusing the honour of that name, accepted of the burthen, and became their General.

Within one year another battel was fought, whereunto each part came better provided. The Lacedemonians brought with them the Corinthians, and some other friends to help; the Messenians had the Argives, Arcadians, and Sycionians. This also was a long and bloody fight; but Aristomenes did so behave himself, that finally he made the Enemies run for their lives. Of such importance was this victory, that the Lacedemonians began to bethink themselves of making some good agreement. But one Tyrtæus an Athenian Poet, whom by appointment of an Oracle they had gotten to direct them, reinforced their spirits with his Verses. After this, Aristomenes took by surprise a Town in Laconia, and vanquished in fight Anaxander King of Sparta, who did set upon him in hope to have recovered the booty.

But all those victories of Aristomenes perished, in the loss of one battel, whereof the honour (if it were honour) or surely the profit, fell upon the Lacedemonians, through the treason of Aristocrates, King of Arcadia, who being corrupted by the enemies with mony, fled away, and left the Messenians exposed to cruel butchery. The loss was so great, that together with Andania their principal City, all the Towns of Messene, standing too far from the Sea, were abandoned for lack of men to defend them, and the Mount Era fortified, whither the multitude, that could not be safe abroad, was conveyed into a place of safety. Here the Lacedemonians found a tedious work, that held them eleven years. For besides that Era it self was a strong piece, Aristomenes with three hundred stout Souldiers, did many incredible exploits, that wearied them, and hindred their attendance on the siege. He wasted all the fields of Messene, that were in the enemies power, and brake into Laconia, taking away Corn, Wine, Cattel, and all Provisions, necessary for his own People, the Slaves and houshold stuffe he changed into mony, suffering the owners to redeem them. To remedy this mischief, the Lacedemonians made an Edict, that neither Messene, nor the adjoyning parts of their own Country, should be tilled or husbanded; which bred a great tumult among private men, that were almost undone by it. Yet the Poet Tyrtæus appeased this uprore with pleasing Songs. But Aristomenes grew so bold, that he not only ranged over all the fields, but adventured upon the Towns, surprised, and sackt Amyclæ, and finally caused the enemies to encrease and strengthen their Companies; which done, there yet appeared no likelihood of taking Era.

In performing these and other services, thrice Aristomenes was taken prisoner, yet still he escaped. One escape of his deserves to be remembred, as a thing very strange and marvellous. He had with too much courage adventured to set upon both the Kings of Sparta; and being in that fight wounded, and felled to the ground, was taken up senseless, and carried away prisoner, with fifty of his Companions. There was a deep natural Cave into which the Spartans used to cast head-long such as were condemned to dye for the greatest offences. To this punishment were Aristomenes and his companions adjudged. All the rest of these poor men dyed with their falls; Aristomenes (howsoever it came to pass) took no harm. Yet was it harm enough to be imprisoned in a deep Dungeon, among dead Carkasses, where he was like to perish through hunger and stench. But after a while he perceived by some small glimmering of light (which perhaps came in at the top) a Fox, that was gnawing upon a dead body. Hereupon he bethought himself, that this beast must needs know some way to enter the place, and get out. For which cause he made shift to lay hold upon it, and catching it by the tail with one hand, saved himself from biting with the othet hand. by thrusting his coat into the mouth of it. So letting it creep whether it would, he followed, holding it as his guide, untill the way was too strait for him; and then dismissed it. The Fox being loose, ran through a hole at which came in a little light; and there did Aristomenes delve so long with his nails, that at last he clawed out his passage. When some fugitives of Messene brought word to Sparta, that Aristomenes was returned home, their tale sounded alike, as if they had said, that a dead man was revived. But when the Corinthian forces that came to help the Lacedemonians in the siege of Era, were cut in pieces, their Captains slain, and their Camp taken; then was it easily beleived, that Aristomenes was alive indeed.

Thus eleven years passed whilest the enemies hovering about Era, saw no likelihood of getting it; and Aristomenes with small forces did them greater hurt than they knew how to requite. But at the last, a slave that had fled from Sparta, betrayed the place. This fellow had enticed to lewdness the wife of a Messenian, and was entertained by her, when her Husband went forth to watch. It happened in a rainy-winter-night, that the husband came home unlooked for, whilest the Adulterer was within. The Woman hid her Paramour, and made good countenance to her husband, asking him by what good fortune he was returned so soon. He told her, that the storm of foul weather was such, as had made all his fellows leave their stations, and that himself had done as the rest did; as for Aristomenes, he was wounded of late in fight and could not look abroad, neither was it to be feared, that the enemies would stir in such a dark rainy night as this was. This slave that heard these tidings, rose up secretly out of his lurking hole, and got him to the Lacedemonian Camp with the news. There he found Emperamus his Master commanding in the Kings absence. To him he uttered all; and obtaining pardon for his running away, guided the Army into the Town. Little or nothing was done that night. For the Allarm was presently taken; and the extream darkness, together with the noise of wind and rain, hindred all directions. All the next day was spent in most cruel fight; one part being incited by meer hope ending a long work, the other enraged by meer desperation. The great advantage that the Spartans had in numbers, was recompenced partly by the assistance which women and children (to whom the hatred of servitude had taught contempt of death) gave to their husbands and fathers; partly by the narrowness of the streets and other passages, which admitteth not many to fight at once. But the Messenians were in continual toyl; their enemies fought in course, refreshing themselves with meat and sleep, and then returning supplyed the place of their weary fellows with fresh Companions. Aristomenes therefore, perceiving that his men for want of relief were no longer able to hold out, (as having been three days and three nights vexed with all miseries, of labour, watchings, fighting, hunger and thirst, besides continual rain and cold) gathered together all the weaker sort, whom he compassed about with armed men, and so attempted to break out through the midst of the Enemies. Emperamus General of the Lacedemonians was glad of this; and to further their departure, caused his Souldiers to give an open way, leaving a fair passage to these desperate mad men. So they issued forth, and arrived safe in Arcadia, where they were most lovingly entertained.

Upon the first bruit of the taking of Era, the Arcadians had prepared themselves to the rescue: but Aristocrates their false hearted King, said it was too late, for that all was already lost. When Aristomenes had placed his followers in safety, he chose out five hundred the lustiest of his men, with whom he resolved to march in all secret hast into Sparta, hoping to find the Town secure, and ill manned, the people being run forth to the spoyl of Messene. In this enterprise, if he sped well, it was not doubted, that the Lacedemonians would be glad to recover their own, by restitution of that which they had taken from others; if all failed, an honourable death was the worst that could happen. There were three hundred Arcadians that offered to joyn with him; but Aristocrates marred all, by sending speedy advertisement thereof to Anaxander King of Sparta. The Epistle which Anaxander sent back to Aristocrates was intercepted by some that mistrusted him to whom it was directed. Therein was found all his falshood, which being published in open assembly, the Arcadians stoned him to death, and casting forth his body unburied, erected a monument of his treachery, with a note, That the Perjurer cannot deceive God.

Of Aristomenes no more is remaining to be said, than that committing his people, to the charge of his son Gorgus and other sufficient Governors, who should plant them in some new seat abroad, he resolved himself to make aboad in those parts, hoping to find the Lacedemonians work at home. His daughters he bestowed honourably in marriage. One of them, Demagetus, who reigned in the Isle of Rhodes, took to wife, being willed by an Oracle, to marry the Daughter of the best man in Greece. Finally Aristomenes went with his daughter to Rhodes, when he purposed to have travelled unto Ardys the Son of Gyges King of Lydia, and to Phraortes King of Media: but death prevented him at Rhodes, where he was honourably buried.

The Messenians were invited by Anaxilus (whose great Grandfather was a Messenian, and went into Italy after the former War) being Lord of the Rhegians in Italy, to take his part against the Zancleans in Sicily, on the other side of the Streights. They did so; and winning the Town of Zancle, called it Messene, which name it keeps to this day.

This second Messenian War ended in the first year of the twenty eighth Olympiad. Long after which time, the rest of that Nation, who staying at home served the Lacedemonians, found means to rebell; but were soon vanquished, and being driven to forsake Peloponnesus, they went into Acarnania; whence likewise, after few ages, they were expelled by the Lacedemonians, and thence followed their ancient Country-men into Italy and Sicily; some of them went into Africa, where they chose unto themselves a seat.

It is very strange, that during two hundred and fourscore years, this banished Nation retained their name, their ancient customs, language, hatred of Sparta, and love of their forsaken Country; with a desire to return unto it. In the third year of the hundred and second Olympiad, the great Epaminondas, having tamed the pride of the Lacedemonians, revoked the Messenians home, who came flocking out of all quarters, where they dwelt abroad, into Peloponnesus. There did Epaminondas restore unto them their old possession, and help them in building a fair City; which by the name of the Province, was called Messene, and was held by them ever after, in despight of the Lacedemonians, of whom they never from thenceforth stood in fear.

SECT. V.

Of the Kings that were in Lydia and Media, while Manasses reigned. Whether Deioces the Mede, were that Arphaxad which is mentioned in the Book of Judith. Of the History of Judith.

Ardys King of Lydia, and Phraortes of the Medes, are spoken of by Pausanias, as reigning shortly after the Messenian war, Ardys succeding unto his father, father Gyges, began his reign of nine and forty years, in the second of the five and twentieth Olympiad. He followed the steps of his Father, who encroached upon the Ionians in Asia, had taken Colophon by force, and attempted Miletus and Smyrna. In like manner Ardys wan Priene, and assayled Miletus; but went away without it. In his reign the Cimmerians, being expelled out of their own country by the Scythians, over-ran a great part of Asia, which was not freed from them before the time of Alyattes this mans Grand-child, by whom they were driven out. They had not onely broken into Lydia, but wan the City of Sardes; though the Castle or Citadel thereof was defended against them and held still for King Ardys whose long reign was unable, by reason of this great storm, to effect much.

Phraortes was not King until the third year of the nine and twentieth Olympiad, which was six years after the Messenian war ended; the same being the last years of Manasses his reign over Juda.

Deioces the father of this Phraortes, was King of Media, three and fifty of these five and fifty years, in which Manasses reigned. This Deioces was the first that ruled the Medes in a strict form, commanding more absolutely than his Predecessors had done. For they, following the example of Arbaces, had given to the people so much licence, as caused every one to desire the wholsom severity of a more Lordly King. Herein Deioces answered their desires to the full. For he caused them to build for him a stately Pallace; he took unto him a Guard; for the defence of his person; he seldom gave presence: which also when he did, it was with such austerity, that no man durst presume to spit or cough in his sight. By these and the like ceremonies he bred in the people an awful regard, and highly upheld the Majesty which his Predecessours had almost letten fall, through neglect of due comportments. In execution of his Royal office, he did uprightly and severely administer justice, keeping secret spies to inform him of all that was done in the Kingdom. He cared not to enlarge the bounds of his Dominion, by encroaching upon others, but studied how to govern well his own. The difference found between this King, and such as were before him, seems to have bred that opinion which Herodotus delivers, that Deioces was the first who reigned in Media.

Herod. l. 1.

This was he that built the great City of Ecbatane, which now is called Tauris; and therefore he should be that King Arphaxad, mentioned in the story of Judith, as also Ben Merodach, by the same account, should be Nabuchodonosor the Assyrian, by whom Arphaxad was slain, and Holofernes sent to work wonders upon Phul and Lud, and I know not what other Countries. For I reckon the last year of Deioces to have been the nineteenth of Ben Merodach: though others place it otherwise, some earlier, in the time of Merodach Baladan, some later, in the reign of Nabulassar, who is also called Nabuchodonosor.

In fitting this book of Judith to a certain time, there hath been much labour spent with ill success. The reigns of Cambyses, Darius, Hystaspis, Xerxes, and Ochus, have been sought into, but afford no great matter of likelihood; and now of late, the times foregoing the destruction of Jerusalem, have been thought upon, and this age that we have in hand, chosen by Bellarmine, as agreeing best with the story; though others herein cannot (I speak of such as fain would) agree with him. Whilst Cambyses reigned, the Temple was not re-built, which in the story of Judith is found standing and dedicated. The other two Persian Kings, Darius and Xerxes, are acknowledged to have been very favourable to the Jews; therefore neither of them could be Nabuchodonosor, whose part they refused to take, and who sent to destroy them. Yet the time of Xerxes hath some conveniences, aptly fitting this History; and above all, the opinion of a few ancient Writers (without whose judgment the authority of this Book were of no value) having placed this argument in the Persian Monarchy, inclines the matter to the reign of this vain-glorious King. As for Ochus, very few, and they faintly, entitle him to the business. Manifest it is, and granted, that in the time of this History, there must be a return from captivity lately foregoing; the Temple rebuilt; Joachim High Priest; and a long peace of three score and ten years, or thereabout, ensuing. All these were to be among the Jews. Likewise on the other side, we must find a King that reigned in Nineve, eighteen years at the least; that vanquished and slew a King of the Medes; one whom the Jews refused to assist; one, that sought generally to be adored as God, and that therefore commanded all Temples, of such as were accounted Gods, to be destroyed; one, whose Viceroy or Captain General knew not the Jewish Nation, but was fain to learn what they were of the bordering people.

Of all these circumstances; the Priesthood of Joachim, with a return from captivity, are found concurring, with either the time of Manasses before the destruction of Jerusalem, or of Xerxes afterward: the re-building of the Temple a while before, and the long peace following, agree with the reign of Xerxes; the rest of circumstances requisite, are to be found all together, neither before nor after the captivity of the Jews, and desolation of the City. Wherefore the decision of this controversy is, That the Book of Judith is not Canonical. Yet hath Torniellus done as much, in fitting all to the time of Xerxes, as was possible in so desperate a case. For he supposeth, that under Xerxes there were other Kings, among which Arphaxad might be one, (who perhaps restored and re-edified the City of Ecbatane, that had formerly been built by Deioces) and Nabuchodonosor might be another. This granted; he adds, that from the twelfth year to the eighteenth of Nabuchodonosor, that is five or six years, the absence and ill fortune of Xerxes in his Grecian expedition (which he supposeth to have been so long) might give occasion unto Arphaxad, of rebelling: and that Nabuchodonosor, having vanquished and slain Arphaxad, might then seek to make himself Lord of all, by the Army, which he sent forth unto Holofernes. So should the Jews have done their duty, in adhering to Xerxes their Sovereign Lord, and resisting one that rebelled against him; as also the other circumstances rehearsed before, be well applyed to the argument. For in these times, the affairs of Jury were agreeable to the History of Judith, and such a King as this supposed Nabuchodonosor, might well enough be ignorant of the Jews, and as proud as we shall need to think him. But the silence of all Histories, takes away belief from this conjecture: and the supposition it self is very hard, that a Rebell, whose King was abroad, with an Army consisting of seventeen hundred thousand men, should presume so far, upon the strength of twelve hundred thousand foot, and twelve thousand Archers on horse-back, as to think that he might do what he list, yea that there was none other God than himself. It is indeed easie to find enough that might be said against this device of Torniellus: yet if there were any necessity of holding the book of Judith to be Canonical, I would would rather chuſe to lay aſide all regard of profane Hiſtories, and build ſome defence upon this ground; than, by following the opinion of any other, to violate, as they all do, the text it ſelf. That Judith lived under none of the Perſian Kings, Bellarmine (whoſe works I have not read, but find him cited by Torniellus) hath proved by many arguments. That ſhe lived not in the Reign of Manaſſes, Torniellus hath proved very ſubſtantially, ſhewing how the Cardinal is driven, as it were to break through a wall, in ſaying that the text was corrupted, where it ſpake of the deſtruction of the Temple foregoing her time, that the Kings Arphaxad and Nabuchodonoſor, found out by Torniellus, are the children of meer fantaſy, it is ſo plain that it needs no proof at all.

Wherefore we may truly ſay, that they, which have contended about the time of this Hiſtory, being well furniſhed of matter, wherewith to confute each other, but wanting wherewith to defend themſelves (like naked men in a ſtony field) have chaſed Holofernes out of all parts of time, and left him and his great expedition, Extra anni ſoliſque vias, in an age that never was, and in places that were never known.

Surely, to find out the borders of Japheth, which were towards the South, and over againſt Arabia: or the Countries of Phul and Lud, that lay in Holofernes his way; I think it would as much trouble Coſmographers, as the former queſtion hath done Chronologers. But I will not buſie my ſelf herewith; having already ſo far digreſſed, in ſhewing who lived not with Manaſſes, that I think it high time to return unto mine own work, and rehearſe what Others I find to have had their part, in the long time of his Reign.

Judit. 2. 22. & 25.

SECT. VI.

Of other Princes and Actions that were in theſe times.

THE firſt year of Manaſſes was the laſt of Romulus; after whoſe death, one year the Romans wanted a King. Then was Numa Pompilius a Sabine choſen, a peaceable man, and ſeeming very religious in his kind, He brought the rude people, which Romulus had employed only in Wars, to ſome good civility, and more orderly faſhion of life. This he effected by filling their heads with Superſtition; as perſwading them, that he had familiarity with a Nymph called Egeria, who taught him many Ceremonies which he delivered unto the Romans as things of great importance. But all theſe devices of Numa were in his own judgement, no better then meer deluſions, that ſerved only as rudiments to bring the ſavage multitude of theeves and out-laws, gathered into one body by Romulus, to ſome form of milder diſcipline, than their boyſterous and wild natures were otherwiſe apt to entertain. This appeared by the Books that were found in his grave, almoſt ſix hundred years after his death, wherein the Superſtition taught by himſelf was condemned as vain. His Grave was opened by chance, in digging a piece of ground that belonged to one L. Petilius a Scribe. Two Coffins or Cheſts of ſtone were in it, with an inſcription in Greek and Latine letters, which ſaid, that Numa Pompilius, the Son of Pompo, King of the Romans lay there. In the one coffin was nothing found; his body being utterly conſumed, In the other were his Books, wrapped up in two bundles of wax; of his own conſtitutions ſeven, and other ſeven of Philoſophy. They were not onely uncorrupted, but in a manner freſh and new. The Pretor of the City deſiring to have a ſight of theſe Books, when he perceived whereunto they tended, refuſed to deliver them back to the owner, and offered to take a ſolemn Oath that they were againſt the Religion then in uſe. Hereupon the Senate, without more ado, commanded them to be openly burnt. It ſeems that Numa did mean to acquit himſelf unto wiſer Ages, which he thought would follow, as one that had not been ſo fooliſh as to believe the Doctrine wherein he inſtructed his own barbarous times. But the poyſon wherewith he had infected Rome, when he ſate in his Throne, had not left working, when he miniſtred the Antidote out of his Grave. Had theſe Books not come to light until the days of Tully and Ceſar, when the miſt of ignorance was ſomewhat better diſcuſſed: likely it is, that they had not onely eſcaped the fire, but wrought ſome good (and peradventure general) effect. Being as it was, they ſerved as a confutation, without remedy, of Idolatry that was inveterate.

Numa reigned three and forty years in continual peace. After him Tullus Hoſtilius the third King was choſen, in the ſix and fortieth of Manaſſes, and reigned two and thirty years, buſied, for the moſt part, in war. He quarrelled with the Albanes, who met him in the field, but in regard of the danger, which both parts had cauſe to fear, that might grow unto them from the Tuſcanes, cauſed them to bethink themſelves of a courſe, whereby without effuſion of ſo much bloud, as might make them too weak for a common enemy, it might be decided, who ſhould command, and who obey.

There were in each Camp three Brethren, Twins, born at one birth (Dionyſius ſays that they were Couſin Germans) of equal years and ſtrength, who were appointed to fight for their ſeveral Countries. The end was, that the Horatii, Companions for the Romans, got the victory, though two of them firſt loſt their lives. The three Curiatii that fought for Alba (as Livy tels it) were all alive, and able to fight, yet wounded, when two of their oppoſites were ſlain; but the third Horatius, pretending fear, did run away, and thereby drew the others, who by reaſon of their hurts, could not follow him with equal ſpeed, to follow him at ſuch a diſtance one from another, that returning upon them, he ſlew them, as it had been in ſingle fight, man after man, ere they could joyn together and ſet upon him at once. Dionyſius reports it ſomewhat otherwiſe, telling very particularly what wounds were given and taken, and ſaying, that firſt, one of the Horatii was ſlain, then, one of the Curiatii, then, a ſecond Horatius, and laſtly the two Curiatii, whom the third Horatius did cunningly ſever the one from the other, as is ſhewed before.

This is one of the moſt memorable things in the old Roman Hiſtory, both in regard of the action it ſelf, wherein Rome was laid, as it were in a wager, againſt Alba; and in reſpect of the great increaſe which thereby the Roman State obtained. For the City of Alba did immediately become ſubject unto her own Colony, and was ſhortly after, upon ſome treacherous dealing of their Governor, utterly razed, the people being removed unto Rome where they were made Citizens. The ſtrong Nation of the Latines, whereof Alba, as the mother City, had been chief, became ere long dependent upon Rome, though not ſubject unto it, and divers petty States adjacent, were by little and little taken in; which additions, that were ſmall, yet many, I will forbear to rehearſe (as being the work of ſundry ages, and and few of them remarkable considered apart by themselves) until such time as the fourth Empire, that is now in the Infancy, shall grow to be the main subject of this History.

The seventh year of Hippomenes in Athens was current with the first of Manasses. Also the three last Governors for ten years, who followed Hippomenes, were in the same Kings time. Of these I find only names Leocrates, Absander, and Erixias. After Erixias yearly, Rulers were elected.

These Governors for ten years were also of the race of Medon and Codrus, but their time of rule was shortned, and from term of life reduced unto ten years, it being thought likely that they would govern the better, when they knew that they were afterwards to live private men under the command of others. I follow Dionysius of Halicarnassus, in applying their times unto those years of the Olympiads, wherein the Chronological Table, following this work, doth set them. For he not only professeth himself to have taken great care in ordering the reckoning of times: but hath noted alwaies the years of the Greeks, how they did answer unto the things of Rome, throughout all the continuance of this History. Whereas therefore he placeth the building of Rome, in the first year of the seventh Olympiad, and affirms, that the same was the first year of Charops's government of Athens; I hope I shall not need excuse, for varying from Pausanias, who sets the beginning of these Athenians somewhat sooner.

Dion Hali. l. 1. fol. 43 & 45.

In the reign of Manasses it was that Midas, whom the Poets feigned to have had Asses ears, held the Kingdom of Phrygia. Many fables were devised of him; especially that he obtained of Bacchus, as a great gift, that all things that he should touch might immediately be changed into Gold: by which means he had like to have been starved (his meat and drink being subject to the same transformation) had not Bacchus delivered him from that miserable faculty, by causing him to wash himself in the River Pactolus, the stream whereof hath ever since, forsooth, abounded in that precious metall. Finally, it is said he dyed by drinking Bulls blood; being invaded by the Scythians.

In this age flourished that Antimachus, who (saith Plutarch in the life of Romulus) observed the Moons Eclipse at the foundation of Rome.

The Milesians, or, (as Eusebius hath it) the Athenians having obtained some power by Sea, founded Macicratis a City on the East of Egypt. Psammiticus herein seems to have assisted them, who used all means of drawing the Greeks into Egypt, accounting them his surest strength. For neither Miletus nor Athens were of power sufficient to plant a Colony in Egypt by force.

About this time Archias and his companion Miscellus, and other Corinthians, founded Syracusæ in Sicily, a City in after times exceeding famous. Plut. & Euseb.

The City of Nicodemia, sometime * Astacus, was enlarged and beautified in this age, by Zipartes native of Thrace. Sybilla of Samus, according to Pausanias, lived much about this time. * Whence in Strabo there is sinus Astacenus, a part of Propontis where this City stands.

About these times also was Croton founded upon the Bay of Tarentum by Miscellus, the companion of Archias that built Syracusæ, Strabo makes it somewhat more ancient, and so doth Pausanias. Paus. l. 5. Hal. l. 3. Strab. l. 6.

About the same time the Parthenians being of age, and banished Lacedemon, were conducted by Phalantus into Italy; where it is said they founded Tarentum: but Justine and Pausanias find it built before, and by them conquered and amplified. And about the same time, Manasse yet living, the City Phaselis was founded in Pamphylia, Gela in Sicily, Interamne in the Region of the Umbrii, now Urbin in Italy. About which time also Chalcedon in Asia, over against Byzantium (now Constantinople) was founded by the Megarenses, who therefore were upbraided as blind, because they chose not the other side of Bosphorus. It were a long work to rehearse all that is said to have been done in the five and fifty years of Manasses: that which already hath been told is enough, the rest being not greatly worth remembrance, may well be omitted, reserving only Ben Merodach, and Nabulassar, to the business that will shortly require more mention of them. Justin. l. 3. Paus. l. 10.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Of the Times from the death of MANASSES, to the Destruction of Jerusalem.

SECT. I.

Of AMMON and JOSIAS.

AMmon the Son of Manasse, a man no less wicked than was his Father before his conversion, restored the exercise of all sorts of Idolatry: for which God hardned the hearts of his own servants against him, who slew him after he had reigned two years. Philo, Eusebius, and Nicephorus give him ten years, following the Septuagint. 2 Kin. 21. 2 Chro. 33.

Josias succeeded unto Ammon, being but a child of 8. years old, he began to seek after the God of David his Father; and in his twelfth year he purged Juda, and Jerusalem from the high places, and the groves, and the carved and molten Images: and they brake down in his sight the Altars of Baalim: He caused all the Images, as well those which were graven, as molten, to be stampt to powder, and strewed on their graves that had erected them; and this he commanded to be done throughout all his Dominions. He also slew those that sacrificed to the Sun and Moon, and caused the Chariots and Horses of the Sun to be burnt. Of Josias it was prophesied in the time of Jeroboam the first, when he erected the Golden Calf at Bethel, that a child should be born unto the house of David, Josias by name, and upon thee 2 Kin. 22. 2 Chro. 34. 1 Kin. 13.

thee (said the Prophet, speaking to the Altar) shall he sacrifice the Priests of the high places, that burn incense upon thee: a prophecy very remarkable.

In the eighteenth year of his reign, he re-built and repaired the Temple, at which time Helkiah the Priest, found the Book of of Moses, called Deuteronomy, or, of the Law, which he sent to the King: which when he had caused to be read before him, and considered of the severe commandments therein written, the prosperity promised to those that observe them, and the sorrow and extirpation to the rest, he rent his garments, and commanded Helkiah, and others, to ask counsel of the Propheteſs Hulda, or, Olda, concerning the Book: who answered the messengers in these words: Thus saith the Lord, Behold, I will bring evil upon the place, and upon the inhabitants thereof, even all the curses that are written in the Book, which they have read before the King of Juda, because they have forsaken me, and burnt incense to other Gods. Only for the King himself, because he was a lover of God and his laws, it was promised that this evil should not fall on Juda and Jerusalem in his dayes, but that he himself should inherit his grave in peace.

2 Chro. 34. 24.
2 Kin. 22. 15.
2 Chro. 34.

Josias assembled the Elders, caused the Book to be read unto them, made a Covenant with the Lord, and caused all that were found in Jerusalem and Benjamin to do the like, promising thereby to observe the Laws and Commandments in the Book contained.

The execution done by Josias upon the Altar, Idols, Monuments, and Bones of the false Prophets at Bethel, argueth his Dominion to have extended unto those Countries, that had been part of the Kingdom of the ten Tribes. Yet I do not think, that any victory of Josias in war got possession of these places; but rather that Ezechias, after the flight and death of Sennacherib. when Merodach opposed himself against Asarhaddon, did use the advantage which the faction in the North presented unto him, and laid hold upon so much of the Kingdom of Israel, as he was able to people. Otherwise also it is not improbable that the Babylonian finding himself unable to deal with Psammiticus in Syria (as wanting power to raise the siege of Azotus, though the Town held out nine and twenty years) did give unto Manasses, together with his liberty, as much in Israel as himself could not easily defend. This was a good way to break the amity that the Kings of Juda had so long held with those of Egypt, by casting a bone between them, and withall by this benefit of enlarging their Territories with addition of more than they could challenge, to redeem the friend-ship of the Jews, which had been lost by injuries done in seeking to bereave them of their own. When it is said, that Manasses did after his deliverance from imprisonment, put Captains of War in all the strong Cities of Juda; it may be that some such business is intimated, as the taking possession and fortifying of places delivered into his hands. For though it be manifest that he took much pains, in making Jerusalem it self more defensible; yet I should rather believe, that he, having already compounded with the Babylonian, did fortifie himself against the Egyptians, whose side he had forsaken, than that he travelled in making such provision onely for his minds sake. The earnestness of Josias in the King of Babel's quarrel, doth argue, that the composition wch. Manasses had made with that King or his Ancestor, was upon such friendly terms, as required not only a faithfull observation but a thankful requital. For no perswasions could suffice to make Josias sit still, and hold himself quiet in good neutrality, when Pharao Necho King of Egypt passed along by him, to war upon the Countries about the River of Euphrates.

2 Chron. 33. 14

The last year of Josias his reign it was, when as Necho the Son of Psammiticus, came with a powerful Army towards the border of Judea, determining to pass that way, being the neerest towards Euphrates, either to strengthen the passages of that River about Carchemis, or Cercusium, for the defence of Syria (as long after this, Diocletian is said by Ammianus Marcellinus to have done,) or perhaps to invade Syria it self. For it seemeth that the travail of Psammiticus had not been idely consumed about that one Town of Azotus, but had put the Egyptians in possession of no small part of Syria, especially in those quarters that had formerly belonged unto the Adades Kings of Damasco.

2 Chro. 35. 20.

Neither was the industry of Necho less than his Fathers had been, in pursuing their War against Babel. In which war, two things may greatly have availed the Egyptian, and advanced their affairs and hopes: the extraordinary valour of the mercenary Greeks, that were far better Souldiers than Egypt of it self could afford; and the danger wherein Assyria stood, by the force of the Medes, which under the command of more absolute Princes, began to feel it self better, and to shew what it could do. These were great helps, but of shorter endurance than was the war; as in a place more convenient shall be noted. At the present it seems that either some preparation of the Chaldeans to reconquer, did enforce, or some disability of theirs to make resistance, did invite the King of Egypt into the Countries bordering upon Euphrates; whither Pharao Necho ascended with a mighty Army.

These two great Monarchs, having their Swords drawn, and contending for the Empire of that part of the World, Josias advised with himself to which of these he might adhere, having his Territory set in the mid way between both, so as the one could not invade the other, but that they must of necessity tread upon the very face and body of his Country. Now though it were so that Necho himself desired, by his Embassadors, leave to pass along by Judea, protesting that he directed himself against the Assyrian only, without all harmful purpose against Josias; yet all sufficed not, but the King of Israel would needs fight with him.

2 Chro. 35.

Many examples there were, which taught what little good the friendship of Egypt could bring to those that had affiance therein: as that of Hosea the last King of Israel, who when he fell from the dependance of the Assyrian, and wholly trusted to Sabacus or Sous King of Egypt, was utterly disappointed of his hopes, and in conclusion lost both his life and estate, which the Assyrian so rooted up and tare in pieces, as it could never after be gathered together or replanted. The calamities also that fell upon Juda in the thirteenth and fourteenth years of Ezechia, whilst that good King and his people relied upon Sethon; and more lately, the imprisonment of Manasses, were documents of sufficient proof, to shew the ill assurance that was in the help of the Egyptians, who (near neighbours though they were) were alwaies unready, when the necessities of their friends required their assistance. The remembrance hereof might be the reason why Neco did not seek to have the Jews renew their ancient league with him, but onely craved that they would be contented to sit still, and behold the pastime between him and the Assyrians. This was an easie thing to grant; seeing the countenance of such an Army, as did soon after this, out-face Nabulassar upon his own borders, left unto the Jews, a lawful excuſe of fear, had they forborn to give it any check upon the way. Wherefore I believe that this religious and vertuous Prince Joſias, was not ſtirred up only by politick reſpects, to ſtop the way of Neco; but thought himſelf bound in Faith and Honour, to do his beſt in defence of the Babylonian Crown: whereunto his Kingdom was, obliged, either by Covenant made at the enlargement of Manaſſes, or by the gift of ſuch part as he held in the Kingdom of the ten Tribes. As for the Princes and people of Juda, they had now a good occaſion to ſhew, both unto the Babylonians, of what importance their friendſhip was, aud to the Egyptians, what a valiant Nation they had abandoned, and thereby made their enemy.

Some think that this Action of Joſias was contrary to the advice of Jeremy the Prophet; which I do not find in the Prophecie of Jeremy, nor can find reaſon to believe. Others hold opinion that he forgat to ask the Counſel of God: and this is very likely; ſeeing he might believe that an enterpriſe grounded upon fidelity and thankfulneſs due to the King of Babel could not but be diſpleaſing unto the Lord. But the wickedneſs of the people (in whom the corruptions of former times had taken ſuch root, as all the care of Joſias in reforming the Land could not pluck up) was queſtionleſs far from hearkening how the matter would ſtand with Gods pleaſure, and much farther from enquiring into his ſecret will, wherein it was determined that their good King, whoſe life ſtood between them and their punihment, ſhould now be taken from among them, and that in ſuch ſort, as his death ſhould give an entrance to the miſeries enſuing. So Joſias levying all the ſtrength he could make, near unto Megiddo, in the half tribe of Manaſſes, encountred Neco: and there he received the ſtroke of death, which lingring about him till he came to Jeruſalem, brought him to the Sepulchres of his Anceſtors. His loſs was greatly bewailed of all the people and Princes of Juda, eſpecially of Jeremy the Prophet, who inſerted a ſorrowfull remembrance thereof in his Book of Lamentations. Lam.4.20.

SECT. II.

Of Pharaoh Neco that fought with Joſias: Of Jehoahaz and Jehojakim Kings of Iſrael.

OF theſe Wars, and particularly of this Victory, Herodotus hath mention among the Acts of Neco. He tells us of this King, that he went about to make a Channel, whereby Ships might paſs out of Nilus into the Red Sea. It ſhould have reached above an hundred miles in length, and been wide enough for two Gallies to row in front. But in the middeſt of the work, an Oracle foretold that the Barbarians ſhould have the benefit of it, which cauſed Neco to deſiſt when half was done. There were conſumed in this toylſome buſineſs twelve hundred thouſand Egyptians; a loſs great enough to make the King forſake his enterprize, without troubling the Oracle for admonition. How ſoever it were, he was not a man to be idle; therefore he built a Fleet, and levied a great Army, wherewith he marched againſt the King of Babel. In this expedition, he uſed the ſervice as well of his Navy, as of his Land-forces; but no particular exploits of his therein are found recorded, ſave only this victory againſt Joſias, where Herodotus calls the place Magdalus, and the Jews Syrians; which is a ſmall error, ſeeing that Judea was a Province of Syria, and Magdolus or Magdala is taken to have been the ſame place (though diverſly named) in which this battel was fought. After this, Necus took the City of Caditis, which was perhaps Charchemiſh, by Euphrates, and made himſelf Lord, in a manner, of all Syria, as Joſephus witneſſeth. Joſ. Ant. Jud. lib. 10 cap.7. Herod.l.4.

Particularly we find, that the Phænicians one of the moſt powerful Nations in Syria, were his Subjects, and that by his command they ſurrounded all Africa, ſetting ſail from the Gulf of Arabia, and ſo paſſing along all the coaſt, whereon they both landed, as need required, and ſowed Corn for their ſuſtenance in that long voyage, which laſted three years. This was the firſt Navigation about Africa, wherein that great Cape, now called Of good hope, was diſcovered; which after was forgotten, until Vaſco de Gama the Portingal found it out, following a contrary courſe to that which the Phænicians held; for they beginning in the Eaſt, ran the way of the Sun, South, and then Weſtward, after which they returned home by the pillars and ſtreights of Hercules (as the name was then) called now the ſtreights of Gibraltar, having Africk ſtill on the right hand; but the Portingals, beginning their voyage not far from the ſame ſtreights, leave Africk on the Larboord, and bend their Courſe unto the Eaſt. That report of the Phænicians, which Herodotus durſt not believe, how the Sun in this journy was on their right hand, that is on the North ſide of them, is a matter of neceſſary truth; and the obſervation then made hereof, makes me the better to believe, that ſuch a voyage was indeed performed. But leaving theſe diſcourſes of Neco his magnificence, let us tell what he did, in matters more importing his eſtate. The people of Juda, while the Egyptians were buſie at Charchemiſh, had made Jehoahaz their King, in the room of his Father Joſias. The Prophet Jeremy calls this new King Shallum, by the name of his younger brother; alluding perhaps to the ſhort reign of Shallum King of the ten tribes: for Shallum of Iſrael reigned but one month; Jehoahaz no more than three. He was not the eldeſt Son of Joſias: Wherefore it may ſeem that he was ſet up as the beſt affected unto the King of Babel; the reſt of his houſe being more inclined to the Egyptian, as appears by the ſequel. An Idolater, he was, and thrived accordingly. For when as Neco had diſpatched his buſineſs in the North parts of Syria, then did he take order for the affairs of Judea. This Country was now ſo far from making any reſiſtance, that the King himſelf came from Riblah in the Land of Hamath, where the matter went ſo ill on his ſide, that Neco did caſt him into bonds, and carry him priſoner into Egypt, giving away his Kingdom to Eliakim his elder brother, to whom of right it did belong. The City of Riblah, in after times called Antiochia, was a place unhappy to the Kings and Princes of Juda, as may be obſerved in divers examples. Yet here Jehojakim, together with his new name, got his Kingdom; an ill gain, ſince he could no better uſe it. But however Jehojakim thrived by the bargain, Pharao ſped well, making that Kingdom Tributary, without any ſtroke ſtricken; which three months before was to ſtout to give him peace, when he deſired it. Certain it is, that in his march outward, Neco had a greater task lying upon his hands, than would permit him to waſt his forces upon Judea: but now the reputation of his good ſucceſs at Megiddo, and Charchemiſh, together with the diſſention of the Princes Joſias his Sons (of whom the eldeſt is probably thought to have ſtormed Jer.22.32. 2 Kin. 3432.

at the preferment of his younger brother) gave him power to do even what should please himself. Yet he did forbear to make a conquest of the Land, perhaps upon the same reason, which had made him so earnest in seeking to hold peace with it. For the Jews had suffered much in the Egyptians quarrel, and being left by these their friends, in time of need, unto all extremities, were driven of necessity to forsake that party, and to joyn with the enemies; to whom if they shewed themselves faithfull, who could blame them? It was therefore enough to reclaim them; seeing they were such a people as would not upon every occasion shift side, but endure more than Pharao, in the pride of his victories, thought that any henceforth should lay upon them: so good a Patron did he mean to be unto them. Nevertheless, he laid upon them a Tribute, of an hundred Talents of Silver, and one Talent of Gold; that so he might both reap at present some fruits of his pains taken, and leave unto them some document in the future, of greater punishment than verbal anger, due to them, if they should rebel. So he departed, carrying along with him into Egypt the unfortunate King Jehoahaz, who died in his Captivity.

The reign of Jehoahaz was included in the end of his Fathers last year; otherwise it would hardly be found, that Jehojakim his Successor did reign ten whole years; whereas the Scriptures give him eleven, that are current and incomplete. If any man will rather cast the three mouths of this short reign, into the first year of his brother, than into the Fathers last, the same arguments that shall maintain his opinion, will also prove the matter to be unworthy of disputation; and so I leave it.

Jehojakim in impiety was like his Brother, in faction he was altogether Egyptian, as having received his Crown at the hand of Pharao. The wickedness of these last Kings being expressed in Scriptures none otherwise, than by general words with reference to all the evil their Fathers had done, makes it apparent, that the poyson wherewith Ahaz and Manasses had infected the Land, was not so expelled by the zealous goodness of Josias, but that it still cleaved unto the chief of the people, Yea, unto the Priests also; and therefore it was not strange, that the Kings had their parts therein. The Royal authority was much abased by the dangers wherein the Country stood, in this troublesome age: the Princes did in a manner what they listed, neither would the Kings forbear to profess, that they could deny them nothing. Yet the beginning of Jehojakim had the countenance of the Egyptian to grace it which made him insolent and cruel, as we find by that example of his dealing with Uria the Prophet: though herein also the Princes do appear to have been Instigators. This holy man denounced Gods judgments against the City and Temple, in like sort as other Prophets had formerly done, and did in the same age. The King with all the men of power, and all the Princes, hearing of this, determined to put him to death. Hereupon the poor man fled into Egypt: but such regard was had to Jehojakim, that Uria was delivered unto his Embassador, and sent back to the death; contrary to the custom used, both in those dayes, and since among all civil Nations, of giving refuge unto strangers, that are not held guilty of such inhumane crimes, as for the general good of mankind should be exempted from all priviledge.

2 Chro. 36. 14.

It concerned Pharao to give all contentment possible to Jehojakim; for the Assyrian Lion, that had not stirred in many years, began about these times to roar so loud upon the banks of Euphrates, that his voice was heard unto Nilus, threatning to make himself Lord of all the Forrest. The causes that hitherto had withdrawn the house of Merodach from opposing the Egyptian in his conquest of Syria, require our consideration in this place, before we proceed to commit them together at Charchemish, where shortly after this the glory of Egypt is to fall.

SECT. III.

Of the Kings of Babylon and Media. How it came to pass that the Kings of Babel could not give attendance on their business in Syria; which caused them to lose that Province.

Merodach the Son of Baladan, who taking the advantage that Sennacherib's misadventure and death, together with the dissention between his children, presented, made himself King of Babylon, was eleven years troubled with a powerful Enemy, Asarhaddon the Son of Sennacherib, reigning over the Assyrians in Nineve; from whom whilest he could not any other way divert his cares, he was fain to omit all business in Syria, and (as hath been formerly shewed) to make over unto Ezechia some part of the Kingdom of the ten Tribes. From this molestation, the death of Asarhaddon did not only set him free, but gave unto him some part of Assyria, if not (as is commonly, but less probably thought) the whole Kingdom. How greatly this was to the liking of the Assyrians, I will not here stand to enquire: his long reign following, and his little intermedling with the matters of Syria, make it plain, that he had work enough at home, either in defending or establishing that which he had gotten, Josephus gives him the honour of having won Nineve it self which we may believe; but surely he did not hold it long, For in the times soon following, that great City was free, and vanquished Phraortes the Median. Perhaps it yielded upon some capitulation: and refused afterwards to continue subject, when the Kings, being of the Chaldean race preferred Babylon before it.

Some think that this was the Assyrian King, whose Captains took Manasses prisoner, but I rather believe those that hold the contrary, for which I have given my reasons in due place. To say truth, I find little cause why Merodach should have looked into those parts, as long as the Jews were his friends, and the Egyptians, that maligned the Northern Empire, held themselves quiet at home, which was until the time of Psammiticus, about the end of this Kings Reign, or the beginning of his Sons.

Ben Merodach the Son and successor of this King, is not mentioned in the Scriptures; yet is he named by good consent of Authors, and that speake little of his doings. The length of his Reign is gathered by inference to have been one and twenty years; for so much remaineth of the time that passed between the beginning of his Fathers and Nephews reign (which is a known sum) deducting the years of his Father, and of his Son Nabulassar. This (as I take it) was he that had Manasses prisoner, and released him. He sped ill in Syria, where Psammiticus, by the vertue of his mercenary Greeks, did much prevail. This may have been some cause that he released Manasses, and did put into his hands ſome part more of the Kingdom of Samaria: which is made probable by circumſtances alledged before.

Nabulaſſar that reigned in Babylon after his Father Ben Merodach, had greater buſineſs in his own Kingdom, than would permit him to look abroad: inſomuch as it may be thought to have been a great negligence or overſight of Pſammiticus or Necho, that they did not occupy ſome good part of his Dominions beyond Euphrates. For it was in his time, that Phraortes King of the Medes invaded Aſſyria, and beſieged Nineve; from whence he was not repelled by any force of Nabulaſſar, but conſtrained to remove by the coming of the Scythians, who in theſe ages did overflow thoſe parts of the world, laying hold upon all that they could maſter with ſtrong hand. Of theſe Scythians, and the Lordſhip that they held in Aſia, it is convenient that I ſpeak in this place; ſhewing briefly afore-hand, how the Medes; upon whom they firſt fell, were buſied in the ſame times with hopes of conquering Aſſyria.

Phraortes, the ſon of Deioces, King of the Medes, having by many victories enlarged his Dominions, conceived at length a fair poſſibility of making himſelf Lord of Nineve.

Herod l. 1. That City (as Herodotus reports it) having been a Soveraign Lady was not forſaken of all her dependants, yet remained in ſuch caſe, that of her ſelf ſhe was well enough.

This makes it plain, that howſoever Merodach had gotten poſſeſſion of this Imperial ſeat, and made it ſubject as was the reſt of the Country. yet it found the means to ſet it ſelf at liberty: as after this again it did, when it had been regained by Nabulaſſar his Grand-child.

Sharp war, and the very novelty of ſudden violence, uſe to diſmay any State or Country, not inured to the like: but cuſtom of danger hardeneth even thoſe that are unwarlike. Nineve had been the Palace of many valiant Kings lately reigning therein; it had ſuffered, and reſiſted, all the fury, wherewith either Domeſtical Tumults between the Sons of Sennachirib, or foreign war of the Babylonians, could afflict it: and therefore it is the leſs wonderful, that Phraortes did ſpeed ſo ill in his journy againſt it, He and the moſt of his Army periſhed in that expedition: whereof I find no particular circumſtances (perhaps they undervalued their forces, and brought a leſs power than was needful.) It is enough, that herein we may believe Herodotus.

Cyaxares the Son of Phraortes, a braver man of War than his Father, wan as much of Aſia the leſs, as lay Eaſtward, from the River of Halys; he ſought revenge upon the Aſſyrians for the death of his Father, and beſieged Nineve it ſelf, having a purpoſe to deſtroy it. I rather believe Euſebius, That he took the City, and he fulfilled his diſpleaſure upon it, than Herodotus, That the Scythian Army came upon him while he lay before it. For where equal authorities are contradictory (as Euſebius, though far later than Herodotus, yet having ſeen other Authors that are now loſt, it is to be valued according to his great reading) there do I hold it beſt, to yield unto the beſt likelihoods.

To think that the Scythians came upon Cyaxares, whileſt he lay before Nineve, were to accuſe him of greater improvidence than ought to be ſuſpected in one commended as a good Souldier. But to ſuppoſe that he was fain to leave the Town, when a War ſo dangerous fell upon his own Country, doth well agree both with the condition of ſuch buſineſs as that Scythian expedition brought into thoſe parts, and with the State of the Chaldean and Aſſyrian affairs enſuing.

The deſtruction of this great City is both foretold in the Book of Tobit, and there ſet down as happening about theſe times; of which Book whoſoever was the Author, he was ancient enough to know the ſtory of thoſe ages, and hath committed no ſuch error in reckoning of times, as ſhould cauſe us to diſtruſt him in this. As for the Prophecy of Nahum, though it be not limited unto any certain terms, yet it appears to have taken effect, in the final deſtruction of Nineve by Nabuchodonoſor, according to the common opinion. For the Prophet hath mention of a conqueſt of Egypt, foregoing this calamity, whereof we will ſpeak in due place. Some that aſcribe more authority than the reformed Churches yield, to the Book of Tobit, are careful, as in a matter of neceſſity, to affirm that about theſe times, Nineve was taken; but they attribute (conjecturally) the victory over it to Ben Merodach: a needleſs conjecture, if the place of Euſebius be well conſidered. Yet I hold it probable, that Nabulaſſar the ſon of Ben Merodoch did ſeize upon it, and place a King or Viceroy therein, about ſuch time as the Country of Aſſyria was abandoned by Cyaxares, when the Scythian War overwhelmed Media. For then was the Conqueſt wrought out ready to his hand; the ſwelling ſpirits of the Ninevites were allayed, and their malice to Babylon ſo much aſſwaged, that it might be thought a great favour, if Nabulaſſar, appointing unto them a peculiar King, took him and them in protection: though afterwards to their confuſion, this unthankful people and their King rebelled again, as ſhall be ſhewed in the Reign of Nabuchodonoſor.

SECT. IV.

The great expedition of the Scythians, who ruled in Aſia eight and twenty years.

¶. I.

The time of this Expedition.

NOw that I have ſhewed what impediment was given by the Aſſyrians and the Medes, to the Babylonians, who thereby were much diſabled to perform any action of worth upon the Egyptians in Syria; it is time that I ſpeak of that great Scythian expedition, which grievouſly afflicted not only the Babylonians, but the Medes and Lydians with the Countries adjacent, in ſuch wiſe, that part of the trouble redounded even to the Egyptians themſelves.

Of the Scythian people in general, Herodotus makes very large diſcourſe, but interlaced, as of matter ill known, with many Fables; of this Expedition he tells many particulars, but ill agreeing with conſent of time. Concerning his fabulous reports, it will be needleſs to recite them; for they are far enough diſtant from the buſineſs in hand. The computation of times which by inference out of his relations, may ſeem very ſtrange, needeth ſome anſwer in this place: leſt otherwiſe I ſhould either ſeem to make my ſelf too bold with an Author, in citing him after a manner different from his own tale; or elſe to be too forgetful of my ſelf, in bringing to act upon the Stage, thoſe perſons, which I had already buried. Eight and twenty years, he ſaith, that the Scythians reigned in Aſia, before Cyaxares delivered the Country from them. Yet he reports a War between Cyaxares and Halyattes the Lydian, as foregoing the ſiege of Nineve; the ſiege of Nineve being ere the Scythians came.

War

And further he tells how the Scythians having vanquiſhed the Medes, did paſs into Syria, and were encountred in Paleſtina by Pſammiticus King of Egypt, who by gifts and intreaty procured them to depart from him. Theſe narrations of Herodotus may, every one of them, be true; though not in ſuch order of time, as he hath marſhalled them. For Pſammiticus was dead before Cyaxares began to reign: and Cyaxares had ſpent half of his forty years, ere Halyattes was King of Lydia, ſo taht he could not after thoſe Lydian Wars, reign eight and twenty years together with the Scythians. It is true, that Euſebius doth alſo call Pſammis the ſon of Pharao Neco, by the name of Pſammiticus; and this King Pſammis may, by ſome ſtrained conjecture, be thought to have been he that met with the Scythians: for he lived with both Cyaxares and Halyattes. But Euſebius himſelf refers all that buſineſs of the Scythian irruption into Paleſtina to Pſammiticus the Father of Necho, whom he leaves dead before the reign of Halyattes. Therefore I dare not rely upon Herodotus, in this matter, otherwiſe than to believe him, that ſuch things were in theſe ages, though not in ſuch order as he ſets them down.

It remains, that I collect as well as I can, thoſe memorials which I find of this expedition ſcattered in divers places: a work neceſſary, for that the greatneſs of this action was ſuch, as ought not to be omitted in general Hiſtory; yet not eaſie, the conſent of thoſe that have written thereof, being nothing near to uniformity.

I have noted before, that in the reign of Ardys King of Lydia, the Cimmerians over-ran that Kingdom, and were not expelled, until Halyattes the Nephew of Ardys got the upper hand of them. In theſe times therefore of Ardys, Sardyattes, and Haliattes, are we to find the eight and twenty years, wherein the Scythians reigned over Aſia. Now foraſmuch as Pſammiticus the Egyptian had ſome dealings with the Scythians, even in the height of their proſperity, we muſt needs allow more than one or two of his laſt years unto this their Dominion. But the beginnning of Halyattes his reign in Lydia, being three and twenty years compleat after the death of Pſammiticus, leaves the ſpace very ſcant, either for the great victories of the Scythians, neceſſarily ſuppoſed before they could meet the Egyptians in Syria, or for thoſe many loſſes, which they muſt have received ere they could be driven quite away. To encreaſe this difficulty, the victorious reign of Nabuchodonoſor in Babylon, is of no ſmall moment. For now may we think it poſſible, that he ſhould have adventured the ſtrength of the Kingdom againſt the Egyptians and Jews, had he ſtood in daily fear of looſing his own, to a more mighty Nation, that lay upon his neck? To ſpeak ſimply as it appears to me, the victories aſcribed to Cyaxares and Halyattes over theſe warlike people, were not obtained againſt the whole body of their Army, but were the defeatures of ſome troops that inveſted their ſeveral Kingdoms; other Princes, and among theſe Nabulaſſar having the like ſucceſs, when the pleaſures of Aſia had mollified the courages of theſe hardy Northern Lads. Wherefore we may probably annex the eight and twenty years of the Scythians rule, to as many almoſt the laſt of Nabulaſſar's Reign, in compaſs whereof their power was at the greateſt. This is all that I can ſay of the time, wherein Aſia ſuffered the violence of their oppreſſors.

‖. II.

What Nations they were that brake into Aſia; with the cauſe of their Journey.

TOuching the expedition it ſelf, Herodotus tells us, that the Cimmerians being driven out of their Country by the Scythians, invaded and waſted ſome part of Aſia; and that the Scythians, not contented with having won the land of the Cimmerians, did follow them, I know not why, into far removed quarters of the World, ſo (as it were by chance) falling upon Media and Egypt, in this purſuit of men that were gone another way into Lydia. Hereby we may gather that the Cimmerians were an odious and baſe people; the Scythians, as miſchievous and fooliſh; or elſe Herodotus, and ſome other of his Country-men, great ſlanderers of thoſe, by whom their Nation had been beaten, and Ionia, more than once, grievouſly ranſackt. The great valour of the Cimmerians or Cimbrians is ſo well known, and their many Conqueſts ſo well teſtified in Hiſtories of divers Nations, that the malice of the Greeks is inſufficient to ſtain them with the note of Cowards. Theſe were the poſterity of Gomer, who peopled the greateſt part of our Weſtern World; and whoſe reflow did overwhelm no ſmall portion of Greece and Aſia, as well before and after, as in the age whereof we do now entreat. He that would more largely inform himſelf of their original and actions, may peruſe Goropius Becanus his Amazonica, of many things in which Book, that may be verified, which the learned Ortelius is ſaid to have ſpoken of all Goropius his works, that it is eaſie to laugh at them, but hard to confute them: There we find it proved, by ſuch arguments and authorities as are not lightly regarded, that the Cimmerians, Scythians, and Sarmatians, were all of one Lineage and Nation; howſoever diſtinguiſhed in name, by reaſon of their divers tribes, profeſſions, or perhaps Dialect of ſpeech. Homer indeed hath mention of the Cimmerians; whoſe Country whether he placeth in the Weſt, as near unto the Ocean and bounds of the Earth, or in the North, as being far from the Sun, and covered with eternal darkneſs; certain it is that he would have them near neighbours to Hell: for he had the ſame quarrel to them which Herodotus had, and therefore belike would have made them ſeem a kind of Goblins. It was the manner of this great Poet (as Herodotus writing his life affirms) to inſert into his Works the names of ſuch as lived in his own time, making ſuch mention of them, as the good or ill done by them to himſelf deſerved. And for this reaſon it is proved by Euſtathius, that the Cimmerians were ſo diſgraced by him, becauſe they had waſted his Country. Perhaps that invaſion of Phrygia by the Amazons, whereof Homer puts a remembrance into Priamus his diſcourſe with Helen, was the very ſame, which Euſebius noteth to have happened ſomewhat before the age of Homer, at what time the Cimmerians with the Amazons, together invaded Aſia.

This is certain, that both the Amazons and the Cimmerii (who in after-times were called Cimbri) did often break into Greece and Aſia; which though it be not in expreſſe terms written, that they did with joynt forces, yet ſeeing they invaded the ſelf-ſame places, it may well be gathered, that they were companions. One journy of the Amazons into Greece, mentioned alſo by Euſebius, was by the ſtreights of the Cimmerians, as we find in Diodore, who Diod. l. 4. c. 2. Diod. l. 2. c. 11. who further telleth us, that the Scythians therein gave them assistance. The same Author, before his entry into those discourses of the Amazons, which himself acknowledgeth to be fabulous, doth report them to have been Wives of the Scythians, and no less War-like than their Husbands; alledging the example of that Queen who is said to have slain the great Persian Cyrus. That it was the manner of the Cimbri to carry their Wives along with them to the wars; and how desperate the courage was of those Women; the terrible descent of them into Italy, when Marius the Roman overthrew them, gives proof sufficient. I will not here enter into a discourse of the Amazons; another place will give me better leisure to speak of them: but seeing that they are noted by divers Historians to have belonged unto the Cimmerians, to the Scythians, and to the Sarmatians, we may therefore the better approve Goropius his conclusion, That these three Nations were one, at least that they were near allies.

Now as concerning the expulsion of the Cimmerians by the Scythians, it appears to have been none other than the sending forth a Colony of them into Asia, with an Army of Scythians to help them in purchasing a new seat and establishing the Plantation.

The Sarmatians also were companions in this journy. For the City of Novograd in Russia (which Country is the same that was called Sarmatia) stood in their way homewards, as shall anon be further shewed. So that all the North was up in Arms: and therefore it is no marvel though many Countries felt the weight of this great inundation. Such another voyage was that, which the same people made five hundred years and more after this, when they were encountred by the Romans. For they issued from the parts about the Lake Maotis; they were then likewise assisted (saith Plutarch in the most likely report of them) by the Scythians their neighbors; they had in their Army above three hundred thousand fighting men, besides a huge multitude of women and children; they wandred over many Countries, beating all down before them; and finally, thinking to have setled themselves in Italy, they divided their Company, for the more eatie passage thither, and were consumed in three terrible battels by the Roman Consuls. Meer necessity enforced these poor Nations to trouble the World, in following such hard adventures. For their Country being more fruitfull of men by far than of sustenance, and shut up on the North side with intollerable cold, which denied issue that way to their overswelling multitudes; they were compelled to discharge upon the South, and by right or wrong to drive others out of possession, as having title to all that they had power to get, because they wanted all, that weaker but more civil, people had. Their sturdy bodies, patient of hunger, cold, and all hardness, gave them great advantage over such as were accustomed unto a more delicate life, and could not be without a thousand superfluities. Wherefore most commonly they prevailed very far; their next neighbours giving them free passage, that they might the sooner be rid of them: others giving them, besides passage, victuals and guides to conduct them to more wealthy places; others hiring them to depart with great presents; so as the farther they went on, the more pleasant Lands they found, & the more effeminate people.

Plutarch in the life of Marius

§. III,

Of the Cimmerians War in Lydia.

THe first Company of these, consisting for the most part of Cimmerians, held the way of the Euxine Seas, which they had still on the right hand: leaving on the other side, and behind them, the great Mountains of Caucasus. These having passed through the Land of Cholchis, that now is called Mengrelli, entred the Country of Pontus, and being arrived in Paphlagonia, fortified the Promontory, whereon Synope, a famous Haven Town of the Greeks, was afterwards built. Here it seems that they bestowed the weakest and most unserviceable of their train, together with the heaviest of their carriages, under some good guard: as drawing near to those Regions in conquest whereof they were to try the utmost hazard. For in like sort afterwards did the Cimbri (of whom I spake even now) dispose of their impediments, leaving them in a place of strength, where Antwerp now stands, when they drew near unto Gaul, upon which they determined to adventure themselves in the purchaser. From Synope, the way unto Phrygia, Lydia and Ionia, was fair and open to the Cimmerians, without any ladg of Mountains, or any deep Rivers at all to stay their march: for Iris and Halis they had already passed. Herod. l. 4.

What battels were fought between these Invaders and the Lydians, and with what variable success the one or other part wan and lost, I find not written, nor am able to conjecture. This I find that in the time of Ardys, the Cimmerians got possession of Sardes the capital City of Lydia; only the Castle holding out against them. Further I observe, that whereas Herodotus tells of the acts performed by Gyges and Ardys Kings of Lydia, before this invasion, and by Halyattes and Crœsus in the times folowing, all that Ardys did against the Cimmerians, and all, save burning the Milesians Corn fields, that was done in twelve years by Sadyattes his son (who perhaps had his hands so full of this business, that he could turn them to nothing else) is quite omitted: whereby it may seem, that neither of the two did any thing worthy of remembrance in those Wars, but were glad enough that they did lose all.

Certainly the miseries of War are never so bitter and many, as when a whole Nation, or a great part of it, forsaking their own seats, labour to root out the established Possessors of another Land; making room for themselves, their Wives and children. They that fight for the mastery, are pacified with Tribute, or with some other services and acknowledgments; which had they been yielded at the first, all had been quiet, and no sword bloudied. But in these migrations, the assailants bring so little with them, that they need all which the defendants have; their Lands and Cattel, their houses and their goods, even to the Cradles of the sucking Infants. The mercileſs terms of this controversy, arm both sides with desperate resolution: seeing one part must either win, or perish by famine; the other defend their goods, or lose their lives without redemption. Most of the Countries in Europe have felt examples thereof; and the mighty Empire of Rome was overthrown by such invasions. But our Isle of Britain can best witness the diversity of Conquests; having by the happy Victory of the Romans, gotten the knowledge of all Civil Arts, in exchange of liberty, that was but slenderly instructed therein before; where as the issue of the Saxon and Danish Wars, was, as were the causes, quite contrary. For these did not seek after the Dominion onely, but the entire possession of the Country, which the Saxons obtained, but with horrible cruelty, eradicating all of the Britisb Race, and defacing all memorials of the ancient inhabitants through the greater part of the Land. But the Danes (who are also of the Cimmerian blood) found such end of their enterprize, as it may seem that that the Cimmerians in Lydia, and Scythians in the higher Asia, did arrive unto, So that by considering the process of the one, we shall the better conceive the fortune of the other. Many battels the Danes won, yet none of such importance, as sufficed to make them absolute Conquerors: Many the Saxons won upon the Danes, yet not so great, as could drive them quite away, and back from hence, after they had gotten firm footing. But in course of time, the long continuance even of utter enmity, had bred such acquaintance between them, as bowing the natures of both these people, made the one more pliant unto the other. So their disagreeable qualities, both ill and good, being reduced in one mild temper, no small number of the Danes became peaceable cohabitants with the Saxons in England, where great slaughter had made large room; others returning home, found their own Country wide enough to receive them, as having disburthened it self of many thousands, that were sent to seek their graves abroad. And such (as I think) was the end of the Cimmerian War in Lydia; whereunto though some victory of Halyattes may have hastened the conclusion, yet the wearisome length of time seems to have done most, in compelling them to desire of rest. I know not why I should fear to add hereunto my further conjecture, which is, that the matter was so compounded between the Cimmerians and Halyattes, that the River of Halys should divide their Territories. For Halys was henceforth the border of the Lydians, and on the Eastern side of the River was the Country of the Amazons, that is indeed, of the Cimmerians, and other Scythian people; whose wives and daughters these warlike women are supposed to have been.

And hereunto the quarrel ensuing between Halyattes and Cyaxares the Mede, hath very good reference. For Halyattes (as is said) fought in defence of certain Scythians, upon whom the Median sought revenge. And it stands with reason, that the Lydians and Cimmerians, being much weakned with mutual slaughters, should have joyned in a league of mutual defence for their common safety: though otherwise it had been dangerous to Halyattes, if he had permitted the Median to extend his Kingdom so far West-ward, whatsoever the pretences might be, of taking revenge upon such as had spoiled each of their Countries. As for that occasion of the War between these two Kings, which Herodotus relates, I find it of little weight, and less probability. He tells of Scythians, that being chased out of their Country by faction, came unto Cyaxares, who committed unto them certain Boys, to be instructed in the Scythian tongue, and feat of Archery. Now it so fell out (saith he) that these Scythians using much to hunt, and commonly bringing home somewhat with them, did nevertheless other-whiles miss of their game, and came home as they went. Hereupon the King being froward and cholerick, bitterly reviled them, and they, as impatient as he, killed one of the Boys that was under their charge, whom dressing like Venison, they presented unto him; which done, they fled unto Halyattes. This Herodotus delivers, as the ground of a War that lasted six years between the Medes and Lydians; the one King demanding these Fugitives to be delivered into his hand, the other refusing to betray such men as were become his suppliants. To this I will say no more, than that I see no cause that might induce the Scythians to betake themselves to either of these Kings unto whom their Nation had wrought so much displeasure. Particularly, they had reason to distrust Cyaxares, for the treachery that he shewed in the massacring of their Country-men that were in his Kingdom, of whom it is now meet that we should speak.

SECT. IV.

The War of the Scythians in the higher Asia.

AS the Cimmerians held their course Westerly, along the shores of the Euxine sea, so the Scythians and Sarmatians took the other way, and having the Caspian Sea on their left hand, passed between it and Caucasus, through Albania, Colthene, and other obscure Nations, where now are the Countries of Servan and Georgia, and so they entred into Media. The Medes encountred them in Arms, but were beaten, and thereupon glad to come to any agreement with them. This was in the time of Phraortes, whilest Psammiticus reigned in Egypt. If it were in the sixth year of Nabulassars Reign over Babylon (supposing him to have reigned five and thirty; otherwise we must allow to Ben Merodach what we take from him) then do the eight and twenty years of their Dominion end, one year before the great Nabuchodonosor was King; so giving him good leave to provide securely for the invasion of Syria; which expedition he began while his Father yet lived, as Josephus out of Berosus relates the History.

Now the Medes, desirous to save themselves as well as they might, from this terrible nation, which when they had no lust to a second trial of the sword, refused not to undergo the burthen of a Tribute, but thought nothing dishonourable, that would serve to remove these troublesome guests into some other lodging. On the other part, the Scythians finding still the Countries pleasanter and better, the further that they marched into the South, did suffer themselves to be perswaded that a little more travel would add a great deal more to their content. For they relyed so much upon their own valour, that they feared no resistance, and being the bravest men, they thought it reason that they should dwell in the best Region. That Phraortes perswaded them into Egypt, I do not think; Babylon was near enough; whether if he could send these Locusts to graze, then should not his unfriendly Neighbours have cause to laugh at his misfortune. What shift Nabulassar made with them, or that at all he had any dealings with them, I do not read. But it is well known that his Dominions lay in the middest between Media and Egypt; as also, that they made all those parts of Asia Tributary; wherefore we may very well believe, that they watered their Horses in his Rivers, and that he also was content to give them provender.

Psammiticus hearing of their progress (like the jealous Husband of a fair Wife) took care that they might not look upon Egypt, lest the sight thereof should more easily detain them there, than any force or perswasion that he could use would send them going. Therefore he met them in Syria, presuming more on the great gifts which he meant to bestow upon them, than on his Army that should keep them back. Egypt was rich and half the riches had not been ill spent in saving all. Yet Psammitticus took the most likely course, whereby to make his part good against them by strong hand in case they had been so obstinate as to refuse all indifferent composition. For he lay close upon the edge of the Wilderness in Gaza (as I take it) the Southermost border of Palestina: whence he never advanced to meet with the Scythians, but gave them leave to feel as much of the scalding Sun-beams, ill agreeing with their temper, as all the length of Syria could beat upon them. When they were come as far as Ascalon, the the next City to Gaza, then did he aſſay them with goodly words, accompanied with gifts, which were likely to work ſo much the better, by how much the worſe they were pleaſed with the heat of a Climate ſo far different from their own. Pſammiticus had at his back a vaſt wilderneſs, over the ſcorching ſands whereof, the Sythians more patient of cold and wet, than of the contrary diſtempers, could ill have endured to purſue him through unknown ways, had they fought with him and prevailed, eſpecially the Kingdom of Egypt being ready to entertain him with relief, and them with new trouble at the end of their weary journey. Wherefore they were content to be entreated, and taking in good part his courteous offers, returned back to viſit their acquaintance in the high Countries. The Egyptian King (beſides that he preſerved his own Eſtate from a dangerous adventure, by hireing this great Army to depart from him) found all his Coaſt well repayed in the proceſs of his War in Syria, where the Nations beyond Euphrates had no power to moleſt him, being more than ever troubled themſelves with their oppreſſors. For the Sythians, reſolving now to ſeek no further, began to demand more than the Tribute formerly impoſed. And not contented to fleece the Naturals with grievous exactions, they preſumed to live at diſcretion upon the Country, taking what they liſted from the owners; and many times (as it were to ſave the labour of taking often) taking all at once. This tyrannous Dominion they long uſed over the higher Aſia, that is over the Country lying between the Caſpian and Red Seas: and between India and Aſia the leſs. Happy it was for the poor people that in ſo large a ſpace of ground, there was room enough for theſe new comers, otherwiſe the calamity that fell, as it were by chance, upon thoſe private men, to whoſe wealth any Scythian did bear a fancy, would have lighted in general upon all at one clap, leaving few alive, and none able to relieve their fellows. Yet it ſeems that the heavieſt burthen lay upon Media; for it was a fruitful Country, not far from their own home, and lay under a Climate well agreeing with the conſtitution of their bodies, there alſo it was that they had the fatal blow, by which their inſolent Rule was taken from them.

Herod. lib. 1. Cyaxares King of the Medes, who in this extremity was no better than a Rent-gatherer for the Scythians, perceiving that his Land lay unmanured and waſte, through the negligence of his people, that were out of heart by daily oppreſſions, and that the matter could not be remedied by open force, reſolved to prove what might be done by ſtratagem. The managing of the buſineſs is thus delivered in brief; That he, and his Medes, feaſted the better part of the Scythians, made them drunk, and ſlew them; recovering hereby the poſſeſſion of all that they had loſt.

Such another ſlaughter was committed upon the Danes in England; but it was revenged by their Country men, with greater cruelty than ever they had practiſed before. That the Scythians which eſcaped this bloody feaſt made any ſtir in Media, I do not find; neither do I read that either in revenge hereof, or upon other pretence, the Medes were troubled by invaſion from Scythia in time following.

Herod. lib. 4. This is the more ſtrange, for that the Army returning home out of Media, was very ſtrong, and encountred with oppoſition (as Herodotus reports it) no leſs than it had found abroad. Wherefore it may be, that the device of Cyaxares to free his Country, took good effect, with leſs bloodſhed than hath been ſuppoſed. For if he ſurpriſed all the chief of them, it was no hard matter to make a good compoſition. Many of them doubtleſs in eight and twenty years had ſo well ſetled themſelves, that they were deſirous of reſt, and might be permitted, without any danger, to remain in the Country; many (of whom I ſhall ſpeak anon) having done what they could in the buſineſs, for which they came forth, were willing to return home with what they had gotten; ſuch as were not pleaſed with either of theſe two courſes, might go joyn with the Cimmerians in Lydia, or ſeek their fortunes in other Provinces among their own Companions. Whereas all the Families of the North are ſaid to have been with Nebuchadnezzar, it may be underſtood, that a great part of the Scythians, upon hope of gain, or deſire to keep what they had already gained, were content to become ſubject unto Nabulaſſar; mens love of their wealth being moſt effectual, in taming the more unquiet love of inordinate liberty. This is certain, that Nebuchadnezzar, as ever after, ſo in his firſt beginning of war, did beat the Egyptians, who in ages foregoing, had been accuſtomed to deal with the Babylonians after another faſhion: and this new ſucceſs of that King may be imputed, in regard of humane means, to ſuch addition as this of new forces. Jer. 35.9.

Of the Scythian Army returning out of Media, divers authors report a Story, which confirms me in the opinion, that this Company went forth to aſſiſt their kindred and friends, in acquiring a new ſeat, and ebliſhing their plantation. For theſe had left their wives behind them; a good argument to prove that they meant to come again. The Scythian women, to comfort themſelves in their husbands abſence, became bed-fellows to their ſlaves. Theſe got a luſty brood of youths, that were loth to be troubled with Fathers-in-law, and therefore prepared to fight with them at their return. If they were only the children of ſlaves, which compounded an Army (as Herodotus would have it, who tels us, that the Scythians were wont to pull out all their bond-mens eyes) it muſt needs be that they were very boys, or elſe that the Women did very little while continue chaſt. Wherefore I rather belie e that tale as it is told by the Ruſſes themſelves, who agreeing in the reſt with the conſent of Hiſtories, make that report of their Anceſtors returning homewards, which I will ſet down as I find it in Maſter Doctor Fletcher his exact diſcourſe of the Ruſs Common-wealth. They underſtood by the way, that their Chorolopey, or Bond-ſlaves, whom they left at home, had in their abſence poſſeſſed their Towns, lands, houſes, wives, and all; At which news being ſomewhat amazed, and yet diſdaining the Villany of their ſervants, they made the more haſt home, and ſo not far from Novograd met them in warlike manner marching againſt them. Whereupon adviſing what was beſt to be done, they agreed alſo to ſet upon them with no other ſhew of weapon but with their horſe-whips (which as their manner is, every man rideth with all) to put them in remembrance of their ſervile condition, thereby to terrifie them, and abate their courage. And ſo marching on, and laſhing altogether with their whips in their hands, they gave the onſet; which ſeemed ſo terrible in the ears of their Villains, and ſtrook ſuch a ſenſe into them of the ſmart of the whip, which they had felt before, that they fled altogether like Sheep before the Drivers. In memory of this victory, the Novogradians ever ſince have ſtamped their Coin (which they call Dingoe Novogradskoy, currant through all Ruſſia) with the figure of a horſe-man ſhaking a whip aloft in his hand. It may ſeem, that all the women of that Country have fared the worſe ever ſince, in regard of the univerſal fault: For ſuch a Pudkey or whip, as terrified thoſe ſlaves, curiouſly wrought by her ſelf, is the firſt preſent that the Muſcovian wife, even in time of wooing, ſends to him that ſhall be her husband, in token of ſubjection, being well aſſured to feel it often on her own loins. But this was a Document unto the Scythians, or rather Ruſ. Commonw. cap 4.

Sarmatians

Sarmatians (for Novograd ſtands in the Country that was called Sarmatia) to beware of abſenting themſelves any more ſo long from their wives; which after this, I find not that they did.

Thus much I thought good to ſet down of the Scythian expedition; not only becauſe it is the moſt memorable act performed abroad by that Nation, famous in Hiſtories, & terrible to many Countries; but for that it appears to have been a great cauſe of the Egyptians prevailing hitherto in Syria, & about Judæa, which continues yet a while the center of our diſcourſe.

SECT. V.

Of Princes living in divers Countries, in theſe Ages.

HAving thus far digreſſed from the matters of Juda, to avoid all further occaſion of doing the like, I will here inſert a note of ſuch Kings, & men of mark, as were between the death of Manaſſes, and the ruine of Jeruſalem. Of the Egyptians, Babylonians, Medes, & Lydians, I have ſpoken as much as I thought needful. In Rome, Tullus Hoſtilius held the Kingdom until the one & twentieth year of Joſias; at which time Ancus Martius ſucceding, reigned four and twenty years. After him L. Tarquinius Priſcus, a new come ſtranger, but very rich, prevailed ſo far by his graciouſneſs among the people that he got the Kingdom to himſelf, diſappointing the ſons of Ancus, over whom he was Tutor. He began in the fourth year of Zedekia, and reigned eight and thirty years. In this time it was, namely, in the ſecond year of the thirtieth Olympiad, that the Lacedæmonians bethinking them how to be avenged of the Arcadians, who gave ſuccour to the Meſſenians againſt them in the former war, entred their Territory, took the City of Phigalia or Phialia, from whence their Garriſons were ſoon after beaten out. Cypſelus expelling the race of the Bacidæ, made himſelf Lord of Corinth about theſe times, and governed it in peace thirty years; leaving for ſucceſſor his ſon Periander, one of the ſeven Sages, but a cruel Tyrant: who among other vile acts, ſlew his own wife, and afterwards, as in her honour, ſtripped all the Corinthian women ſtark naked, burning their apparel, as an acceptable offering to her Ghoſt. Hereby we may perceive, that the wiſdom of the Greeks was not excellent in thoſe days, when ſuch a one as this could be admired as excelling all the Country.

In theſe times alſo were Zaleucus and Draco, famous law-givers, the one among the Locrians in Italy, the other in the City of Athens. The laws of Draco were ſo rigorous, that he was ſaid to have written them with blood: for he rewarded every ſmall offence with death. Wherefore his Conſtitutions were ſoon abrogated, and power given to Solon by the Athenians, to make new in their ſtead. But the laws of Zaleucus were very mild. He forbad any Gentlewoman to walk abroad with more than one Bond-woman attending on her, unleſs it were when ſhe was drunk; or to go forth of the Town by night, unleſs it were to ſome ſweet-hearts bed; or to dreſs her ſelf up in immodeſt bravery, unleſs it were to inveigle a lover. By which pleaſant Ordinances he effected his deſire, for none would ſeem, in breaking the Statutes, to be in ſuch caſe as challenged the diſpenſation. It is noted in this man as a ſingular example of juſtice, that when his own Son had committed Adultery, and was therefore to loſe both his eyes, he did not cauſe him to be pardoned, but gave one eye of his own to ſave the young man (who alſo loſt one) from utter blindneſs.

I ſhall not therefore need ſo far to wander, as hitherto I often have done, in purſuing of actions collateral to the Hiſtory, for inſerting them in their order of time. The Chaldeans will ſoon fall under the Perſians; ere long, encounter with the Greeks; the Greeks, with the Romans; the Romans, with many Nations. Concerning all theſe, as they ſhall ſucceſſively preſent themſelves, in their flouriſhing Eſtate, it will be enough to recapitulate the moſt memorable accidents, that befell them in their Minority. But in the long ſpace of more than thirteen hundred years, which paſſed between the calling of Abraham, and the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, we find little matter, wherein the Hiſtory of Iſrael had any dealing with other Nations, than the very neareſt borderers. Yet read we of many Kingdoms, that in theſe many ages were erected and thrown down; as likewiſe many memorable acts were performed in Greece and elſe-where, though not following one another at any near diſtance; all which muſt have been quite omitted, or elſe reſerved unto a very unſeaſonable rehearſal, had they not been diſpoſed in this method, whereof he that will not allow the conveniency, may pardon the neceſſity.

The oppreſſion of Judea, and deſtruction of Jeruſalem by the Chaldeans.

NOw to return to the Jewiſh Story, from whence we have ſo far digreſſed. In the third year of Jehojakim, Nabuchodonoſor the ſecond, his Father yet living, entred Judea with a great Army, who beſieging and forcing Jeruſalem, made Jehojakim his vaſſal in deſpight of Necho, that had eſtabliſhed him King, and took with him for pledges Daniel, being as yet a child, with Ananias, Miſael, and Azarias. Alſo he took a part of the Church treaſures; but ſtayed not to ſearch them throughly; for Necho haſtened to the ſuccour of Jehojakim, hoping to find Nabuchodonoſor in Judea: wherein this great Babylonian had no diſpoſition to hazard himſelf and his Army, it being a Country of an evil affection towards him, as alſo far off from any ſuccour or ſure place of retrait. If he had, as may be ſuppoſed, any great ſtrength of Scythian horſe-men in his Army, it was the more wiſely done of him, to fall back, out of the rough, mountainous, and over-hot Country, into places that were more even and temperate. But beſides all theſe reaſons, the death of his father happening at the ſame time, gave him juſt occaſion to return home, and take poſſeſſion of his own Kingdom, before he proceeded further in the ſecond care, of adding more unto it. This he did at reaſonable good leiſure: for the Egyptian was not ready to follow him ſo far, and to bid him battel, until the new year came in; which was the fourth of Jehojakim, the firſt of Nabuchodonoſor, and the laſt of Necho. In this year the Babylonian lying upon the Bank Euphrates (his own territory bounding it on the North-ſide) attending the arrival of Necho. There, after a reſolved contention for victory, Necho was ſlain, and his Army remaining forced to ſave it ſelf; which full ill it did, by a violent retrait. This victory Nabuchodonoſor ſo well purſued, as he recovered all Syria, and whatſoevet the Egyptians held out of their proper Territory towards the North. The Egyptians being in this conflict beaten, and altogether for the preſent diſcouraged, Jehojakim held himſelf quiet, as being friend in heart unto the Egyptians, yet having made his peace with the Chaldeans the year before; who contented with ſuch profit as he could then readily make, had forborn to lay any Tribute upon Juda. But this cool reſervedneſs of Jehojakim, was, on both ſides, taken in ill part. The Egyptian King Pſammis, who ſucceeded unto Necho, began to think upon reſtoring Jehoahaz, taken priſoner by his Father, and ſetting him up as a Domeſtical Enemy, againſt his ungratefull brother. Againſt all ſuch accidents, the 2 Chro 36. 9. Judeam had prepared the uſual remedy practized by his forefathers: for he made his own ſon Jechonia King with him long before, in the ſecond year of his own Reign, when the Boy was but eight years old. As for this rumour of Jehoahaz his return, the Prophet Jeremy foretold, that it ſhould prove idle, ſaying: He Jer. 22. 11. & 12. ſhall not return thither, but ſhall die in the place whither they had led him captive, and ſhall ſee this land no more. The Egyptians indeed, having ſpent all their Mercenary forces, and received that heavy blow at Carchemiſh, had not remaining ſuch proportion of ſharp ſteel, as of fair gold, which without other help, is of little effect. The valour of Necho was not in Pſammis Apres, who reigning after Pſammis, did once adventure to ſhew his face in Syria; but after a big look, he was glad to retire, without adventuring the hazard of a battel. Wherefore this decaying Nation fought only with brave words, telling ſuch frivolous tales, as men that mean to do nothing, uſe, of their glorious acts fore-paſſed, againſt Joſias and Jehoahaz. In this caſe it was eaſie for Jehojakim to give them ſatisfaction, by letting them underſtand the ſincerity of his affection towards them, which appeared in time following. But Nabuchodonoſor went to work more roundly. He Joſeph. Antiq. lib. 10 cap. 7. ſent a peremptory meſſage to Jehojakim, willing him not to ſtand upon any nice points, but acknowledge himſelf a Subject, and pay him Tribute: adding hereunto ſuch fearful threats, as made the poor Judean lay aſide all thoughts of Pharaoh, and yield to do, as the more mighty would have him. So he continued in the obedience of Nabuchodonoſor three years. At this time Jeremy the Prophet cried out againſt the Jews, putting them in mind that he had now three and twenty years exhorted them to repentance, but becauſe they had ſtopt their ears againſt him, and the reſt of the Prophets, he now pronounced their captivity at hand, and that he ſhould endure the yoke of bondage full ſeventy years. The ſame calamity he threatned to all the neighbouring Nations, to the Egyptians, Moabites, Ammonites, Idumeans, and the reſt; foretelling that they ſhould all drink out of the Babylonian Pitcher, the wine of his fury whom they had forſaken; and after the ſeventy years expired, that the Babylonians themſelves ſhould taſte of the ſame Cup, and be utterly ſubverted by the Medes, and the Judeans permitted to return again into their own Fields and Cities. The firſt impriſonment of the Prophet Jeremy ſeems Jerem. 25. to have been in the fourth year of this Jehojakim, at which time Baruch the Scribe wrote all his Prophecies out of his mouth, whom he ſent to read them unto the people; and afterwards unto the Princes, who offered them to the King: but fearing the Kings fury, they had firſt ſet Jeremy at liberty, and adviſed him and Baruch to hide themſelves.

Jehojakim, after he heard a part of it, and perceived the ill news therein delivered, made no more adoe, but did cut the Book in pieces and caſt it into the fire. All which Jeremy cauſed to be new written with this addition; that the dead body of Jehojakim ſhould be caſt out, expoſed in the day to the heat, and in the night to the froſt, and there ſhould be none of his ſeed to ſit on the Throne of David.

Time thus running on, while Jehojakim reſted ſecure of all danger, as Tributary to the Babylonian, yet well thought of by the Egyptian; the mighty City of Tyre oppoſed it ſelf againſt the Chaldean forces, and upon juſt confidence of her own ſtrength, deſpiſed all preparation that could be made againſt her. Now forasmuch as the terme of ſeventy years were preſcribed unto the deſolation, as well of Tyre, as of Jeruſalem, and other Towns and Countries; it is apparent, that they which referre the expugnation of this City unto the nineteenth year of Nabuchodonoſor, have ſure authority for their warrant. Whereupon likewiſe it follows of neceſſity, that the ſiege thereof began in the ſeventh of his Reign, as having laſted thirteen years.

Here I will take leave to intrude a brief note, concerning the ſeveral beginnings of this great Prince his Rule, whereupon hath riſen much diſputation. The third year of Jehojakim was the laſt of Nabulaſſar, who being delivered from other cares, took notice of ſuch as had revolted from him unto Pharaoh Necho, and ſent this Noble Prince his Son, with an Army into Syria, to reclaim them. In this expedition was Daniel carried away, who therefore makes mention of the ſame year. The year next following, being the fourth of Jehojakim, was the firſt of Nebuchadnezzar; Dan. 1. 1. which Jeremy affirmeth in expreſſe words; and from Jer. 25. 1. this we reckon all his time and actions that follow. In his three and twentieth year he conquered Egypt; and then began to reign as a great Monarch, finding none that durſt offend him. The ſecond from this year it was, wherein he ſaw that viſion, of the Image conſiſting of ſundry Metals; which did prefigurate the ſucceſſion of great Kingdoms, that ſhould rule the Earth before the coming of Chriſt. I will not ſtand to diſpute about this, which is the beſt concluſion that I find, of long diſputations: but return unto the ſiege of Tyre, which began in the ſeventh of his Reign.

The City of Tyre covered all the ground of an Iſland, that was divided from the main, by a deep and broad channel of the Sea. The Chaldeans had no Fleet, and were no Sea-men; the Tyrians, in multitude of goodly Ships, and skill to uſe them, excelled all other Nations; and every wind, from one part or other, brought needfull proviſions into the City. Wherefore neither force, nor famine could greatly hurt the place; whereof nevertheleſs the judgments of God (denounced againſt it by Eſay, Jeremy, and Ezekiel) Eſay 23. Jerem 25. Ezek. 26. had threatned the deſtruction; and the obſtinate reſolution of Nabuchodonoſor had fully determined to perform it. This high minded King, impatient of reſiſtance, undertook a vaſt peice of work, even to fill up the Sea that parted the Iſland from the Continent. The City of old Tyrus that ſtood oppoſite to the new, upon the firm Land, and the Mountain of Lybanus neer adjoyning, that loaden with Cedars, and abundance of other trees, might furniſh him with Materials. Thirteen years were ſpent in this laborious, and almoſt hopeleſs buſineſs. Which need not ſeem ſtrang: for Alexander working upon that foundation which was remaining of Nabuchodonoſor's Peere, and being withal aſſiſted with a ſtrong Fleet, was yet ſeven moneths ere he could make way into the City. Wherefore if the raging of the Sea was able to carry away that wherewith Alexander laboured to cover a ſhelve; with much more violence could it overturn, and as it were conſume, the work of Nabuchodonoſor, who laid his foundations in the bottom of the deep; ſtriving as it were to fill the empty belly of this Cormorant, whereas the Macedonian did only ſtop the throat of it. Every man knows, God could have furthered this accompliſhment of his own threats, againſt this place (though it had not pleaſed him to uſe either Miracle, or ſuch of his more immediate weapons, as are Earthquakes, and the like) by making at leaſt the Seas calm, and adding the favourable concurrence of all ſecond helps. But ſo it pleaſeth him oftentimes, in chaſtiſing the pride of man, to uſe the hand of man; even the hand of man ſtriving, as may ſeem, againſt all reſiſtance of nature and fortune. So in this exceſſive labour of the Chaldeans, Every head was made bald, and every ſhoulder was made bare. Yet Nabuchodonoſor would not give over till he was maſter of the Ezek. 29. Town.

When he was entred upon this deſperate ſervice; whether whether it were ſo, that ſome loſſes received, ſome mutiny in his Army, or (which is moſt likely, and ſo Joſephus reports it) ſome glorious rumour of the Egyptians, gave courage to his evil willers; Jehojakim renounced his ſubjection, and began to hope for the contrary of that which quickly fell out. For Nabuchodonoſor gave him no leiſure to do much hurt: but with part of his Army marched directly into Judea, where the amazed King made ſo little reſiſtance (the Egyptians having left him, as it were, in a dream) that he entred Jeruſalem, and laid hands on Jehojakim, whom he firſt bound and determined to ſend to Babylon, but changing counſel, he cauſed him to be ſlain in the place, and gave him the ſepulchre of an Aſſe, to be devoured by beaſts and ravenous birds, according to the former Prophecies: leaving in his Place Jehojakim or Jechonias his ſon; whom after three months and ten dayes Nabuchodonoſor removed, and ſent priſoner to Babylon, with Ezekiel, Mardocheus, and Joſedech, the high Prieſt. The mother of Jechonias, together with his ſervants Eunuches, and all the ableſt men, and beſt Artificers of the land, were alſo carried away Captives. This Jechonias, following the counſel of Jeremy the Prophet, made no reſiſtance; but ſubmitted himſelf to the Kings will: wherein he both pleaſed God, and did that which was beſt for himſelf; though at the preſent it might ſeem otherwiſe, to ſuch as conſidered the evil that befell him, rather than the greater evil that he thereby avoided. This only particular act of his is recorded, which was good. But it ſeems that he was partaker, at leaſt of his Fathers faults, if not an Inſtigator, which was the cauſe, that his ſubmitting himſelf to Gods pleaſure did not preſerve his Eſtate: for ſo we read in general words, that he did evil in the ſight of the Lord, according to all that his Father had done. In his ſtead Nabuchodonoſor eſtabliſhed Mathania his Uncle in the Kingdom of Juda, and called him Zedechias, which is as much to ſay, as the juſtice of God. For like as Necho King of Egypt had formerly diſplaced Jehoahaz, after his Father Joſias was ſlain, and ſet up Jehojakim, the ſon of another mother, ſo Nabuchodonoſor ſlew Jehojakim, who depended on the Egyptians, and carrying his ſon Jechonias Priſoner to Babel, gave the Kingdom to this Zedechias, that was whole Brother to that Jehoahaz, whom Necho took with him into Egypt. From Zedechias he required an oath for his faithfull obedience, which Zedechias gave him, and called the living God to witneſs in the ſame, that he would remain aſſured to the Kings of Chaldea.

Joſeph. Antiq. Jud. l. 10. c. 7.

In the firſt year of Zedechias, Jeremy ſaw and expounded the viſion of the ripe and rotten Grapes, the one ſignifying thoſe Judeans that were carried away captive, the other thoſe that ſtayed and were deſtroyed.

In the fourth of Zedechias, Jeremy wrote in a book all the evil that ſhould fall upon Babylon, which book or ſcrole he gave to Sheraiah, when he went with the King Zedechias to Babylon, to viſit Nabuchodonoſor; willing him firſt to read it to the Captive Jewes; and then to bind it to a ſtone, and caſt it into Euphrates, pronouncing theſe words: Thus ſhall Babel be drowned, and ſhall not riſe from the evil that I will bring upon her. This journy of Zedechias to Babel is probably thought to have been in a way of viſitation, carrying ſome preſents. But I further think, that he had ſome ſute there to make, which his Lordly Maſter refuſed for to grant, and ſent him away diſcontented. For at his return all the bordering Princes ſent Meſſengers to him, inciting him (as it ſeems) to thoſe unquiet courſes, from which Jeremy dehorted both him and them. The Prophet, by Gods appointment, made bonds and yokes, one of which he wore about his own neck, others he ſent to the five Kings, of Edom, Moab, Ammon, Tyre, and Zidon, by thoſe Meſſengers which came to viſit Zedechias: making them know, that if they and the Kings of Juda, abode in the obedience of Babylon, they ſhould then poſſeſſe and enjoy their own Countries; if not, they ſhould aſſuredly periſh by the ſword, by fire and peſtilence.

He alſo foretold them, that thoſe Veſſels which as yet remained in Jeruſalem, ſhould alſo travel after the reſt, and at length they ſhould be reſtored again.

The ſame year Ananias, the falſe Prophet, took off the woodden Chain, which Jeremy wore in ſign of the Captivity of the Jews, and brake it, vaunting, that in like manner, after two years God would break the ſtrength of Babel, and the yoke that he laid on all Nations; reſtore Jechonias and all the Jews, with the Veſſels and riches of the Temple, and give an end to all theſe troubles. But Jeremy, inſtead of his woodden yoke, wore a Coller of iron: and in ſign that Ananias had given a deceitful and falſe hope to the people, he foretold the death of this cold Prophet, which ſeized upon him in the ſecond Month. After this, when Zedechias had wavered long enough between Faith and Paſſion, in the eighth year of his reign, he practiſed more ſeriouſly againſt Nabuchodonoſor, with his Neighbours the Edomites, Ammonites, Moabites, Tyrians, and others that were promiſed great aydes of the Egyptians: in confidence of whoſe aſſiſtance, he determined to ſhake off the Babylonian yoke. Hereof when Nabuchodonoſor had knowledge, he marched with his Army in the dead of the winter, toward Jeruſalem, and beſieged it. Jeremy perſwaded Zedechias to render the City and himſelf: but being confident of the help from Egypt, and being perſwaded by his Counſellors and falſe Prophets, that it was impoſſible that the Kingdom of Juda ſhould be extirpate, untill the coming of Silo (according to the Prophecy of Jacob) he deſpiſed the words of Jeremy, and impriſoned him. For Jeremy had told the King that the City ſhould be taken and burnt; that the King ſhould not eſcape, but be taken priſoner, and brought to the preſence of Nabuchodonoſor; that he ſhould not periſh by the ſword, but being carried to Babel, die his natural death.

Gen. 49. 10 Jer. 32. & 34.

Jeruſalem being the following year ſurrounded by Nabuchodonoſors Army; the King of Egypt, Pharao Hophra, according to Jeremy, (Herodotus calleth him Apries) entred the border of Juda with his Army to ſuccour Zedechias, of whoſe revolt he had been the principal Author. But Jeremy gave the Jews faithfull counſel, willing them not to have truſt in the ſuccour of Egypt: for he aſſured them that they ſhould return again, and in no ſort relieve them. And it fell out accordingly. For when the Chaldeans removed from Jeruſalem to encounter the Egyptians, theſe vaunting Patrons abandoned their enterpriſe, and taking Gaza in their way homeward, returned into Egypt, as if they had already done enough, leaving the poor people of Jeruſalem to their deſtined miſeries.

Jer. 44. Herod. lib. 2.

In the mean while the Jews, who in their firſt extremity had manumiſed their Hebrew Bond-men (as Gods law required at the year of Jubilee) and made them free, thereby the better to encourage them to fight; did now upon the breaking up of the Chaldean Army, repent them of their Charity: and thinking all had been at an end, held them perforce to their former ſlavery. But the Chaldees being returned to the ſiege, the Prophet Jeremy, when the ſtate of Jeruſalem began now to grow to extremity, counſelled Zedechias to render himſelf unto them; aſſuring him of his own life, and the ſafety of the City, if he would do ſo. But his obſtinate heart conducted him to that wretched end, which his neglect of God, and his infidelity and perjury, had provided for him.

Jos. Ant. Jud. lib. 10 c. 11. als. Josephus reports, that they overtopped the walls with high Towers raised upon Mounts; from which they did so beat upon the wall with their Engines, that the Defendants were compelled to forsake their Stations. Now although it were so that the besieged also raised Counter-buildings, like unto these, yet the great King of Babel, who commanded all the Regions there-abouts, and had the Woods and Rivers to obey him, found means to overthrow all the Citizens endeavours: and to beat down as fast from without, as they raised from within; the body and foundation of his own works being guarded by the walls of Jerusalem interposed; and theirs within, laid open to their enemies disturbance. Besides, both Famine and Pestilence (which commonly accompany men straitly besieged) grew on fast upon them, whereby, when the number, strength, and courage of the Jews failed, the Chaldeans made a breach, and forcing an entry, their Princes did seat themselves, as Lords of the Town, in the middle gate. Zedechias beholding this uncomfortable sight, and finding no remedy of the danger present, lost both his courage and his hopes at once; and shifted himself, together with his Wives, Children, Princes, and principal servants, out of the City, by a way under ground; leaving his amazed and guideless people to the merciless swords of their enemies. Thus he, who, when Jeremy the Prophet perswaded him to render himself, despised both the counsel of God, and the force of Nabuchodonosor, used now that remedy, which Wolphius truly termeth, Triste, turpe, & infœlix: Woefull, shamefull, and unfortunate.

By this secret subterrane vault, Zedechias making his stealth, recovered (by the help of the dark night) the Plains or Desarts of Jericho: but by reason of the train that followed him and his, (every one leading with him those whom they held most dear unto them) he was easily traced and pursued. How great soever the company was that attended on him, yet as Josephus reports it, they, on whose fidelity he most reposed himself, no sooner beheld the Chaldeans approach, but they all abandoned his defence, and shifted themselves into the Desarts, as they could. For whom God had forsaken, no man followed, but the ministers of his vengeance; by whom Zedechias was made Prisoner, with his Children and Princes: he was conveyed to Rebla or Reblath, a City (as some think) of Nepthalim, where Nabuchodonosor then lay, as a place indifferent between Jerusalem & Tyre, with both which at once he had to do.

Now after Nabuchodonosor had laid before Zedechias the many graces and benefits conferred upon him, together with the notable falshood and perjury, wherewith he had requited them; he commanded his Children, Princes and Friends to be slain before his face. This being done, to the end that so lamentable a spectacle should be the last that ever he should behold in the world, he caused his eyes to be torn out of his head and so carried him in a slavish manner to Babel, where he consumed the rest of his wretched life in perpetual imprisonment. Herein this most marvellous Prophecy Ezek. 12. of Ezechiel was performed, Adducam eam in Babyloniam, & ipsam non videbit: I will bring him into Babylon, and he shall not see it.

Thus in the eleventh and last year of Zedechias, which was the eighteenth of Nabuchodonosor the Chaldeans entred the City by force, where sparing no sex nor age, they committed all to the sword that they therein found.

In the next year following, Nabuzaradan General 3534. of the Army burnt the Kings Palace, and the rest of Jerusalem: and after this fire had lasted from the seventh to the tenth day, he also burnt the Temple of God to the Ground, when it had stood four hundred thirty and one years.

After this upon a second search, Nabuzaradan (not 2 Kin. 25. yet satiated with blood) commanded seventy and two others to be slaughtered, which had hidden themselves from the first fury, to wit, the chief, and the second Priest, two Commanders of Zedechias his men of war, five of his houshold servants, and others to that number; carrying away to Babylon the ablest of the people throughout all Judea; and leaving the poorest labouring souls, with some that followed the party of Nabuchodonosor, to till the ground over whom he left Governour, Godoliah the Nephew of that Saphan, whom Josias had formerly employed in the reformation of Religion, who is, for his justice and equity, by Josephus highly commended. This man, a Jew by Nation, left Zedechias, as it seemeth in the beginning of the war: and by Jeremies desire to live with him, it appeareth that he had embraced the same advice which the Prophet gave unto Zedechias; which was to submit himself altogether to the Babylonian; who being ordained by God to excercise his justice, was therefore resistless. The Prophet Jeremy being left to his own choice, either to live in Chaldea, or elsewhere, he made election of Godoliah, to whom he was recommended; who not only embraced Jeremy, but gave comfort to all the other Jews that were left under his charge, promising them favour and liberty, so long as they remained obedient subjects to Nabuchodonosor, by whom he was established Provincial Governour of his own Nation.

But ere that year was expired, a Prince of the late Kings house (who during the siege of Jerusalem, had kept himself out of the storm, with Baalis King of the Ammonites) being followed by ten other chosen men, while Godoliah feasted them in Maspha or Mitspa, the City of his residence, traiterously slew him, together with divers Chaldeans and Jews that accompanied him. This done, he made an escape, and in his way encountering with eighty persons, repairing towards Godolia with presents, he slew the most part of them, and spared the rest, because they promised to discover unto him some Treasures hidden in the fields during the war. He also took with him a Daughter of Zedechias, committed to the care of Godoliah by Nabuchodonosor. This practice and intent of Ismael had been formerly discovered to Godoliah by Johanan, one of the leaders of the few remaining Jews; but Godoliah was incredulous.

Judea being now left without a Governor (for Ismael durst not take it upon him, but retired himself, or rather fled as fast as he could to the Ammonites) the residue of the Jews, fearing the revenge of the Chaldeans, resolved to fly away into Egypt, and besought Jeremy to ask counsel of God for them: who readily made them answer, that if they remained in Judea, God would provide for them, and shew them mercy; but if they sought to save themselves in Egypt, that they should then undoubtedly perish. Notwithstanding this advice, the Jews held their determination, and despising the Oracle of God, and constraining Jeremy and Baruch to accompany them, they travelled into Egypt, and inhabited by the permission of Pharao, neer unto Taphnes: where when Jeremy often reprehended them for their Idolatry, foretelling both the destruction of themselves, and the Egyptians also, he was by these his own hardhearted and ungrateful Countrymen stoned to death; and by the Egyptians, who greatly reverenced him, buried neer the Sepulcher of their own Kings.

SECT. I.

Of the Connexion of Sacred and Prophane Hiſtory.

THE courſe of time, which in prophane Hiſtories might rather be diſcerned through the greateſt part of its way hitherto paſſed, in ſome out-worn foot-ſteps, than in any beaten path, having once in Greece by the Olympiads, and in the Eaſtern Countries by the accompt from Nabonaſſar, left ſurer marks, and more appliable to actions concurrent, than were the War of Troy, or any other token of former date; begins at length in the ruin of Jeruſalem, to diſcover the connexion of antiquity fore-ſpent, with the ſtory of ſucceeding Ages. Manifeſt it is, that the original and progreſs of things could ill be ſought in thoſe that were ignorant of the firſt Creation: as likewiſe that the affairs of Kingdoms and Empires afterwards grown up, are not to be found among thoſe that have now no ſtate nor policy remaining of their own. Having therefore purſued the Hiſtory of the World unto that age, from whence the memory of ſucceeding accidents is with little interruption of fabulous diſcourſe derived unto us: I hold it now convenient, briefly to ſhew, by what means and circumſtances the Hiſtory of the Hebrews, which of all other is the moſt ancient, may be conjoined with the following times, wherein that Image of ſundry metals diſcovered by God unto Nebuchadnezzar, did reign over the earth, when Iſrael was either none, or an unregarded Nation.

Herein I do not hold it needful to inſiſt upon thoſe authorities which give, as it were by hear-ſay, a certain year of ſome old Aſſyrian King unto ſome action or event, whereof the time is found expreſſed in Scripture: for together with the end of Ninus his line in Sardanapulas, if not before, all such computations were blotted out; the succession of Belochus and his Issue that occupied the Kingdom afterwards, depending upon the uncertain relations of such as were neither constant in assigning the years of his beginning, nor of credit enough for others to relye upon. Let it therefore suffice, that the consent and harmony which some have found in the years of those over-worn Monarchs, doth preserve their names, which otherwise might have been forgotten. Now concerning the latter Kings of that Nation, howsoever it be true, that we find the names of all, or most of them in Scriptures, which are recorded by Prophane Historians; yet hereby could we only learn in what Age each of them lived, but not in what year his reign began or ended, were it not that the reign of Nebuchadnezzar is more precisely applied to the times of Jehojakim and Zedekias. Hence have we the first light whereby to discover the means of connecting the Sacred and Prophane Histories. For under Nebuchadnezzar was the beginning of the Captivity of Judah, which ended when seventy years were expired; and these seventy years took end at the first of Cyrus, whose time being well known, affords us means of looking back into the Ages past, and forwards into the race of men succeeding. The first year of Cyrus his reign in Persia, by general consent, is joined with the first year of the 55 Olympiad; where, that he reigned three and twenty years before his Monarchy, and seven years afterwards, it is apparent, and almost out of controversie. Giving therefore four hundred and eight years unto the distance between the fall of Troy, and the instauration of the Olympiad by Iphitus; we may easily arrive unto those antiquities of Greece, which were not meerly fabulous. As for Princes ruling the whilst in sundry parts of the World, St. Augustine and others may be trusted in setting down their times, which they had by Tradition from Authors of well-approved faith and industry.

From Cyrus forwards, how the times are reckoned unto Alexander, and from him to the battel of Actium, it were (peradventure) in this place impertinent to set down. But seeing that the beginning and end of the Babylonian Captivity, are marks whereby we are chiefly directed, in passing from the first unto the latest years of the World through any story, with least interruption; it is very expedient that we take some pains to inform our selves truly of the Seventy years during which it continued, even from Nebuchadnezzar unto Cyrus.

SECT. II.

A brief rehearsal of two Opinions touching the beginning of the Captivity: with an answer to the cavils of Porphyrie, inveighing against St. Matthew and Daniel, upon whom the latter of these Opinions is founded.

MAny Commentators, and other Historians and Chronologers find, that the Captivity then began, when Jechonia was carried prisoner into Babylon, eleven years before the final destruction of Jerusalem under Zedekias. This they prove out of divers places in Ezekiel, especially out of the fourteenth Chapter, where he makes a plain distinction between the beginning of the Captivity, and utter destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuzaradan, in these words; In the five and twentieth year of our being in Captivity, in the beginning of the year, in the tenth day of the month, in the fourteenth year after that the City was smitten. In which words he beginneth the Captivity in plain terms, eleven years before the City was destroyed. Beroaldus is of opinion, that it began in the first of Nabuchodonosor, and the fourth of Joakim; which he endeavours to prove out of the second of Chronicles, but more especially out of St. Matthew, and Daniel, whose words afford matter of disputation, but serve not to make good so much as Beroaldus would enforce. That place of St. Matthew, and the whole Book of Daniel, have ministred occasion of scoffing and railing at the Christian Religion to that wretched man Porphyrie, who not understanding how the Sons of King Josias were called by divers names, as Epiphanius hath shewed at large, thought that the Apostle had spoken he knew not what, in reckoning the Sons, or according to some Translations, the Son, and Nephews of that good King, begotten about the time of the Captivity. Upon Daniel also the same Porphyrie doth spend the twelfth of his malicious Books written against the Christians; affirming, that these Prophesies and Visions, remembred by Daniel, were written long after his death, and at, or near the time of Antiochus Epiphanes. This fond supposition of his, Eusebius, Apollonius, and others, have sufficiently answered. For the Seventy Interpreters, who converted the Old Testament about an hundred years before Epiphanes, did also turn this Book out of Hebrew into Greek, as a part of Scripture received. And were there no other argument to confound Porphyrie, than that of Alexander Macedon, it were sufficient, who lived divers years before Antiochus Epiphanes. For Jaddus the High Priest shewed that great Conquerour, when he came towards Jerusalem to have destroyed it, this Book of Daniel, wherein he beheld his own glory foretold, as the same was plainly expounded unto him; which not only stayed his hand from the harm of that City and people; but his assurance and resolution was so confirmed and strengthened thereby, as despising all future peril and resistance, he conquered Darius, and the Eastern Empire, in a shorter time than Nabuchodonosor had done one City, to wit, Tyre in Phœnicia.

Ezek. c. 1. v. 2. & c. 3. v. 11. & c. 5.

1 Mac. 1. 11. Joseph. ant. 11.

It is true indeed, that the Jews themselves give less authority to Daniel, than to Moses and the Prophets; accompting his Book among those which they call Cetaphim, or Hagiographa, or holy Writings, which they say Esdras, and the Seniors of the Synagogue compiled after their return from Babylon. But first, that the Book of Daniel (I mean so much as is found in the Hebrew) is Canonical; secondly, that it was written by Daniel himself, and not by Esdras and the Seniors; we may assure our selves by testimony of Councils and Fathers. For in the Council of Laodicea, held about the year of our Lord 368, after the death of Jovinian the Emperour; and after the Nicene Council three and forty years, this Book of Daniel was received, verified and confirmed among the other Canonical Scriptures, as in the Epitomy of the same Council it may be seen; and so doth Meliton the most ancient Bishop of Sardis number it, witness Eusebius in his Ecclesiastical History, the fourth Book, and five and twentieth Chapter: so doth the same Author in the Catalogue of Canonical Books upon Origen: so doth Hilarius in his Preface upon the Psalms, and Epiphanius in his Book of Weights and Measures, &c. To these I may add St. Hierom,

Gregory

Gregory Nazianzene, and others. For, the Hagiographa-Books, or holy Writings, the Jews and Rabbins reckon to be these, Daniel, Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Canticles, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Hester, Esra, Nehemiah, and the Chronicles. And that it was Daniel, and not Esdras, that wrote this Book, Gods commandment unto him by his Angel, to seal up the same to the time appointed, is an unanswerable testimony. Yea, that which exceedeth all strength of other proof, our Saviour Christ, who citeth no Apocryphal Scripture, in Matthew and Mark alledgeth Daniel the Prophet, to wit, the last verse of his ninth Chapter. Further, in the fifth of John, Christ distributeth the risen from the dead, as in Dan. 12. 2. St. Paul describeth Antichrist, out of Daniel; and the Revelation is wholly an interpretation of Daniels Visions.

SECT. III.

That the seventy years of Captivity are to be numbred from the destruction of Jerusalem; not from the migration of Jechoniah.

HAving thus far digressed in maintaining that authority which must often be cited in the present argument: it is now convenient that we return unto the differences of opinion concerning the beginning of these seventy years. Neither will I stand to trouble my self and others with laying open the grounds or weakness of that which Eusebius, and some few nameless Authors, have sometimes held in this point, which is lately revived by Beroaldus; but will forthwith enter into consideration of that opinion, which many, both ancient and late Writers, have so earnestly maintained, that it wants not much of being common.

Four Kings of Juda were carried away Captives to Babylon: First, Manasses; then Jehojakim, and with him among others, Daniel the Prophet: Thirdly, Jechonias, and with him Ezekiel: Lastly, Zedechias, at which time the City and Temple were destroyed. To the first of these Captivities, the beginning of the seventy years is referred by none that I have read; to the second, by few, and with weak proof; to the third, by very many, and with much confidence. For besides those places of Ezekiel already cited, there is a strong argument gathered out of Jeremy, which may seem to make the matter plain. For the Prophet, in comforting the people that were carried away with Jechonias, useth these words: Thus saith the Lord, After seventy years be accomplished at Babel, I will visit you, and perform my good promise towards you, and cause you to return to this place.

Jer. 29. 10.

But it stands indeed with little reason, that we should seek the interpretation of a Prophecy out of circumstances, when the Prophecy is such as doth sufficiently expound it self. Jeremy hath already, in the fourth year of Jehojakim, denounced the judgment of God against the Land, for the sins and impenitency of that obstinate people, in these words: Behold, I will send, and take to me all the families of the North, saith the Lord, and Nebuchadnezzar the King of Babel, my servant; and will bring them against this Land, and against the Inhabitants thereof, and against all these Nations round about; and I will destroy them, and make them an astonishment, and an hissing, and a continual desolation. Moreover, I will take from them the voice of mirth, and the voice of gladness; the voice of the Bridegroom, and the voice of the Bride; the noise of the mill-stones, and the light of the candle; and this whole Land shall be desolate, and an astonishment, and these Nations shall serve the King of Babel seventy years. And when seventy years are expired, I will visit the King of Babel. Here we see prescribed unto the Captivity the term of seventy years: which were to commence, neither when the Prophecy was uttered; nor when Jehojakim, who then reigned, was taken by Nebuchadnezzar; nor yet in the time of Jechonia: but with the utter desolation of the City; whereof Jeremy did again give notice to those that were already in Babylon, at such time as he sent them the comfort of deliverance before rehearsed. And so did the people understand this Prophecy, in those times when they saw it accomplished; beginning the seventy years at the time of the desolation, as manifestly appears in the end of the History of Judah, where it is said thus: They burnt the House of God, and brake down the wall of Jerusalem, and burnt all the Palaces thereof with fire, and all the precious vessels thereof to destroy all: and they that were left by the sword, carried he away to Babel, and they were servants to him, and to his sons, until the Kingdom of the Persians had rule, to fulfill the Word of the Lord by the mouth of Jeremiah, until the Land had her fill of her Sabbaths: for all the days that she lay desolate, she kept Sabbath, to fulfill seventy years. But in the first year of Cyrus King of Persia (when the Word of the Lord spoken by the mouth of Jeremiah, was finished) the Lord stirred up the spirit of Cyrus. We seldom find one piece of Scripture, so precisely and plainly expounded by another as in this Prophecy, to have afterwards been the subject of altercation. For one can hardly devise how either the Desolation could have been expressed more sensibly, than it was by the Prophet; or the event of the Prophecy have been more exactly set down, than it was in the place now last of all cited. If it be requisite that we bring more proof in so evident a case, the ninth Chapter of Daniel yields testimony sufficient unto this exposition of Jeremiah his Prophecy, that Jerusalem was to lye waste seventy years. For in the first year of Darius the Mede, which was the last of the seventy, Daniel obtained of God the deliverance that had been promised, by prayer, which he made upon consideration of the time that was expired: as he telleth in these words: In the first year of his reign, I Daniel understood by Books the number of the years whereof the Lord had spoken unto Jeremiah the Prophet, that he would accomplish seventy years in the desolation of Jerusalem. So that howsoever the time of Daniel his own Captivity be reckoned from the taking of Jehojakim, and that the people carried away with Jechonia, did accompt, as well they might, the years of their own Captivity; yet with the general desolation of the Country, wherein were few or none of the Israelites left remaining to inhabit, began in the nineteenth year of Nabuchodonosor the great Captivity, which by Gods appointment continued unto the end of seventy years.

2 Chron. 36. 19.

Dan. 9. 2.

This I will not further seek to prove, by the authority of Josephus and others affirming the same; forasmuch as that which already hath been produced, is enough to satisfie any man that hath not fully determined to hold the contrary.

SECT. IV.

Sundry opinions of the Kings which reigned in Babylon during the seventy years.

WHat Kings reigned in Babylon, during these seventy years of the Captivity, and how long each of them did wear the Diadem, it is a matter of no great importance to know; forasmuch as neither their acts were notable in the age wherein they lived; nor the length of their reigns any way helpful to the concordance of times, foregoing or succeeding. The conquests recounted by Xenophon, of Syria, Arabia (or rather some part of it) Hyrcania, Bactria, and perhaps of some other Countries, may seem fruits of the Victories obtained by Nebuchadnezzar the Great (or by some of his Ancestors) in the former part of his life, before he betook himself to ease, and to the sumptuous building of his great Babel, for the house of his Kingdom, and for the honour of his Majesty; where it may seem that he and his Heirs kept a great state, and did very little. The idle behaviour of the Assyrian Soldiers, in such skirmishes as afterwards they had with the Medes, did argue no less. For whereas under Nebuchadnezzar, they were so stout and industrious, that (to omit other proofs) they attempted, and finished that hardy piece of work, of winning the strong City of Tyre, by joining unto it the Continent, filling up the deep and broad channel of the Sea, dividing it from the Main with a mole or piece of Earth, and other matter; the reparation whereof, when the Sea had washed it away, was the very greatest of Alexanders works: in the times following, they became timorous, that they durst not approach nearer to the Enemy than their Bows would carry; but were ready to turn their backs as soon as any, though inferiour in numbers, adventuring within the distance, offered to charge them.

Now as their actions from the end of Nebuchadnezzars Wars, till the ruin of their Empire, were not worthy to be recorded; so was the distinction of their times, and reign of their several Kings, unworthy of the great labour that hath in vain been taken in that business. For when it is granted, that the Captivity of Judah, ending with that Empire, lasted seventy years, we may as reasonably forbear to search into the particular continuance of two or three slothful Kings, as we are contented to be ignorant of the ages of the Patriarchs, and their children living in the Egyptians servitude; resting satisfied in both, with the general assured sum.

Yet forasmuch as many have travelled in this business, upon desire (as I take it) to approve the beginning and end of the seventy years, not only by the reigns of other Princes, ruling elsewhere, but by the times of the Assyrians themselves; I will not refuse to take a little pains in collecting their opinions, and shewing what I think may best be held for likely, if the certain truth cannot be found.

The opinions are many, and greatly repugnant, both in recounting the Kings themselves, and in setting down the years of their several reigns. The first and (as I take it) the surest is theirs, who meerly follow the authority of the Scriptures, without borrowing any help from others. These name only three Kings, Nebuchadnezzar, Evilmerodach, and Balthasar; Neither have they only the silence of Daniel, who names none other, to be their warrant; but the Prophecy of Jeremy precisely, and in a manner purposely teaching the very same. For God by the mouth of the Prophet, shewing that he being absolute Lord of all, would dispose of all according to his own will, and making it known that he had put some Countries here named, into the hands of the King of Babel, saith thus: And all Nations shall serve him, and his son, and his sons son, until the very time of his Land come also; then many Nations and great Kings shall serve themselves of him. These words expressing the continuance of the Chaldean Empire, and number of the Kings, will hardly be qualified with any distinction. But indeed I find no other necessity of qualification to be used herein, than such as may grow out of mens desire, to reconcile the Scriptures unto Prophane Authors. And this desire were not unjust, if the consent of all Histories were on the one side, and the letter of the Holy Text were single on the other side.

Jer. 27. 7.

But contrariwise, the Authors which are cited in this case, are so repugnant one to the other, and the proofs of their different reports, are so slender and unsufficient, that the succession of these Princes, had it not been thus delivered in Scriptures, but only set down by some Author of equal credit with the rest, might very well have found and deserved as good belief, as any of those things which they have delivered in this point. For some there are, who following Josephus, derive that Empire, as by descent, from Father to Son, through five generations, beginning with Nabuchodonosor the Great, and giving to him 43 years; to Evilmerodach 18; to Nigliſar the Son of Evilmerodach 40; to Laboſardach the Son of Nigliſar 9 months; and lastly, to Balthaſar (whom Josephus intimates to be of the race of Nabuchodonosor, without naming his Father) 17 years. And this opinion (save that he forbears to reckon the years, and plainly calls Balthaſar the Son of Laboſardach) St. Hierom doth follow, alledging Beroſus, and Josephus as a Sectator of Beroſus, for his Authors; though Beroſus, as he is cited by Josephus, report the matter far otherwise. For he tells us, that Evilmerodach the Son of Nabuchodonosor did reign but two years, for his wickedness and lust slain by his Sisters Husband Nizigliſſoroor, who occupied the Kingdom after him four years, and left it to his own Son Laboſardach; who being an ill-conditioned Boy, was at the end of nine months slain by such as were about him, and the Kingdom given to one Nabonidus, who held it by the election of the Conspirators, and left it unto Cyrus after 17 years. The relation ill agrees with that of Josephus, and both of them as bad with the Scriptures, in number either of years, or of generations; yet the particularities which they handle, have procured unto them some authority; so that the names which they have inserted, are taken as it were upon trust. There is a third opinion which makes the three last Kings Brethren, and Sons of Evilmerodach; and this may well enough agree with the Scripture: though I had rather believe Xenophon, who saith, that the last King of Babylon was immediate Successor to his Father. But whereas the Author of the Scholastical History, who is founder of this opinion, placeth between him that took Jerusalem, and Evilmerodach, another Nabuchodonosor: plain enough it is that he hath, out of any History Sacred or Prophane, as little warrant to guide him, as we have reason to follow him. Eusebius, Sulpitius, Severus, and Theodoret, upon better ground have supposed, that Evilmerodach and Balthaſar were brethren and sons of the great Nabuchodonosor. This is built on the fifth Chapter of Daniel, wherein Balthasar (for of Evilmerodach there is none that ever doubted) is often called Nabuchodonosor his son. And so common grew this explication, that St. Hierom called it the vulgar opinion. But the place of Jeremy before cited, proves that Balthasar was not the Son indeed, but the grandchild of that great Conquerour, though by the phrase very common in Scriptures, and familiar in those Eastern languages, he was called the Son.

Annius his Metasthenes hits very rightly the seventy years of Captivity, giving to Nabuchodonosor 45 years, to Evilmerodach 30 years, and to the three Sons of Evilmerodach, Nephews of Nabuchodonosor, fourteen years: that is, to Reg-Assar the eldest son, three years; to Lab-Assar-Dach the second son, six years; and to Balthasar the third Son, five.

To this accompt agreeing with the Scriptures, both in the whole sum of years, and in the number of generations, I have sometime subscribed; as not daring to reject an appearance of truth, upon no greater reason, than because the Author was of Annius his edition. Yet could I not satisfie my self herein; both for that none of the Ancient, and few such of the Modern Writers as deserve to be regarded, have consented with this Metasthenes; and for that in making Balthasar succeed unto his Brother in the Kingdom, and not unto his Father, he is wholly against Xenophon, whose History of the elder Cyrus in his Assyrian War, I cannot slightly value in many respects, and especially because it is very agreeable to the Scriptures, in the taking of Babylon, while the King was at his drunken feast.

Seeking therefore diligently into all circumstances that might give any light in this obscurity, I found manifest proof, that the time allotted unto Balthasar by Annius his Metasthenes, was far short of the truth; which is enough to render all suspected that he hath said in distributing what part of the seventy years he pleased among the rest.

Dan. 8. 1. & 27. For in the third year of Balthasar, Daniel saw a Vision, after which he was sick certain days; but when he rose up, he did the Kings business; from which business, that he did afterwards withdraw himself, and live retired, so long, that he was forgotten in the Court, it appears plainly, both by the many words which the old Queen used to set out his sufficiency, and by the Kings asking of him, when he came into

Dan. 5. 11, 12, 13. & 2. 49. his presence, whether he were Daniel? Now to think that a man of such account and place as Daniel had held, could in two years have been worn out of remembrance, were in my judgment a very strange conceit; which rather than I would entertain, I can well be contented to think the whole story (thus related) a part of Annius his Impostures.

Out of these reports of Josephus, Berosus, and others, many new opinions are framed, by conjectures of late Writers. For, the endurance of the Captivity being 70 years, and these years extending unto the first of Cyrus, in which course of time Nebuchadnezzar, his Son and Grand-child, must have reigned; it hath seemed needful to supply the years of these three descents, by inserting some, whose reigns might fill up the whole continuance of the Captivity; with which the time allotted by Berosus and others, to Evilmerodach and Balthasar, joined unto the years following the nineteen of Nebuchadnezzar, (wherein Jerusalem was laid desolate) are nothing even.

Therefore Mercator and others following him, fashion the years of Evilmerodach in this sort. They say, that the 18 years given to him by Josephus in the tenth of his Antiquities, should be read and numbred 28 years; and the two years that Berosus hath allowed to Evilmerodach, should be written 23. In the first number the figure of (1) is mistaken for the figure of (2) and in the latter there should have been added the figure of (3) to that of (2): this granted (to wit) that Evilmerodach reigned 28 years, whereof five together with his Father, and 23 after his death, and the same number of 23 added to the 25 which Nabuchodonosor lived after the destruction of Jerusalem, make 48, than 4 years of Niglisar, according to Berosus, nine months of Labassardach his son, and 17 years of Labonidus or Balthasar, make up the number of seventy years to the first of Cyrus. But whether by error in figures, or in words, the numbers be utterly mistaken in all Copies extant; upon how weak a foundation do they build, who having nothing to help them, save only the bare names of two unknown Kings, found in Authors manifestly corrupted, and such as if they had been entirely extant, were not worthy to have the place of Jeremy called into dispute, in regard of their authority?

SECT. V.

A more particular examination of one opinion touching the number, persons, and reigns of the Babylonian Kings.

OTher supppositions, little different in substance from this of Mercator, I purposely forbear to rehearse, as falling under the same answer. That of Joseph Scaliger I may not forget, as deserving to be considered apart from the rest. He gives to Nebuchadnezzar 44 years, to Evilmerodach two, to Belsazer 5, and to Nabonidus 17. So that from the 19 of Nebuchadnezzar, in which Jerusalem was destroyed, unto the time of Cyrus, he accounted only 59 years; beginning (as many do) the Captivity 11 years sooner, from the transportation of Jechonia. But hereof enough hath been said already. That which we are now to consider, is his distribution of the time running between the 19 of Nebuchadnezzar, and the fall of the Chaldean Empire: wherein if he have erred, then is all further inquisition frivolous.

Concerning the length of Nebuchadnezzars reign, I shall hereafter upon better occasion deliver my opinion. The time which he gives to Evilmerodach is very short, and more precisely agreeing with Berosus than with the Scriptures. For we find in Jeremy, that this Evilmerodach in the first of his reign, shewing all favour to Jechoniah, did among other things, take order for him at his Table; and that he did continually eat bread before him all the days of his life. His portion was a continual portion given him of the King of Babel, every day certain, all the days of his life until he died. The very sound of these words (which is more to be esteemed than the authority of Berosus, were he perfectly extant) imports a far longer time than two years, wherein Jechonia under this gentle Prince, enjoyed the comfort sent by God, whose commandment he had obeyed in yielding himself to Nebuchadnezzar. Indeed how long Jechonia did live, it cannot be proved; but plain it is hereby, that all his remaining days he did eat bread before this King. Now that he lived not so short a while after this as two years, it is more than likely; for he was but 55 years when he was set at liberty, having been 37 years in the prison, whereinto he was cast at the age of 18 years; after which time it seems plain that he begat Salathiel, as well by the age of Zerobabel, who is said to have been but a young man, and one of Darius his Pages, threescore years after this, as by other circumstances of his imprisonment it self.

Of Belsazar, to whom Scaliger gives the next five years, naming him also Laborosoardoch, I should wonder why he calls him Nebuchadnezzars daughter's son, were it not that herein I find him very careful to help out Berosus, by shifting in his Nirigliſſoroor, as husband to Nebuchadnezzars daughter, and Protector of his son four of these years; by which means there remains about one year to Belsazar alone, agreeing nearly with nine months assigned by Berosus to the son of Nigliſar. But Jeremy hath told us, that it was to Nebuchadnezzar, and to his son, and to his sons son (not to his daughters son) that the Empire was promised: which difficulty, if Scaliger could not help, it was well done of him to pass it over with silence.

Nabonidus the last of these, whom others (desirous to reconcile Berosus to the Scriptures) have judged to be all one with Balthasar, is by Scaliger thought to be Darius of the Medes. But herein Scaliger is no firm Berosian: for Berosus makes him of the same stock or race, a Babylonian. I speak not this to disgrace the travel of that most learned man (for it highly commends his diligence and judgment, that he was not so wedded to any Author, as affected with the love of truth) but to shew that he himself, having in some points disliked those Writers, whom in general he approveth, might with greater reason have wholly reformed them by the Scriptures, wherein can be no error. Two things there are which chiefly did breed or confirm this opinion in Scaliger, that he whom Berosus calls Nabonidus, was the same whom Daniel had called Darius of the Medes: First, the phrase of Scripture, which signifies unto us, that Darius took the Kingdom, not saying that he wan it by force of arms: Secondly, a fragment of Megasthenes found in Eusebius, wherein this Nabonidus is called the Median. Touching the word of the Original, or of the Greek translation, which expressing no force of arms, doth only signifie that Darius took or received the Kingdom; I see no reason why we should thereupon infer, that the next King entred by Election: seeing Daniel relateth not the means and circumstances of Balthasars death, but only the swift accomplishment of his own Prophecy. Neither could it indeed have properly been said (if Daniel had cared to use the most expressive terms) that Darius of the Medes, breaking into the City, did win the Kingdom; seeing this was performed by Cyrus in the absence of Darius, though by his forces, and to his use. Now concerning the fragment of Megasthenes, true it is, that in Eusebius his works Printed at Basil, in the year 1559, I find only thus much of Megasthenes, cited out of Alpheeus; That Nabuchodonosor was more valiant than Hercules; that he subdued all Lybia, and the rest of Asia, as far as to the Armenians; and that, as the Chaldaans report, being returned into his Kingdom, and rapt with a divine fury, he cried with a loud voice: O Babylonians, I foretell ye of a great calamity that shall come upon you, which neither Bell, nor any of the gods shall avert: There will come a Persian, half an Ass, that shall bring slavery upon you: and that this and the like when he had spoken, he vanished. Of all this I believe little or nothing, saving that Nabuchodonosor knew before-hand, that his Empire should be translated, as Daniel had foretold, from the golden head, to the silver breast. But that he wan all Africa or Lybia, I do hold it neither true nor probable.

If Scaligers Copy of Eusebius were the more perfect, out of which Megasthenes tells us, that Nabuchodonosor wan both Africk and Spain, I believe the fragment so much the less; and am as little moved with the authority of it, where it calls a Median, the pride and confidence of the Assyrians; as where it tells of Nebuchadnezzar his own vanishing away. Indeed that same title (of half an Ass) by which he calleth Cyrus, makes me to suspect the fable, as cunningly forged out of Apollo his Oracle, wherein he termeth him a Mule, because his Parentage was more noble on the Mothers side than on the Fathers; as Mules are begotten by Asses upon Mares; And thus much in answer of the two principal foundations whereon this opinion is built. As for the concinnity and coherence which it had within it self, I easily allow it. But this proves nothing; for meer fictions have not wanted these commendations: neither can any man believe that one so judicious, industrious, and deeply learned as Joseph Scaliger, would overshoot himself in setting down repugnancies.

It now remaineth to examine the agreement of this with the Scriptures, from which there is no appeal. And herein it seems that Scaliger, well knowing his own sufficiency, hath been little careful to satisfie men that would frame Arguments against him. For if the Prophecy of Daniel were true, that the Kingdom of Balthasar was divided, and given to the Medes and Persians; either we must think that Darius of the Medes was not Nabonidus, or else we must bethink our selves what Persian it might be that shared the Kingdom with him, For it is not more certain, that Balthasar lost his life and Kingdom, than that his Kingdom was divided and given to the Medes and Persians. Neither did the Medes and Persians fall out and fight for it, as by supposing Nabonidus to have been Darius, they should be thought to have done; but these two Nations did compound the body of that Empire, and were accounted as Lords over all the subject Provinces; insomuch that the Greek Historians did commonly call those Wars which Darius, and after him Xerxes, made upon Greece, The Wars of the Medes. Yea, to clear this point, even Daniel himself resembles that King, with whom Alexander fought, unto a Ram with two horns, calling him the King of the Medes and Persians. Dan. 8.20. Wherefore the whole Nation of Chronologers were not to have been condemned by Joseph Scaliger, for maintaining upon such good grounds, that Darius of the Medes was partner with Cyrus, in his victories, and not a Chaldaan King by him subdued. Neither was Josephus to be the less regarded, for affirming that Balthasar was destroyed by Darius of the Medes, and his Nephew Cyrus; though herein he varied from Berosus and others, whose authority elsewhere he gladly citeth. For Josephus had no reason to believe any mans faith or knowledg of those times half so well as Daniels, whom I believe that he understood as far as was needful in this case. Lawful it was for him to alledg all Authors that had any mention, though unperfect, of the same things that were contained in the Writing of the Jews, to whose Histories thereby he procured reputation in the Ro- man world, where they were ſtrangers, and might ſeem fabulous. Even ſo did Euſebius and other Writers willingly embrace the teſtimonies of Heathen Books making for the truth in ſome particulars; yet will they not therefore be tried in general by the ſelf-ſame Ethnick Philoſophers, but leave them where they are againſt the truth; as Joſephus in this caſe hath left Beroſus. And thus much I thought it meet to ſay of Scaligers opinion in this point; holding nevertheleſs in due regard his learning and judgment, which if in ſome things it had not failed, the miracle had then been very great.

SECT. VI.

What may be held as probable of the Perſons and Times of Nabuchodonoſor his Succeſſors.

IT now remains that I freely acknowledg mine own weakneſs, who cannot find how the ſeventy years of Captivity are to be divided among them which reigned in Babylon, though I find that the diſtribution made of them, in ſuch wiſe as already is rehearſed, be ill agreeable to the holy Scriptures. Wherefore I may truly ſay with Pererius, that we ought liberally to pardon thoſe whoſe feet have failed them in the ſlippery ways of Chronology, wherein both learning and diligence are ſubject to take a fall at one time or other, by ignorance, forgetfulneſs, or heedleſs reckoning. Yet will I adventure to deliver my opinion, wherein the judgment of Lyra and others (holding thoſe only to have reigned over the Chaldeans, whoſe names are found in the Scriptures) appears more conformable to reaſon and account of time, than any of the other Sentences or Conjectures before rehearſed. Not that I will take upon me to defend Lyra his Conjectures, when he ſuppoſeth by Nigliſar and Laboſardach to be meant the ſame perſons which are called in Scripture Evilmerodach and Balthaſar (for this can by no good colour be maintained); but only to ſhew that the Kings by him cited, are likely to have occupied the whole time of ſeventy years. Firſt therefore let us conſider the reign of Nebuchadnezzar, in whoſe eighteenth year Jeruſalem was taken and ſackt, but in his nineteenth laid utterly deſolate.

Moſt of Writers have given to him 43 years of reign, following therein Beroſus. There are who have added one year more; and ſome have made it up 45. To diſpute about the certainty were needleſs: for in ſhewing by what length of time the Scriptures meaſure him, we ſhall ſhew the certain truth.

2 King. 2. 5,8. Jer. 51. 12. 2 King. 24. 12. 2 King. 25. 27. Jer. 52. 31. Manifeſt it is, that the 19 year of Nebuchadnezzar, is joined with the 11 of Zedechia; as alſo that his eighth year was the firſt year of Jechonia his Captivity; the reign of Zedechia occupied all the mean ſpace, being of 11 years. This is generally agreed upon, ſo that it needs no further proofs: As for the beginning of his ſucceſſor Evilmerodach, it was in the ſeven and thirtieth year of Jechonia his Captivity; ſo that Nebuchadnezzar after his eighth year (which was the firſt of Jechonia his Bondage) reigned 35 whole years, and peradventure a good part of the ſix and thirtieth, foraſmuch as Jechonia was inlarged with ſo great a favour, not until the end of the year. Subſtracting therefore out of theſe four and forty, which Nebuchadnezzars reign did well-near occupy, thoſe eighteen years of his which paſſed away before the Captivity of Judah, and ruin of the City, we have remaining ſix and twenty years of the Seventy, that were almoſt wholly ſpent when his Son began to reign.

It is now to be conſidered, how the remainder of the ſeventy years were divided between the Kings ruling in Babylon, until the firſt of Cyrus. A queſtion more difficult (as I ſaid before) than greatly needful: the whole ſumm being certain, and the diſtinction of times affording no benefit in knowledg of their actions, who were ſlothful Princes. Neither can any man the more juſtly ſuſpect the beginning or end of the whole ſeventy years; for that the diſtribution of ſome part of them is only conjectural; ſeeing that none who gives any other terms to their beginning or end, hath refuſed to follow both unlikely and deſperate conjectures in dividing them. I will therefore be bold to do as others have done; knowing well before-hand, that whoſoever ſhall diſcover my error, muſt do me the pleaſure (which I could rather wiſh in a caſe more material) of making me to underſtand the truth.

Of the four and forty years remaining in account of Nebuchadnezzars death, we are to take away the laſt, which was the firſt of Darius the Mede, and then having authority good enough to warrant us from blame of preſumption, in giving ſeventeen years to Balthaſar, we find left in our hands to beſtow upon Evilmerodach ſix and twenty years. Of the year belonging unto Darius the Mede, I have already ſpoken what I thought ſufficient, in delivering my opinion of the beginning and continuance of this Captivity. That Balthaſar did reign ſeventeen years, we have the authority of Joſephus before cited in expreſs words: We have alſo the general conſent of all, or the moſt late Writers, interpreting Beroſus his Nabonidus, who reigned ſo long, and Balthaſar to have been one. But nothing moved me ſo much to believe this Tradition, as firſt thoſe evident places in Daniel, ſhewing that in the third year of Balthaſar he followed the Kings buſineſs, and yet was forgotten ere the end of his reign (a proof ſufficient of no few years paſſing under this man, eſpecially ſeeing it is no where found that Daniels employments took end either that year or the next). Secondly, the conſideration of Cyrus his Wars againſt the Aſſyrians, which beginning with the death of this mans Father, and being always proſperous, could hardly have occupied any longer time; though we make large allowance to his deeds in the lower Aſia, which fell out in the mid-way: I have already ſhewed, that there appears in the Scriptures likelihood enough to make it credible, that the reign of Evilmerodach was not ſhort, and that men of great judgment have found it moſt probable, that he was a King three and twenty years. More, I think, they would have allowed him, had not the deſire of ſatisfying Beroſus cauſed them to reſt content with this. And ſurely it were greatly to be wiſhed, that Books of ſuch antiquity, as thoſe of Beroſus, were extant without corruption; a great light (no doubt) they would yield in many dark paſſages of Antiquity. I will yet confeſs, that were his works never ſo excellent, and in all things elſe unqueſtionably true, I would not therefore condeſcend unto him in ſome one point, wherein the Scriptures were his open enemy: How much leſs ought I obey a broken fragment of his, containing only ſeven or eight lines, and part even of the title corrupted, as they believe that follow him in the reſt? The Scriptures have told us, that God

Dan. 8. 1. & 27. & 5. v. 11, 12, & 13.

Jer. 27. 7. gave the Empire to Nebuchadnezzar, to his Son, and to his Sons Son: How long each of them held it, we find not Expreſſed; yet would we gladly know it of Beroſus, or of any other that would teach us; provided always, that helping us in a particularity, he deſtroyed not thereby the general truth. More words are needleſs. It is enough to ſay with others, that Beroſus, or Joſephus who cited him, hath been wronged by the careleſneſs of Scribes; and that it was as eaſie for thoſe Scribes to err in writing two for ſix and twenty, as for three and twenty, or perhaps more eaſie. For, the omiſſion of the ſecond figure, was as likely the one way as the other; and the Character 5, ſignifying 6, hath a nearer reſemblance of β that ſtands for 2, than hath γ which is uſed for 3. So that the Numeral notes β 5, expreſſing 26, were not ſafe enough from being miſtaken in the true Copy, and might be altered, as ill written, if ſome crooked hand, or other miſchance not unuſual, had omitted the firſt ſtroke of the former letter, or added a daſh to the latter, which might cauſe them to ſeem not two different figures, but the one a correction of the other, which how it could be ſuppoſed in βγ ſtanding for 23, I do not well perceive. As for the Arithmetical figures now in uſe, they were long after the time of Joſephus brought in by the Arabians, and therefore do not appertain unto this buſineſs; unleſs we ſhould gueſs that his works were corrupted in that unlearned age, which following the Saracen-conqueſt, was little occupied in the ſtudies of Humanity, but in a ſort wholly given over to the doctrine of Ariſtotle. If this will ſerve to make Beroſus our friend, ſo let it be; If not, I will not purchaſe the favour of his authority, by forſaking Jeremy and Daniel, when they ſeem to be his Oppoſites.

SECT. VII.

Of the Victories which Nabuchodonoſor obtained between the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, and conqueſt of Egypt.

With what actions this time of ſeventy years was entertained by the Babylonian Kings, few have written, or little is remaining in record. Which may peradventure have been ſome cauſe that the time it ſelf was, and is yet, ſought to be abridged, as not having left ſufficient matter to witneſs the length of it. But by ſuch an argument we might as well deny to many people even their Being. For every Nation (I know not whom I ſhould except) between the beginning and laſt end of it, hath in ſome ſlothful age rather dreamt away the time, than ſpent it. It is therefore no marvel, if the poſterity of Nabuchodonoſor, finding all things ready to their hand, which their hearts could have deſired, betook themſelves to their eaſe and pleaſures, thinking perhaps, like the Prodigal Sons of greedy Fathers, their own wiſdom greater, which knew how to enjoy, than that of their Anceſtors, which wearied away their days in the reſtleſs travel of purchaſing: Though indeed the reign of Nabuchodonoſor was ſo divided, that his youthful and ſtronger years having been exerciſed in victorious arms, no ſmall part of his life was remaining to be ſpent in eſtabliſhing what was gotten, and gathering the fruit of his worthy labours paſt. The nineteenth year of his reign it was, when deſtroying utterly the great and mighty City of Jeruſalem, he enriched himſelf with abundance of Spoil, and terrified all that would offer to reſiſt him, by that fearful example. From that time forward, he, until his three and twentieth year, laboured in the Conqueſt of thoſe adjoining Regions, which God had expoſed unto his Sword, and commanded to wear his yoke; namely, the Edomites, Moabites, Ammonites, Tyrians, Sydonians, and Egyptians; though ſome of theſe were already become his followers, and ſerved under him, when Jeruſalem was beaten down and burnt. But the Tyrians, whoſe City was founded on an Iſland, ſafe enough from any danger of a Land-army, and whoſe Fleet was ſo ſtrong, that they needed not to fear any enemy at Sea, were neither daunted with the fall of their neighbour-Cities, nor with the obſtinate reſolution of this mighty Prince, imploying all his power to their ſubverſion.

That the City of Tyre was rather well pleaſed, than any way diſcouraged with the fall of Jeruſalem, (which had held the ſame courſe that Tyrus did, and endured all that might be in the ſame quarrel againſt the common enemy) it appears by the words which Ezekiel condemneth as the common voice of Tyrus; Aha, the gate of the people is broken, it is turned unto me; for ſeeing ſhe is deſolate, I ſhall be repleniſhed. Yet at length, even in the nineteenth year of Nabuchodonoſor, that great work of his, whereof we have already ſpoken, began to appear above the waters, and threaten them with inevitable miſchief. Ezek. 26. 2.

But thoſe Prophecies of Jeremy and of Iſaiah, which appoint unto this deſolation of Tyre the ſame term of ſeventy years, that was preſcribed unto the reign of the Chaldæans, do plainly ſhew that ſhe followed Jeruſalem, the ſame nineteenth year of Nabuchodonoſor, in the ſame, or a very like fortune. The particularities which doubtleſs were memorable in the iſſue of ſo great and laborious a ſiége, are in a manner utterly loſt. Thus much we find, That the Citizens perceiving the Town unable to hold out, embarked themſelves, and fled into the Iſle of Cyprus. Nevertheleſs, it ſeems that this evaſion ſerved only the principal men, who eſcaping with their goods, abandoned the poorer ſort unto the enemies fury. For, not only ſuch people of Tyre as dwelt on the Continent, (who are called her Daughters in the field) were put to the ſword; but the like execution was done in the ſtreets, into which, with exceſſive labour, the Aſſyrian made way for his Horſes and Chariots. Thus Nabuchodonoſor cauſed his Army to ſerve a great ſervice againſt Tyrus, wherein every head was made bald, and every ſhoulder was made bare, yet had he no wages, nor his Army; but was fain to reſt contented with the honour of having deſtroyed that City, which in all mens judgments had been held invincible. Jer. 25. Iſa. 23. 15. Ezek. 29. 18.

The deſtruction of theſe two great and powerful Cities, having made the name of the Chaldæans dreadful in the ears of all the Nations thereabout, Nabuchodonoſor uſed the advantage of that reputation which he had obtained by victories already gotten, to the getting of more, and more profitable, with leſs pain. The Kingdom of Egypt was the mark at which he aimed; a Country ſo abounding in all riches and pleaſures, that it might well have tempted any Prince, finding himſelf ſtrong enough, to ſeek occaſion of quarrel againſt it; and ſo far an enemy to the Crown of Babylon, that had it been poorer, yet either it muſt have been ſubdued, or the conqueſt of Syria could ill have been eſtabliſhed. Neverthevertheleſs it was needful, that before he entred into this buſineſs, the Countries adjacent ſhould be reduced unto ſuch terms, that either they ſhould wholly ſtand at his devotion, or at leaſt be unable to work him any diſpleaſure. And herein the Decree of God concurred, as in all proſperous enterpriſes, with reaſon of State. For the people of Moab, Ammon, Edom, Damaſcus, Kedar, Hazar, and other adjoyning Regions, whom God for their ſins had condemned to fall under the Babylonian ſwords, were ſuch as regarding only their own gain, had ſome of them, like Ravens, followed the Chaldæan Army, to feed upon the carcaſes that fell by the cruelty thereof; others taking advantage of their neighbours miſeries, occupied the Countries which were by his victories belonging to Nabuchodonoſor: all of them thinking, that when the Aſſyrian had ſatisfied his fury, he ſhould be fain to forſake thoſe deſolate parts, and leave the poſſeſſion of them to thoſe that could lay hand upon it. Particularly the Edomites and Philiſtims had ſhewed much malice to the Jews when their City was taken. What good ſervice they had done to the Chaldæans, I find not: if they did any, it is likely to have been with reference to their own purpoſes, wherein they were diſappointed. The Ammonites were not contented to rejoyce at the fall of Jeruſalem, but preſently they entred upon the Country of Gad, and took poſſeſſion; as if not the Aſſyrians, but they had ſubdued Iſrael. Neither can I perceive what other ground that practice had of Baalis King of the Ammonites, when he ſent Iſhmael, a Prince of the blood of Judah, to murther Gedalia, whom the King of Babel had left Governour over thoſe that remained in Iſrael, and to carry captive into the Ammonites Country the people that abode in Mizpah, than a deſire of embroiling Nabuchodonoſor with ſo many labours at once, as ſhould make him retire into his own Country, and abandon thoſe waſted Lands to himſelf and others, for whom they lay conveniently. Such or the like policy the Moabites did exerciſe, whoſe pride and wrath were made fruſtrate by God; and their diſſimulation condemned, as not doing right.

All theſe Nations had the art of ravening, which is familiar to ſuch as live or border upon deſarts; and now the time afforded them occaſion to ſhew the uttermoſt cunning of their thieviſh wits. But Nebuchadnezzar did cut aſunder all their devices by ſharp and ſudden war, overwhelming them with unexpected ruin, as it were in one night; according to the Prophecies of Iſaiah, Jeremy, and Ezekiel, who foretold, with little difference of words, the greatneſs and ſwiftneſs of the miſery that ſhould come upon them. With which of them he firſt began, I find not; it ſeems that Moab was the laſt which felt his hand: for ſo do many good Authors interpret the Prophecy of Iſaiah, threatning Moab with deſtruction after three years, as having reference to the third year following the ruin of Jeruſalem; the next year after it, being ſpent in the Egyptian Expedition. This is manifeſt, that all the principal Towns in theſe Regions were burnt, and the people ſlain, or made ſlaves, few excepted, who being preſerved by flight, had not the courage to return to their habitations over-haſtily, much leſs to attempt any thing againſt Nabuchodonoſor; but lived as miſerable Out-laws, or at leaſt oppreſſed wretches, until the end of ſeventy years, which God had preſcribed unto the deſolation of their Countries, as well as of the Land of Judah.

SECT. VIII.

That Egypt was conquered, and the King therein reigning, ſlain by Nabuchodonoſor, contrary to the opinion of moſt Authors, who following Herodotus and Diodorus, relate it otherwiſe.

WHen by a long courſe of Victory, Nabuchodonoſor had brought into ſubjection all the Nations of Syria, and the bordering Arabians, in ſuch wiſe, that no enemy to himſelf, nor friend to the Egyptian, was left at his back, that might give impediment unto his proceeding, or take advantage of any misfortune; then did he forthwith take in hand the Conqueſt of Egypt himſelf, upon which thoſe other Nations had formerly been depending. Of this Expedition, and the victorious iſſue thereof, the three great Prophets, Iſaiah, Jeremy, and Ezekiel, have written ſo plainly, that I hold it altogether needleſs to look after more authority, or to cite for proof half of that which may be alledged out of theſe. Nevertheleſs, we find many and good Authors, who following Herodotus and Diodorus Siculus, are well contented to ſtrain theſe Prophecies with unreaſonable diligence unto ſuch a ſenſe, as gives to Nabuchodonoſor little more than the honour of having done ſome ſpoil in Egypt, omitting the conqueſt of that Land by the Babylonian, and referring the death of Apries or Hophra to a Chance long after following, which had no coherence with theſe times or affairs. So prepoſterous is the delight which many men take in the means and ſecond helps conducing to their purpoſe, that oftentimes they do preſer the Commentator before the Author; and to uphold a ſentence, giving teſtimony to one clauſe, do careleſly overthrow the Hiſtory it ſelf, which thereby they ſought to have maintained. The reports of Herodotus and Diodorus, concerning the Kings of Egypt which reigned about theſe times, are already rehearſed in the former Book: but that which they have ſpoken of Apries, was purpoſely reſerved unto this place. Herodotus doth affirm, that he was a very fortunate King, but wherein he telleth not; (unleſs we ſhould underſtand that he was victorious in the War, which he is ſaid to have made upon Tyrus and Sydon) that he reigned five and twenty years; and was finally taken and put to death by his own Subjects; who did ſet up Amaſis as King, which prevailed againſt him. The rebellion of the Egyptians he imputeth to a great loſs which they received in an Expedition againſt the Cyrenians, by whom almoſt their whole Army was deſtroyed. This calamity the people of Egypt thought to be well pleaſing to their King, who had ſent them on this dangerous Expedition, with a purpoſe to have them conſumed, that ſo he might with greater ſecurity reign over ſuch as ſtayed at home. So they who eſcaped, and the friends of ſuch as were ſlain, rebelled againſt Apries, who ſent Amaſis to appeaſe the tumult; but Amaſis became Captain of the Rebels, and was by them choſen King. Finally, the whole Land conſented unto this new Election; whereby Apries was driven to truſt unto his foreign Mercenaries, the Ionians and Carians, of whom he kept conntinually in readineſs thirty thouſand good Soldiers that fought valiantly for him, but were at length vanquiſhed by the great number of the Egyptian forces, amounting unto two hundred and fifty thouſand, ſand, which were all by birth and education, men of War. Apries himſelf being taken priſoner, was gently entreated by Amaſis for a while, until the Egyptians, exclaiming upon him, as an extream enemy to the Land, got him delivered into their hands, and ſtrangled him, yet they gave him honourable Burial. Such is the repott of Herodotus, with whom Diodorus Siculus doth nearly agree; telling us, that Apries did vanquiſh the Cyprians and Phœnicians in battel at Sea, took by force and demoliſhed Sidon, wan the other Towns of Phœnicia, and the Iſle of Cyprus, and finally periſhed, as is before rehearſed, when he had reigned two and twenty years. This authority were enough (yet not more than enough) to inform us of Apries his hiſtory, if greater authority did not contradict it. But the deſtruction of Egypt by the Babylonian, foretold by the Prophets, which hath no coherence with theſe relations, hath greater force to compell our belief, than have the Traditions of Egyptian Prieſts (which the Greek Hiſtorians followed) and greater probabilities to perſwade thoſe that look only into humane reaſons. For Iſaiah propheſied long before of the ſhameful Captivity of the Egyptians, whom the King of Aſſur, ſhould carry away naked, young and old, in ſuch wiſe, that the Jews, who fled then for deliverance from the Aſſyrian, ſhould be aſhamed of their own vain confidence in men ſo unable to defend themſelves.

Diod. Sic. l. 1. c. 2.

Iſa. 20. 4, 5, & 6.

But Ezekiel and Jeremy, as their Prophecies were nearer to the time of execution, ſo they handled this argument more preciſely. For Ezekiel telleth plainly, that Egypt ſhould be given to Nebuchadnezzar as wages for the ſervice which he had done at Tyre: Alſo he recounteth particularly all the chief Cities in Egypt, ſaying, That theſe by name ſhould be deſtroyed, and go into Captivity; yea that Pharaoh and all his Army ſhould be ſlain by the ſword. Wherefore it muſt needs be a violent expoſition of theſe Prophecies, which by applying the iſſue of ſuch threatnings to an inſurrection and rebellion, concludes all, without any other alteration in Egypt, than change of the Kings perſon, wherein Amaſis did ſucceed unto Apries, by force indeed, but by the uniform conſent of all the people. Certainly, if that notable place of Jeremy, wherein he foretelleth how the Jews in Egypt ſhould ſee Pharaoh Hophra delivered into the hand of his enemies, as Zedekiah had been, were to be referred unto the time of that rebellion, whereof Herodotus hath ſpoken, as the general opinion hath overruled it; then was it vainly done of the ſame Prophet (which God forbid that any Chriſtian ſhould think, ſeeing he did it by the appointment of God himſelf) to hide in the clay of a Brick-hill, thoſe very ſtones, upon which the Throne of Nabuchodonoſor ſhould be ſet, and his Pavilion ſpread. Yea then was that Prophecy no other than falſe, which expreſſed the end of Pharaoh thus: Behold, I will viſit the common people of No, and Pharaoh and Egypt, with their gods, and their Kings, even Pharaoh, and all that truſt in him: and I will deliver them into the hands of thoſe that ſeek their lives, and into the hand of Nebuchadnezzar, King of Babel, and into the hands of his ſervants. The clearneſs of this Prophecy being ſuch as could not but refute that interpretation of many other places, which referred all to the rebellion of Amaſis, it cauſed me to wonder what thoſe Commentators would ſay to it, who are elſewhere ſo diligent in fitting all to the Greek Hiſtorians. Wherefore looking upon Junius, who had in another place taken the enemies of Pharaoh Hophra to be Amaſis and his followers, I found him here acknowledging that the Egyptian Prieſts had notably deluded Herodotus with lyes, coined upon a vain-glorious purpoſe of hiding their own diſgrace and bondage. And ſurely it may well be thought, that the hiſtory of Nebuchadnezzar was better known to the Jews, whom it concerned, than to the Greeks, that ſcarcely at any time heard of his name. Therefore I ſee no cauſe why we ſhould not rather believe Joſephus, reporting that Nabuchodonoſor in the three and twentieth year of his reign, and the fifth year of the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, did conquer Egypt, kill the King thereof, and appoint another in his ſtead; than Herodotus or Diodore; who being meer ſtrangers to this buſineſs, had no great reaſon to labour in ſearching out the truth, but might reſt contented with any thing that the Prieſts would tell them. Now if ſetting aſide all advantage of authority, we ſhould only conſider the relations of Joſephus, and of the Greek Hiſtorians, as either of them might be verified of it ſelf by apparent circumſtances, without reflecting upon the Hebrew Prophets, or Egyptian Prieſts; methinks the death of Apries can no way be approved, as having been wrought by conſent of the people, but affords great matter of ſuſpicion; yea, though no man had oppoſed the reports of Herodotus and Diodore. For the great love and honour which the Egyptians did bear unto their Kings, is notorious by the uniform teſtimony of all others that have handled the matters of that Country, as well as by the report of Diodore himſelf. How then can we think it probable, that Apries having won great Victories, did for one only loſs fall into the hatred of all his people? or, which may ſerve to perſwade us, that a King of Egypt would ſeek, or ſo demean himſelf, that he might be thought to ſeek the deſtruction of his natural ſubjects? As for that Army of thirty thouſand Soldiers, Carians and Ionians, which the King of Egypt, whom Amaſis took priſoner, is ſaid to have kept for his defence: Doth it not argue that he was a foreigner, and one that armed himſelf againſt the Egyptians, wiſhing them few and weak; rather than any of the Pharaohs, who accounted the force of the Country, as aſſuredly their own, as the ſtrength of their own bodies? It were more tedious than any way needful, to uſe all Arguments that might be alledged in this caſe. The very death of this ſuppoſed Apries, which the clamors of the people obtained of Amaſis, who ſought to have kept him alive, doth intimate that he was ſome foreign Governour, not a natural Prince; otherwiſe the people would have deſired to ſave his life, and Amaſis to take it quickly from him. I will not labour any further to diſprove that opinion, whereunto I ſhould not have yielded, though it had ſtood upon great appearance of truth, conſidering that the voice of truth it ſelf crys out againſt it; but leave the circumſtances, proving the Conqueſt of Egypt by Nabuchodonoſor, to be obſerved where due occaſion in courſe of the ſtory following ſhall preſent them.

SECT. IX.

How Egypt was ſubdued and held by Nebuchadnezzar.

IT is a great loſs, that the general Hiſtory of the World hath ſuffered by the ſpoil and waſte which Time hath made of thoſe Monuments that ſhould have have preſerved the memory of ſuch famous actions as were accompliſhed by this mighty Prince Nabuchodonoſor; wherein, whether his Virtue, or Fortune were greater, it is now uncertain. That his Victories following the Conqueſt of Syria, and the Neighbour-Provinces, were ſuch as did more enlarge his Dominion, than all the former Wars had done, it may eaſily be gathered out of Ezekiel, who reckoneth up in his thirty Chapter (beſides the whole Country of Egypt) Phut and Lud, with other Nations, that may ſeem to have reached out into Mauritania, as people ſubdued by this great Babylonian. The circumſtances of theſe Wars are in a manner utterly loſt; but that the victory was eaſie and ſwift, any man ſhall find, who will take the pains to conſer the places wherein the three great Prophets touch this Argument. Thus much I think worthy of more particular obſervation; that Pharaoh, who (as is already noted in the former Book) thought himſelf moſt ſafe in Egypt by the well defenced ſituation of his Country, did very unwiſely in ſuffering his enemies to ſweep the way clean unto his own doors, by conſuming all his friends and adherents in Syria. For, as the labour of this buſineſs did more harden, than weary the Chaldæan Army; ſo the confidence and vain ſecurity of the Egyptians, relying upon the difficult paſſages which the enemy was to make thorough the Arabian deſarts, and the much advantage which the great River of Nilus would afford unto themſelves, did little avail them in proviſion for the War, and much aſtoniſh them (as may juſtly be thought) in the time of execution: it being uſually ſeen, that the hearts of men fail, when thoſe helps fail, in which they had repoſed more confidence than in their own virtue. Hitherto the Kingdom of Egypt had flouriſhed under the rule of the Pharaohs about a thouſand five hundred and fourſcore years; but from this time forward it remained forty years without a King, under the ſubjection of the Babylonians; and then at length it began to recover by little and little the former greatneſs; yet ſo, that it was never dreadful unto others; God having ſaid of that people, I will diminiſh them, that they ſhall no more rule the Nations. For whereas it hath been ſaid of Pharaoh, I am the ſon of the wiſe, I am the ſon of the ancient Kings: And whereas he had vaunted, The River is mine, and I have made it. The Princes of Egypt now became fools, the River failed them, the King himſelf was taken and ſlain, and that ancient lineage quite extinguiſhed This came to paſs in the firſt year after the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, and the three and twentieth of Nebuchadnezzar; at which time (ſaith Joſephus) He ſlew the King then reigning, placed another in his room, and carried Captives thence to Babylon the Jews whom he found in that Country. Now concerning the time which Joſephus gives unto this buſineſs, and the buſineſs it ſelf, I have already ſhewed, that it is warranted by all the Propheſies which inſinuate the ſame. As likewiſe the laſt deſtruction of Jeruſalem, and carrying away thoſe unto Babel who inhabited the miſerable ruins of that great City, which was in the ſame three and twentieth year of Nebuchadnezzar, is not unprobably thought by good Authors to have been at the return from this Egyptian Expedition. But whereas Joſephus tells us, that there was another King put in the room of Apries, by Nebuchadnezzar, we muſt underſtand, that he was only a Vice-roy, and not (as ſome have miſtaken it) think that this was Amaſis. For to place the beginng of Amaſis his reign in the three and twentieth of Nebuchadnezzar, were as well repugnant unto the Propheſies before alledged, as to all Chronology and Hiſtory. Some there are, which to help this inconvenience, imagin that there were two ſucceſſively bearing the name of Amaſis; others that there were two Apries, the one ſlain by Nebuchadnezzar, the other by Amaſis; a queſtion of ſmall importance, becauſe the difference is only about a name, it being once granted, that the perſon mentioned in Scripture was deprived of Life and Kingdom by the Aſſyrians. Yet for any thing that I can perceive, that Apries of whom the Greek Hiſtorians wrote, could not be the Deputy of Nebuchadnezzar, ſeeing that he was the Grandchild of Pharaoh Necho, and made War (as they report) upon the Phœnicians, who were before the Egyptians become ſubject unto the Crown of Babylon. I might add, perhaps, that he whom Nebuchadnezzar left as Governour of Egypt, was more likely to have had ſome Chaldæan or Aſſyrian, than Egyptian name, unleſs we ſhould think that he had been a Traytor to his natural Prince, and ſo rewarded by the Conquerour with Lieutenantſhip of the Country: about which it were but frivolous to diſpute. Thus much in brief we ought to believe, that Nabuchodonoſor made an abſolute Conqueſt of Egypt; that he was not ſo fooliſh as to give it away, any man may gueſs; that he appointed one to rule the Country, it is conſequent unto the former, and hath authority of Joſephus; that his Governour (or ſome ſucceſſor of his) was afterwards taken and ſlain by Amaſis, I ſee probability enough to perſwade my ſelf; and yet can well be content, that others uſe their liberty, and believe what they liſt. As for the Army which this Egyptian King Apries is ſuppoſed to have kept of Ionians and Carians, I hold them to be none other than the Gariſons of Mercenary Soldiers which were left by the Aſſyrian for the guard of his Vice-roy, and cuſtody of the new ſubdued Province: as likewiſe the company returning from Cyrene and Barce, who together with the friends of ſuch as were ſlain in that Expedition, remembred before out of the Greek Hiſtorians, depoſed and ſlew Apries, I take them to have been the Egyptian fugitives, which then recovered their own Country. Sure it is, that this Propheſie of Ezekiel was verified; At the end of forty years will I gather the Egyptians from the people where they were ſcattered, and I will bring again the captivity of Egypt, and will cauſe them to return into the land of Pathros, into the land of their habitation, and they ſhall be there a ſmall Kingdom. If the Egyptian Prieſts alluded hereunto in the tale which they made of Amaſis obtaining the Kingdom, then are they to be helped with this or the like interpretation; if they deviſed matter that had no ſhadow of truth, only to keep the Greeks from knowledg of their Countrys diſgrace, then are they little to be regarded, ſince we know the truth with them.

SECT. X.

Of the ſundry accounts drawn from ſundry acts of Nebuchadnezzar, and of the deſtruction of Ninive by him; the time of which action is uncertain.

THeſe Victories brought the greatneſs of the Aſſyrian Empire to the full, and from them was reckoned the time of Nebuchadnezzar's reign in ſundry places of Scripture. To ſpeak any more of the queſtions ariſing about the ſupputation of Nebuchadnezzar his times, might ſeem to be the over-handling of one Argument: Yet thus much I will note, that whereas Daniel was carried Captive in the third year of Jehojakims reign (which ran along with ſome part of Nebuchadnezzar's firſt year) and was kept in diet three years more, before he was brought into the Kings preſence; It could not be the ſecond of Nebuchadnezzar's Kingdom, Dan. 1. 2. wherein he interpreted the forgotten dream of the great Image, fore-ſhewing the ſucceſs of Monarchies, but the ſecond of his Empire. The ſame or the like may be ſaid of divers places which refer ſundry matters unto their ſet years; as that of Ezekiel before cited, where he foretells, that Egypt ſhould be given in reward for the ſervice done before Tyrus, dating his Propheſie in the ſeven and twentieth year; and that of Daniel, placing the erection of the golden Image in the eighteenth year: for theſe years held no dependance upon either the beginning of Nebuchadnezzar's Kingdom, or of his Empire, nor yet upon any of the Captivities, but had reference to ſome memorable actions, omitted in Scripture, and therefore not eaſie to be found, nor worth the labour of uncertain ſearch.

Of any War made by Nebuchadnezzar, after ſuch time as he returned from the Conqueſt of Egypt, I do not read, excepting that againſt Nineve, the deſtruction whereof was foretold by the Prophet Nahum. Nineve had long before been taken by Merodach (as in due place hath been ſhewed) and together with the reſt of Aſſyria made ſubject to Babylon. Yet was it left under a peculiar King, who rebelling againſt the Chaldæan, as Jehojakim and Zedechias, tributary Kings of Judah had done, taſted likewiſe of the ſame fortune. That the deſtruction of Nineve followed the Conqueſt of Egypt, it appeareth by the compariſon which Nahum the Prophet made between this City that was to fall, and the City of No in Egypt, that was fallen already. But how long after this came to paſs, it is (methinks) impoſſible to find out. For whereas it is found in an Hebrew Chronology, that it was in the firſt of Nebuchadnezzar's reign, the place of Nahum laſt cited, is enough to diſprove it. Whereas it is referred by ſome unto the firſt of his Monarchy, which began at the end of the Egyptian Nah. 3. 8. Wars; the whole Propheſie of Nahum, which went between the one and the other, argueth ſtrongly, that there was a longer ſpace of time intercurrent. So that to enquire into the very year of this deſtruction, or other circumſtances of the War, whether managed by Nabuchodonoſor in perſon, or by his Lieutenants, were ſomewhat like unto the vain curioſity of Tiberius Cæſar, enquiring who was the Mother of Hecuba; or to the like idle pains which he ſhould take, who would ſeek to learn what woman that Huzzah Queen of Nineve was, whoſe woful Captivity the ſame Prophet Nahum likewiſe did foretell.

SECT. XI.

Of the latter time of Nebuchadnezzar; his buildings, madneſs, and death.

OF the time which this great Monarch ſpent in quiet, I think there are no Monuments extant, ſave thoſe which we find among the Propheſies of Daniel. Among theſe we may reckon his great works of Babylon, wherewith he pleaſed himſelf ſo well, that he brake out into thoſe glorious words: Is not this great Babel that I have Dan. 4. 27. built, for the houſe of the Kingdom, by the might of my power, and for the honour of my Majeſty? Surely if thoſe things be true that are by Joſephus rehearſed of him out of Beroſus and Megaſthenes, he might well delight himſelf with the contemplation of ſuch goodly and magnificent buildings. For it is ſaid, That he fortified Babylon with a triple wall; that beſides other ſtately works, he raiſed thoſe huge Arches wherewith were born up the high Orchards, hanging as it were in the Air, and equalling the tops of Mountains; which moſt ſumptuous Frame, that out-laſted all the remainder of the Aſſyrian, and all the Perſian Empire, is ſaid to have been reared, and finiſhed in fifteen days.

But of all this and other his magnificence, we find little elſe recorded, than that (which indeed is moſt profitable for us to conſider) his over-valuing of his own greatneſs, abaſed him unto a condition inferior to the pooreſt of men. And not undeſervedly fell theſe judgments of God upon him. For whereas God had honoured him, not only with many Victories, and much happineſs in his own life, but with a diſcovery of things to come after him, yea and had approved the certainty of his dream, by the miraculous reducing of it into his memory, and interpretation thereof by Daniel the Prophet; he nevertheleſs became ſo forgetful of God, whoſe wonderful power he had ſeen and acknowledged, that he cauſed a golden Image to be ſet up and worſhipped; ordaining a cruel death as reward unto them that ſhould dare to diſobey his Kingly will and pleaſure, which was utterly repugnant to the Law of him that is the King of Kings. Hereof St. Hierom hath well noted; Velox oblivio veritatis, ut qui dudum ſervum Dei quaſi Deum adoraverat, nunc ſtatuam ſibi fieri jubeat, ut ipſe quaſi Deus in Statua adoraretur: A haſty forgetfulneſs of the truth, that he who ſo lately had worſhipped (Daniel) the ſervant of God, as if he had been God himſelf, ſhould now command a Statua to be erected unto himſelf, wherein himſelf might be worſhipped as God. From this impiety it pleaſed God to reclaim him, by the ſtrange and wonderful delivery of thoſe bleſſed Saints out of the fiery furnace; who being thrown into it bound, for refuſing to commit Idolatry, were aſſiſted by an Angel; preſerved from all harm of the fire; looſened from their bands; and finally called out with gracious words, and reſtored to their former honour by the King: who amazed at the miracle, made a decree tending to the honour of God, which by erection of his Image he had violated. Yet this devotion of Nebuchadnezzar, was not ſo rooted in him, that it could bring forth fruit anſwerable to his haſty zeal. Therefore was he forewarned by God in a dream of the terrible judgment hanging over his head, which Daniel expounding, adviſed him to break off his ſin by righteouſneſs, and his iniquity by mercy towards the poor, that there might be an healing of his error. Hereby it ſeems that injuſtice and cruelty were the faults for which he was threatned: but this threatning ſufficed not unto his information. For that ſo great a Monarch ſhould be driven from among men (according to the tenor of the dream and interpretation); yea, compelled to dwell with the beaſts of the field, and made to eat graſs as the Oxen, was a thing ſo incredible in mans judgment, that eaſily it might be thought an idle dream; and much more eaſily be forgotten at the years end. One whole years leiſure to repent, was given to this haughty Prince: which reſpite of the execution may ſeem to have bred in him a forgetfulneſs of Gods ſentence. For at the end of twelve months, walking in the royal Palace of Babel, he was ſo over-joyed and tranſported with a vain contemplation of his own ſeeming happineſs, that without all fear of Gods heavy judgment pronounced againſt him, he uttered thoſe lofty words before rehearſed, in vaunting of the Majeſtical works which he had reared, as well beſeeming his Majeſtical perſon. But his high ſpeeches were not fully ended, when a voice from Heaven, telling him that his Kingdom was departed from him, rehearſed over unto him the ſentence again, which was fulfilled upon him the very ſame hour.

That Solomon, and many other Princes, and great ones, have taken delight in their own buildings, it cannot any way be doubted; yet I do not remember that ever I have read of any, that were puniſhed for rejoycing in works of this kind (though it is hard in joy or any paſſion of the mind, to keep a juſt meaſure) excepting only this Nebuchadnezzar.

The like may be ſaid of David: for other (and ſome very godly) Kings have muſtred all their forces to the very laſt man; but few or none have been known to have been puniſhed as David was. Surely I not only hold it lawful to rejoyce in thoſe good things wherewith God hath bleſſed us; but a note of much unthankfulneſs to entertain them with a ſullen and unfeeling diſpoſition. Yet as all humane affections, wherein due reverence to God is wanting, are no better than obſcure clouds hindring the influence of that bleſſed Light, which clarifies the ſoul of man, and prediſpoſeth it unto the brightneſs of eternal felicity; ſo that inſolent joy, which man in the pride of his vain imagination conceiveth of his own worth, doth above all other paſſions blaſt our minds, as it were with lightning, and make us to reflect our thoughts upon our ſeeming inherent Greatneſs, forgetting the whilſt him, to whom we are indebted for our very Being. Wherefore theſe Mala mentis gaudia, The evil joys of the mind were not unaptly, by the Prince of Latin Poets, beſtowed in the entrance of Hell, and placed farther inward than ſorrows, cares, and fears, not far from the Iron Cabbins of the Furies. And certainly it is no unlikely token of vengeance near at hand, when theſe unreaſonable flaſhes of proud and vain joy, do rage in a mind, that ſhould have been humbled with a juſt repentance, and acknowledgment of ill deſerving.

This was verified upon Nebuchadnezzar, whoſe puniſhment was ſingular and unexampled. For he ran among beaſts in the fields and woods, where for ſeven years he lived, not only as a ſalvage man, but as a ſalvage beaſt; for a beaſt he thought himſelf, ſecundum ſuam imaginationem, as Thomas noteth, and therefore fed himſelf in the ſame manner, and with the ſame food that beaſts do: Not that he was changed in figure external, according to Mediana, inſomuch as he appeared a beaſt to other mens eyes, as St. Hierom in the life of Hilarius (how true God knows) ſpeaks of a Woman that appeared to all other mens ſight a Cow, but to Hilarius only a Woman; neither was he changed as Iphigenia the daughter of Agamemnon was ſaid to be, into a Hind; nor made a Monſter, as Dorotheus and Epiphanius dreamed: but according to St. Hierom's expoſition of theſe words, At the ſame time was my underſtanding reſtored unto me, &c. Quando dicit (ſaith St. Hierom) ſenſum ſibi redditum, oſtendit non formam ſe amiſiſſe, ſed mentem; When he ſaith that his ſenſe was reſtored unto him, he ſhewed that he had not loſt his humane ſhape, but his underſtanding. Seven years expired, it pleaſed God to reſtore Nabuchodonoſor, both to his underſtanding, and his eſtate, for which he acknowledged and praiſed God all the reſt of his life, confeſſing his power, and everlaſting being; that he was the Lord of Heaven and Earth, and wrought without reſiſtance what he pleaſed in both; that his works were all truth, and his ways righteous. Which gave argument to many of the Fathers, and others, not to doubt of his ſalvation; namely St. Auguſtine, Theodoret, Lyra, Carthuſianus, and others. And for that place of Iſaiah the 14, out of which his perdition may be gathered, the aforenamed Authors apply the ſame to Balthaſar; becauſe Iſaiah both in the 13 and 14 Chapt. ſpeaketh of the King, and the deſtruction of Babylon jointly.

SECT. XII.

Of EVILMERODACH.

HAving already ſpoken what I could of the ſucceſſion and years of Nebuchadnezzar's poſterity; the moſt that may be ſaid of him, is ſaid of Evilmerodach, which I will not here again rehearſe.

He loſt ſome part of that which his Father had gotten; and left his Kingdom burning in a War that conſumed it to aſhes. He loſt Egypt by rebellion of the people, in the nineteenth year of his reign, which was forty years after his Father had conquered it. But this agrees neither with the account of Herodotus, who allows to Amaſis four and forty years of reign; nor with that of Diodorus, who gives him five and fifty, ſaying, that he died in the third year of the threeſcore and third Olympiad, when Cambyſes did conquer Egypt. There were indeed but ſeven and thirty years, which paſſed between the ſecond year of the four and fiftieth Olympiad (which was the nineteenth of Evilmerodach, and the firſt of Amaſis) and the fifth of Cambyſes his reign, wherein he wan Egypt; of which ſeven and thirty years it is credibly held, that Pſammiticus, the Son of Amaſis, reigned three: ſo that Amaſis could be no longer King than four and thirty years. But ſeeing that theſe two Greek Hiſtorians have been abuſed by Egyptian Prieſts in the ſubſtance of that which was ſpoken of Amaſis, it is no marvel though they were alſo deceived in the length of his reign. This is the plain anſwer to this objection. For to ſay, either that the numbers were miſ-written, and four and forty ſet down inſtead of four and thirty; or that Amaſis did temporize a while with the Aſſyrians, and not bear himſelf as abſolute King of Egypt, until the nineteenth of Evilmerodach (at which time, and not before, it hath been proved out of Ezekiel, that Egypt became again a Kingdom) I hold it a ſuperfluous excuſe.

Whether theſe Egyptian-troubles did animate the King of the Medes, to deal with Evilmerodach, as with a Prince greater in fame and reputation, gotten by the decayed valour of his people, than in preſent forces, or whether (as I rather think) ſome foil received by the Aſſyrian invading Media, emboldned the Egyptians to rebel againſt him; I will neither undertake, nor ſeek to define. Xenophon tells, that the firſt ſervice of young Cyrus in War, was under Aſtyages King of the Medes, his Grandfather, in a proſperous fight againſt the Aſſyrian Prince,

Prince, who did ſet upon him; at which time, Cyrus was fifteen or ſixtteen years old. If therefore Cyrus lived threeſcore and three years (as he is ſaid to have died well ſtricken in years) which is held to be the ordinary term of no ſhort life, then was this encounter in the third year of Evilmerodach his reign. Yet by the ſame reckoning it ſhould follow, that the War began more early between theſe Nations, foraſmuch as the manner of their fight in former times, with other circumſtances inſinuating as much, are found in the ſame place of Xenophon. And it may well be, that the death or deſtruction of Nabuchodonoſor gave courage unto thoſe that had felt him a troubleſome neighbour, to ſtand upon prouder terms with the Aſſyrians, than in his flouriſhing eſtate they durſt have uſed. Howſoever the quarrel began, we find that it ended not before the laſt ruin of the Aſſyrian Monarchy. For the Babylonian, being too proud to digeſt the loſſes which he received by the Medes, and their Allies the Perſians, drew unto his party the Lydians, and all the people of the leſſer Aſia, with gifts and ſtrong perſwaſions, hoping ſo to overwhelm his enemies with a ſtrong Invaſion, whom in vain he had fought to weary out with a lingring War.

Xenoph. Cyropæd. l.8.

This happened after the death of Aſtyages, who left the world in the nineteenth year of Evilmerodach, at which time Amaſis took poſſeſſion of Egypt. So that the Aſſyrians having his hands already full of buſineſs, which more earneſtly did affect him, ſeems thereby to have given the better means unto the Egyptians of new erecting their Kingdom, which by long diſtance of place, did ſundry times find occaſion to rebel in after-ages, and ſet up a King within it ſelf, againſt the far more mighty Perſian.

The iſſue of theſe great preparations made by Evilmerodach againſt the Medes, was ſuch as opened the way unto the fulfilling of thoſe Propheſies, which were many years before uttered againſt Babel, by Iſaiah and Jeremy.

For the Aſſyrians and their Confederates, who truſting in their numbers, thought to have buried the Medes and Perſians under their thick ſhowers of arrows and darts, were encountred with an Army of ſtout and well-trained men, weightily armed for cloſe fight, by whom they were beaten in open battel, wherein Evilmerodach was ſlain. So that great frame of Empire which Nabuchodonoſor had raiſed and upheld, being ſhaken and grievouſly crackt under his unfortunate Son, was left to be ſuſtained by his unworthy Nephew; a man more likely to have overthrown it, when it was greateſt and ſtrongeſt, than to repair it, when it was in way of falling.

SECT. XIII.

A private conjecture of the Author, ſerving to make good thoſe things which are cited out of Beroſus, concerning the Succeſſors of Evilmerodach, without wrong to the truth. The quality, and death of Balthaſar.

THough I have already (as it ſeems to me) ſufficiently proved that Balthaſar was the Son, and immediate Succeſſor to Evilmerodach, yet conſidering earneſtly the conjectures of thoſe Writers, which following Beroſus, inſert Nigliſſar, or Nirigliſſoroor, and his Son Labaſſardach between them; as alſo that which I find in Herodotus, of Nitocris a famous Queen of Babylon, who greatly adorned and fortified that City; I have thought it not ſuperfluous here in this place to ſhew by what means it was poſſible, that ſome error might have crept into the Hiſtory of thoſe times, and thereby have brought us to a needleſs trouble of ſearching out the truth, as it were by candle-light, in the uncertain fragments of loſt Authors, which we might have found by day-light, had we adhered only to the Scriptures. Firſt therefore I obſerve, that the time which Beroſus divides betwixt Evilmerodach, and the two next Kings, agrees with the years in which Nebuchadnezzar lived wild among brute beaſts in the open field: Secondly, that the ſuddenneſs of this accident, which came in one hour, could not but work much perturbation in that State, wherein doubtleſs the honour of ſo noble a Prince was highly regarded, his calamity pitied, and his reſtitution hoped; the prediction of Daniel finding reputation in that clauſe which promiſed his recovery, as being verified in that which had been more incredible. Now if we do in common reaſon judg, what courſe was like to be taken by the great Ones of the Kingdom, for ſetling the Government, whilſt the King was thus diſtracted, we ſhall find it moſt likely, that his Son and Heir did occupy the Royal Throne, with condition to reſtore it unto his Father, when God ſhould enable him to repoſſeſs it. In this his rule Evilmerodach being to ſupply the utter want of underſtanding in his Father, as Protectors do the unripeneſs of it in young, but reaſonable Kings, might eaſily either commit the inſolencies, or fall into the troubles, incident to ſuch an office. That he had in him very ſmall ability of Government, it appears by his ill maintaining the Empire, when he held it in his own right. That his Siſter Nitocris (if Nitocris were his Siſter) was a Woman of high ſpirit, it appears by that which Herodotus reports of her, ſaying, That ſhe was more cunning than Semiramis, as appeared in her magnificent and uſeful works about the River of Euphrates, and her fortification of Babylon againſt the Medes, who had gotten many Towns from the Aſſyrians, and amongſt them Nineve. Wherefore it were not unreaſonable to think, that ſuch a Woman, ſeeing how the Empire went to decay through her Brothers miſ-government, uſed practices to get the rule into her own hands, and afterwards, as a Mother, to leave it unto her ungracious Son. Other time than this, wherein Nitocris could have reigned, we do not find; but we find in Beroſus (as Joſephus hath cited him) that Nigliſſar who got the Kingdom from Evilmerodach, was his Siſters Husband; which argues this to have been the ſame woman. As for Labaſſardach the Son of Nigliſſar, if at the end of nine months reign he were for his leud conditions ſlain by the Nobility, as the ſame Beroſus reporteth; it ſeems that God prepared hereby the way for Nebuchadnezzar's reſtitution (whoſe term of puniſhment was then expired) by raiſing ſuch trouble, as ſhould make him the more deſired, both of the Princes and the people. I will not here uſe many words to confute that which Beroſus hath further ſet down of Evilmerodach, telling us that he was ſlain by his Siſters Husband: For the plain words of the Scripture, naming the year wherein he gave liberty to Jechonia, do plainly teſtifie that he out-lived the three or four and fortieth year of his Fathers reign, which was the laſt of his life.

Herod. l.1.

This may ſuffice to ſhew, that they who are ſaid to have ſucceeded Evilmerodach in the Kingdom,

dom, might indeed have so done, though not when he held it in his own right. Of Balthasar, who was his Son and Heir, we find that he had such conditions as God permitted to be in a King for the ruin of the people. He was from his young years of a mischievous nature; having in his Fathers time slain a Noble young man that should have married his Sister, only for spight and envy to see him kill two wild beasts in hunting, at which himself having thrown his Javelin had missed them. Another great Lord he had gelded, because a Gentlewoman commending his beauty, said, It were a happy woman that should be his wife. Such barbarous villanies caused many which had loved his Father (as a good and gracious, though unfortunate Prince) to revolt from him unto the enemy as soon as he was King. Neither do I find that he performed any thing worthy of record, but as a coward and a fool he lost all; sitting still, and not once daring to give battel to them that daily took somewhat from him. Yet carelesly feasting when danger had hemmed him in on every side, and when death arrested him by the hands of those whom he had wronged in his Fathers life. So the end of him was base and miserable; for he died as a fool taken in unexcusable security; yet had not that happiness, such as it is, of a death free from apprehension of fear, but was terrified with a dreadful Vision; which had shewed his ruin not in many hours before, even whilst he was drinking in that Wine, which the swords of his insulting enemies drew out of him, together with his lateſt blood. It is therefore in this place enough to say of him, That after a dishonourable reign of seventeen years, he perished like a beast, and was slain as he deserved. The rest that concerneth him in question of his time, hath been spoken heretofore; in matter of his affairs, shall be handled among the acts of Cyrus, to whose story, that of Balthasar is but an appendix.

CHAP. II.

Of the Original and first greatness of the Persians.

SECT. I.

That the Medes were the chief actors in the subversion of the Babylonian Empire.

THe Line of Belochus being now extinguished in Balthasar, the Empire of Babylon, and of Assyria, was joined first to that of Media, which then was governed by Cyaxares, or Darius Medus; after whom Cyrus became Lord and Monarch, both of Assyria, and of Media it self.

Of the race of Phul Belochus there were ten Kings besides himself, and of Arbaces as many are found by Metasthenes. These two Provincial Governours having cut down the last branch of Ninus in Sardanapalus, divided between them the Eastern Empire. Cyaxares (whom the Scriptures call Darius Medus) the last of the race of Arbaces, dying about two years after that the Line of Belochus was ended in Balthasar; the Dominions as well of the Conqueror, as of the conquered, fell to a third Family, namely to Cyrus of the house of Achæmenes; the Princes of which blood reigning in Persia, had formerly been dependants on the Medes, and were of as little power at home, as of fame abroad in the world.

Of the Family of the Achæmenes, and Line of the Persian Kings, we shall hereafter find occasion in due place to intreat.

The Nation of the Medes descended from Madai the third Son of Japhet. That they had Kings soon after the Flood, Lactantius and Diodorus have found record; For Lactantius remembreth an ancient King of the Medes called Hydaspes; and Diodore speaketh of Pharnus with his seven Sons, slain by the Assyrians in the beginning of their Empire.

But of these who succeeded Arbaces the first, that freed his Nation from the Assyrians, I take the list and number from Eusebius, adding Darius Medus: of whom I have spoken in their proper places heretofore; and they are these:

Arbaces	Reigned	28 years.
Sorsamus		30 years.
Medidus		40 years.
Cardiceas		13 years.
Diocles		53 years.
Phraortes		24 years.
Cyaxares		32 years.
Astyages		38 years.
Darius Medus

And though the Greeks ascribe the Conquest of Babylon to Cyrus alone, yet the Scriptures teach us, that Darius was not only King of Media, and had the Persians his followers; but that the Army victorious over Balthasar, was his; as the Assyrian and Babylonian Empire also was, during his own life. For we find in Daniel, that Darius of the Medes took the Kingdom, being threescore and two years old: And further, what Officers it pleased him to set over the Kingdom. And so was it prophesied by Isaiah long before: Behold, I will stir up the Medes against them, &c. And by Jeremy; The Lord hath raised up the spirit of the King of the Medes: for his purpose is against Babel to destroy it; and 28. ver. Prepare against her the Nations, with the King of the Medes, the Dukes thereof, the Princes thereof, and all the land of his Dominion. These Scriptures Julius Africanus doth well open, who taking authority from Diodore, Castor, Thalus, and others, delivereth, that Babylon was taken before Cyrus began to reign; which also agreeth with Strabo, where he saith, That as the Medes were subjugated by the Persians; so before that, both the Babylonians and Assyrians were mastered by the Medes. And therefore the reports of Justin and Herodotus are not to be received, who attribute the taking of Babylon to Cyrus alone.

SECT.

SECT. II.

By what means the Empire was tranſlated from the Medes to the Perſians.

HOw the Kingdom of the Medes fell into the hands of Cyrus, it is a doubt not ſufficiently cleared by Hiſtorians; But rather their different relations of his beginnings have bred the former opinion of thoſe who give the Conqueſt of Babel to the Perſians only. For ſome there are who deny that Aſtyages had any other Succeſſor than Cyrus, his Grand-child by Mandane. Whereas Cteſias on the contrary ſide affirmeth, that Cyrus was no way deſcended from Aſtyages (whom he called Aſtigas or Apania) but only that having vanquiſhed him in battel, and confined him to Bactria, he married his Daughter Amytis. But I find the relations of Cteſias often cited, and ſeldom followed, and himſelf ſometimes very juſtly reproved of wilful untruth.

Viginier, a diligent and learned Hiſtorian of this age, produceth many probable reaſons that Aſtyages had no ſuch Son as Cyaxares, or Darius Medus; and to confirm this opinion the more, he citeth Diodore, Juſtin, Strabo, Plato, Ariſtotle, Socrates, and before them, Caſtor, Thalus, and Phlegon; who do not find any ſuch Succeſſor. Neither do Tatianus, Theophilus Antiochenus, Julius, Africanus, Clemens Alexandrinus, Juſtin Martyr, Lactantius, Euſebius, St. Hierom, or St. Auguſtin, make report out of any faithful Author by them read, that hath given other Son or Succeſſor to Aſtyages than Cyrus.

Yet ſeeing that this manner of argument ab authoritate negative, doth never inforce conſent; we may be the bolder (all this great liſt of noble Writers by him alledged notwithſtanding) to affirm, that either Aſtyages himſelf muſt have been Darius of the Medes, which cannot agree with his place in the courſe of time; or elſe to give him ſome other ſucceſſor, according to Joſephus and Xenophon, the ſame whom Daniel calleth Darius. For it is manifeſt, and without diſpute, that the King of the Medes commanded in chief, and was abſolute Lord of that Conqueſt; Cyrus during his life, being no other than the Lieutenant of his Army, and ſubject to his authority; the ſtrength of both Nations, to wit, the Medes and Perſians, with other the Vaſſals of Darius, being joyned together to compound it.

Xen. l. 1. c. 19. Joſ. An. l. 10. c. 13. Xen. l. 8. Pæd.

But it is very certain, that the honour of that great victory over Babylon was wholly given to Cyrus, who was the inſtrument preordained and forenamed by God himſelf for this action; but for the delivery of his Church; a greater work not only in the eyes of God, than the ſubverſion of any State or Monarchy how powerful ſoever.

And it may well be thought, that the Soldiers employed in that ſervice did rather aſcribe the glory to him that was the beſt man of war, than to the Median, who was greateſt in riches and power. All which alſo falling upon Cyrus by ſucceſſion, and continuing in his poſterity, did much augment the fame of his vertue; which among prophane Hiſtorians over-grew altogether the honour due to Cyaxares, both becauſe he was old, and did nothing in perſon; as alſo becauſe he ſoon after quitted the world, and left all to Cyrus, who was poſſeſt of whatſoever belonged to Darius, before the fame of any ſuch King or Conqueror was carried far off.

And for the Greek Hiſtorians, they took all things from the relation of the Perſians, who gave to Cyrus all the praiſe of a moſt excellent Prince, making none his equal. Only Daniel in the firſt, fifth, and ſixth Chapters of his Prophecy, makes it plain, that himſelf not only lived a great Officer under King Darius, but that he continued in that eſtate to the firſt of Cyrus; which being the year of Daniel's death, could not have been diſtinguiſhed from the reign of Darius, if they had begun together and reigned jointly: Neither can it be imagined that Darius held the Kingdom by Cyrus permiſſion, conſidering that Cyrus began after him.

SECT. III.

Xenophon's relation of the War which the Medes and Perſians made with joint forces upon the Aſſyrians and others.

THeſe Teſtimonies of the Scriptures, which need no other confirmation, are yet made more open to our underſtanding, by that which Xenophon hath written of theſe Wars: The cauſe whereof, according to his report, was this.

When the Aſſyrian had enlarged his Empire with Victories, and was become Lord of all Syria, and many other Countrys; he began to hope that if the Medes could be brought under his ſubjection, there ſhould not then be left any Nation adjoining, able to make head againſt him. For the King of the Medes was able to bring into the field threeſcore thouſand Foot, and ten thouſand Horſe; to which the forces of Perſia being joined, made an exceeding ſtrong Army.

The Aſſyrian conſidering the ſtrength of ſuch a Neighbour, invited Cræſus King of Lydia, a Prince very mighty both in men and treaſure, and with him other Lords of Aſia the leſs, to his aſſiſtance; alledging, that thoſe Eaſtern Nations were very powerful, and ſo firmly conjoined by league, and many alliances, that it would not be eaſie, no not poſſible, for any one Nation to reſiſt them. With theſe incitements, and ſtrengthned with great Preſents, he drew to himſelf ſo many adherents, as he compounded an Army of Two hundred thouſand Foot, and threeſcore thouſand Horſe; of which, ten thouſand Horſe, and forty thouſand Foot were led by Cræſus, who had great cauſe of enmity with the Medes, in regard of the War made by them againſt his Father Alyattes: But this great Army was by Cyaxares King of the Medes, and by Cyrus General of the Perſian forces, utterly broken: Upon which defeat the Aſſyrian King being alſo ſlain, ſo many of the Aſſyrians revolted, as Babylon it ſelf could not longer be aſſured without the ſuccours of Mercenaries, waged with great ſumms of Money out of Aſia the leſs, Egypt, and elſewhere. Which new gathered forces were alſo ſcattered by Cyrus, who following his advantage, poſſeſt himſelf of a great part of the leſſer Aſia; at which time it was, as I take it, that Cræſus himſelf was alſo made priſoner.

The attempt of Babylon following ſoon after, the Army lying before it being paid by Darius, whom Xenophon called Cyaxares, and led by Cyrus his Siſters Son, prevailed againſt Balthaſar, as in due time ſhall be ſet down.

Thoſe Perſians which followed Cyrus, and by him levied, are numbered thirty thouſand foot-men, of which a thouſand were armed Gentlemen, the

reſt of the common ſort were Archers, or ſuch as uſed the Dart or Sling: So far Xenophon.

Of whom in this argument, as it is true, that he deſcribed in Cyrus the pattern of a moſt Heroical Prince, with much Poetical addition: ſo it cannot be denied but that the bulk and groſs of his Narration was founded upon meer Hiſtorical truth.

Neither can it indeed be affirmed of any the like Writers, that in every ſpeech and circumſtance he hath preciſely tyed himſelf to the phraſe of the ſpeaker, or nature of the occaſion: but borrowed in each out of his own invention, appropriating the ſame to the times and perſons of whom he treated. Putting therefore apart the Moral and Politick diſcourſe, and examining but the Hiſtory of things done, it will eaſily appear, that Xenophon hath handled his undertaken ſubject in ſuch ſort, that by beautifying the face thereof, he hath not in any ſort corrupted the body.

SECT. IV.

The eſtate of the Medes and Perſians in times foregoing this great War.

FOr it is commonly agreed upon, that Achæmenes, the Son of Perſes, being Governour of Perſia, did aſſociate himſelf with Arbaces, who commanded in Media, in that rebellion againſt Sardanapalus, and that each of them after the victory obtained, held for himſelf the Dominion of thoſe Countrys which he had formerly ruled for the Aſſyrians; as alſo that they conveyed over the ſame honour and power to their poſterity: which in Media was not abſolutely Regal, but with ſome reſtraint limited, until ſuch time as Deioces took upon him the full authority and majeſty of a King. From the death of Sardanapalus to the reign of Deioces, are uſually accounted about an hundred and forty years; in the laſt ſixty whereof, there reigned in Aſſyria mighty Princes, namely, Salmanaſſar and his Succeſſors; whoſe great atchievements in Syria and elſewhere, witneſs, that the Medes and Perſians found it not for their advantage to undertake any offenſive War againſt thoſe victorious Kings: it being alſo probable, that the league continued as yet between theſe the ſucceſſors of Belochus and Arbaces, who had formerly ſhared the Empire.

Now from the beginning of Deioces to the firſt of Aſtyages, there paſt above ninety years; in which, if Herodotus have written truly, that Phraortes conquered Perſia, and how he and other Kings of Media by many Victories greatly enlarged their Dominions, and commanded many parts of Aſia, it had been but an unadviſed enterprize of the Aſſyrians and Babylonians, to have waſted themſelves againſt the Syrians and Egyptians, leaving ſo able and victorious a Nation on their backs. But that the Medes had done nothing upon the South parts of Perſia; and that the Perſians themſelves were not Maſters of Suſiana in Nabuchodonoſor's time; it is manifeſt in Daniel, who was then Governour for the Babylonian in Suſa, or Suſan, the chief City thereof. It is true indeed, that the Medians, either under Cyaxares, or Aſtyages, or both, had quarrel with Halyattes the Father of Crœſus, which after ſome ſix years diſpute was compounded.

How the affairs of Perſia ſtood in ſo many ages, I do not find any memory. It ſeemeth that the roughneſs of the mountainous Country which they then poſſeſt, with the confederacy which they continued with the Medes, gave them more ſecurity than fame: For if their Kings, being the poſterity of Achæmenes, had done any memorable acts, the greatneſs which they afterward obtained, would not have ſuffered any forgetfulneſs thereof. But as we find all Xenophon's reports, both of theſe Wars, and the ſtate of thoſe Countrys, to be very conſonant and agreeable to the relation of many other good Authors; ſo it appears, that the race of Achæmenes held the Principality of Perſia from Father to Son for many deſcents. And therefore we may better give credit to Xenophon, who affirmeth, That Cambyſes the Father of Cyrus, was King of Perſia; than to thoſe that make him a mean man, and ſay, that Aſtyages gave him his Daughter Mandane in Marriage, to the end that her Son (whoſe nativity he feared) might be diſabled from any great undertaking by his Fathers ignobility.

For what cauſe of grief could it be to Aſtyages, that the Son of his Daughter ſhould become Lord of the beſt part of Aſia? No, it was more likely, that upon ſuch a Prophecy his love to his Grandchild ſhould have increaſed, and his care been the greater to have married her to ſome Prince of ſtrength and eminent virtue.

Yea, the ſame Herodotus, who is the firſt Author, and as I think, the deviſer of the miſchief intended againſt Cyrus by his Grand-father, doth confeſs, That the line of the Achæmenidæ was ſo renowned, that the great King Xerxes in the height of his proſperity, did thence derive himſelf, and vaunt of it: which he would never have done, had they been ignoble, or had they been the vaſſals of any other King or Monarch.

For in this ſort Xerxes in the ſeventh of Herodotus deriveth himſelf:

Cambyſes.	Ariaramines.	Darius.
Cyrus.	Arſamnes.	Xerxes.

Of the Achæmenidæ there were two races: of the firſt was Cyrus the great, whoſe iſſue-male failed in his two Sons, Cambyſes and Smerdis. This royal Family is thus ſet down by the learned Reineccius.

Achæmenes, the Son of Perſes, firſt King of Perſia.
Darius.
Cyrus, the firſt of that name, had Cambyſes, and Atoſſa, who married to Pharnaces, King of Cappadocia, had Artiſtona and other Daughters.
Cambyſes had
Cyrus the Great: Cyrus had Cambyſes, who ſucceeded him, and Smerdis, ſlain by his Brother Cambyſes.

Of the ſecond, were thoſe ſeven great Princes of Perſia, who having overthrown the uſurped Royalty of the Magi, choſe from among themſelves Darius the Son of Hyſtaſpes, King.

This Kingdom of Perſia was firſt known by the name of Elam, ſo called after Elam the Son of Sem; and the people therein inhabiting, Elamitæ; by Elianus, Elymæ; by Joſephus, Elymi.

Suidas derives this Nation ſometimes from Aſſur, ſometimes from Magog, of whom they were called Maguſæi; which Maguſæi, according to Euſebius, are not to be taken for the Nation in general, but for thoſe that were afterward called the Magi, or Wiſemen. So do the Greeks, among many other their ſayings of them, affirm, That the Perſians were anciently written Artæi, and that they called themſelves Cephenes. But that they were Elamitæ, Moses and the Prophets, Isaiah, Jeremy, Ezekiel, Daniel, and Esdras, in many places confirm: Which also St. Hierom upon Jeremy the five and twentieth, upon Daniel the eighth, and also in his Hebrew questions, approveth, saying: Elam a quo Elamitæ Principes Persidis; Elam, of whom were the Elamites Princes of Persia.

And that City which the Author of the second Book of the Maccabees calleth Persepolis, is by the Author of the first called Elamais, but is now called Siras, being the same which Antiochus, for the great riches thereof, twice attempted, in vain, and to his great dishonour. And yet this City, now called Siras, was not the old Persepolis; for Alexander, at the request of Thais the Harlot, burnt it.

The first King of Persia to us known, if we follow the current of Authors, interpreting the fourteenth Chapter of Genesis, was Chedorlaomer, who lived with Amrafel or Ninias, and joined with him in the War against those Arabians, who was afterward extinguished by the forces of Abraham.

of CYRUS.

SECT. I.

of Cyrus his Name, and first Actions.

Strab. l. 15.

AS touching the Name of Cyrus, Strabo saith, That the same was taken from a River which watereth Persia; this great Prince having Agradatus for his proper Name: But the great Cyrus was the first of that Name. Herodotus, otherwise; and that Cyrus signifieth a Father in the Persian Tongue, and therefore so intituled by the people.

Plut. in vit. Artax.

It is true, that for his Justice and other excellent virtues, he was indeed called a Father: But that the Name of Cyrus had any such signification, I think it be mistaken.

Plutarch hath a third opinion, affirming, That Cyrus is as much to say as the Sun, in the same Language. Howsoever it be, yet the Prophet Isaiah, almost two hundred years before Cyrus was born, gives him that Name, Thus saith the Lord unto Cyrus his Anointed, &c.

Before the Conquest of Babylon, the Victories which Cyrus obtained, were many and great: among which the Conquest of Lydia, and other Provinces thereto subject, together with the taking of Crœsus himself, are not recounted by Eusebius, Orosius, and others, but placed among his latter atchievements: whose opinion for his difference of time is founded upon two reasons; namely, That of the Median there is no mention in the last War against Crœsus; and that the obtaining of Sardis is referred to the eight and fiftieth Olympiad; and the glorious Victory which Cyrus had over Babylon, to the five and fiftieth Olympiad.

The former of which might have been used (and was by the Greeks) to exclude the Medes from the honour of having won Babylon it self, which in due place I have answered. The latter seems to have reference to the second War which Cyrus made upon Lydia, when it rebelled; at which time he so established his former Conquest, as after that time these Nations never offered to revolt. Wherefore I like better in this particular to believe with Herodotus, whom the most of Chronologers follow, and find the enterprize of Sardis to precede that of Babylon.

SECT. II.

of Crœsus the King of Lydia, who made War upon Cyrus.

IHave in the last Book spoke somewhat of Crœsus, of his race and predecessors, as also of those Kings which governed Lydia in more ancient times: of which the first (to prophane Authors known) was Lydus the Son of Atys: which Family extinguished, the Kingdom was by an Oracle conferred upon Argon, descended from Hercules, whereof there were two and twenty Generations, Candaules being the last, who by shewing his fair Wife naked to Gyges his Favourite, he was by the same Gyges (thereto urged upon peril of his own life by the Queen) the next day slain. Which done, Gyges enjoyed both the Queen and the Kingdom of Lydia, and left the same to *Ary*s his Son, who was Father to Sadyattes, the Father of Halyattes (who thrust the Cimmerians out of Asia) and Halyattes begat Crœsus. Which five Kings of a third race, enjoyed that Kingdom an hundred and seventy years. Halyattes the Father of Crœsus was an undertaking Prince; and after he had continued a War against Cyaxares the Median, a Prince very powerful, and maintained it six years, a peace was concluded upon equal conditions between them. Her. l. 1. p. 3, 4, & 5.

Astyages the Son of Cyaxares, and Grand-father to Cyrus, thought himself greatly honoured by obtaining Aryenes, Crœsus Sister, whom he married.

But Crœsus so far enlarged his Dominions after his Fathers death, as he was nothing inferior in territory to any King or Monarch of that age: Of which, about that time there were four in effect of equal strength; to wit, the Median, the Babylonian, the Egyptian, and the Lydian: only Nabuchodonosor, after he had joined Phœnicia, Palastina, and Egypt to his Empire, had thenceforward no Competitor during his own life.

But Crœsus, notwithstanding the men and treasure spent in the quarrel of the Babylonians, he yet mastered Æolis, Doris, and Ionia, Provinces possest by the Greeks in Asia the less, adjoining to Lydia; gave Law to the Phrygians, Bithinians, Carians, Carians, Mysians, Paphlagonians, and other Nations. And that he also inforc'd the Ephesians to acknowledg him, notwithstanding they compassed their City with Diana's Girdle, Herodotus witnesseth. Moreover, Athæneus out of Berosus (which also confirmeth) makes report of a signal Victory which Crœsus obtained against the Sacæans, a Nation of the Scythians, in memory whereof the Babylonians his allies did yearly celebrate a Feast, which they called Sacæa: All which he performed in fourteen years.

Herod. l. 5. Athe. l. 14. c. 17.

And being now confident in the continuance of his good fortune, and envious of Cyrus fame, doubting also that his prosperous undertakings might in the end grow perilous to himself, he consulted with the Oracle of Apollo (whom he presented with marvellous rich gifts) what success he might hope for against Cyrus, if he undertook him: from whom he received this riddle; Crœsus passing over the River Halys, shall dissolve a great Dominion. For the Devil being doubtful of the success, payed him with merchandize of both sides alike, and might be inverted either way, to the ruin of Persia, or of his own Lydia.

SECT. III.

Crœsus his Expedition against Cyrus.

HEreupon Crœsus being resolved to stop the course of Cyrus fortunes, if he could: despised all the arguments used by Sandanes to the contrary: who desired him to fore-think, That he urged a Nation inhabiting a barren and mountainous Region; a people not covered with the soft silk of Worms, but with the hard skins of Beasts; not fed with such meat as they fancied, but content with what they found; drinkers of Water, not of Wine: and in a word, a Nation warlike, enduring, valiant and prosperous; over whom, if he became victorious, he could thereby enrich himself in nothing but fame, in which he already excelled: and if by them beaten, and subjected, so great would his loss appear of all things which the world hath in account, as the fame could neither hastily be told, nor readily conceived.

Notwithstanding this solid counsel, Crœsus having prepared a powerful Army, he led the same toward Media: but in his passage he was arrested at Pterium, a City of great strength in Cappadocia; which while he sought by all means to surprize or to force, Cyrus came on, and found the Lydians encamped before it. That each was inferior to other in strength or opinion, I do not find: for out of doubt, Crœsus, as he excelled any Prince of that age in riches and ability; so was he not under any in territory and fame that then lived.

But as Cratippus of Mitylene answered Pompey when he complained against the gods, because they favoured a disturber and usurper of the Commonweal against him who sought for the Roman liberty, That Kingdoms and Common-weals had their encrease and period from divine Ordinance: so at this time was the Winter of Crœsus prosperity at hand, the leaves of his flourishing fortune ready to fall, and that of Cyrus but in the flower and first spring. The God of all power, and not Admetis Herdman, Apollo, had given a date to the one, and a beginning of glory to the other.

When these two Armies were in view of each other, after the entertainment of divers skirmishes, the Persians and Lydians began to join in grois troops: supplys from both Kings thrust on upon the falling off, and advancement of either Nations: and as the Persians had somewhat the better of the day; so when the dark vail of night had hidden each Army from the others view, Crœsus doubting what success the rising Sun would bring with it, quitted the field to Cyrus, and with all speed possible retired; and taking the next way into Lydia, recovered Sardis his first City and Regal Seat, without any pursuit made by Cyrus to retard him. Where being arrived, and nothing suspecting Cyrus approach, or any other War for that Winter, he dismissed the Soldiers, and sent the Troops of his sundry Nations to their own Provinces, appointing them to re-assemble at the end of five months; acquainting his Commanders with his intents for the renewing of the War at the time appointed.

SECT. IV.

The Conquest of Lydia by Cyrus.

CYrus in the following morning finding the Lydians departed, put his Army in order to pursue them; yet not so hastily, and at their heels, as to be discovered. But having good intelligence of Crœsus his proceeding, he so measured his marches, as he presented not himself before Sardis, till such time as Crœsus had disposed his Army to their wintring garrisons; which being altogether unlooked for, and unfeared, he surrounded Sardis with his Army; Wherein Crœsus having no other Companies than his Citizens and Ordinary Guards, after fourteen days siege the same was entred by assault, and all executed that resisted. Crœsus having now neither Arms to fight, nor wings to fly, Sardis being on all parts strongly encompassed, thrust himself into the heap and miserable multitude of his vassals, and had undergone the common fortune of common persons vanquished, had not a son of his, who had been dumb all his life (by extremity of passion and fear enabled) cried out to the Soldiers to spare Crœsus. Who thereupon being taken and imprisoned, despoiled of all things but the expectation of death, he was forthwith tied in fetters, and set on the top of a great and high heap of wood, to be consumed to ashes thereon. To which when the fire was set and kindled, remembring the discourse which he had with the Athenian Law-giver, he thrice cried out on his name, Solon, Solon, Solon: and being demanded what he meant by that invocation, he first used silence; but urged again, he told them, That he had now found it true which Solon had long since told him, That many men in the race and courses of their lives might well be accounted fortunate; but no man could discern himself for happy indeed till his end.

In communi calamitate suam quisq; habet fortunam, Curt. Memoriam metus perimit: timor, vocis est incitamentum. &c. Solin. c. 7.

Of which answer Cyrus being speedily informed, remembring the changes of fortune, and his own mortality, he commanded his Ministers of Justice to withdraw the fire with all diligence, to save Crœsus, and to conduct him to his presence: Which done, Cyrus demanded of him, Who it was that had perswaded him, or what self-reason had conducted him to invade his Territory, and to make him of a Friend an Enemy? To whom he thus answered: It was thy prosperous, and my unprosperous destiny (the Greecian god flattering therewithal my ambition) that were the inventers and conducters of Crœsus War against Cyrus.

Homo qui in homine calamitoso miserior est, meminit sui, cass.

Cyrus being pierc'd with Crœsus answer, and bewailing his estate, though victorious over it, did not only spare his life, but entertained him ever after as a King, and his companion, shewing therein a true effect of mercy indeed, Quæ non causam, sed fortunam spectat.

And herein is the real difference discerned between that behaviour which we call beneficium latronis, and gratiam Principis: A thief sometime sparing the life of him which is in his power, but unjustly: A King that giveth breath, and a continuance of being, to him that was the cause and author of his own evil.

The report made by Xenophon, is, That Cyrus did friendly entertain Crœsus at the first sight, not mentioning that which Herodotus delivers, and is here already set down, that he should have been burnt alive. It may very well be, that Xenophon pourtraying (in Cyrus) an heroical Prince, thought an intent so cruel, fitter to be forgotten than rehearsed, as too much mis-beseeming a generous nature. And it is very likely, that neerness of alliance might withhold Cyrus (had he been otherwise vicious) from so cruel a purpose against his Grandmothers brother. Howsoever it was, the moral part of the story hath given much credit and reputation to the report of Herodotus (as to many the like it often doth) and made it pass for currant; though the trust reposed in Crœsus afterwards may seem to argue, that Cyrus did not use him inhumanely at the first.

For as Herodotus himself telleth us, when Cyrus past with his Army over Araxes into Scythia, he left Crœsus to accompany and advise his son Cambyses, Governour of the Empire, in his absence, with whom he lived all the time of Cyrus, and did afterward follow Cambyses into Egypt, where he hardly escaped his tyranous hand. What his end was, I do not find.

But in this time the races of three of the greatest Kings in that part of the World took end; to wit, of the Babylonians, Medians, and Lydians; in Balthasar, Cyaxares, and Crœsus.

SECT. V.

How Cyrus won Babylon.

After this Lydian War, ensued the great Conquest of Babylon, which gave unto Cyrus an Empire so large and mighty, that he was justly reputed the greatest Monarch then living upon earth. How long time the preparations for this great action took up, it is uncertain; only it seems, that ten whole years did pass between his taking those two Cities of Sardis and Babylon; which nevertheless I do not think to have been wholly occupied in provision for the Assyrian War, but rather to have been spent in setling the Estate which he had already purchased. And hereunto perhaps may be referred that which Ctesias hath in his fragments, of a War made by Cyrus upon the Scythians, though related as foregoing the Victory obtained against Crœsus. He telleth us, That Cyrus invaded Scythia: and being victorious over that Nation, took Amorges their King prisoner: but being in a second battel overthrown by the wife of Amorges, Sparetha, and therein taken, the one King was delivered for the other.

Likewise it may be thought that no small part of those troubles which arose in the lower Asia, grew soon after the departure of the victorious Army, before the Conquest was fully established.

For after Cyrus was returned out of Asia the less, many Nations conquered formerly by Crœsus, and now by Cyrus, revolted from him; against whom he employed Pactias, and then Harpagus, who first reduced the Phocians under their former obedience, and then the rest of the Greeks inhabiting Asia the less, as the Ionians, Carians, Æolians, and Lycians, who resolvedly (according to the strength they had) defended themselves. But in the attempt upon Babylon it self, it is not to be doubted, that Cyrus employed all his forces, having taken order before-hand, that nothing should be able to divert him, or to raise that siege, and make frustrate the work upon which he did set all his rest. And great reason there was, that he should bend all his care and strength unto the taking of that City, which beside the fame and reputation that it held, as being head of an Empire thereon depending, was so strongly fenced with a treble wall of great height, and surrounded with waters unfoordable, so plentifully victualled for many years, that the inhabitants were not only free from all doubt and fear of their estate, but despised and derided all purposes and power of their besiegers.

The only hope of the Medes and Persians, who despaired of carrying by assault a City so well fortified and man'd, was in cutting off all supplys of victuals and other necessaries: whereof though the Town was said to be stored sufficiently for more than twenty years, yet might it well be deemed, that in such a world of people as dwelt within those gates, one great want or other would soon appear, and vanquish the resolution of that unwarlike multitude. In expecting the success of this course, the Besiegers were likely to endure much travel, and all in vain, if they did not keep streight watch and strong guards upon all quarters.

This was hard to do, in regard of the vast circuit of those walls which they were to gird in, with numbers neither great enough, nor of men sufficiently assured unto their Commander: The consideration whereof ministred unto the Babylonians matter of good pastime, when they saw the Lydians, Phrygians, Cappadocians, and others, quartered about their Town to keep them in, who having been their ancient friends and allies, were more likely to join with them, if occasion were offered, than to use much diligence on the behalf of Cyrus; who had, as it were yesterday, laid upon their necks the galling yoke of servitude. Whilest the besieged were pleasing themselves in this deceitful and vain gladness, that is the ordinary forerunner of sudden calamity; Cyrus, whom the Ordinance of God made strong, constant, and inventive, devised by so many Channels and Trenches as were sufficient and capable of Euphrates, to draw the same from the walls of Babylon, thereby to make his approach the more facile and assured: which when by the labour of many hands he had performed, he stayed the time of his advantage for the execution: for he had left certain banks or heads uncut, between the main river which surrounded the City, and his own Trenches. Xenoph. Cyropæd. l. 7.

Now Balthasar finding neither any want or weakness within, nor any possibility of approach for his enemies without, prepared an exceeding sumptuous Feast, publick Plays, and other Pastimes; and thereto invited a thousand of his Princes or Nobility, besides his Wives, Curtizans, and others of that trade. This he did either to let the besiegers know, that his provisions were either sufficient, not only for all needful uses, but even for jollity and excess;

or because he hoped that his enemies, under the burthen of many distresses, were well near broken; or in honour of Bell his most reverenced Idol; or that it was his Birth or Coronation-day; or for many or all these respects. And he was not contented with such magnificence as no Prince else could equal; but (using Daniel's words) he lifted himself up against the Lord of heaven: for he and his Princes, Wives and Concubines, made carousing cups of the vessels of Gold, in contempt of whom he praised his own Puppets, made of Silver and Gold, of Brass, Iron, Wood, and Stone; Quanta fuit stultitia in vasibus aureis bibentes, ligneos & lapideos deos laudare? How great a foolishness was it (saith St. Hierom) drinking in golden Cups, to praise gods of Wood and Stone? While Balthasar was in this sort triumphing, and his brains well filled with vapors, he beheld a hand, which by divine power wrote on the wall opposite unto him, certain words which he understood not: wherewith so great a fear and amazement seised
Dan. 5. 6. him, as the joints of his loyns were loosed, and his knees smote one against the other. Which passion, when he had in some part recovered, he cried out for his Chaldæans, Astrologians, and Southsayers, promising them great rewards, and the third place of honour in the Kingdom to him that could read and expound the writing: but it exceeded their Art. In this disturbance and astonishment, the Queen hearing what had past, and of the Kings amazement, after reverence done, used this speech: There is a man in thy Kingdom, in whom is the spirit of the holy Gods: and in the days of thy Father, light, and understanding, and wisdom, like the wisdom of the Gods, was found in him, whom the King Nabuchodonosor thy Father, the King (I say) thy Father made chief of the Inchanters, Astrologians, Chaldæans, and Southsayers, because a more excellent spirit, and knowledg, and understanding, &c. were found in him, even in Daniel, &c. Now let Daniel be called, and he will declare the interpretation.

Orig. & Theod. in Dan. Joseph. Ant. 10. This Queen Josephus takes for the Grand-mother, Origen and Theodoret, for the Mother of Balthasar; either of which may be true: for it appeareth that she was not any of the Kings Wives, because absent from the feast; and being past the age of dancing and banquetting, she came in upon the bruit of the miracle, and to comfort the King in his distraction. And whereas Daniel was forgotten and neglected by others both of younger years and times, this old Queen remembred well what he had done in the days of Nabuchodonosor, Grandfather to this Balthasar, and kept in mind both his Religion and divine gifts.

When Daniel was brought to the Kings presence, who acknowledged those excellent graces wherewith God had enriched him, he prayed him, together with promises of reward and honour, to read and interpret those words miraculously written; to whom Daniel made answer in a far different style from that he used towards his Grandfather: for the evil which he foretold Nabuchodonosor, he wished that the same might befall his enemies; but to this King (whose neglect of God, and vice, he hated) he answered in these words, Keep thy rewards to thy self, and give thy gifts to another; yet will I read the writing unto the King, and shew him the interpretation. Which before he had performed, he gave him first the cause of Gods just judgment against him, and the reason of this terrible sentence, whereof the King and all his
Dan. 5. 18, 19, 20. Wise men were utterly ignorant. Which being written at large in Daniel, hath this effect, That forgetting Gods goodness to his Father, whom all Nations feared and obeyed, and that for his pride and neglect of those benefits, as he deprived him of his estate and understanding; so upon the acknowledgment of Gods infinite power he restored him to both. This King notwithstanding, lifted himself up against the same God; and presuming both to abuse those Vessels dedicated to holy uses, and neglecting the Lord of all power, praised and worshipped the dead Idols of Gold, Silver, Brass, Iron, Stone, and Wood: and therefore those words, from the Oracle of a true God delivered, (to wit) Mene, Tekel, Upharsin, gave the King knowledg, that God hath numbred the time of his Kingdom, and finished it; that he was weighed in the ballance of Gods Justice, and found too light; and that his Empire was divided and given to the Medes and Persians.

The very evening or night of this day, wherein Balthasar feasted and perished, Cyrus, either by his espials, according to Xenophon; or inspired by God himself, whose Enfign he followed in this War, found the time and opportunity to invite him: and therefore while the Kings head, and the heads of his Nobility were no less filled with the vapors of Wine, than their hearts with the fear of Gods judgment, he caused all the banks and heads of his Trenches to be opened and cut down with that diligence, as by them he drew the great River of Euphrates dry for the present, by whose Channel running, his Army made their entrance, finding none to disturb them. All the Town lay buried (as the Poet saith) in sleep and wine: such as came in the Persians way, were put to the sword, unless they saved themselves by flight, as some did, who ran away crying, and filling the streets with an uncertain tumult.

Such Assyrian Lords as had revolted from Balthasar, and betaken themselves to the party of Cyrus, did now conduct a selected company to the Kings Palace; which having easily forced, they rushed into the Chamber where the King with his Princes were banquetting, slew both him and them without any mercy, who strugled in vain to keep those lives which God had newly threatned to take away. And now was the Prophecy of Jeremy fulfilled, and that of Isaiah two hundred years before this subversion; who in his 47 Chapter, and elsewhere, writeth this destruction so feelingly and lively, as if he had been present both at the terrible slaughter there committed, and had seen the great and unfeared change and calamity of this great Empire; yea, and had also heard the sorrows and bewailings of every surviving soul thereunto subject. His Prophecy of this place he beginneth in these words: Come down, and sit in the dust, O Virgin Daughter of Babel: sit on the ground, there is no throne, &c. And again, Sit still, and get thee into darkness, O daughter of the Chaldæans; for thou shalt no more be called the Lady of Kingdoms. For though it cannot be doubted, that God used Nabuchodonosor and the Chaldæans, to punish the Idolatry of the Judæans; yet Isaiah teacheth us in this place, That he did not yet forget that the execution of his judgments was mixt with a rigorous extremity. For (saith Isaiah) in the person of God, I was wroth with my people, I have polluted mine inheritance, and given them into thine hand: thou didst shew them no mercy, but thou didst lay thy very heavy yoke upon the ancient. I will rise up against them, saith the Lord of Hosts, and will cut off from Babel the Name, and the Remnant, and the Son, and the Nephew. And in the 13, Every one that is found, shall be stricken thorough: whosoever joineth himself, shall fall by the sword, their children also shall be broken in pieces before their eyes, their houses spoiled, and their wives ravished. So as there is no Historian who was either present at this victory of Cyrus, or that received the report from others truly as it was, that could better leave the same to posterity after it happened, than Isaiah hath done in many places of his Prophecies, which were written two hundred years before any thing attempted.

The greatness and magnificence of Babylon, were it not by divers grave Authors set down, might seem altogether fabulous: for besides the reports of St. Hierom, Solinus, and Orosius, Aristotle in the third of his Politicks, the second Chapter, received
Diod. l. 3. the report for true, That one part of the City knew not that the rest was taken three days after. Which is not impossible, if the testimony of Diodorus Siculus may be taken; who finds the compass thereof at three hundred and threescore Stadia or Furlongs, which makes five and forty miles: the walls whereof had so great a breadth, that six Chariots might pass in front thereon. And of height, according to Ctesias and Clitracus, three hundred threescore and five foot, garnished with an hundred and fifty Towers. Strabo in the beginning of his sixteenth Book of Geography, gives it a greater circuit, adding five and twenty Furlongs more to the former compass, reckoning the same at three hundred fourscore and five Furlongs, which make eight and forty miles and one Furlong, but finds the wall far under that which Diodore reports: and so doth Curtius measure their thickness but at two and thirty foot, and their height at an hundred cubits, which is also very much; every cubit containing a foot and a half of the large measure: though to the whole circuit of the City he gives the same with Siculus, and eight Furlongs more. Herodotus finds a greater content than Strabo doth, namely, four hundred and fourscore furlongs circle; the thickness of the wall he measures at fifty cubits, and the height at two hundred of the same regal
Her. l. 1. cubit. For entrance, it had an hundred Gates of Brass, with Posts and Hooks to hang them on of the same metal: and therefore did the Prophet
Isa. 47.13. Isaiah rightly intitle Babylon, The Princess and Glory of Kingdoms.

But when Cyrus had won her, he stript her out of her Princely Robes, and made her a slave; dividing not only all her goodly houses, and her whole Territory, with all the riches therein contained, among his Soldiers; but bestowing the inhabitants themselves as bond-slaves upon those that had taken possession of their goods.

Touching the reign of Cyrus, and the time which he enjoyed in rest and pleasure, I can say no more of it, than that it is generally agreed by all Chronologers, to have lasted only seven years: in which time he made such Constitutions as differ little from the Ordinances of all wise Kings that are desirous to establish a Royal power to themselves and their posterity.

SECT. VI.

The End of Cyrus.

THe last War, and the end of this great King Cyrus, is diversly written. Herodotus and Justin deliver, That after the Conquest of Asia the less, Cyrus invaded the Massagetes, a very warlike Nation of the Scythians, governed by Tomyris their Queen: and that in an incounter between the Persians and these Northern Nomades, Tomyris lost her Army, and her Son Spargapises that commanded it: In revenge whereof, this Queen making new levies of men of War, and following the War against Cyrus, in a second battel beat the Persian Army, and taking Cyrus prisoner, cut off his head from his body, and cast the same into a bowl of blood, using these words; Thou that hast all thy life time thirsted for blood, now drink thy fill, and satiate thy self.

It should hereby seem, that Cyrus knowing the strength and multitude of those frozen Nations, was perswaded to abate their fury by some forcible invasion and depopulation, because in the time of Cyaxares Father to Astyages, those Scythians invaded Media and Asia the less, and held the same in a servile subjection eight and twenty years.

This War which Metasthenes calleth Tomyrique, lasted (saith he) six years, and took end at the end of Cyrus.

But in this particular I believe with Viginier, that this Scythian War was rather the same which Cyrus made against the Sacians, before the conquest of Lydia, according to Ctesias before cited, who calleth Tomyris, Sparetha; though he deliver the success of that War otherwise than Herodotus doth: The rather (saith Viginier) because Strabo in his eleventh Book reciteth, that Cyrus surprized the Sacians by the same stratagem by which Justin saith, he defeated the Son of Tomyris. And the same Ctesias also reporteth, That the last War which Cyrus made, was against Amorrhæus King of the Derbicians, a Nation (as the rest) of Scythia; whom though he overcame, yet he then received the wound of his death, which he suffered three days after.

Strabo also affirmeth, That he was buried in his own City of Pasagardes, which himself had built, and where his Epitaph was to be read in his time; which is said to have been this: O vir, quicunque es, & undecunque advenis, neque enim te adventurum ignoravi: Ego sum Cyrus qui Persis imperium constitui, pusillum hoc terræ quo meum tegitur corpus mihi ne invideas; O thou man, whosoever thou art, or whencesoever thou comest; for I was not ignorant that thou shouldst come: I am Cyrus that founded the Persian Empire: do not envy unto me this little earth, with which my body is covered.

Strab. l. 15.

This Tomb was opened by Alexander, as Qu. Curtius reporteth, either upon hope of treasure, supposed to have been buried with him, (or upon desire to honour his dead body with certain Ceremonies) in which there was found an old rotten Target, two Scythian Bows, and a Sword. The Coffin wherein his body lay, Alexander caused to be covered with his own garment, and a Crown of Gold to be set upon it. These things well considered, as they give credit to the reports of Xenophon and Zonaras, so they derogate much from Herodotus, who leaves his body in the hands of Tomyris.

Qu. Curt.

Xen. ped. 8.

Zon. l. 1. c. 20.

And surely had Cyrus lost the Army of Persia in Scythia, it is not likely that his Son would so soon have transported all his remaining forces into Egypt, so far off from that quarter; the Scythian Nation then victorious, and bordering Media: neither had Cambyses been able in such haste to have undertaken and performed so great a Conquest. Wherefore I rather believe Xenophon, saying, That Cyrus died aged, and in peace: and that finding in himself, that he could not long enjoy the world, he

he called unto him his Nobility, with his two Sons, Cambyſes and Smerdis; or after Xenophon, Tanaoxares: and after a long Oration, wherein he aſſured himſelf, and taught others of the immortality of the Soul, and of the puniſhments and rewards following the good and ill deſerving of every man in this life; he exhorted his Sons by the ſtrongeſt arguments he had, to a perpetual concord and agreement. Many other things he uttered, which make it probable, that he received the knowledg of the true God from Daniel, when he governed Suſa in Perſia; and that Cyrus himſelf had read the Prophecy of Iſaiah, wherein he was expreſly named, and by God (for the delivery of his people) preordained. Which act of delivering the Jews from their Captivity, and of reſtoring the holy Temple and City of Jeruſalem, was in true conſideration the nobleſt work that ever Cyrus performed. For in other actions he was an inſtrument of Gods power, uſed for the chaſtiſing of many Nations, and the eſtabliſhing of a Government in thoſe parts of the world which was not long to continue. But herein he had the Grace to be an inſtrument of Gods goodneſs, and a willing advancer of his Kingdom upon Earth; which muſt laſt for ever, though heaven and earth ſhall periſh.

SECT. VII.

Of Cyrus his Decree for building the Temple of God in Jeruſalem.

HAving therefore ſpoken of his great Victories, mentioned by ſundry Hiſtorians, the glory of all which was a reward of this his ſervice done unto him that was Author of them and of all goodneſs: I hold it meet at length to ſpeak of the Decree made in the firſt of his Reign, being perhaps the firſt that ever he made after his poſſeſſion of the Babylonian Empire: That the captive Jews ſhould return again into their own Territory, and re-build the Houſe of God in Jeruſalem, having now endured and finiſhed the threeſcore and ten years Captivity, by the Prophets foretold. For the accompliſhing whereof, he gave order to his Treaſurers to furniſh them with all things neceſſary and wanting. He alſo reſtored unto them five thouſand four hundred threeſcore and nine Veſſels of Gold and Silver, whereof Nabuchodonoſor the Grandfather of Balthaſar, had formerly robbed the Temple.

The number of the Jews which returned out of Chaldæa under their Leader Zorobabel, the Son of Salathiel, and Nephew to King Jeconias, and Jeſus or Joſua the Son of Joſadak, were about fifty thouſand; where, as ſoon as they arrived, they built an Altar to the living God, and ſacrificed thereon, according to their own Law, and afterward bethought themſelves how to prepare materials for the rebuilding of the Temple.

1 Eſd. 2. 2 Eſd. 7. Phil. in bre. 1 Eſd. 3. 3. Eſd. 5. Eſd. 4. & 5. Joſeph. l. Ant. 11.

But no ſooner did the Jews begin to lay any one ſtone, than the Samaritans and other Idolatrous Nations adjoining, gave all the impediments they could. So did the Governours of thoſe Provinces under Cyrus altogether countenance the diſturbers, and in no ſort favoured the Jews, nor the labours nor purpoſes they had in hand. And not only thoſe which were but Provincial Lieutenants, and other officers of leſs place, but Cambyſes himſelf; who having the charge of the whole Empire, while Cyrus was buſied otherwiſe, countermanded the building begun. And whereas ſome Authors make doubt, that whatſoever Cambyſes did when himſelf had obtained the Empire, yet during the life of Cyrus there was no ſuch impediment or prohibition: they may herein reſolve themſelves out of Eſdras, That by the conſpiracies of the neighbouring Nations, the building was hindred all the time of King Cyrus life, &c. And therefore it is true, what the Jews themſelves affirm, as it is written in the ſecond of John, That the Temple was forty-ſix years in ſetting up, having received ſo many hinderances from the firſt foundation to the ſecond of Darius.

1 Eſd. 2. 16. 1 Eſd. 5. 33. 1 Eſd. 4. 5.

And if we ſeek the natural and politick courſes which moved Cambyſes to withſtand his Fathers Decree, as well while he governed under him, as when himſelf became ſole and Soveraign Monarch, we ſhall find them in that Epiſtle remembred by Eſdras, written by Belemus, Mithridates, and the reſt, Preſidents and Counſellors in Phœnicia, wherein they complain that the Jews were evermore rebellious and troublers of Kings; that their City being once built, they would then refuſe to pay tribute, and fall from the obedience of the Empire, as they had formerly done in the times of other Kings.

1 Eſd. 1. c. 4.

But that which for that preſent ſeemed the moſt forcible impediment was, that Cambyſes having in his reſolution to invade Egypt, and that it was a common opinion, That the Jews were deſcended of thoſe Nations, becauſe they iſſued thence under Moſes, when they conquered Judæa; their City being once repaired and fortified, they might return to their old vomit, and give the ſame diſturbance to Cambyſes Conqueſt, which they did to Sennacherib, Nabuchodonoſor, and other Kings of Babylon. For as it is written in Ezekiel, Egypt was the confidence of the houſe of Iſrael.

Ezek. c. 29.

But it is to be underſtood, as Codoman and others have obſerved, that Artaxerxes, to whom the Counſellors and Governours of Phœnicia complained againſt the Jews, did not precede but ſucceed Darius Hyſtaſpes, as in the ſixth and ſeventh Chapters of Eſdras it is made plain: and alſo that thoſe Governours (whoſe Epiſtle ſheweth as much) did not withſtand the building of the Temple, but the fortifying and encloſing of the City, as by the reaſons given in the ſaid Epiſtle, and by the Kings anſwer, it is evident.

Alſo in the ſixth of Ezra, the fourteenth verſe, the Kings are named in order as they governed, and Artaxerxes written after Darius; as, And they built and finiſhed it (to wit, the Temple) by the appointment of the God of Iſrael, and by the commandment of Cyrus and Darius, and Artahſhaſte Kings of Perſia. Laſtly, in the ſeventh of Ezra it is written, Now after theſe things, in the reign of Artahſhaſte King of Perſia: which was as much as to ſay, after the finiſhing of the Temple in Darius time. And therefore Artaxerxes in the ſecond of Eſdras is there named by anticipation, not in his own time and place.

And thus much concerning the rebuilding of the City and Temple of Hieruſalem. Which action, though proſpered by the hand of God, was very ſlowly purſued by the men whom it moſt concerned, but firſt ſet on foot by Cyrus. The other Ordinances of Cyrus, with his form and manner of Government are to be found in Xenophon. At his death he bequeathed the Empire unto his eldeſt ſon Cambyſes, appointing Smerdis or Tanaoxares his younger ſon to be Satrapa, or Lieutenant of Media, Armenia, and Cuduſia; and then died, after he had reigned (ſaith Herodotus) one and thirty years, or (according to Juſtin) but thirty.

SECT.

SECT. VIII.

Of Cyrus his Issue: and whether Atossa were his Daughter, or (as some think) were the same with Queen Hester.

Cyrus had issue two sons, Cambyses and Smerdis, with three daughters, Atossa, Meroe, and Artystona: Ctesias addeth to these, Amytis. Atossa and Meroe their brother Cambyses married; Artystona, Darius Hystaspes obtained; so did he Atossa, Cambyses being dead: who (as some Writers have supposed) inflamed both her Husbands, Darius and Xerxes after him, to invade Greece, to be avenged of the whole Nation for the cruel intent that Aman (whom the old Translation calleth a Macedonian) had against the Jews: though the opinion of Josephus be more probable, who finds Aman to be an Amalekite. But it is hard to be understood, how Atossa the daughter of Cyrus should have been Esther, whose History seems rather to appertain to the time of Artaxerxes Longamanus, than of Darius the son of Hystaspes, or of Xerxes. The desire of Atossa to have Greece brought under the yoke of Persia, was partly grounded upon the honour which thereby she thought her Husband might obtain, partly upon a feminine humour of getting many brave Dames, Corinthians, Athenians, and others of that Nation, to be her bond-women. Wherefore I cannot give assent to the opinion of Codoman, who upon the near sound of the two names, Atossa and Hadassa, (by the latter of which Esther was also called) makes them to have been one person. For though it be true that Esther concerning her Parentage, a while might be taken for a great Lady; yet Codomans inference is nothing probable, that she should therefore, and for the great affection which the King bare unto her, be thought the daughter of Cyrus. Certain it is, that Esther did at length discover her Kindred and Nation; whereby, if Histories could be kept free from this error, yet the people, and especially the Nobility, must needs have understood the truth: who nevertheless did so well know the Parentage of Atossa, that for her sake, as being daughter of Cyrus, her son Xerxes was preferred to the Kingdom before his elder brother, against whom also he could have pretended a very weak claim. But of these things more hereafter in fitter place.

CHAP. IV.

The Estate of things from the Death of Cyrus to the Reign of Darius.

SECT. I.

Of the Number and Names of the Persian Kings.

OF the Successors of Cyrus, and the continuance of the Persian Empire, there are many opinions; As that of Metasthenes, who hath numbred the Persian Kings, and their times as followeth.

Darius Medus, and Cyrus jointly	2
Cyrus alone	22
Priscus Artaxerxes	20
Darius Longimanus	37
Darius Nothus	19	years.
Artaxerxes Mnemon	55
Artaxerxes Ochus	26
Arses, or Arsames	4
Darius, the last, conquered by Alexander	6

To which Philo agreeth; which number of years added, make in all an hundred ninety and one. But in this Catalogue Metasthenes hath left out Cambyses and Xerxes, and names Artaxerxes Assuerus, for the immediate successor of Cyrus; in place (saith Melancthon) of Darius the Son of Hystaspes: for Metasthenes, as Melancthon conjectureth, doth not account Cambyses in the Catalogue, because his reign was confounded with that of Cyrus.

There is a second Opinion, though ridiculous, of Sedar Olam, who finds but four Persian Kings from the beginning to the end of that Empire.

Genebrard, Schubert, and Beroaldus, have also a differing account from the Greeks; whom nevertheless Eusebius, and most of the Latins follow, and so doth Krentzheim, who hath fully answered, and as I take it, refuted all the former Authors varying from that account. For in this sort do the Greeks marshal the Persian Kings with the times of their reigns. Chro. Kren. fol. 135.

Cyrus in all	30		Melancthon gives Cyrus but 29.
Cambyses with the Magi	8
Darius Hystaspes	36
Xerxes	21		Melanct. but 20.
Artaxerxes Longimanus	40	years.
Darius Nothus	19
Artaxerxes Mnemon	43		Melanct. but 40.
Artaxerxes Ochus	23		Melanct. 26.
Arsames	3
Darius, the last	6		Melanct. 4.

Which numbers put together, make in all two hundred and thirty.

This account (as I have said) the most Chronologers, and the best learned approve. These Persian Princes, being all warranted by the authority of the Scriptures, as Peucer in his Historical Animadversions hath gathered the places; finding first Cyrus in the second of Chronicles, ch. 36. vers. 22, 23. Ezra 1. ch. 1. vers. 1. and often elsewhere.

Secondly, Cambyses in the eleventh of Daniel, who may indeed be well esteemed for one of those three Kings in the second verse named, and so the

* Marginal

Marginal Commentator upon the Geneva, understands that place; but under correction, mistakes the matter greatly, when he saith in the same note, that Darius Hystaspes was an enemy to the people of God, and stood against them: his great favour and liberality to the Jews being elsewhere proved.

Thirdly, Darius Hystaspes is found in Ezra the first, c.4.v.5. who in the sixth verse is also named Ahasuerus.

Fourthly, In the eleventh of Daniel, verse the second, Xerxes is plainly foretold and described, and the great War which he should make against the Greeks, by Daniel remembered.

Fifthly, Artaxerxes Longimanus in Ezra the fourth, verse seven, who is also called Arthasastha, c.4.v.1. Ezra v.7. and chap.7.v.7.

Sixthly, Darius Nothus, Ezra cap.4.v.24. and cap.5.v.6. Nehem. cap.12.v.22.

Seventhly, Artaxerxes Mnemon in Nehem. cap.2. v.1. who was father to Artaxerxes Ochus, and Arsames: for Darius the last, he was of another Family, the Line of Cyrus the Great ending in Ochus, who descended from Xerxes the son of Atossa, Cyrus his Daughter; and the issue male of Cyrus failing with his own Sons.

But to proceed, Eusebius with the Latins following the Greeks, apply the beginnings and ends of every Persian King, with their Acts, to some certain Olympiad; As the War of Astyages (Cyrus his maternal Grandfather) and Alyattes (Crœsus his Father) to the nine and fortieth Olympiad; The beginning of Cyrus reign, to the beginning of the five and fiftieth Olympiad; The taking of Sardis by Cyrus to the eight and fiftieth Olympiad; The Invasion of Egypt by Cambyses to the third year of the threescore and third Olympiad, and so of the rest. Which reference with good agreement between several forms of computation, add the more credit unto both.

Again, this Historical demonstration is confirmed by the Astronomical computation of Ptolomy, who refers the death of Alexander the Great, who died the twelf of November, in the beginning of the hundred and fortieth Olympiad, to the four hundred and four and twentieth year after Nabonassar. And the Æra of Nabonassar began on the six and twentieth of February: which conferred with the Olympiad, was in the ninth month of the first year of the eighth Olympiad; So that whether we follow the accounts of the Olympiads, as do the Greek Historians, or that of Nabonassar with Ptolomy, we shall find every memorable accident to fall out right with each computation.

Alm. l.3. cap.6.

For Ptolomy reckons the time answerable to two hundred and four and twenty Julian years, and an hundred and forty days from Nabonassar to the sixteenth of July, in the seventh year of Cambyses.

The Greeks, and namely, Diodorus Siculus, place the taking of Egypt by Cambyses in the second or third year of the threescore and third Olympiad; and the beginning of Cambyses seventh year, in the first of the threescore and fourth Olympiad; which first of the threescore and fourth Olympiad, runs along with part of the two and twentieth of Nabonassar. The like agreement is consequently found about the beginning and end of Cyrus.

Likewise the twentieth of Darius, who succeeded Cambyses, is according to Ptolomy, the two hundred and six and fortieth of Nabonassar, which (observing the differences of Nabonassars Æra and the Olympiad, viz. eight and twenty years) agrees with the third of the threescore and ninth Olympiad, wherein it is placed by the Greeks. In this Josephus agrees with the Greeks throughout, saving that he joineth Darius Medus, whom Xenophon calleth Cyaxares, with Cyrus in the destruction of Babylon; which is true, and not contrary to the Greek computation, but may very well stand with it.

Lastly, The disagreement and confused accompts of those that follow the other Catalogue of the Persian Kings formerly rehearsed, doth give the greater credit to this of the Greeks, which being constant in it self, accordeth also with the computation of other Historians, and Astronomers, and likewise with the holy Scriptures.

SECT. II.

Of Cambyses, and the conquering of Egypt by him.

WE will therefore, according to the truth, give the Empire of Persia to Cambyses, the Son of Cyrus, though degenerate in all things, saving the desire to increase the greatness of his Empire; whereof he was possest in his Fathers time, while Cyrus made War in the North. Ctesias with others give him a longer reign than agreeth with the Græcian accompt before received.

In the fifth year of his sole reign, and in the third year of the threescore and third Olympiad, according to Diodore and Eusebius, he invaded Egypt, and having overthrown the King thereof, Psammeniticus, he not only caused him to be slain, but also did put to death all his kindred and dependants, with the most of his Children.

Herodotus and Ctesias give for cause of this War (being no other indeed than the Ambition of Cambyses) that when he sent to Amasis King of Egypt, to have his Daughter in marriage, Amasis presented him with Nitetis the Daughter of Apries his Predecessor, which Cambyses disdained.

Howsoever it were, true it is, that Cambyses gathered an Army fit for such an enterprize, and caused the same to march. But before they entred Egypt, Amasis died, and left Psammeniticus, whom Ctesias called Amyrteus, his successor; who enjoyed Egypt after his Father (according to the best Copies of Herodotus) but six months, though other Chronologers give him six years.

But how long soever he held the Crown, in one battel he lost it, and was himself taken prisoner.

It is said that Cambyses following therein the example of Cyrus, did not only spare life to the conquered King, but that he also trusted him with the Government of Egypt; and that upon some revolt, or suspicion thereof, he caused him to be slaughtered. But the race of this King was not so extirpated, if we may believe Herodotus and Thucydides, but that he left a Son called Inarus, who caused the Egyptians to revolt both from Xerxes and Artaxerxes.

That Psammeniticus was at the first entreated gently by Cambyses, I hold it very improbable, if it be true which is also written of him, That he so much hated Amasis the King of Egypt, who died before his arrival, that he caused his body to be drawn out of the grave, and after divers indignities used, commanded the same to be burnt, contrary to the custom both of the Egyptians and Persians. For the Egyptians used to powder their dead bodies with salt, and other drugs, to the end the worms might not devour them. The * Persians durst not consume them with fire, which they esteemed as a God, and therefore feared to feed it with Carrion.

* Neither did the Romans ever consume their dead to ashes, till the time of Sylla Dictator, who caused his own to be be devoured by that Element, fearing the Law called Talionis, or like for like, becauſe himſelf had untombed the carcaſe of Caius Marius after his death. Her. l.3. Plin. l.6. c.54. Stra. & Juſt. l. 1. p. 87,88. Her. l.3. Sta. l. 7.

SECT. III.

The reſt of Cambyſes his Acts.

After this Victory obtained in Egypt, Cambyſes ſent an Army into Cyprus, and conſtrained Evilthon King thereof to acknowledg him, who before held that Iſland of the Egyptians.

While Cambyſes yet buſied himſelf in Egypt, he ſo much deteſted the Idolatry of that Nation, as he cauſed the Images themſelves, with the Temples wherein they were worſhipped, to be torn down and defaced. This done, he directed a part of his Army into Lybia, to overturn the Temple of Jupiter Ammon; but the Devil in defence of his Oratory, raiſed ſuch a Tempeſt of Sand, wherewith the greateſt part of the Country is covered, as the Perſians were therewith choked and over-whelmed.

Notwithſtanding which miſadventure, Herodotus and Seneca report, that diſdaining to be reſiſted, he prepared the reſt of his Army, which himſelf meant to conduct into thoſe parts; but that finding a beginning of thoſe incommodities, which his firſt-ſent troops had tried, he changed his purpoſe. For though conquering Kings have power over men, yet the Elements do not obey them; according to that old Engliſh Proverb, Go, ſaith the King; Stay, ſaith the Tide.

After his return from the attempt of Æthiopia, he cauſed Apis the Egyptian Bull, worſhipped by that Nation as God, to be ſlain; a deed very commendable, had it proceeded from true zeal, and been executed as in ſervice of him that only is, and liveth. But ſoon afterwards, when in a dream it ſeemed unto him that Smerdis did ſit in the Royal Throne of Perſia, (which apparition was verified in Smerdis the Magus) he gave it in charge to his Favourite Praxaſpes, to murther Smerdis his Brother. And having married his own Siſters, contrary to the Perſian Laws, he committed a moſt cauſleſs and moſt deteſtable murder upon the one of them called Meroe, then by himſelf with child, becauſe ſhe bewailed the death of her Brother Smerdis. I find it written of this Cambyſes. That becauſe his Predeceſſors obſerved religiouſly the Ordinances of their Empire, he aſſembled his Judges, and enquired of them, Whether there were any Law among the Perſians that did permit the Brother to marry his own Siſter; it being his own intent ſo to do: The Judges (who had always either Laws or diſtinctions in ſtore to ſatisfie Kings and times) made anſwer, That there was not any thing written allowing any ſuch conjunction; but they notwithſtanding found it in their cuſtoms, that it was always left to the will of the Perſian Kings to do what beſt pleaſed themſelves; and ſo as Nauclerus terms it, invenerunt occaſionem: that is as much to ſay, The Judges found a ſhift to pleaſe the King, and to ſecure themſelves. And yet where it concerned not the Kings private ſatisfaction, he cauſed Siſamnus one of his Judges, and perchance one of thoſe which favoured his inceſtuous match, to be flayed alive, for an unjuſt judgment given, and the ſame his hide to be hung up over the judgment-ſeat. After which, beſtowing the Fathers Office on his Son, he willed him to remember that the ſame partiality deſerved the ſame puniſhment.

Her. p. 89, 90.

Among other his cruelties, that which he exerciſed againſt the Son of his beloved Praxaſpes, was very ſtrange and ungrateful. For when he deſired to be truly informed by him what the Perſians thought of his conditions? Praxaſpes anſwered, That his virtues were followed with abundant praiſe from all men; only it was by many obſerved, That he took more than uſual delight in the taſt of Wine: with which taxation inflamed, he uſed this replication: And are the Perſians double-tongued, who alſo tell me, that I have in all things excelled my Father Cyrus? Thou Praxaſpes ſhalt then witneſs, whether in this report they have done me right: for if at the firſt ſhot I pierce thy Sons heart with an Arrow, then is it falſe that hath been ſpoken; but if I miſs the mark, I am then pleaſed that the ſame be accounted true, and my ſubjects believed. This being ſpoken, he immediately directed an Arrow towards the innocent child, who falling down dead with the ſtroke, Cambyſes commanded his body to be opened, and his heart being broached on the Arrow, this monſtrous Tyrant greatly rejoicing, ſhewed it to the Father, with this ſaying inſtead of an Epitaph: Now Praxaſpes, thou mayeſt reſolve thy ſelf, that I have not loſt my wits with wine, but the Perſians theirs, who make ſuch report.

Many other barbarous cruelties he exerciſed, till at the laſt, according to the phraſe of our Law, he became felon de ſoy. For when he was informed, that Patizites and Smerdis the Magi (Cedrenus writeth them Sphendanis and Cimerdius) Miniſters of his Domeſtical affairs, taking advantage of the great reſemblance between Smerdis the Kings Brother, and Smerdis the Magus, poſſeſt themſelves of the Empire, he made all haſte towards Perſia; and in mounting haſtily on horſe back, his ſword diſſheathing, pierced his own thigh, wherewith deadly wounded, falling into an over-late and remedileſs repentance of the ſlaughter which he had executed upon his own Brother, he ſoon after gave up his wicked ghoſt, when he had reigned eight years, accounting therein thoſe ſeven months, in which the Magi governed while he was abſent.

In Cambyſes the Male-line of Cyrus failed. For he had no iſſue either by Atoſſa or Meroe: yet Zonaras out of Hierom gives him a Daughter called Pantaptes, and a Son called Orontes: who being drowned in the River Ophites by Antioch, the ſame was afterward in memory of the Princes death called Orontes. Zon. Com. 2. p. 117.

He built the City of Babylon in Egypt, in the place where Latopolis was formerly ſeated, and that of Meroe in the Iſland of Nilus, calling it by the name of his Siſter Meroe.

SECT. IV.

Of the Inter-regnum between Cambyſes and Darius.

Cyrus and his two Sons being now dead, and the Kingdom in the poſſeſſion of one of the Magi, the counterfeit of Smerdis; the Princes, or Satrapa's, or Provincial Governours of the Empire, (to wit, Otanes, Intaphernes, Gobrias, Megabyſus, Aſphatines, Hidarnes, and Darius, who were all deſcended from Achæmenes the firſt Perſian King) having diſcovered the fraud of this impoſture, joined their forces together, ſurprized and rooted out the Conſpirator with his Companions and Aſſiſtants. In which which action (saith Justin) Intaphernes and Asphatines were slain: but Herodotus otherwise, that they were only wounded; for he avoweth, that all the seven Princes were present at the Election following.

For the Empire being now without a Governour, these Princes grew into a consultation how the same might be ordered from thenceforth. Otanes (one of the Seven) did not fancy any election of Kings, but that the Nobility and Cities should confederate, and by just Laws defend their Liberty in equality, giving divers reasons for his Opinion, being as it seemed, greatly terrified by the cruelties of Cambyses: As first, that it was not safe to give all power to any one, seeing greatness it self, even in good men, doth often infect the mind with many vices, and that liberty and freedom in all things is most apt to insult, and to commit all manner of wicked outrage. Again, that Tyrants do commmonly use the service of wicked men, and favour them most; they usurp upon the Laws of their Country; take other mens wives by force, and destroy whom they please without judgment.

Megabysus was of another Opinion, affirming, that the tyranny of a multitude was thrice more intolerable than that of One. For the multitude do all things without judgment, run into business and affairs with precipitation, like raging and overbearing floods.

He therefore thought it safest to make election of a few, and those of the best, wisest, and most vertuous; because it is ever found, that excellent Counsels are ever had from excellent men.

Darius gave the third judgment, who perswaded the creation of a King, because even among few diuturnity of concord is seldom found: and in great Empires it doth ever happen that the discord of many Rulers hath enforc'd the election of one Supream. It were therefore, saith Darius, far safer to observe the Laws of our Country, by which Kingly Government hath been ordained.

The other four Princes adhered to Darius, and agreed to continue the same Imperial Government by God established and made prosperous. And to avoid partiality it was accorded, That the morning following, these seven Princes should mount on Horseback, and on him the Kingdom should be conferred, whose Horse after the Sun-rising should first neigh, or bray. In the evening after this appointment was made, it is said, that Darius consulted with the Master of his Horse Oebarus, who in the Suburbs of the City, where the election was resolved of, caused the same Horse whereon in the morning Darius was mounted, to cover a Mare, who as soon as he came into the same place, was the first Horse that brayed. Whereupon the other six Princes descended from their Horses, and acknowledged Darius for their Lord and King. Her. 3. p. 100, 101.

Plato in the third of his Laws affirmeth, that in memory of the seven Princes, whereof Darius himself was one, that delivered the Empire from the usurpation of the Magi, he divided the whole into seven Governments; Herodotus saith, into twenty Satrapies.

SECT. I.

of Darius his Lineage.

Darius was descended of the ancient Persian Kings, to wit, of the Achæmenidæ, of which Cyrus the Great was the Lineal successor. For in this sort Herodotus derives him as before;

Cyrus the first, who had Teispius, who begat
Ariaramnes, who was father of Arsamnes, the father of Hystaspes, the father of Darius, sirnamed Celes, the father of Xerxes. Curt. l. 4.

Hystaspes accompanied Cyrus the Great in the Wars against the Scythians: at which time Cyrus being made jealous of Darius by a dream of his own, caused him to be sent into Persia; others say, to be imprisoned, from whence by the death of Cyrus he was delivered, and made Governour of the Persian Magi. He afterward followed Cambyses into Egypt; he then joined with the rest of the Princes against the Magi, and either by the neighing of his horse, or as others affirm, by strong hand he obtained the Empire, which he the more assured to himself by taking two of Cyrus Daughters, and as many of his Neices for his wives. Her. l. 1. & 3.

Hystaspes, according to * Herodotus, had besides Darius these three Sons, who were great Commanders in the War which Darius made in Asia the less, Thrace, Macedon, and Greece; Atarnes, Artaphernes, and Artabanus, who dissuaded Xerxes from the second Grecian War. Hystaspes had also a Daughter married to Gobrias the Father of Mardonius, who commanded the Army of Darius in Macedon, and married the Daughter of Darius, Artosostre his Cousin-germain. * Her. pag. 137. Pag. 154. Pag. 130. Pag. 101. & 202. Pag. 180. 109. Her. l. 6. p. 180. Pag. 186. 190.

Reineccius gives to Hystaspes five Sons, Darius, who succeeded Cambyses, Artabanus, Artaphernes, Otanes, and Atarnes, with two Daughters. P. 179. P. 200. 204. & p. 213. 285, 286. P. 214. 254. De Reg. Persar. fol. 32.

SECT. II.

Of Darius his Government, and suppressing the Rebellion of Babylon.

Darius devised equal Laws whereby his Subjects might be governed, the same being formerly promised by Cyrus. He gave access to all his his Subjects, and behaved himself so mildly to all men, that many Nations desired and offered themselves to become his Vassals: Only he laid divers payments and taxes on the people, which had not been accustomed in Cyrus time, to the value of fourteen thousand five hundred and threescore talents, saith Herodotus.

The War which Cambyses made afar off in Egypt, and the contention between the Magi and the Princes of Persia for the Empire, gave heart to the Babylonians to recover their liberty, and to shake off the Persian yoke; whereof Darius being advertised, he prepared an Army to recover that City and State revolted. But finding the same a difficult work, he used the service of Zopyrus, who for the love he bare Darius, did cut off his own Ears and Nose, and with other wounds yet fresh bleeding, he seemed to fly to the Babylonians for succour, to whom he accused the cruelty of Darius: who for having given him advice to give over the siege of their City, had in this sort dismembred and deformed him; whereupon the Babylonians gave him that credit, as they trusted him with the disposition and commandment of their greatest forces: which when Zopyrus had obtained, after some small colourable over-throws given to the Persians upon sallies, he delivered the City into Darius his hands, who had lyen before it twenty months. Her. l. 3.

SECT. III.

Of Darius his favour to the Jews in building the Temple.

IN the second year of Darius, he gave order that the building of the Temple at Hierusalem should go on, and commanded that the same should be finished at his own charge, and out of the revenues of the Crown. And whereas the Governours of Ezra c. 6. those Provinces which are situate between Euphrates and the Phœnician, and midland Sea (whom Ezra calleth the Captains beyond the River) had hindred the work in Cambyses his time, Darius gave commandment that they should not thenceforth come near unto Jerusalem, to give any impediment to the building, but that they should withdraw themselves, and get them far off till all were finished, and at an end. In the old Latine it is written, Procul recedite ab illis; Withdraw your selves far from them; In our English, Be ye far from thence, to wit, from the City and Temple now in building.

He also made a Decree which concerned his own Subjects, That whosoever should thenceforth hinder the setting up of the Temple of God, that his house should be torn down, and the disturber hanged on the Gallows made of the timber thereof. He also in the same Decree maketh invocation to God, That hath caused his Name to dwell there Ezra 6.11. (to) destroy all Kings and people that put their hands to alter, and to destroy this house of God which is in Jerusalem, &c. In four years after which Decree Ezra 6. (the Jews being really furnished with money, and all things necessary from Darius) the Temple was in all finished, to wit, in the beginning of the Spring, in the sixth year of Darius Hystaspes, and in the two and fortieth after their first return.

SECT. IV.

Of Darius his Scythian War.

AFter the recovery of Babylon, he invaded the Scythians, whose King Justin calleth Lauthinus; and saith, that Darius undertook this War against him, because he refused him his Daughter in marriage. The better to convoy his Army into Scythia, he built a bridg of small Vessels over the River Ister or Danubius, and gave the custody of the same in charge (among others of Asia the less) to the Ionians and Æolians, among whom was Miltiades, who perswaded the Asian Græcians to break down the bridg, to the end Darius might not return thereby, and if by any other way, then not without great difficulty; but the same was resisted by Histiæus Prince of Milet, a City of Ionia, which Nation being a Colony of the Greeks, Diodorus call- Diod. l. 11. eth Traytors to their Country, because they joined themselves to Darius. But the Scythians more elegantly termed them good slaves, for as much as they would not run away from their Master, but were more mindful of doing their duties, than of shaking off their bondage, when they were presented with as fair an occasion of liberty as could have been desired. For the great Army of Darius entring the desart Country called Bessarabia, found in it neither people to resist them, nor any sustenance to relieve them. For the Scythians were then, as are the Chrim Tartars their posterity, at this day all horsemen, using the Bow and Sword. They were not Ploughmen, but Grasiers, driving their Heards from one place to another, as opportunity of Pasture led them. Standing-Towns they had none, but used for Houses the Waggons wherein they carried their Wives and Children. These Waggons they place at every Station in very good order, making Streets and Lanes in the manner of a great Town, removable at their pleasure. Neither hath the Emperour himself, called now the great Chrim, any other City than such as Agora (as they name it) or Town of Carts. When as therefore Darius had wearied himself, and wasted his Provision in those desolate Regions, wherein he found neither ways to direct him, victuals to refresh him, nor any houses, fruitful trees, or living creatures, nor any thnigs at all, which either he himself might make use of, or by destroying it might grieve his enemies; he began to perceive his own folly, and the danger into which it had brought him. Yet setting a good face upon a bad game, he sent brave messages to the Scythian, bidding him to cease his flight, and either to make trial of his valour and fortune in plain battel: Or, if he acknowledged himself the weaker, then to yield by fair means, and become his Subject; giving him Earth and Water, which the Persians used to demand as a sign that all was yielded unto them. To this challenge the Scythian returned an Hieroglyphical answer; sending a Bird, a Frog, a Mouse, and five Arrows: which dumb shew Darius interpreting by his own wish, thought that he did yield all the Elements wherein those creatures live, and his weapons withal into his hands. But Gobryas one of the seven Princes, who had slain the Magi, construed their meaning aright, which was thus; O ye Persians, get ye wings like Birds, or dive under the water, or creep into holes in the earth, for else ye shall not escape our arrows. And this interpretation was soon verified by the Scythians themselves, who assailed the Persian Camp, drave the Horsemen into the Trenches, and vexed the Army Her. l. 4. Just. l. 2.

Army with continual Allarums day and night; were so fearless of this great Monarch, and so little regarded him, that within his hearing, and even in his sight, they did not forbear the pastime of coursing a Hare, which they had started by chance. By this boldness of theirs, Darius was so discouraged, that he forsook his Camp by night, making many fires, and leaving all that were sick and weak behind him, and so with all speed marched away towards the River Ister. He was pursued hardly by the Scythians, who mist him; yet arriving at the Bridg before him, perswaded the Ionians to depart, assuring them that the Persian King should never more be able to do them either good or harm. Which words had certainly been proved true, had not Hystiaus the Milesian prevailed with his people to attend the coming of Darius, whom the Scythians did likewise fail to meet, when they returned from Ister to seek him out.

SECT. V.

Some actions of the Persians in Europe, after the Scythian War.

Darius having thus escaped out of Scythia, determined the Invasion of Thrace and Macedon, in which War he employed Megabasus, who mastered the Paonians, and transplanted them, and possest Perinthus, Chalcedon, Byzantium, and other places being also soon after subjected, and added to the Persian Empire by Otanes, the son of Sysamnes, whom Cambyses had excoriated for false judgment. So were the Cities of * Selybria, and (a) Cardia likewise taken in from the Persian, who having now reduced under his obeisance the best part of Thrace, did send his Embassadors to Amintas King of Macedon adjoining, demanding of him by the Earth and Water the Soveraignty over that Kingdom. Amintas doubting his own strength, entertained the Embassadors with gentle words, and afterwards invited them to a solemn and magnificent feast; the Persians greatly desired that the Macedonian Ladies might be present: which being granted, the Embassadors who were well filled with Wine, and presumed upon their greatness, and many Victories, began to use such embracings, and other lascivous behaviour towards those Noble Ladies, as Alexander the Kings son, great Grandfather to Alexander the Great, disdaining the Persians barbarous presumption, besought his Father to withdraw himself from the assembly, continuing notwithstanding all honourable respect towards the Embassadors, whom withal he entreated that the Ladies might refresh themselves for a while; promising their speedy return. This being obtained, Alexander caused the like number of well-favoured young men to clothe themselves in the same garments, and to use the same attires which the Ladies had worn at the feast, giving them in charge, That when the Persians offered to abuse them, they should forthwith transpierce them with their long knives, of which they were provided for that purpose, which was accordingly performed. Charge was soon after given by Darius for a severe revenge of this murder: But Alexander somewhat before the death of Amintas gave his sister Gygea in marriage to Bubaris, a principal Commander of Darius forces on that side, who perswading her Husband how helpful the Alliance of Macedon would prove for the Invasion of Attica intended, so prevailed, as Alexander escaped that tempest, which threatned to fall upon him very suddenly; the War of Asia the less, called Ionick, falling out at the same time.

SECT. VI.

The first occasion of the War which Darius made upon Greece, with a rehearsal of the Government in Athens, whence the quarrel grew.

NOw the better to understand the reason and motives of that great War, which followed soon after between the Persians and Grecians, it is necessary to make a short repetition of the state of Athens, which City endured the hardest and worst brunt of Darius invasion on that side the Sea, with admirable success. Neither do I hold it any impertinency to be large in unfolding every circumstance of so great a business as gave fire to those Wars, which never could be throughly quenched, until in the ruin of this great Persian Monarchy. Persepolis the Capital City of the Empire, was at the request of an Athenian Harlot consumed with a flame as dreadful as in the pride of their greatness the Persians had raised in Athens.

Now therefore, as out of the former books it may be gathered, how Athens and other parts of Greece were anciently governed, the same being already set down, though scatteringly, and in sevral times, among other the Contemporary occurrents of the Eastern Emperours, and the Kings of Judea; so I thought it very pertinent in this place to remember again the two last changes in the State of Athens. As for the Lacedemonians, they maintained still their ancient Polity under Kings, though these also after some fifteen descents were bridled by the Ephori.

Codrus King of the Athenians, in the former books remembred, who willingly died for the safety of his people, was therefore so honoured by them, as (thinking none worthy to succeed him) they changed their former Government from Monarchical, to Princes for term of life, of which Medon the Son of Codrus was the first, after whom they were called Medontide; and of these there were twelve Generations besides Medon, to wit, Solon, and others, who are the leſs to be regarded by reaſon of the yearly change.

This Solon being a man of excellent wiſdom, gave Laws to the Athenians, which were publiſhed, according to Gellius, in the three and thirtieth year of Tarquinius Priſcus, and were in after-ages derived unto the Romans, and by the Decem-viri (Magiſtrates in Rome created for that purpoſe) reduced into Twelve Tables, which were the ground of the Roman Laws. But theſe goodly ordinances of Solon were in his own days violated, and for a while almoſt quite extinguiſhed. For whereas they were framed unto the practice and maintenance of a popular Government; the State of Athens was very ſoon changed into a Monarchy by Piſiſtratus the ſon of Hippocrates: who finding the Citizens diſtracted into two factions, whereof Megacles and Lycurgus, two Citizens of Noble Families, were become the heads, took occaſion by their contention and inſolency to raiſe a third faction more powerful than the other two, and more plauſible, for that he ſeemed a Protector of the Citizens in general. Having by this means obtained love and credit, he wounded himſelf, and fained that by malice of his enemies he had like to have been ſlain for his love to the good Citizens; he procured a Guard for his defence, and with that band of men ſurpriſing the State-houſe, or Cittadel of Athens, he made himſelf Lord of the Town, Hegeſiſtratus being then Governour. But the Citizens who in every change of Government had ſought to remove themſelves further and further from the form of a Monarchy, could ſo ill brook this Uſurpation of Piſiſtratus, that he was driven for lack of help to fly the Town, as ſoon as Megacles and Lycurgus (joining their forces) attempted his expulſion. Yet as the building of his Tyranny, founded upon the diſſention of the Citizens, was ruined by their good agreement; ſo was it ſoon after well re-edified by the new breaking out of the old factions. For when Megacles found the power of Lycurgus to grow greater than his own, he did (as is the uſual practice of the weaker ſide) call in the common enemy Piſiſtratus, to whom he gave his Daughter in marriage; by which alliance the Family of the Alcmæonidæ, whereof Megacles was chief, became very powerful; yet ſo, that Piſiſtratus by their power was made Maſter both of them and all the reſt. But this agreement held not long; the Alcmæonidæ, and eſpecially Megacles, being incenſed againſt Piſiſtratus for his miſdemeanor towards his Wife. Wherefore they practiſed with the Soldiers of the Town, proceeding in their treaſon ſo ſecretly, and ſo far, that Piſiſtratus (upon the firſt diſcovery of their intent) perceived no other remedy for his affairs, than to withdraw himſelf to Eretria, where he remained eleven years. Which time being expired, having hired Soldiers out of many parts of Greece, he again recovered the Principality of Athens: after which third obtaining his eſtate, he governed Athens ſeventeen years, according to Ariſtotle, and reigned in all thirty and three years, ſaith Elianus, but as Juſtin hath it, four and thirty; accounting the time belike as well before, as after his ſeveral expulſions. Herodotus gives the Father and the Son ſix and thirty years; Ariſtotle five and thirty. But Thucydides affirmeth, that he died very old, leaving for his Succeſſors his two Sons, Hippias and Hipparchus, who governed the Athenians with ſuch moderation, as they rather ſeemed the lineal ſucceſſors of a natural Prince than of a Tyrant. But in the end, and ſome three years before Hippias was expelled out of Athens, his Brother Hipparchus was murdered by Harmodius and Ariſtogiton. The cauſe why, and the manner how performed, Thucydides hath written at large. And though Hipparchus was charged with unnatural luſt after Harmodius, yet Plato in his Dialogue, intituled Hipparchus, doth greatly magnifie him, affirming that he was a Prince of as many eminent virtues as that Age had any, altogether condemning the murderers and authors of that ſcandal. Hippias fearing that this enterprize upon his Brother had more and deeper roots than were apparent, firſt ſought to diſcover the further intents of Harmodius and Ariſtogiton, by a Harlot of theirs called Lemnia: who, becauſe ſhe would not reveal her Companions, did cut out her own tongue. Then did Hippias, the better to ſtrengthen himſelf, enter into a ſtrait amity with Æantides, Tyrant of the City Lampſacus, whom he knew to be greatly favoured by Darius, to whoſe Son Hypoclus he gave one of his Daughters in marriage. But ſome three years after the death of his Brother, doubting I know not what ſtrong practice againſt himſelf, he began to uſe the Citizens with great ſeverity, which neither Piſiſtratus the Father, nor Hippias himſelf had ever exerciſed during their uſurpation till this time. And therefore the Athenians fearing leſt that this diſeaſe might rather increaſe than diminiſh in Hippias, they ſtirred up Cliſthines, one of the nobleſt and beſt able of their City, to practiſe their delivery: who, calling to his aſſiſtance the baniſhed Alcmæonidæ, together with an Army of the Lacedemonians led by Cleomenes their King, ſo affrighted Hippias, as by his compoſition he gave over his eſtate, and the poſſeſſion of Athens, and from thence imbarking himſelf, took Land at * Sigeum, whence he went to Lampſacus in Myſia governed by Æantides, who preſented him to Darius. He was deprived of his eſtate, as Herodotus and Thucydides agree, twenty years before the battel of Marathon: all which time he continued partly with Æantides, at other times with Artaphernes Lieutenant for Darius in Sardis, the Metropolis of Lydia; perſwading and practiſing the enterprize upon Athens, which Darius in the end to his great diſhonour undertook, twenty years after Hippias had reſigned his eſtate.

Thus far I have digreſſed from Darius, to the end the Reader may conceive the better the cauſes and motives of this War: whereof the hope that Hippias had to be reſtored to Athens by the help of Darius, which made him ſolicite and perſwade the Perſians to conquer Greece, was one, but not the moſt urgent.

SECT. VII.

Of the Ionian Rebellion, which was the principal cauſe of the Wars enſuing between Greece and Perſia.

ANother and a ſtrong motive to this expedition, was the Ionick War, breaking out in Aſia about the ſame time. The Colonies tranſported out of Greece into Aſia, which occupied the greateſt part of the Sea-coaſt, having enjoyed their liberty about 500 years, even from the Ionick migration, to the time of Cræſus, were by this Lydian King made Tributaries, and afterwards as parcel of his Dominions, were taken in by Cyrus, and left as hereditary Servants to the Crown of Perſia.

But as it is the cuſtom of Nations half conquered (witneſs Ireland) to rebell again upon every advantage and opportunity: ſo did the Ionians, and other Græcians, both in Cyrus his life, and after him, ſeek by all means poſſible to free themſelves.

At this time they found ſuch men ready to ſpurr them into Rebellion, as had by the Perſian been given unto them for bridles to hold them in ſubjection. Every one of thoſe Towns had a Lord to rule it, whom they (abhorring the Government of one man) called their Tyrants. Theſe Lords were very true to the Perſian, by whoſe only might they held the people in ſubjection. And this their dutiful affection they had well declared, when Darius, being in great extremity, they uſed all means to deliver him and his Army (that otherwiſe had been loſt) out of the Scythians hand. Of this great piece of ſervice Hiſtiæus the Tyrant of Miletus expected the chief thanks, as having been chief Author of their expecting Darius; when the reſt, either perſwaded by the Scythians, or carried away with their own deſires, were ready to have abandoned him. But it came ſo to paſs, that Darius being more fearful of the harm that Hiſtiæ (being powerful and crafty) might do to him in the future, than mindful of the good which he had already received at his hand, found means to carry him along to Suſa, where he detained him with all kind uſage of a friend, yet kept ſuch good eſpial upon him, as an enemy, he could not ſtart away. Hiſtiæus had ſubtilty enough to diſcover the Kings purpoſe, which ill agreed with his own deſires. For he thought it more pleaſant, and more honourable to rule as Prince in one fair City, having a ſmall Territory, than to ſit and feaſt at the great Kings Table, and hear the Counſels by which a large Empire was managed; being himſelf an idle beholder, and enjoying with much reſtraint of liberty, none other pleaſures than a private man might beſtow upon himſelf.

Wherefore he bethought himſelf of raiſing of ſome tumults in the lower Aſia, to pacifie which, if he might be ſent, as one that had great experience and authority in thoſe quarters, it would afterwards be in his power to ſtay at home, and either ſatisfie the King with excuſes, or deal as occaſion ſhall require. Reſolving upon this courſe, he ſent very ſecret inſtructions to Ariſtagoras his Kinſman, whom he had left his Deputy at Miletus, adviſing him to ſtir up ſome Rebellion. Theſe directions came ſeaſonably to Ariſtagoras, who having failed in an enterprize upon the Iſle of Naxos, through the falſe dealing of a Perſian his Aſſociate, ſtood in fear of diſgrace, if not of ſome further ill that might befall him, as one that had waſted the Kings treaſures to no good purpoſe.

Therefore he readily embraced the counſel: and the better to draw the whole Country of Ionia into the ſame courſe which he determined to run, he abandoned his tyranny, and did ſet Miletus at liberty. This plauſible beginning wan unto him the hearts of the Mileſians: and his proceeding with other Ionian Tyrants (of whom ſome he took and ſold as ſlaves to their Citizens, others he chaſed away) cauſed the whole Nation to be at his command. The Perſian Fleet, whereof he lately had been Admiral in the enterprize of Naxos, he had ſurprized in his firſt breaking out, together with the principal Officers and Captains; ſo that now he thought himſelf able to deal with the great Kings forces lying thereabout, either by Land or Sea. But likely it was that the power of all Aſia would ſhortly be upon his neck, and cruſh both him and his aſſiſtants to pieces, unleſs he were able to raiſe an Army that might hold the field, which the Ionians alone were inſufficient to perform. Therefore he took a journey to Sparta, where having aſſayed in vain with many arguments, and the offer of fifty Talents, to win to his party Cleomenes King of the Lacedæmonians; he went from thence to Athens, and with better ſucceſs beſought the people to lend him their aſſiſtance. The Athenian Ambaſſadors which had been ſent to the Perſian Kings Lieutenant in the lower Aſia, deſiring them not to give countenance to Hippias, now a baniſhed man, and lately their Tyrant, were a while before this returned with ill anſwers, having found very churliſh entertainment. So that the evil which they were to expect in all likelihood from the Perſian, made them willing to begin with him. To which purpoſe, their conſanguinity with the Ionians, and the perſwaſions of Ariſtagoras, drew them on apace, if perhaps his treaſure were not helping. Twenty ſhips the Athenians furniſhed for this Voyage; to which the Eretrians furniſhed five more, in regard of the ancient Kindneſs that had paſſed between the Ionians and them. With theſe and their own forces joined, the Ionians entred the River Caiſtrus, which falleth into the Sea by Epheſus: by which advantage they ſurprized Sardis, when no enemy was heard of or ſuſpected; inſomuch as Artaphernes, who ruled as Viceroy in thoſe parts, had no other hope of ſafety, than by retreating himſelf into the Caſtle, which the Græcians could not force: from whence he beheld the ſlaughter of the Citizens, and the City flaming,

The Perſians at length, mixt with the Burgers, began to encourage them to defence, and recovered the Market-place, ſtrengthened by the River Pactolus, which ran thorow it; and borrowing courage from deſperation, they both defended themſelves, and charged their enemies; who well adviſing themſelves, made all the haſte they could toward the Sea-ſide. But Artaphernes having gathered all the ſtrength he could, purſued the Græcians, and found them near Epheſus; where ſetting reſolvedly upon them, he ſlaughtered a great part of their Army, the reſt ſaving themſelves in Epheſus. In this fight, Evalcides, Captain of the Eretrians periſhed: but his fame and memory was by that excellent Poet Simonides preſerved. After this overthrow, the Athenians which were before ſent unto Ariſtagoras, and to the Ionians, could by no arguments of theirs, no not by their tears, be perſwaded to make any ſecond trial of their fortunes on that ſide the Sea.

Yet

Yet the burning of Sardis made a greater noise in the world, than the late good success which the Persians had in one or two skirmishes could raise. Wherefore the Ionians bravely proceeded, won a great part of Caria; and sending their Fleet into the Hellespont, got Bizantium and other Towns into their hands. Yea, the Cyprians lately subdued by Cambyses, began hereupon to take heart; and entring into confederacy with the Ionians, who were able to give them aid by Sea, rebelled against the Persians.

These news coming to the ear of Darius, filled him with great indignation, and with an extream hatred of the Athenians, upon whom he vowed to take sharp revenge. As for the Ionians, his contempt of them, and their knowledg of his power, made him to think, that they would not have dared to attempt such things, but by the instigation of those to whom the ignorance of his great might had afforded the courage to provoke him. This was the main ground of the War commenced by Darius, and pursued by Xerxes against Athens: To which the solicitation of Hippias, before remembred, gave only some form and assistance: the business when once it was thus far on foot, being like enough to have proceeded, though he had perished, ere it were advanced any further.

Some other occurrences in this Ionian commotion extended the quarrel of Darius against many of the Islanders, if not against the whole Nation of the Greeks; for all of them gave to his Rebels free harbour: the Islanders moreover did help to furnish out a Navy of three hundred and sixty Sail against him. These provocations did rather breed in him a desire to abate their pride, than any fear of harm that they were like to do him. For what they had done at Sardis, was but by surprize. In every fight they were beaten by the Persians, who had not yet lost the fruits of their discipline, wherein Cyrus had trained them, nor all their ancient Captains. In one Sea-fight by the Isle of Cyprus, the Ionians indeed had the upper-hand; but they were Phœnicians, Egyptians, and Cilicians, whom they vanquished: neither was that victory of any use to them; the Cyprians in whose aid they came, being utterly beaten by the Persian Army at Land, and reduced into their old subjection. So had the Persians likewise by open War and fair force overthrown the Carians in two battels, and reclaimed that Nation; as also they had recovered the Towns upon Hellespont, with some Æolian and Ionian Cities, when Aristagoras with his friends quitting Miletus, fled into Thrace, desirous to seat himself in Amphipolis, a Colony of the Athenians. But the Edonians on whose Territory be-like he landed, overthrew him, and cut his troops in pieces.

About the same time, Histiæus, the first mover of this insurrection, came down into those quarters; who having undertaken the performance of great matters to Darius, was glad to flye from his Lieutenants, by whom his double-dealing was detected.

But this Evasion preserved him not long. And after many vain attempts that he made, he was taken in fight by the Persians, and hastily beheaded, lest the King should pardon him upon remembrance of old good turns; as it seems that he would have done, by the Burial which he commanded to be given to his dead body that was crucified, and by his heavy taking of his death.

Histiæus had sought to put himself into Miletus; but the Citizens doubting his conditions, chose rather to keep him out, and make shift for themselves without his help. The strength of their City by Land, which had in old time withstood the Lydian Kings; and their good Fleet, which promised unto them the liberty of an open Sea, emboldened them to try the uttermost, when very few friends were left upon that Continent to take their part. But their Navy was broken as much by threatnings as by force; many of their companions and fellow-rebels forsaking them upon hope of pardon; and many being daunted with the causeless flight of those that should have assisted them. Neither was it long before the Town it self, being assaulted both by Land and Sea, was taken by force, the Citizens slain, their Wives and Children made slaves, and their goods a booty to the Persians, whom for six years space they had put to so much trouble.

SECT. VIII.

The War which Darius made upon Greece, with the battel of Marathon, and Darius his death.

THis War with good success finished by the Persians, and some attempts made on Europe side with variable success; Darius obstinate in the enterprise and conquest of Greece (though at first he pretended to make the War but against the Athenians and Eritræans, who jointly assisted the Ionians against him, and burnt Sardis in Lydia) did now by his Ambassadours, demand an acknowledgment from them all: among whom, some of them not so well resolved as the rest, submitted themselves; as the Æginets, and others. Against these, the Athenians being inflamed, (by the assistance of the Lacedæmonians) after divers encounters forced them to give pledges, and to relinquish the party of the Persians. Cleomenes led the Lacedæmonians in this War, and caused his companion King Demantus to be deposed: who thereupon fled to Darius, far the more confident of victory, by reason of these discords, alienations, and civil Wars among the Greeks. He therefore gave order to Hippagorus to prepare a Fleet of Ships, fit to transport his Army over the Hellespont: the same consisting of an hundred thousand foot, and ten thousand horse. The charge in chief of his Army he committed to Datis, accompanied and assisted by Hippias, the Son of Pisistratus, expelled out of Athens twenty years before, and by Artaphernes his Brother, Governour of Sardis, and the Sea-coast of Asia the less. These Commanders having their Companies brought down to the Sea-side, imbarked themselves in six hundred Gallies and other Vessels; and first of all attempted the Islands called Cyclades, which lay in the mid-way between Asia the less, and Greece. For (obtaining those places) the Persians had then nothing to hinder the transportation of their forces over the Ægean Sea; but on the contrary they might always both relieve themselves in the passage, and shroud themselves from all sudden tempests and outrage.

To this end, they first possest themselves of Samos; secondly, they attempted Naxos: which Island the Inhabitants despairing of their own forces, abandoned. So did the people of Delos, of which Apollo was native: which Island Darius did not only forbear to sack, but recalling the Inhabitants, he gave order to beautifie the places and Altars of Sacrifice to Apollo erected. And having recovered these and other Islands, the Persians directed their course

Her. l. 6. Whether this City or People were of Peloponnesus in Ionia, or of Ægea, between Thessalia and Macedon, I do not know; but those borderers and next the enemy, were more likely to compound than the rest far off. There is also a City called Æginum, not far from Ægea, Livy, 32, 33, &c.

courſe for Eretria in Eubœa: for that City (as already hath been ſhewed) had aſſiſted the Ionians at the taking and firing of Sardis. In this Iſland the Perſians took ground, and beſieged Eretria very ſtraitly, and after ſix days aſſault, partly by force, and in part by the treaſon of Euphabus and Philagius, they took it, ſackt it, and burnt it to the ground. Thus far the winds of proſperous fortune filled their ſails. From Eubœa the Perſians paſt their Army into Attica, conducted and guided by Hippias, late Prince of Athens, and marching towards it, they encamped at Marathon, in the way from the Sea, where they landed towards Athens.

The Athenians finding the time arrived wherein they were to diſpute with their own virtues againſt Fortune, and to caſt lots for their liberty, for their wives, their children, and their lives, put themſelves in the beſt order they could to make reſiſtance, and withal ſent away with ſpeed to the Lacedæmonians for ſuccour, imploying in that Negotiation one Phidippides; who paſſing through Arcadia, encountred in the way a familiar Devil, which he ſuppoſed to be Pan, who willed him to aſſure the Athenians of victory, promiſing that ſome one of the gods ſhould be preſent at the battel to aſſiſt them, and defend them againſt the multitude of their enemies. Phidippides at his return, ſeeing he could not bring with him any preſent ſuccours from Sparta, yet he thought it greatly availing to bring news from the gods, and promiſe of aſſiſtance from Heaven, which no doubt (though the device was ſomewhat likely to be his own, yet) it greatly encouraged the multitude and common people, who in all ages have been more ſtirred up with fond Prophecies, and other like ſuperſtitious fooleries, than by any juſt cauſe or ſolid reaſon.

The Athenians being now left to themſelves, with one thouſand only of the Plateans (who having been formerly defended by the Athenians againſt the Thebans, did in this extremity witneſs their thankfulneſs and grateful diſpoſition) began to diſpute, Whether it were moſt for their advantage to defend the walls of Athens, or to put themſelves into the field with ſuch forces as they had, the ſame conſiſting of ten thouſand Athenians, and one thouſand of the Plateans? In the end, and after great diverſity of opinions, Miltiades, who perſwaded the trial by battel, prevailed.

The Armies being now in view, and within a mile of each other, the Athenians diſpoſed themſelves into three troops: two wings or horns, as they term them; and the body of a battel. The Perſians when they perceived ſo ſmall a troop advancing towards them, thought the Athenians rather diſpoſſeſt of their underſtandings, than poſſeſt with the reſolution whereof they made ſhew. So invincible and reſiſtleſs the Perſians eſteemed their own numbers to be, and that ſmall troop of their enemies then in view, rather to be deſpiſed than to be fought withal: But in concluſion, the Victory being doubtfully ballanced for a while, ſometime the virtue of the Græcians, and ſometimes the number of the Perſians prevailed; the Græcians fighting for all that they had, the Perſians for that they needed not; theſe great forces of Darius were diſordered and put to rout; the Athenians following their Victory even to the Sea-ſhore; where the Perſians, ſo many of them as loſt not their wits with their courage, ſaved themſelves in their Ships.

The Perſian Army conſiſted of an hundred thouſand foot, and ten thouſand horſe; of which there were ſlain in the place ſix thouſand three hundred, and of the Græcians an hundred fourſcore and twelve. For howſoever it came to paſs, either by ſtrange Viſions, which were afterward called Pannici terrores, or by ſome other affright, it ſeemeth that the invading Army, after the firſt encounter, fought with their backs towards their enemy, and loſt that number, by Herodotus ſet down, in their diſorderly retreat, or rather in their flat running away. As for Juſtins report, That two hundred thouſand of the Perſian Army were ſlain, the ſame hath no appearance nor poſſibility of truth. In this fight Hippias the perſwader of the enterpriſe was ſlain, ſaith Juſtin and Cicero; but Suidas tells us, That he eſcaped, and died moſt miſerably in Lemnos. Ad Att.

The greateſt honour of this Victory was caſt upon Miltiades, who both perſwaded the trial by battel, and behaved himſelf therein anſwerably to the counſel which he gave. Themiſtocles had his firſt reputation in this fight, being but young and of the firſt beard. Thoſe of the Græcians of mark and commandment, that fell in the firſt encounter, were Callimachus and Steſileus. It is alſo ſaid, That Cynegyrus following the Perſians to their embarking, laid hands on one of their Gallies, to have held it from putting off the ſhore, and having his right hand cut off, he yet offered to arreſt it with his left; of which alſo being deprived, he took hold of it with his teeth. This Encounter happened in the firſt year of the threeſcore and twelfth Olympiad, about the time of the War made by Coriolanus againſt his fellow Romans: Alexander the Son of Amyntas being then King of Macedon, and Phanippus then Governour of Athens, according to Plutarch, or Hybilides, after Halycarnaſſæus. In vita Ariſt.

This great fray thus parted, and the Perſians returned back into the leſſer Aſia, Miltiades ſought and obtained an employment againſt the Iſlanders of Paros, one of the Cyclades; and paſſing over his Companies in threeſcore and ten Gallies, after ſix and twenty days aſſault he brake his thigh, in ſeeking to enter it by the Temple of Ceres, wherewith himſelf being made unable, and his Companies diſcouraged, he returned to Athens; where thoſe ungrateful Citizens forgetting all his ſervices paſt, and that of all other the moſt renowned at the battel of Marathon, did by the perſwaſion of Xantippus the father of Pericles (who envied his fame) caſt him into priſon, and ſet on him a fine of fifty Talents; where his weak and wounded body being not able to endure the one, nor his eſtate to pay the other, he after a few days ended his life.

Which envy of the better ſort to each other, with their private Factions, aſſiſted by the unthankful and witleſs people, brought them not many years after, from a victorious and famous Nation, to baſe ſubjection and ſlavery. Miltiades left behind him one ſon called Cymon begotten on Hegeſipila, daughter of Olorus King of Thrace, who (ſaith Plutarch) was neither inferiour to his Father in valour, nor to Themiſtocles in underſtanding, but exceeded them both in Juſtice and good Government.

Now Darius taking greater care how to recover his honour, than ſorrow for the loſs received in Greece, gave order for new levies of men, and all other warlike proviſions. But the Egyptians revolting from his obedience (a Kingdom of great ſtrength and revenue) greatly diſtracted his reſolution for the re-invaſion of Greece. The diſſention alſo among his Sons, of whom the younger being born after he was King, and by ſo great a mother as Atoſſa, diſdaining to give place to his elder brother, born before Darius obtained the Empire, greatly vexed him. And laſtly, Death, who hath no reſpect of any mans affairs, gave end to all his conſultations and enterpriſes, and joined him to the earth of his Anceſtors, about a year after the battel of Marathon, and after that he had reigned ſix and thirty years. He left behind him five ſons, namely, Artabaſanes, born before he obtained the Kingdom, Xerxes who ſucceeded him, Achæmenes Governour of Egypt, Maſiſtes, and Anabignes.

CHAP. VI.

of XERXES.

SECT. I.

The Preparations of Xerxes againſt Greece.

Xerxes received from his Father, as hereditary, a double War, one to be made againſt the Egyptians, which he finiſhed ſo ſpeedily, that there is nothing remaining in writing how the ſame was performed: the other againſt the Græcians, of which it is hard to judg, whether the preparations were more terrible, or the ſucceſs ridiculous. In the conſultation for the proſecution of this War, which was chiefly bent againſt the Athenians, the Princes of Perſia were divided in opinion. Mardonius who had formerly commanded in Thrace and Macedon, under Darius, and had alſo Hyſtaſpes for his Grandfather, as Xerxes had, and married Xerxes his Siſter Artozoſtres, perſwaded by many arguments the European War. But Artabanus, Brother to the late Darius, and Uncle to Xerxes, maintained the contrary counſel, laying before Xerxes the lamentable and ridiculous ſucceſs of the two late Invaſions, which Darius had made contrary to his counſel: The one in perſon upon the Scythians, the other by his Lieutenants upon the Greeks; in each of which Darius left to his Enemies both his Army and his Honour.

He therefore beſought Xerxes to be right well adviſed before he did too far imbark himſelf in this buſineſs. For whatſoever undertaking hath deliberate and ſound counſel for conductor, though the ſucceſs do not always anſwer the probability, yet hath Fortune nothing elſe thereof to vaunt, than the variableneſs of his own nature, which only the Divine Providence, and not any humane power, can conſtrain.

But ſo obſtinate was the reſolution of Xerxes in proſecution of his former intent, that Artabanus, whether terrified by Viſions (as it is written of him) or fearing the Kings hatred, which he made known to all thoſe that oppoſed his deſire to this War (changing opinion and counſel) aſſiſted the Grecian Expedition with all the power he had.

After the War of Egypt was ended, four years were conſumed in deſcribing and gathering an Army for this invaſion: which being compounded of all Nations ſubject to the Perſian Empire, conſiſted of ſeventeen hundred thouſand foot, and eighty thouſand Horſemen, beſides Chariots, Camels, and other Beaſts of Carriage, if we may believe Herodotus: for of this multitude, Trogus finds the number leſs by ſeven hundred thouſand footmen. Her. l. 7.

The Commanders of the ſeveral Nations were the Princes of the blood of Perſia, either by marriage in the Kings houſe, or otherwiſe; for to theſe were all commandments of this nature given, ſome few people excepted, who had of their own Leaders.

The charge of the whole Army was beſtowed on Mardonius, the Son of Gobrias, by a ſiſter of Darius, to whom were joined ſome others of Xerxes his neareſt kindred, as Generals over all; ſaving that the charge of ten thouſand ſelect Perſians, called the Immortal Regiment (becauſe if any one of the whole number died, or were ſlain, there was another preſently choſen in his ſtead) was given to Hydarnes; the eighty thouſand horſemen were led by the ſons of Datis, who commanded the late Army of Darius in Greece.

The Fleet of Gallies were 2200, and eight furniſhed by the Phœnicians, who had Commanders of their own Nation, and by the Cypriots, Cilicians, Pamphylians, Lycians, Dorians, Carians, Ionians, Æolians, and Helleſpontines; who were truſted with the furniſhing of their own Veſſels, though commanded by the Princes of Perſia, as by Artabignes the Son of Darius, and others. The reſt of the Veſſels for tranſportation were three thouſand. There were alſo certain Gallies furniſhed by Artemeſia, the daughter of Lygdames, Princeſs of Halicarnaſſeus, and the Iſlands adjoining, which her ſelf commanded. Thoſe Gallies by her prepared and furniſhed, exceeded all the reſt of the Fleet, excepting thoſe of Zidon, in which Xerxes himſelf was imbarked.

SECT. II.

Xerxes Army entertained by Pythius: his cutting off Mount Athos from the Continent: his Bridg of Boats over the Helleſpont: and the diſcourſe between him and Artabanus upon the view of the Army.

When this World of an Army was throughly furniſhed, he cauſed all the Nations of which it was compounded, to make their Rendezvouz, and repair at Sardis in Lydia. And when he had aſſembled to the number of ſeventeen hundred thouſand foot, as he entred the border of Celænus he was by one Pythius a Lydian entertained, who out of his Flocks and Herds of Cattel gave food to Xerxes and his whole Army. The feaſt ended, ended, he alſo preſented him with two thouſand Talents of Silver, and in Gold four Millions, wanting ſeven thouſand of the Perſian Darici; which make ſo many of our Marks.

The King overcome with the exceeding liberality of Pythius, did not only refuſe his treaſure offered, but commanded that ſeven thouſand Darici ſhould be given him to make up his four Millions; of which ſo many thouſands were wanting when he made the Preſent. But ſoon after, when Pythius beſought him to ſpare one of his five ſons from his attendance into Greece (becauſe himſelf was old, and had none whom he could ſo well truſt as his own ſon), Xerxes moſt barbarouſly cauſed the young man, for whom his father ſought exemption, to be ſundered into two parts, commanding that the one half of his Carcaſs ſhould be layed on the right, and the other half on the left hand of the common way by which the Army marched.

Two things he commanded to be done before he came to the Sea-ſide: The one was a paſſage for Gallies to be cut behind Mount Athos, making the ſame (with the half Iſland or Headland whereon it ſtood) to be an entire Iſland; ſundring thereby from the Continent of Thrace five Cities, beſides the Mountain and the Cherſoneſus, or Neck of Land it ſelf: a work of more oſtentation than of uſe, and yet an enterprize of no great wonder, the Valley which held it to the Continent having but twelve furlongs (which make about a mile and a half) to cut through, and the ditch being broad enough only for two Gallies to paſs in front. The Cities ſo ſevered from the main, were Dion, Olophyxus, Acrothoon, Thyſus, and Cleonæ.

He alſo gave order, that a Bridg upon Boats ſhould be made over the Helleſpont between Abidus and Seſtos, the Sea there having a mile of breadth wanting an eighth part; which after the finiſhing, was by a Tempeſt torn aſunder and diſſevered: wherewith Xerxes being more enraged than diſcouraged, commanded thoſe to be ſlain that were maſters of the work, and cauſed ſix hundred threeſcore and fourteen Gallies to be coupled together, thereon to frame a new Bridg; which by the art and induſtry of the Phœnicians, was ſo well anchored to reſiſt both winds blowing into, and from the Euxine Sea, as the ſame being well boarded and railed, the whole Army of ſeventeen hundred thouſand Foot, and fourſcore thouſand Horſe, with all the Moyles and Carriages, paſt over it into Europe in ſeven days and ſeven nights, without intermiſſion. This tranſportation of Armies did Cæſar afterward uſe. And Caligula, that mad Emperour, in imitation of Xerxes his Bridg, did build the like.

The Bridg finiſhed, and the Army brought near to the Sea-ſide, Xerxes took a view of all his Troops, aſſembled in the Plains of Abidus, being carried up, and ſeated on a place over-topping the Land round about it, and the Sea adjoyning: and after he had gloried in his own happineſs, to behold and command ſo many Nations, and ſo powerful an Army and Fleet, he ſuddenly (notwithſtanding) burſt out into tears, moved with this contemplation, That in one hundred years there ſhould not any one ſurvive of that marvellous multitude: the cauſe of which ſudden change of paſſion when he uttered to Artabanus his Uncle, Artabanus ſpake to the King to this effect: That which is more lamentable than the diſſolution of this great Troop within that number of years by the King remembred, is, That the life it ſelf which we enjoy is yet more miſerable than the end thereof: for in thoſe few days given us in the world, there is no man among all theſe, or elſewhere, that ever found himſelf ſo accompanied with happineſs, but that he oftentimes pleaſed himſelf better with the deſire and hope of death, than of living; the incident calamities, diſeaſes, and ſorrows whereto mankind is ſubject, being ſo many and inevitable, that the ſhorteſt life doth oftentimes appear unto us over-long; to avoid all which, there is neither refuge nor reſt, but in deſired death alone.

With this melancholy diſcourſe, Xerxes being not much pleaſed, prayed Artabanus not to overcaſt thoſe joyes which they had now in purſuit, with ſad remembrances. And holding ſtill a doubtful conceit, that Artabanus utterly condemned the invaſion of Greece, againſt which he had formerly given many ſtrong reaſons, deſired him to deal freely with him, Whether he were returned to his firſt reſolution, that the enterprize of Greece could not be proſperous? or whether, according to the change of mind put into him by his late Viſion, he was confident of good ſucceſs? Artabanus, notwithſtanding that he aſſured himſelf of the Kings reſolution to go on, and dared not by any new arguments to batter the great purpoſe it ſelf, yet he told the King, That there were two things which marvellouſly affrighted him, and which the King ſhould find, as he feared, to be moſt adverſe, to wit, the Sea and the Land: The Sea, becauſe it had no where in that part of the World any Port capable of ſo great a Fleet; inſomuch, as if any tempeſt ſhould ariſe, all the Continent of Greece could hardly receive them, nor all the Havens thereof afford them any ſafety: and therefore when any ſuch ſhelter ſhall be wanting unto them, he prayed him to underſtand, that in ſuch a caſe of extremity men are left to the will and diſpoſition of Fortune, and not Fortune to the will and diſpoſition of men. The Land, beſides other incommodities, will be found by ſo much the more an enemy, by how much the unſatiate deſire of man to obtain more and more thereof, doth lead him forward: for were there no man found to give reſiſtance, yet the want of means to feed ſuch an Army, and the Famine which cannot be prevented, will without any other violence offered, diſmable and conſume it. By theſe Arguments Artabanus hoped to have diverted Xerxes, not daring perchance to utter what indeed he moſt feared, to wit, the overthrow of the Army it ſelf both by Sea and Land, which ſoon after followed. Theſe cautions were exceeding weighty, if Xerxes his obſtinacy had not miſpriſed them. For to invade by Sea upon a perilous Coaſt, being neither in poſſeſſion of any Port, nor ſuccoured by any party, may better fit a Prince preſuming on his fortune, than enriched with underſtanding. Such was the enterpriſe of Philip the ſecond upon England in the year 1588, who had belike never heard of this Counſel of Artabanus to Xerxes, or forgotten it.

Now concerning the ſecond point; It is very likely that Xerxes his Army, which could not have in it leſs than two millions of Souls, beſides his beaſts for ſervice, and carriage, ſhould after a few days ſuffer famine, and uſing Machiavels words, Mourire ſans confeſſion; Die without a knife. For it was impoſſible for Greece, being a ragged, ſtrait, and mountainous Country, to yield food (beſides what ſerved themſelves) for twenty hundred thouſand ſtrangers, whom they never meant to entertain but with the ſharpned points of their Weapons, deſtroying withal whatſoever they could not well incloſe and defend. Nay, if we may believe Herodotus, the Army of Xerxes being reviewed at Thermopylæ, consisted of five millions, two hundred eighty three thousand, two hundred twenty men, besides Laundresses, Harlots, and Horses; and was therefore likely to endure a speedy famine.

The effect of Xerxes his answer was, That it was impossible to provide for all things; and that whosoever should enterprise any great matter, if he gave the hearing to all that could be objected of accidental inconveniences, he should never pursue the same farther than the dispute and consultation: which if his Predecessors, the Persian Kings, had done, they had never grown to that greatness, or possest so many Kingdoms and Nations as they now did; and therefore concluded, That great enterprises were never undertaken without great perils. Which resolution of Xerxes was not to be condemned, if any necessity had inforc'd him to that War. But seeing the many Nations newly conquered, which he already commanded, were more than could be constrained to obedience any longer than the powerful prosperity of the Persians endured, and that Greece was separated by the Sea from the rest of Xerxes his Dominions (of whose resolution his Father Darius had made a dear experience) the fruit of this War was answerable to the plantation, and the success and end agreeable to the weak counsel whereon it was grounded. Furthermore, those millions of men which he transported, and yet in his own judgment not sufficient (for he gathered in, marching on, all the strength of Thrace and Macedon) were an argument, that he rather hoped to fear the Greeks by the fame of his numbers, than that he had any confidence in their valour and resolution, whom he conducted. For it is wisely said of those uncountable multitudes: Non vires habent, sed pondus; & impedimenta potius sunt, quam auxilium: They are great in bulk, but weak in forces, and rather a luggage than an aid.

Besides, as it was impossible to marshall such a world of men in one Army; so the divers Nations, speaking divers languages, bred the same confusion among the Persian Commanders when they came to fight, as it did to the builders of Babel when they came to work. Whereas if Xerxes had of his five millions compounded ten Armies of fifty thousand chosen Soldiers in each, and sent them yearly into Greece well victualled and furnished, he had either prevailed by the sword, or forced them to forsake their territory, brought them into obedience by necessity and famine, which cannot be resisted. But while Xerxes resolved to cut down the banks of Greece, and to let in a sea of men upon them, he was deceived both of his own hopes, and in their hearts whom he employed, and beaten by the Greeks both by Land and Sea; yea, he himself, conducted by his fear, fled shamefully into Asia. A great part of his Army was buried in Greece; the remainder whereof, which wintred in Thessaly, and led by Mardonius who perswaded the enterprise, was in the summer following utterly defeated, and himself slain.

SECT. III.

Of the fights at Thermopylæ and Artemisium.

After such time as Xerxes had transported the Army over the Hellespont, and landed in Thrace (leaving the description of his passage along that Coast, and how the River of Lissus was drunk dry by his multitudes, and the Lake near to Pissyrus by his cattel, with other accidents in his marches towards Greece): I will speak of the encounters he had, and the shameful and incredible overthrows which he received. As first at Thermopylæ, a narrow passage of half an acre of ground, lying between the Mountains which did divide Thessaly from Greece, where sometime the Phocians had raised a wall with gates, which was then for the most part ruined. At this entrance Leonidas one of the Kings of Sparta, with three hundred Lacedemonians, assisted with one thousand Tegeatæ and Mantineans, one thousand Arcadians, and other Peloponnesians, to the number of three thousand one hundred in the whole; besides one thousand Phocians, four hundred Thebans, seven hundred Thespians, and all the forces (such as they were) of the bordering Locrians, defended the passage two whole days together against that huge Army of the Persians. The valour of the Greeks appeared so excellent in this defence, that in the first dayes fight Xerxes is said to have three times leaped out of his Throne, fearing the destruction of his Army by one handful of those men whom not long before he had utterly despised: and when the second days attempt upon the Greeks had proved vain, he was altogether ignorant how to proceed further; and so might have continued, had not a runnagate Grecian taught him a secret way, by which part of his Army might ascend the ledg of mountains, and set upon the backs of those who kept the Straits. But when the most valiant of the Persian Army had almost inclosed the small forces of the Greeks, then did Leonidas King of the Lacedemonians, with his three hundred and seven hundred Thespians, which were all that abode by him, refuse to quit the place which they had undertaken to make good, and with admirable courage not only resist that world of men which charged them on all sides; but issuing out of their strength, made so great a slaughter of their enemies, that they might well be called vanquishers, though all of them were slain upon the place. Xerxes having lost in this last fight, together with twenty thousand other Soldiers and Captains, two of his own brethren, began to doubt what inconvenience might befall him by the vertue of such as had not been present at these battels, with whom he knew that he shortly was to deal. Especially of the Spartans he stood in great fear, whose manhood had appeared singular in this trial, which caused him very carefully to enquire what numbers they could bring into the field. It is reported of Dieneces the Spartan, that when one thought to have terrified him by saying, That the flight of the Persian Arrows was so thick as would hide the Sun; he answered thus: It is very good news, for then shall we fight in the cool shade.

Such notable resolution having as freely been expressed in deeds, as was uttered in words, caused the Persian to stand in great doubt, when he heard that the City of Sparta could arm well-nigh eight thousand men of the like temper, and that the other Lacedæmonians, though inferior to those, were very valiant men. Wherefore he asked counsel of Demaratus, a banished King of the Spartans, who had always well advised and instructed him in the things of Greece, what course were fittest to be taken in his further proceedings. The opinion of Demaratus was, That all the Land-forces should assemble together to defend the Isthmus, that streight neck of ground which joineth Peloponnesus to the Continent. For which cause he advised, That three hundred ships well manned, should be sent ſent unto the Coaſt of Laconia, to ſpoil the Countrey, and to hold the Lacedæmonians and their neighbours buſied at home, whilſt Xerxes at his leiſure having ſubdued the reſt, might afterward bring his whole power upon them, who remaining deſtitute of ſuccour, would be too weak alone to make reſiſtance. To this purpoſe alſo the ſame Demaratus further adviſed, That the ſaid Fleet of three hundred ſhips ſhould ſeize upon the Iſland then called Cythera, now Cerigo, which lying near to the Coaſt of Laconia, might ſerve as a fit place of Rendezvous upon all occaſions, either of their own defence, or endamaging the enemy: whereby that ancient ſpeech of Chilon the Lacedæmonian ſhould be verified, that it were better for his Countrymen to have that Iſle drowned in the Sea, than ſtand ſo inconveniently for them as it did. What effect this counſel might have taken, had it been followed, it is not eaſie to gueſs. But a contrary opinion of Achæmenes brother to King Xerxes, was preferred as the ſafer. For the Perſian Fleet had been ſorely vexed with a grievous tempeſt, which continued three whole days together, wherein were loſt upon the Coaſt of Magneſia four hundred ſhips of War, beſides other Veſſels innumerable, accordingly as Artabanus had foreſeen, that if any ſuch calamity ſhould overtake them, there would not be found any Harbor wide enough to give them ſuccour. Therefore Achæmenes perſwaded his Brother not to diſperſe his Fleet; for if (ſaid he) after the loſs of four hundred ſhips we ſhall ſend away other three hundred to ſeek adventures, then will the Greeks be ſtrong enough by Sea to encounter the reſt of the Navy, which holding all together, is invincible. To this counſel Xerxes yielded, hoping that his Land-Army and Fleet, ſhould each of them ſtand the other in good ſtead, whilſt both held one courſe, and lay not far aſunder. But herein he was far deceived; for about the ſame time that his Army had felt the valour of the Greeks by Land, his Navy likewiſe made a ſorrowful proof of their skill and courage at Sea. The Grecians Fleet lay at that time at Artimeſium, in the ſtraits of Eubœa, where the Perſians thinking to encompaſs them, ſent two hundred ſail about the Iſland to fall upon them behind, uſing a-like ſtratagem to that which their King did practiſe againſt Leonidas, in a caſe not unlike, but with far different ſucceſs. For that narrow channel of the Sea, which divideth Eubœa from the main, was in the ſame ſort held by a Navy of two hundred threeſcore and eleven ſail againſt the huge Perſian Armado, as the ſtraits of Thermopylæ had formerly been maintained by Leonidas till he was circumvented, as this Navy might have been, but was not. The departure of thoſe two hundred ſhips that were ſent about the Iſland, and the cauſe of their voyage was too well known in the Perſian Fleet, and ſoon enough diſcloſed to the Greeks, who ſetting ſail by night, met them with a counter-ſurprize, taking and ſinking thirty Veſſels, inforcing the reſt to take the Sea; where being over taken with foul weather, they were driven upon the Rocks, and caſt all away. Contrariwiſe, the Navy of the Greeks were increaſed by the arrival of fifty three Athenian ſhips, and one Lemnian, which came to their party in the laſt fight. As theſe new forces encouraged the one ſide, ſo the fear of Xerxes his diſpleaſure ſtirred up the other to redeem their loſs with ſome notable exploit. Wherefore ſetting aſide their unfortunate policy, they reſolved in plain fight to repair their honour, and caſting themſelves into the form of a Creſcent, thought ſo to incloſe the Greeks, who readily did preſent them battel at Artemiſium.

The fight endured from noon till night, and ended with equal loſs to both parts. For though more of the Perſian ſhips were ſunk and taken, yet the leſſer loſs fell altogether as heavy upon the Greekiſh Fleet, which being ſmall, could worſe bear it. Herein only the Barbarians may ſeem to have had the worſe, that they forſook the place of fight, leaving the wrack and ſpoils to the enemy, who nevertheleſs were fain to abandon preſently even the paſſage which they had undertaken to defend; both for that many of their ſhips were ſorely cruſht in the battel, and eſpecially becauſe they had received advertiſement of the death of Leonidas at Thermopylæ. Before they weighed Anchors, Themiſtocles General of the Athenians, engraved upon ſtone at the watering-place an exhortation to the Ionians, that either they ſhould revolt unto the Greeks, or ſtand neutral; which perſwaſion, he hoped, would either take ſome place with them, or at the leaſt make them ſuſpected by the Perſians.

SECT. IV.

The attempt of Xerxes upon Apollo's Temple: and his taking of Athens.

WHen Xerxes had paſt the ſtraits of Thermopylæ, he waſted the Country of the Phocians, and the regions adjoining: as for the Inhabitants, they choſe rather to fly, and reſerve themſelves to a day of battel, than to adventure their lives into his hands, upon hope of ſaving their wealth, by making proffer unto him of their ſervice. Part of his Army he ſent to ſpoil the Temple of Delphi, which was exceeding rich by means of many Offerings that had been made by divers Kings, and great perſonages; of all which riches it was thought that Xerxes had a better Inventory than of the goods left in his own Palace. To make relation of a great aſtoniſhment that fell upon the Companies which arrived at the Temple to have ſacked it, and of two Rocks that breaking from the Mount Parnaſſus, overwhelmed many of the Barbarians, it were peradventure ſomewhat ſuperſtitious. Yet Herodotus, who lived not long after, ſaith, That the broken Rocks remained even to his memory in the Temple of Minerva, whither they rouled in their fall. And ſurely this attempt of Xerxes was impious; for ſeeing he believed that Apollo was a god, he ſhould not have dared to entertain a covetous deſire of inriching himſelf by committing ſacrilege upon his Temple. Wherefore it may poſſibly be true, that licenſe to chaſtiſe his impiety, in ſuch manner as is reported, was granted unto the Devil, by that Holy One, who ſaith, Will a man ſpoil his gods? and elſewhere; Hath any Nation changed their gods, which yet are no gods? Go to the Iſles of Kittim, and behold, and ſend to Kedar, and take diligent heed, and ſee whether there be any ſuch things. Now this impiety of Xerxes was the more inexcuſable, for that the Perſians alledged the burning of Cybele's Temple by the Athenians, when they ſet fire on the City of Sardis in Aſia, to be the ground and cauſe of the waſte which they made in burning of Cities and Temples in Greece. Whereas indeed, in the enterprize againſt Delphos, this vizor of holy and zealous revenge falling off, diſcovered the face of covetouſneſs ſo much the more ugly, by how much the more themſelves had profeſſed a deteſtation of the offence which the Athenians had committed in that kind by meer mischance.

The remainder of that which Xerxes did, may be expressed briefly thus: He came to Athens, which finding forsaken, he took and burnt the Cittadel and Temple which was therein. The Cittadel indeed was defended a while by some of more courage than wisdom, who literally interpreting Apollo's Oracle, That Athens should be safe in wooden walls, had fortified that place with Boards and Palissadoes; too weak to hold out long, though by their desperate valour so well maintained at the first assault, that they might have yielded it upon tolerable conditions, had they not vainly relied upon the Prophecy: whereof (being somewhat obscure) it was wisely done of Themistocles, to make discretion the Interpreter, applying rather the words to the present need, than fashioning the business to words.

SECT. V.

How Themistocles the Athenian drew the Greeks to fight at Salamis.

THe Athenians had, before the coming of Xerxes, removed their Wives and Children into Trœzene, Ægina, and Salamis, not so highly prizing their Houses and Lands, as their freedom, and the common liberty of Greece. Nevertheless, this great zeal, which the Athenians did shew for the general good of their Country, was ill requited by the other Greeks, who with much labour were hardly intreated to stay for them at Salamis, whilst they removed their Wives and Children out of the City. But when the City of Athens was taken, it was presently resolved upon, that they should forsake the Isle of Salamis, and withdraw the Fleet to Isthmus: which neck of land they did purpose to fortifie against the Persians, and so to defend Peloponnesus by Land and Sea, leaving the rest of Greece as indefensible, to the fury of the enemy. So should the Islands of Salamis and Ægina have been abandoned, and the Families of the Athenians (which were there bestowed as in places of security) have been given over into mercileſs bondage. Against this resolution Themistocles Admiral of the Athenian Fleet, very strongly made opposition, but in vain. For the Peloponnesians were so possessed with fear of losing their own, which they would not hazard, that no perswasions could obtain of them to regard the estate of their distressed Friends and Allies. Many remonstrances Themistocles made unto them, to allure them to abide the enemy at Salamis: As first in private unto Eurybiades the Lacedemonian, Admiral of the whole Fleet; That the self-same fear which made them forsake those coasts of Greece upon which they then anchored, would afterward (if it found no check at the first) cause them also to dissever the Fleet, and every one of the Confederates to withdraw himself to the defence of his own City and Estate: Then to the Council of War, which Eurybiades upon this motion did call together (forbearing to object what want of courage might work in them hereafter;) he shewed, that the fight at Isthmus would be in an open Sea, whereas it was more expedient for them, having the fewer ships, to determine the matter in the streights; and that besides the safeguard of Ægina, Megara, and Salamis, they should by abiding where they then were, sufficiently defend Isthmus; which the Barbarians should not so much as once look upon, if the Greeks obtained victory by Sea; which they could not so well hope for elsewhere, as in that present place which gave him so good advantage. All this would not serve to retain the Peloponnesians, of whom one unworthy of memory, upbraided Themistocles with the loss of Athens, blaming Eurybiades for suffering one to speak in the Council that had no Country of his own to inhabit. A base and shameful objection it was, to lay as a reproach that loss, which being voluntarily sustained for the common good, was in true estimation by so much the more honourable, by how much it was the greater. But this indignity did exasperate Themistocles, and put into his mouth a reply so sharp, as availed more than all his former perswasions. He told them all plainly, That the Athenians wanted not a fairer City than any Nation of Greece could boast of; having well near two hundred good ships of War, the better part of the Grecian Fleet, with which it was easie for them to transport their Families and substance into any part of the World, and settle themselves in a more secure habitation, leaving those to shift as well as they might, who in their extremity had refused to stand by them. Here withal he mentioned a Town in Italy belonging of old to the state of Athens, of which Town he said an Oracle had foretold, That the Athenians in process of time should build it anew; and there (quoth he) will we plant our selves, leaving unto you a sorrowful remembrance of my words, and of your own unthankfulness. The Peloponnesians hearing thus much, began to enter into better consideration of the Athenians; whose affairs depended not as they well perceived, upon so weak terms, that they should be driven to crouch to others; but rather were such as might enforce the rest to yield to them, and condescend even to the uttermost of their own demands.

For the Athenians when they first embraced that Heroical resolution, of leaving their grounds and houses to fire and ruin, if necessity should enforce them so far for the preservation of their liberty, did employ the most of their private wealth, and all the common treasure, in building a great Navy. By these means they hoped (which accordingly fell out) that no such calamity should befall them by Land, as might not well be counterpoised by great advantages at Sea: Knowing well, that a strong Fleet would either procure victory at home, or a secure passage to any other Country. The other States of Greece held it sufficient, if building a few new ships, they did somewhat amend their Navy. Whereby it came to pass, that had they been vanquished, they could not have expected any other fortune than either present death, or perpetual slavery; neither could they hope to be victorious without the assistance of the Athenians, whose forces by Sea did equal all theirs together; the whole consisting of more than three hundred and fourscore bottoms. Wherefore these Peloponnesians beginning to suspect their own condition, which would have stood upon desperate points if the Fleet of Athens had forsaken them, were soon perswaded by the greater fear of such a bad event, to forget the lesser, which they had conceived of the Persians; and laying aside their insolent bravery, they yielded to that most profitable counsel of abiding at Salamis.

SECT.

SECT. VI.

How the Persians consulted about giving battel: and how Themistocles by policy held the Greeks to their resolution; with the victory at Salamis thereupon ensuing.

IN the mean season the Persians had entred into consultation, whether it were convenient to offer battel to the Greeks, or no. The rest of the Captains giving such advice as they thought would best please the King their Master, had soon agreed upon the fight; but Artemisia Queen of Halicarnassæus, who followed Xerxes to this War in person, was of contrary opinion: Her counsel was, that the King himself directly should march toward Peloponnesus, whereby it would come to pass, that the Greek Navy (unable otherwise to continue long at Salamis for want of provision) should presently be dissevered, and every one seeking to preserve his own City and Goods, they should being divided, prove unable to resist him, who had won so far upon them when they held together. And as the profit will be great in forbearing to give battel; so on the other side the danger will be more (said she) which we shall undergo, than any need requireth us to adventure upon; and the loss, in case it fall upon us, greater than the profit of the Victory which we desire. For if we compel the enemies to fly, it is more than they would have done, we sitting still: but if they as better Seamen than ours, put us to the worst, the journey to Peloponnesus is utterly dasht, and many that now declare for us, will soon revolt unto the Greeks. Mardonius whom Xerxes had sent for that purpose to the Fleet, related unto his Master the common consent of the other Captains, and withal this disagreeing opinion of Artemisia. The King well pleased with her advice, yet resolved upon following the more general, but far worse counsel of the rest; which would questionless have been the same which Artemisia gave, had not fear and flattery made all the Captains utter that, as out of their own judgment, which they thought to be most conformable to their Princes determination. So it was indeed, that Xerxes had entertained a vain perswasion of much good that his own presence upon the shore to behold the conflict, would work among the Soldiers. Therefore he encamped upon the Sea-side, pitching his own Tent on the Mount Ægaleus, which is opposite unto the Isle of Salamis, whence at ease he might safely view all which might happen in that action, having Scribes about him to write down the acts and behaviour of every Captain. The near approach of the Barbarians, together with the news of that timorous diligence which their Countrymen shewed in fortifying the Isthmus, and of a Persian Army, marching apace thither, did now again so terrifie and amaze the Peloponnesians, that no entreaty nor contestation would suffice to hold them together. For they thought it meer madness to fight for a Country already lost, when they rather should endeavour to save that which remained unconquered; propounding chiefly to themselves what misery would befall them, if losing the Victory, they should be driven into Salamis, there to be shut up, and besieged round in a poor desolate Island.

Hereupon they resolved forthwith to set sail for Isthmus; which had presently been done if the wisdom of Themistocles had not prevented it. For he perceiving what a violent fear had stopt up their ears against all good counsel, did practise another course, and forthwith labour to prevent the execution of this unwholsome decree; not suffering the very hour of performance to find him busie in wrangling altercation. As soon as the Council brake up, he dispatched secretly a trusty Gentleman to the Persian Captains, informing them truly of the intended flight, and exhorting them to send part of their Navy about the Island, which incompassing the Greeks, might prevent their escape; giving them withal false hope of his assistance. The Persians no sooner heard than believed these good news, vvell knovving that the Victory vvas their ovvn assured, if the Athenian Fleet joyned with them; which they might easily hope, considering what ability their Master had to recompence for so doing, both the Captains with rich rewards, and the people with restitution of their City, and Territories. By these means it fell out, that when the Greeks very early in the morning were about to weigh Anchor, they found themselves incloſed round with Persians, who had laboured hard all that night, sending many of their ships about the Isle of Salamis, to charge the enemy in rear, and landing many of their men in the Isle of Psittalea, which lyeth over against Salamis, to save such of their own, and kill such of the Gracian party, as by any misfortune should be cast upon the shore. Thus did meer necessity enforce the Gracians to undertake the battel in the streights of Salamis, where they obtained a memorable Victory, stemming the foremost of their enemies, and chasing the rest, who falling foul one upon another, could neither conveniently fight nor fly. I do not find any particular occurrences in this great battel to be much remarkable. Sure it is, that the Scribes of Xerxes had a wearisom task of writing down many disasters that befell the Persian Fleet, which ill acquitted it self that day, doing no one piece of service worthy the presence of their King, or the registring of his Notaries. As for the Greeks, they might well seem to have wrought out that Victory with equal courage, were it not that the principal honour of that day was ascribed to those of Ægina, and to the Athenians, of whom it is recorded, That when the Barbarians did fly towards Phalerus, where the Land-Army of Xerxes lay, the ships of Ægina having possest the Streights, did sink or take them, whilst the Athenians did valiantly give charge upon those that kept the Sea, and made any countenance of resisting.

SECT. VII.

Of things following after the battel of Salamis: and of the flight of Xerxes.

AFter this Victory, the Greeks intending by way of scrutiny to determine which of the Captains had best merited of them in all this great service; every Captain being ambitious of that honour, did in the first place write down his own name, but in the second place, as best deserving next unto himself, almost every Suffrage did concur upon Themistocles. Thus private affection yielded unto vertue, as soon as her own turn was served. The Persian King, as not amazed with this calamity, began to make new preparation for continuance of War; but in such fashion, that they which were best acquainted with his temper might easily discern cern his faint-heart through his painted looks. Especially Mardonius Author of the War, began to caſt a wary eye upon his Maſter, fearing leſt his counſel ſhould be rewarded according to the event. Wherefore purpoſing rather to adventure his life in purſuit of the Victory, than to caſt it away by undergoing his Princes indignation, he adviſed the King to leave unto him three hundred thouſand men, with which forces he promiſed to reduce all Greece under the ſubjection of the Perſian Scepter. Herewithal he forgot not to ſooth Xerxes with many fair words, telling him, That the cowardiſe of thoſe Egyptians, Phœnicians, and Cilicians, with others of the like metal, nothing better than ſlaves, who had ſo ill behaved themſelves in the late Sea-ſervice, did not concern his honour, who had always been victorious, and had already ſubdued the better part of Greece, yea taken Athens it ſelf, againſt which the War was principally intended. Theſe words found very good acceptance in the Kings ear, who preſently betook himſelf to his journey homewards, making the more haſte, for that he underſtood, how the Greeks had a purpoſe to ſail to Helleſpont, and there to break down his bridg, and intercept his paſſage. True it was, that the Greeks had no ſuch intent, but rather wiſhed his haſty departure, knowing that he would leave his Army not ſo ſtrong as it ſhould have been had he in perſon remained with it. And for this cauſe did Eurybiades give counſel, that by no means they ſhould attempt the breaking of that Bridg, leſt neceſſity ſhould enforce the Perſians to take more courage, and rather to fight like men than die like beaſts. Wherefore Themiſtocles did, under pretence of friendſhip, ſend a falſe advertiſement unto this timerous Prince, adviſing him to convey himſelf into Aſia with all ſpeed, before his Bridg were diſſolved: which counſel Xerxes took very kindly, and haſtily followed, as before is ſhewed. Whether it were ſo that he found the Bridg whole, and thereby repaſſed into Aſia; or whether it were torn in ſunder by tempeſts, and he thereby driven to imbark himſelf in ſome obſcure veſſel, it is not greatly material; though the Greeks did moſt willingly imbrace the latter of theſe reports. Howſoever it were, this flight of his did well eaſe the Country, that was thereby disburdened of that huge throng of people, which as Locuſts had before overwhelmed it.

SECT. VIII.

The Negotiations between Mardonius and the Athenians, as alſo between the Athenians and the Lacedæmonians, after the flight of Xerxes.

Mardonius with his three hundred thouſand had withdrawn himſelf into Theſſaly, whence he ſent Alexander the ſon of Amyntas King of Macedon, as Embaſſador to the Athenians, with promiſe of large amends for all their loſſes received; and of extending their Territories as far as their own deſires; allowing them to retain their liberty and laws, if they would make peace with Xerxes, and aſſiſt him in that War.

The Athenians had now re-entred their City, but not as yet brought back their wives and children; foraſmuch as they well perceived that the place could not be ſecure till the Army of Mardonius was broken and defeated. Wherefore the Lacedæmonians underſtanding what fair conditions this Embaſſador would propound, were perplexed with very great fear, leſt he ſhould find good and ready acceptance. Hereupon, they likewiſe very ſpeedily diſpatch their Embaſſadors for Athens, who arriving before the Macedonian had audience, uſed the beſt of their perſwaſion to retain the Athenians firm. They alledged, that neither Xerxes nor Darius had any pretence of War againſt the reſt of Greece, but had only threatned the ſubverſion of Athens, till they and all their Confederates arming themſelves in defence of that City, were drawn into the quarrel, wherein the Athenians without much cruelty of injuſtice could not leave them. We know, ſaid they, that ye have endured great calamities, loſing the fruit of the grounds, and being driven to forſake the Town, the houſes thereof be ruined, and unfit for your habitation; in regard whereof, we undertake to maintain as our own, your wives and children amongſt us, as long as the War ſhall continue; hoping that ye who have always procured liberty to others, will not now go about to bring all Greece into ſlavery and bondage. As for the Barbarians, their promiſes are large, but their words and oaths are of no aſſurance. It was needleſs to uſe many arguments to the Athenians, who gave anſwer to Alexander in preſence of the Spartan Ambaſſadors, That whilſt the Sun continued his courſe, they would be enemies to Xerxes, regarding neither gold nor any riches, with which he might ſeek to make purchaſe of their liberty. Concerning the maintenance of their wives and children, it was a burden which they promiſed to ſuſtain themſelves; only deſiring the Lacedæmonians, that with all ſpeed they would cauſe their Army to march, foraſmuch as it was not likely that Mardonius would long ſit ſtill in Theſſaly, having once received ſuch a peremptory anſwer. In this their opinion of Mardonius his readineſs to invade Attica, they found themſelves nothing deceived. For he, as ſoon as Alexander had returned their obſtinate purpoſe of reſiſtance, did forthwith lead his Army towards them and their City: they having now the ſecond time quitted it, and conveyed themſelves into places of more ſecurity abroad in the Countrey, where they expected the arrival of their confederates. From Athens he ſent his Agents unto them, with inſtructions not only to perſwade them to acceptance of the conditions before to them propounded; but with great promiſes to allure the principal of them to his party. His hope was, that either the people, wearied with forſaking their houſes ſo often, would be deſirous to preſerve them from fire, and to have thoſe which were already laid waſte, re-edified at the Kings charges: or, if this affection took no place with them, but that needs they would rely upon their old confederates, whoſe ſuccours did very ſlowly advance forwards; yet perhaps the leaders might be won with great rewards, to draw them to this purpoſe; all which projects, if they ſhould fail, the deſtruction of Athens would be a good mean to pleaſe his Maſter King Xerxes, who muſt thereby needs underſtand, that Mardonius kept his ground, and feared not to confront the whole power of Greece in the ſtrongeſt part of their own Country. But his expectation was beguiled in all theſe. For the Athenians ſo little regarded his offers, that when one Lycidas, or (as Demoſthenes calls him) Cyrcilus adviſed the Senate to accept the conditions, and propounded them to the people; all the Senators, and as many as abiding without the Council-houſe, heard what he had ſaid, immediately diately ſet upon him, and ſtoned him to death; not examining whether it were fear or money that had moved him to utter ſuch a vile ſentence. Yea, the Women of Athens, and in the Iſle of Salamis, hearing of his bad counſel, and bad end, aſſembling together, did enter his houſe there, and put his wife and children to the like execution. All this bravery notwithſtanding, when they perceived the ſlackneſs of the Peloponneſians in giving them aid, they were fain to betake themſelves to Salamis again, the old place of their ſecurity. Remaining there, and ſeeing little forwardneſs in thoſe whom it moſt concerned to aſſiſt them, they ſent very ſevere meſſages to Sparta, complaining of their ſlackneſs, and threatning withal to take ſuch courſe as might ſtand beſt with their own good, ſeeing that the common eſtate of all was ſo little regarded. Theſe meſſengers were at the firſt entertained with dilatory anſwers; which every day grew colder, when as the Peloponneſian Wall, builded athwart the Iſthmus, was almoſt finiſhed. But as the Lacedæmonians waxed careleſs and dull, ſo the Athenians hotly preſſed them to a quick reſolution, giving them plainly to underſtand, that if they ſhould hold on in thoſe dilatory courſes, it would not be long ere the City of Athens took a new courſe that ſhould little pleaſe them. All this while the Perſian Fleet lay upon the Coaſt of Aſia, not daring to draw nearer unto Greece, as being now too weak at Sea. Likewiſe the Greekiſh Navy contained it ſelf within the Harbours upon Europe ſide; both to do ſervice where need ſhould require at home, and withal to ſhun the danger which might have befallen any part of it, that (being diſtracted from the reſt) had ventured over-far. So mutual fear preſerved in quiet the Iſlands lying in the midſt of the Ægean Seas. But it was well and ſeaſonably obſerved by a Counſellor of Sparta, that the Wall upon Iſthmus would ſerve to little purpoſe for the defence of Peloponneſus, if once the Athenians gave ear to Mardonius: conſidering that many doors would be opened into that Demy-Iſland, as ſoon as the Enemy ſhould by winning the friendſhip of Athens, become the Maſter of the Seas about it. The Lacedæmonians upon this admonition making better peruſal of their own dangers, were very careful to give ſatisfaction to the Athenian Embaſſadors, who not brooking their delays, were upon point of taking leave, yea, as it ſeemed, of renouncing their alliance. Wherefore diſpatching away five thouſand Spartans in the evening, under conduct of Pauſanias, they gave audience the next day to the Embaſſadors, whoſe complaints they anſwered with vehement proteſtations of their readineſs; deeply ſwearing, that the Army of Sparta was already far upon the journey, and giving them leave to take up other five thouſand Lacedæmonians, out of the Region adjoining, to follow after them.

The Athenians, though diſtaſting ſuch want of gravity, in a matter ſo important, were nevertheleſs contented with the final concluſion; and levying the number appointed of Lacedæmonian Soldiers, made vvhat haſte they could to incamp in Attica. The other Græcians vvere nothing ſlack in ſending forth Companies, vvhoſe near approach cauſed Mardonius to forſake Attica as a rough Country, and therefore of much diſadvantage to Horſe, vvherein conſiſted the beſt of his povver. Before his departure he burnt the City of Athens, beating dovvn the Walls of it, and ruining all that had formerly eſcaped the fury of War.

SECT. IX.

The great battel of Platæa.

IT were too long a rehearſal to ſhew all that happened in many ſkirmiſhes between the Greeks and him, in the Country of Bœotia, which Mardonius had choſen to be the ſeat of that War. Much time was ſpent before the quarrel was decided by the trial of one main battel: for both parties did ſtand upon their guard, each expecting when the other ſhould aſſail them.

The Army of Mardonius contained about three hundred thouſand, which were by him choſen out of Xerxes his Army; to whom were adjoined the forces of Thebes, Macedony, Theſſaly, and other parts of Greece, that now ſiding with the Perſian, furniſhed his Camp with fifty thouſand men. Againſt theſe the Lacedæmonians, Athenians, and their Confederates had levied an Army of one hundred and ten thouſand, of which forty thouſand were weightily armed, the reſt were only aſſiſtants to theſe forty thouſand, being armed more ſleightly, as rather to make excurſions and give chaſe, than to ſuſtain any ſtrong charges.

Theſe two Armies having eleven days confronted one the other, without performing any memorable piece of ſervice; Mardonius, whoſe victuals began to fail, reſolved to begin the fray. The Greeks were promiſed Victory by an Oracle, if they fought in the Land of the Athenians, and in the plain of Ceres and Proſerpina, making prayers unto certain gods, Demi-gods, and Nymphs. But it was hard to find the certain place which the Oracle deſigned: For the plain of Ceres was indeed in the Territory of Athens; but there was alſo an old Temple of Ceres and Proſerpina, near unto the place where they lay at that time encamped; as likewiſe the memorials of thoſe Nymphs and Demi-gods, were in the ſame place upon Mount Citharon; and the ground ſerved well for footmen againſt horſe: only the Land belonged unto the Plataans, and not unto the Athenians.

Whilſt the Greeks were perplexed about the interpretation of this doubtful Oracle, the Plataans to make all clear, did freely beſtow their Land on that ſide the Town upon the Athenians.

This magnificence of the Plataans cauſed Alexander the Great, many ages after, to re-ediſie their City; which was ruined in the Peloponneſian Wars.

All things being ready for battel, the Lacedæmonian General thought it moſt meet, that the Athenians ſhould ſtand oppoſite that day to the Medes and Perſians, whom they had formerly vanquiſhed at Marathon; and that he with his Spartans ſhould entertain the Thebans and other Greeks which followed Mardonius, as better acquainted with their fight, and having beaten them oftentimes before. This being agreed upon, the Athenians changed place with the Lacedæmonians; which Mardonius underſtanding, (whether fearing the Athenians, of whoſe valour the Medes and Perſians had felt heavy proof, or deſiring to encounter the Spartans, as thinking them the braveſt Soldiers in Greece) he did alſo change the order of his Battel, and oppoſe himſelf to Pauſanias. All the Greeks might well perceive how the Enemies did ſhift his wings, and Pauſanias thereupon returned to his former Station; which Mardonius noting, did alſo the like. So one whole day was ſpent in changing to and fro. Some attempt the Perſians made that day with their Archers on horſe-back, who did ſo moleſt the Greeks at their watering-place, that they were fain to enter into conſultation of retiring; becauſe they could not without much loſs to themſelves, and none to the enemy, lye near to that fountain which did ſerve all the Camp. Having therefore concluded among themſelves to diſ-lodge; and part of the Army being ſent away before day-light: Mardonius perceived their departure in the morning, and thereupon being incouraged by their flight, (which to him ſeemed to proceed out of meer cowardiſe) he charged them in the rear with great violence. It may well be recorded as a notable example of patient valour, That the Lacedæmonians being overtaken by the enemies horſe, and overwhelmed with great flights of Arrows, did quietly ſit ſtill, not making any reſiſtance or defence, till the Sacrifices for victory were happily ended, though many of them were hurt and ſlain, and ſome of eſpecial mark loſt, before any ſign of good ſucceſs appeared in the entrails.

But as ſoon as Panſanias had found in the Sacrifice thoſe tokens which the ſuperſtition of that Age and Countrey accounted fortunate, he gave the ſignal of battel; and thereupon the Soldiers, who till then did ſit upon the ground, as was their manner, aroſe all together, and with excellent courage received the charge of the Barbarians, that came thronging upon them without any fear of ſuch notable reſiſtance. The reſt of the Greek Army that was in march, being revoked by Panſanias, came in apace to ſuccour the Lacedæmonians: only that part of the Army which was led by the Athenians, could not arrive unto the place of the great battel, becauſe the Thebans and other Greeks confederated with the Perſians, gave them check by the way. Nevertheleſs, the Spartans, with other their Aſſiſtants, did ſo well acquit themſelves, that the Perſians were vanquiſhed, and Mardonius with many thouſands more ſlain in the field; the reſt fled into the Camp, which they had fortified with wooden walls, and there defended themſelves with ſuch courage as deſperate neceſſity inforced them unto; holding out the longer, becauſe the Lacedæmonians were not acquainted with the manner of aſſaulting Fortreſſes and Walls. In the mean time the Athenians having found ſtrong oppoſition of the Thebans and Theſſalians, did with much labour and courage obtain victory; which having not long purſued, they came to help the Lacedæmonians, whom they found warily buſied in aſſaulting the Camp with more valour than skill. Wherefore they themſelves undertook it, and in ſhort ſpace forced a paſſage thorow the Wall; at which breach firſt, and then on all ſides, the Greeks entred with ſuch fury, and juſt deſire of vengeance, that of three hundred thouſand, they are ſaid not to have left three thouſand alive, excepting thoſe who fled away with Artabanus, when as the Perſian Army firſt fell to rout.

If the execution were ſo great, as is reported, an eſpecial cauſe of it was the fooliſh retreat, or rather flight into the Camp. For, though it were ſo, that the place was well fortified, and the number of thoſe who caſt themſelves into it, greater than any of the Aſſailants; yet they being of ſeveral Nations and Languages, and having loſt their General, with other principal Commanders, it was impoſſible that they in ſuch a terror and aſtoniſhment, ſhould make good that piece of ground, lying in the heart of an Enemy-Countrey, againſt an Army of men far more valiant than themſelves, and enflamed with preſent victory. Therefore the ſame Wall which for a few hours had preſerved their lives, by holding out the enemy, did now impale them, and leave them to the ſlaughtering fury of unpitiful Victors. Artabanus fled into Thrace, telling the people of Theſſaly, and other Countries in his way, that he was ſent by Mardonius upon ſome piece of ſervice: For he well knew, that had they underſtood any thing of that great diſcomfiture, all places would have been hoſtile unto him, and ſought with his ruine to purchaſe favour of the vanquiſhers. Therefore making ſo large marches, that many of his Soldiers being feeble, were left behind and loſt, he came to Bizantium, whence he ſhipped his men over into Aſia. Such was the end of the vain-glorious Expedition undertaken by Xerxes againſt the Greeks, upon hope of Honour and Conqueſt, though ſorting otherwiſe, accordingly as Artabanus had foreſeen, and rather worſe; foraſmuch as it began the quarrel, which never ended before the ruin of the Perſian Empire was effected by that Nation of the Greeks, deſpiſed and ſought to have been brought into ſlavery. Hereby it may ſeem, that the Viſion appearing to Xerxes, was from God himſelf, who had formerly diſpoſed of thoſe things, ordaining the ſubverſion of the Perſian Monarchy by the Greeks, who thus provoked, entred into greater conſideration of their own ſtrength, and the weakneſs of their Enemies.

SECT. X.

The battel of Mycale; with a ſtrange accident that fell out in the beginning: and examples of the like.

THe ſame day on which the Battel was fought at Platæa, there was another Battel fought at Mycale, a Promontory, or Head-land in Aſia, where the Perſian Fleet rode.

Leutychides the Spartan, with Xantippus the Athenian, Admirals of the Greek Navy, at the requeſt of ſome Iſlanders and Ionians, did ſail into thoſe parts to deliver the Samians, and procure the Ionians to revolt from the Perſian. Xerxes himſelf at this time lay at Sardis a City in Lydia, not far from the Sea-ſide, having left threeſcore thouſand under the command of Tigranes, for defence of Ionia and the Sea-coaſt. Therefore when Artayntes and Ithramitres Admirals of the Perſian Fleet, underſtood that the Greeks bent their courſe towards them, they did forthwith draw their ſhips aground, fortifying with Paliſſadoes, and otherwiſe as much ground as was needful for the encamping of all their Land and Sea-forces. Leutychides at his arrival, perceiving that they meant to keep within their ſtrength, and reſolving to force them out of it, rowed with his Galley cloſe aboard the ſhore, and called upon the Ionians (who more for fear than good will, were encamped among the Perſians) exhorting them in the Greek Tongue to remember liberty, and uſe the fair occaſion which they now had to recover it. Herein he did imitate Themiſtocles, who had done the like at Eubœa, truſting that either theſe perſwaſions would prevail, or if the Perſians did happen to underſtand them, that it would breed ſome jealouſie in them, cauſing them to fight in fear of their own companions. It need not ſeem ſtrange, that this very ſame ſtratagem, which little or nothing availed Themiſtocles, did now very happily ſucceed. For Xerxes being in his full ſtrength, it was a matter of much difficulty to perſwade perſwade thoſe Inhabitants of Aſia to revolt; who now in his declining eſtate, gave a willing ear to the ſweet ſound of liberty. The Perſians likewiſe, who in their former bravery little regarded, and leſs feared any treaſon to be contrived by their ſubjects, were now ſo wary, that from the Samians which were amongſt them, they took away their arms; the Mileſians whom they did ſuſpect, but would not ſeem to miſtruſt, they placed far from them, as it were for defence of the ſtreight paſſages of Mycale; pretending that theſe Mileſians did beſt of all others know thoſe places. But theſe devices little availed them. For the Samians perceiving that they were held as Traytors, took courage in the heat of the fight, and laying hold upon ſuch weapons as came to hand, aſſailed the Perſians manfully within the Camp; which examples the Ionians preſently followed, being very glad to have found ſome that durſt begin. It is ſaid, that while the Greeks were yet in a march toward the Enemies Camp, a rumour ſuddenly ran in the Army, that Mardonius was overthrown in Greece, which (though perhaps it was given out by the Captains to encourage the Soldiers) was very true. For the Battel of Platæa was fought in the morning, and this of Mycale in the evening of the ſame day.

The like report of that great Battel, wherein Paulus Æmilius overthrew Perſeus the laſt King of Macedon, was brought to Rome in four days, as Livy with others do record. And Plutarch hath many other examples of this kind. As that of the Battel by the River Sagra in Italy, which was heard of the ſame day in Peloponneſus: That of the Battel againſt the Tarquinians and the Latins, preſently noiſed at Rome: And (which is moſt remarkable) the victory obtained againſt Lucius Antonius who was Rebel to Domitian the Emperour. This Lucius Antonius being Lieutenant of the higher Germany, had corrupted his Army with gifts and promiſes, drawing the barbarous people to follow him, with great hope to make himſelf Emperour; which news much troubling the City of Rome, with fear of a dangerous War, it was ſuddenly reported that Antonius was ſlain, and his Army defeated.

Hereupon many did offer ſacrifice to the gods, and ſhew all manner of publick joy, as in ſuch caſes was accuſtomed. But when better inquiry was made, and the Author of theſe tydings could not be found, the Emmperour Domitian betook himſelf to his journey againſt the Rebel; and being now with his Army in march, he received advertiſement by Poſt of the Victory obtained, and the death of Antonius: whereupon remembring the rumour noiſed before in Rome of the ſelf-ſame Victory, he found that the report and victory were born upon one day, though twenty thouſand furlongs (which make above five and twenty hundred miles) aſunder. It is truly ſaid of Plutarch, that this laſt example gives credit unto many the like. And indeed it were very ſtrange if among ſo many rumors begotten by forgery or miſtakings, and foſtered by credulous imagination, there ſhould not be found (as happens in dreams among many thouſand vain and frivolous) a few preciſely true. Howbeit we may find, that God himſelf doth ſometimes uſe to terrifie thoſe who preſume upon their own ſtrength, by theſe light means of tumultuous noiſes: as he raiſed the ſiege of Samaria, by cauſing a ſound of Horſes and Chariots to affright the Aramites; and as he threatned Senacherib, ſaying, Behold I will Iſa. 37. 7. ſend a blaſt upon him, and he ſhall hear a noiſe, and return to his own Land. Wherefore it may well have been true, that God was pleaſed by ſuch means as this to animate the Greeks; who (as Herodotus notes) went towards the Enemies with heavy hearts, being in great fear leſt their own adventure ſhould by no means fall out well; conſidering in what danger they had left their own Country of Greece which was ready to be ſubdued by Mardonius, whileſt they went wandring to ſeek out Enemies afar off, upon the coaſt of Aſia. But the fame of the Battel fought at Platæa being noiſed among them, every man deſired that his own valour in the preſent fight might be ſome help to work out the full deliverance of Greece. In this alacrity of ſpirit they divided themſelves into two Battalions, whereof the Athenians led the one, by the way of the Plain, directly towards the Enemies Camp; the Lacedæmonians conducted the other, by the Mountains and ſtreight paſſages, to win the higher ground. The Athenians did firſt ſet upon the Camp (e're the Lacedæmonians could arrive on the other part) and being deſirous to get all the honour of the day to themſelves, did ſo forcibly aſſault it, that they brake way thorow the Paliſſadoes and Gabions, and made themſelves Maſters of the place, ſlaying all that could not ſave themſelves by fligh. In this fight the Samians did good ſervice, as is formerly mentioned.

But the Mileſians who upon the like jealouſie, were placed by the Perſians on the tops of Mycale, to defend the paſſages, did now (as if they had been ſent of purpoſe to keep them from running away) put as many to the ſword as fell into their hands, letting none eſcape, except very few that fled through by-paths. The Lacedemonians that day did little ſervice, for the buſineſs was diſpatched e're they came in: Only they broke ſuch companies as retired in whole troops; making them flie diſperſed in very much diſorder, whereby the Mileſians were enabled to do the greater execution upon them. This was the laſt fight of that huge Army levied againſt Greece, which was now utterly broken, and had no means left to make offenſive War.

SECT. XI.

Of the barbarous qualities of Xerxes : with a tranſition from the Perſian affairs to matters of Greece, which from this time grew more worthy of regard.

Xerxes lay at Sardis, not far from the place of this Battel; but little mind had he to revenge either this, or other his great loſſes, being wholly given over to the love of his Brothers Wife: with whom he could not prevail by intreaty, nor would obtain his deſire by force. Becauſe he reſpected much his Brother her Husband, he thought it beſt to make a match between his own Son Darius, and the Daughter of this Woman; hoping by that means to find occaſion of ſuch familiarity as might work out his deſire. But whether it were ſo, that the chaſtity of the Mother did ſtill reject him, or the beauty of the Daughter allure him, he ſoon after fell in love with his own Sons Wife, being a vicious Prince, and as ill able to govern himſelf in peace, as to guide his Army in War. This young Lady having once deſired the King to give her the Garment which he then wore, being wrought by his own Wife, cauſed the Queen thereby to perceive her Husbands converſation with her, which ſhe imputed not ſo much to the beauty of her Daughter-in-lavv, as to the cunning of the Mother, againſt vvhom thereupon ſhe conceived extream hatred. Therefore at a Royal Feaſt, vvherein the cuſtom vvas, that the King ſhould grant their requeſt, ſhe craved that the Wife of Maſiſtes, her Husbands Brother, the young Ladies Mother, might be given into her diſpoſition. The barbarous King vvho might either have reformed the abuſe of ſuch a cuſtom, or have deluded the importunate cruelty of his Wife, by threatning her ſelf vvith the like, to vvhatſoever ſhe ſhould inflict upon the innocent Lady, granted the requeſt; and ſending for his Brother, perſvvaded him to put avvay the Wife vvhich he had, and take one of his Daughters in her ſtead. Hereby it ſeems that he underſtood hovv villainouſly that poor Lady ſhould be intreated, vvhom he knevv to be virtuous, and vvhom himſelf had loved. Maſiſtes refuſed to put her avvay; alledging his ovvn love, her deſerving, and their common children, one of vvhich vvas married to the Kings Son, as reaſons important to move him to keep her. But in moſt vvicked manner Xerxes reviled him, ſaying, That he novv ſhould neither keep the Wife vvhich he had, nor have his Daughter vvhom he had promiſed unto him. Maſiſtes vvas much grieved vvith theſe vvords, but much more, vvhen returned home he found his Wife moſt butcherly mangled by the Queen Ameſtris vvho had cauſed her Noſe, Lips, Ears, and Tongue to be cut off; and her Breaſts in like manner, which were caſt unto Dogs. Maſiſtes enraged with this villany, took his way with his children and ſome friends towards Bactria, of which Province he was Governour, intending to rebell and avenge himſelf: But Xerxes underſtanding his purpoſe, cauſed an Army to be levied, which cut him off by the way, putting him and all his company to the ſword. Such was the Tyrannical condition of the Perſian Government; and ſuch are generally the effects of Luxury, when it is joined with abſolute power.

Yet of Xerxes it is noted, that he was a Prince of much vertue. And therefore Alexander the Great finding an Image of his overthrown, and lying upon the ground, ſaid, That he doubted whether in regard of his virtue he ſhould again erect it; or for the miſchief done by him to Greece, ſhould let it lye. But ſurely, whatſoever his other good qualities were, he was fooliſh, and was a coward, and conſequently mercileſs.

Therefore we may firmly believe, that the virtue of Cyrus was very great, upon which the foundation of the Perſian Empire was ſo ſurely laid, that all the wickedneſs and vanities of Xerxes and other worſe Princes could not overthrow it, until it was broken by a virtue almoſt equal to that which did eſtabliſh it. In Wars againſt the Egyptians the fortune of Xerxes did continue as at the firſt it had been, very good; but againſt the general eſtate of Greece, neither he or any of his poſterity did ever make offenſive War but received many loſſes in Aſia, to which the laſt at Mycale ſerved but as an introduction; teaching the Greeks, and eſpecially the Athenians, that the Perſian was no better Soldier at his own doors than in a foreign Country: whereof good trial was made forthwith, and much better proof as ſoon as the affairs of Athens were quietly ſetled and aſſured.

From this time forward I will therefore purſue the Hiſtory of Greece, taking in the matters of Perſia, as alſo the eſtate of other Countrys, collaterally, when the order of time ſhall preſent them. True it is, that the Perſian eſtate continued in her greatneſs many ages following, in ſuch wiſe that the known parts of the world had no other Kingdom repreſenting the Majeſty of a great Empire.

But this greatneſs depended only upon the riches and power that had formerly been acquired, yielding few actions or none that were worthy of remembrance, excepting ſome Tragedies of the Court, and examples of that exceſſive Luxury wherewith both it and all, or the moſt of Empires that ever were, have been enervated, made unwieldy, and (as it were) fattened for the hungry ſwords of poor and hardy Enemies. Hereby it came to paſs that Xerxes and his ſucceſſors were fain to defend their Crowns with money and baſe policies; very ſeldom or never (unleſs it were with great advantage) daring to adventure the trial of plain battel with that little Nation of Greece; which would ſoon have ruined the foundations laid by Cyrus, had not private malice and jealouſie urged every City to envy the height of her neighbours Walls, and thereby diverted the ſwords of the Greeks into their own bowels, which after the departure of Xerxes began very well, and might better have continued to hew out the way of Conqueſt on the ſide of Aſia.

CHAP. VII.

Of things that paſſed in Greece from the end of the Perſian War, to the beginning of the Peloponneſian.

SECT. I.

How Athens was rebuilt and fortified.

After that the Medes and Perſians had received their laſt blow, and were utterly beaten at Mycale: Leutychides who then commanded the Græcian Army, leaving the purſuit of the War to the Athenians, aſſiſted by the revolted Iones, returned with the Lacedæmonians and other Peloponneſians to Sparta, and other places, out of which they had been levied. The Athenians in the mean while beſieged Seſtos, a City on the ſtrait of the Helleſpont, between which and Abydus Xerxes had lately faſtened his Bridg of Boats: where the Inhabitants deſperate of ſuccor, did did not long dispute the defence thereof, but quitted it to the Greeks, who entertained themselves the Winter following on that side the Hellespont. In the Spring they drew homeward, and having left their wives and children since the invasion of Attica, and the abandoning of Athens in divers Islands, and at Trœzen; they now found them out, and returned with them to their own places.

And though the most part of all their houses in Athens were burnt and broken down, and the walls of the City overturned; yet they resolved first on their common defence, and to fortifie their City, before they cared to cover themselves, their wives and children, with any private buildings. Whereof the Lacedemonians being advertised, and misliking the fortifying of Athens, both in respect that their own City of Sparta was unwalled, as also because the Athenians were grown more powerful by Sea than either themselves or any other State of Greece, they dispatched messengers to the Athenians to disswade them; not acknowledging any private mislike or jealousie, but pretending, that if the Persians should return to invade Greece a third time, the Athenians being in no better state to defend themselves than heretofore, the same would serve to receive their enemies, and to be made a seat for the War, as Thebes had lately been. To this the Athenians promised to give them satisfaction by their own Embassadours very speedily. But being resolved to go on with their works, by the advice of Themistocles they held the Lacedemonians in hope of the contrary, till they had raised their walls to that height, as they cared not for their mislikes, nor doubted their disturbance; and therefore (to gain time) they dispatched Themistocles towards Lacedemon, giving him for excuse, that he could not deliver the Athenians resolutions, till the arrival of his fellow-Commissioners, who were of purpose retarded. But after a while, the Lacedæmonians expectation being converted into jealousie (for by the arrival of divers persons out of Attica, they were told for certain, That the walls of Athens were speedily grown up beyond expectation), Themistocles prayed them not to believe reports and vain rumors, but that they would be pleased to send some of their own trusty Citizens to Athens, from whose relation they might resolve themselves, and determine accordingly. Which request being granted, and Commissioners sent, Themistocles dispatched one of his own, by whom he advised the Athenians, first to entertain the Lacedæmonians with some such discourse as might retain them a few days; and in conclusion to hold them among them, till himself and the other Athenian Embassadours then at Sparta, had their liberty also to return. Which done, and being also assured by his associates, and Aristides, that Athens was already defensible on all parts, Themistocles demanding audience, made the Lacedæmonians know, That it was true that the Walls of Athens were now raised to that height, as the Athenians doubted not the defence of their City; praying the Lacedemonians to believe, That whensoever it pleased them to treat with the Athenians, they would know them for such as right well understood what appertained to a Commonweal, and their own safety, without direction and advice from any other: That they had in the War of Xerxes abandoned their City, and committed themselves to the wooden Walls of their Ships, from the resolutions of their own counsels and courage, and not thereto taught or perswaded by others: and finally, in all that perilous War against the Persians, they found their own judgments, and the execution thereof, in nothing inferiour or less fortunate than that of any other Nation, State, or Commonweal among the Greeks. And therefore concluded, that they determined to be Masters and Judges of their own affairs; and thought it good reason, That either all the Cities confederated within Greece, should be left open, or else that the Walls of Athens should be finished and maintained.

The Lacedæmonians finding the time unfit for quarrel, dissembled their mislike, both of the fortifying of Athens, and of the division; and so suffered the Athenians to depart, and received back from them their own Embassadors.

The Walls of Athens finished, they also fortified the Port Pyræus, by which they might under covert imbark themselves upon all occasions.

SECT. II.

The beginning of the Athenian greatness, and prosperous War made by that State upon the Persian.

THE Athenians having setled things in good order at home, prepared thirty Gallies for the pursuit of the War against the Persians; to which the Lacedæmonians added other twenty: and with this Fleet, strengthned by the rest of the Cities of Greece confederated, they set sail for Cyprus, under the conduct of Pausanias the Lacedemonian; where, after their landing, having possest themselves of many principal places, they imbarked the Army again, and took land in Thrace, recovering from the Persians by force the City of Bizantium, now Constantinople: from whence Pausanias, behavlng himself more like a Tyrant than a Captain, especially towards the Ionians lately revolted from Xerxes, was called back by the Council of Lacedæmon, and not only accused of many insolent behaviours, but of Intelligence with the Medes, and Treason against his Countrey. In his stead they employed Dorces, who either gave the same cause of offence; or else the Athenians, who affected the first commandment in that War, practised the Soldiers to complain; though indeed the wise and vertuous behaviour of Aristides, General of the Athenian Forces, a man of rare and incomparable sincerity, had been able to make a good Commander seem ill in comparison of himself; and therefore was much more available in rendring those detested whose vices afforded little matter of excuse. Howsoever it were, the Lacedæmonians being no less wearied of the War than the Athenians were eager to pursue it, the one obtained their ease, and the other the execution and honour which they desired: for all the Greeks (those of Peloponnesus excepted) willingly subjected themselves to the commandment of the Athenians, which was both the beginning of their greatness in that present age, and of their ruin in the next succeeding. For the charge of the War being now committed unto them, they began to rate the confederated Cities; they appointed Receivers and Treasurers, and began to levy money according to their discretion, for the maintenance of the general defence of Greece, and for the recovering of those places on Europe side in Asia the less, and the Islands from the Persians. This tribute (the first that was ever paid by the Greeks) amounted to four hundred and threeſcore Talents, which was raiſed eaſily by the honeſt care of that juſt man Ariſtides, to whoſe diſcretion all the Confederates referred themſelves, and no one man found occaſion to complain of him. But as the vertue of Ariſtides, and other worthy Citizens, brought unto the Athenians great commodity; ſo the deſire which they conceived of encreaſing their commodity corrupted their vertue, and robbing them of the general love which had made them powerful, abandoned their City to the defence of her Treaſure, which with her in the next age periſhed. For it was not long ere theſe four hundred and threeſcore Talents were raiſed to ſix hundred; nor long after that, ere their covetous tyranny had converted their followers into ſlaves, and extorted from them yearly thirteen hundred Talents. The Iſle of Delos was at the firſt appointed for the Treaſure-houſe wherein theſe ſums were laid up, and where at the general Aſſembly the Captains of thoſe forces ſent by the Confederates, were for form ſake called to conſultation. But the Athenians who were ſtronger by Sea than all Greece beſides, had lockt up the common Treaſure in an Iſland under their own protection, from whence they might tranſport it at their pleaſure, as afterward they did.

The general Commander in this War was Cimon the ſon of Miltiades, who firſt took Eionia upon the River Strimon; then the Iſle of Sciros inhabited by the Dolopes: they maſtered the Cariſtii, and brought into ſervitude the Naxii, contrary to the form of the Confederacy: So did the other the inhabitants of Greece, if at any time they failed of their contribution, or diſobeyed their commandments; taking upon them, and uſurping a kind of ſoveraign authority over the reſt: which they exerciſed the more aſſuredly, becauſe they were now become Lords of the Sea, and could not be reſiſted. For many of the confederated Cities and Nations, weary of the War in their own perſons, and given up altogether to their eaſe, made choice rather to pay their parts in money, than either in men of War, or in Ships; leaving the proviſion of both to the Athenians. Hereby the one grew weak in all their Sea-defences, and in the exerciſe of the Wars; the other greatly ſtrengthened their Navy and their experiences, being always armed and imployed in honourable ſervices, at the coſt of thoſe who having lifted them into their Saddles, were now enforced to become their footmen. Yet was the Tribute-money levied upon theſe their confederates, employed ſo well by the Athenians at the firſt (as ill proceedings are often founded upon good beginnings) that no great cauſe of repining was given. For they rigged out a great Fleet of Gallies, very well manned, wherewith Cimon the Admiral ſcouring the Aſiatick Seas, took in the City of Phaſelis; which having formerly pretended neutrality, and refuſed to relieve, or any way aſſiſt the Greeks, were enforced to pay ten Talents for a fine, and ſo to become followers of the Athenians, paying yearly contribution.

From thence he ſet ſail for the River Eurymedon in Pamphylia, where the Perſian Fleet rode, being of ſix hundred ſail, or (according to the moſt ſparing report) three hundred and fifty, and having a great Land-Army encamped upon the ſhore; all which forces having been provided for advancing the Kings affairs in Greece, were utterly defeated in one day, and two hundred ſhips taken by the Athenians; the reſt being broken to pieces or ſunk, ere ever they had ſwom in the Greekiſh Seas. Cimon having in one day obtained two great Victories, the one by Sea, and the other by Land, was very ſoon preſented with a third. For fourſcore ſail of Phœnicians (who were the beſt of all Sea-men, under the Perſian command) thinking to have joined themſelves with the Fleet before deſtroyed, arrived upon the ſame Coaſt, ignorant of what had paſſed, and feared nothing leſs than what enſued. Upon the firſt notice of their approach, Cimon weighed anchor, and meeting them at an head-land called Hydra, did ſo amaze them, that they only ſought to run themſelves on ground; by which mean preſerving few of their men, they loſt all their ſhips. Theſe loſſes did ſo break the courage of the Perſian, that omitting all hope of prevailing upon Greece, he condeſcended to whatſoever Articles it pleaſed the Athenians to propound, granting liberty unto all the Greeks inhabiting Aſia; and further Covenanting, That none of his ſhips of War ſhould ſail to the Weſtward of the Iſles called Cyaneæ and Chelidonia.

This was the moſt honourable peace that ever the Greeks made; neither did they in effect after this time make any War that redounded to the profit or glory of the whole Nation, till ſuch time as under Alexander they overthrew the Empire of Perſia; in which War few, or perhaps none of them had any place of great command, but ſerved altogether under the Macedonians.

SECT. III.

The death of Xerxes by the Treaſon of Artabanus.

BEſides theſe loſſes which could not eaſily have been repaired, the troubles of the Empire were at this time ſuch as gave juſt cauſe to the Perſian of ſecking peace upon any terms not altogether intollerable. For Artabanus the Uncle of Xerxes, perceiving that the King his Maſter did eaſily take ſmall occaſions to ſhed the blood of ſuch as in kindred or place were near unto him, began to repoſe leſs hope of ſafety in remaining faithful, than of obtaining the Soveraignty by deſtroying a Prince that was ſo hated for his cruelty and deſpiſed for his cowardiſe and misfortunes. Having conceived this Treaſon he found means to execute it by Mithridates an Eunuch, in ſuch cloſe manner, that (as if he himſelf had been innocent) he accuſed Darius the Son of Xerxes, and cauſed him to ſuffer death as a Parricide. Whether it be true, that by this great wickedneſs he got the Kingdom, and held it ſeven months; or whether intending the like evil to Artaxerxes the ſon of Xerxes, he was by him prevented and ſurprized, were hard to affirm any certainty. But all Writers agree upon this, That taken he was, and with his whole family put to death by extream torments; according to the ſentence, whereof the truth is more ancient than the Verſe:

Raro antecedentem ſceleſtum
Deſeruit pede pœna claudo.

Seldom the villain, though much haſte he make,
Lame-footed Vengeance fails to overtake.

SECT.

SECT. IV.

The Baniſhment of Themiſtocles: his flight to Artaxerxes newly reigning in Perſia; and his death.

ARtaxerxes being eſtabliſhed in his Kingdom, and having ſo compounded with the Athenians as the preſent neceſſity of his affairs required, began to conceive new hopes of better fortune againſt the Greeks, than he or his Predeceſſors had ever hitherto found. For the people of Athens, when the Perſians were chaſed out of Greece, did ſo highly value their own merit in that ſervice, that they not only thought it fit for themſelves to become the Commanders over many Towns and Iſlands of the Greeks, but even within their own walls, they would admit none other form of Government than meerly Democratical. Herein they were ſo inſolent, that no integrity nor good deſert was able to preſerve the eſtate of any ſuch as had born great office longer than by flattering the raſcal multitude, he was contented to frame all his words and deeds to their good liking.

This their intolerable demeanour much offended Themiſtocles; who though in former times he had layed the foundations of his greatneſs upon popularity, yet now preſuming upon his good ſervices done to the State, he thought that with great reaſon they might grant him the liberty to check their inordinate proceedings. But contrariwiſe, they were ſo highly offended with his often rehearſing the benefits which they had received from him, that they laid upon him the puniſhment of Oſtraciſm, whereby he was baniſhed for ten years, as a man over-burthenſome to the Commonwealth.

Before the time of his return was half expired, a new accuſation was brought againſt him by the Lacedemonians, who charged him of conſulting with Pauſanias about betraying the whole Country of Greece unto Xerxes. Hereupon Themiſtocles finding no place of ſecurity againſt the malice of two ſuch mighty Cities, was driven after many troubleſom flights, and dangerous removings, to adventure himſelf into Perſia, where he found Artaxerxes newly ſetled, and was by him very honourably entertained. But the great hope which Artaxerxes had conceived of advancing his affairs by the counſel and aſſiſtance of Themiſtocles, proved altogether fruitleſs. For when the Athenians in favour of Inarus the Lybian, (who infeſted Egypt, cauſing it to rebell againſt the Perſian) had ſent a Fleet to Sea, landing an Army in Egypt, and ſcowred thoſe Eaſtern Seas, to the great hinderance of Artaxerxes, and (for ought that I can underſtand) to the manifeſt breach of that peace, which to their great honour they had concluded with Xerxes; then did the King ſend his Letters to Themiſtocles, requiring him to make good the hopes which he had given, of aſſuring the Perſian eſtate againſt the Greeks.

But whether Themiſtocles perceived much unlikelineſs of good ſucceſs, in leading a great Army of daſtardly Perſians againſt the warlike people of Greece; or elſe (as in favour of his vertue it is more commonly reported) the love of his Country would not permit him to ſeek honour by the ruin of it; ſure it is, that being appointed by Artaxerxes to undertake the conduct of great forces againſt the Athenians, he decided the great conflict between thankfulneſs to his well-deſerving Prince, and natural affection to his own ill-deſerving people by finiſhing his life with a cup of poyſon.

SECT. V.

How the Athenians breaking the peace which to their great honour they had made with the Perſian, were ſhamefully beaten in Egypt.

THen was Artaxerxes driven to uſe the ſervice of his own Captains in the Egyptian War, wherein it appeared well, That a juſt cauſe is a good defence againſt a ſtrong enemy. An Athenian Fleet of two hundred ſail ſtrong, was ſent forth under Cimon, to take in the Iſle of Cyprus: which conqueſt ſeemed eaſie both to make and to maintain; the Perſian being utterly broken at Sea, and thereby unable to relieve the Iſland. Now although it were ſo, that a peace had been concluded, which was likely to have been kept ſincerely by the Perſian, who had made ſo good proof of the Gracian valour, that he was nothing deſirous to build any Ships of War (without which the Greeks could receive no harm from him) whereof if any one ſhould be found ſailing towards Greece, the peace was immediately broken; and if not his whole eſtate, yet all the Sea-coaſt (no ſmall part of his Dominions) expoſed to the waſte of an enemy too far overmatching him. Yet whether the Athenians were in doubt, leſt the league which in his own worſer fortunes he had made with them, he would break in theirs; and therefore ſought to get ſuch aſſurance into their hands, as might utterly diſable him from attempting ought againſt them; or whether the increaſe of their revenues and power, by adding that rich and great Iſland to their Empire, cauſed them to meaſure honour by profit; they thought it the wiſeſt way to take whileſt they might whatſoever they were able to get and hold, and he unable to defend.

The Iſle of Cyprus lying in the bottom of the ſtreights between Cilicia, Syria, and Egypt, is very fitly ſeated for any Prince or State that being mighty at Sea, doth either ſeek to enrich himſelf by trade with thoſe Countrys, or to infeſt one or more of them when they are his enemies. And this being the purpoſe of the Athenians, their Ambition which had already devoured in conceit this Iſland, was on the ſudden well-nigh choaked with a greater morſel, to ſnatch at which they let Cyprus alone, which they might eaſily have ſwallowed and digeſted. For Inarus King of the Lybians confining Egypt, having found how greatly the Country was exhauſted by the late Wars, and how weakly defended by very ſlender Perſian Garriſons, conceived rightly, that if ſuch ſmall forces as the Satrapa, or Viceroy, could make on the ſudden of his own Guards, or levy out of the ordinary Garriſons, were by him defeated, the naturals of the Country not long ſince oppreſſed by Cambyſes, and after a revolt lately ſubdued by Xerxes, would ſoon break faith with him, who had no other title to that Kingdom than a good ſword. Further, he perſwaded himſelf that the people unable to defend themſelves againſt the Perſian without his aſſiſtance, would eaſily be drawn to accept him the author of their deliverance, for King. Neither did this hope deceive him. For having taken and cruelly ſlain Achemanes the Viceroy, divers Cities forthwith declared themſelves for him, and proclaiming him King, ſhewed the moſt of their endeavour for proſecution of the War. But he conſidering his own weakneſs, and that the means of the Egyptians his adherents adherents were not answerable to their desires, perceived well that to resist the power of Artaxerxes, far greater forces than his and theirs were to be procured at what price soever he obtained them. Therefore hearing of the great Athenian Fleet, and knowing well the vertue of the Soldiers therein imbarked; he invited the Commanders to share with him the Kingdom of Egypt as a far greater reward of their adventure, than such an addition as that of Cyprus could be to their estate. Whether he or they (if things had wholly sorted according to their expectation) would have been contented with an equal share, and not have fallen out in the partition, were perhaps a divination unnecessary. He was possessed of the peoples love, they were of most power. But the issue of those affairs was such as left them nothing to communicate but misfortunes, which they shared somewhat equally.

Yet had the beginning of their enterprize very good and hopeful success: For they entred the Land as far as to Memphis the principal City; and of the City it self they took two parts: to the third part which was called the white Wall, they laid such hard siege, that neither those forces of the Persians which then were in Egypt were strong enough to remove them; neither could Artaxerxes well advise what means to use for the recovery of that which was lost, or for the preservation of the remainder. The best of his hope was, by setting the Lacedæmonians upon Athens, to enforce the Athenians to look homewards to their own defence. This was the first time that the Persian sought to procure the assistance of the Greeks one against the other, by stirring them up with Gold to the entertainment of private quarrels, for the good of their common enemy. To this purpose he sent Megabazus to Sparta with much Treasure; who after great expence finding that the Lacedæmonians were nothing forward in employing their whole force against the Athenians, whom in many conflicts of great importance they had found to be their matches, notwithstanding the absence of their Army in Egypt; he thought it his wisest way to employ the rest of his money and means to their relief who had now the space of six years defended his masters right in Egypt. Therefore he hastily dispatched another of his name, the son of Zopyrus, who arriving in Egypt, was first encountred by the revolted people; over whom he obtained victory, which made him master of the Country, whilst the Athenians lay busied about Memphis the great City.

Prosopites an Island between the Rivers of Taly and Pharmuticus, two of the outlets of Nilus towards Alexandria.

It cannot be doubted that long abode in a strange air, and want of supply, had much enfeebled the Athenians: sure it is that when Megabazus having reduced the Country to obedience, attempted the City it self, whether his former success had amended the courage of the Persians, or want of necessaries made the Athenians inferior to themselves, he chased them out of Memphis, and pursued them so near as they were forced to fortifie themselves in the Isle of Prosopites, where Megabazus after eighteen months siege, turning away one part of the River by divers Trenches, assaulted the Athenians without impediment of waters, took their Gallies, and put all to the sword, save a few that saved themselves by flight into Lybia: the same entertainment had fifty other Gallies, which they sent to the succour of the first two hundred. For those Athenians having heard nothing that their Fleet and Army was consumed, entred by the branch of Nilus, which is called Mendesium, and fell unawares among the Phœnician Gallies, and the Persian Army; so as the Persians recovered all Egypt, but that part held by Amyrteus; and Inarus the King of Lybia being by them taken and hanged. This was the end of the Athenians six years War in Egypt, and the reward of their vanity and indiscretion to undertake many enterprizes at once.

Mendesius is an Island in the mouth of Nilus, between the outlet called Bustriticos, and Diolcos: But the branch of Nilus, called Mendesium, runneth into the sea by the City Panæphysis.

SECT. VI.

Of other Wars made by the Athenians for the most part with good success, about the same time.

NOtwithstanding these overthrows in Egypt, yet the Athenians in their home-Wars waded through many difficulties, and held the reputation of their forces against the Lacedæmonians, Corinthians, and others, rather to their advantage than otherwise. For as they were beaten near unto Halia, by the Corinthians and Epidaurians; so they obtained two great victories soon after, the one over the Peloponnesians near unto Cecryphalia; the other over the Æginets near unto Ægina, where they sunk and carried away threescore and ten Gallies of their enemies. Furthermore, they landed their forces on the sudden, and besieged Ægina, from whence they could not be moved, notwithstanding that the Corinthians, to divert them, invaded Megara; where, after a great fight with equal loss, the Corinthians, when they returned again to set up their Trophie as Victors in the former battel, were utterly broken and slaughtered by the Athenian Garrisons and Megarians, to their great loss and dishonour.

Again, as the Athenians were discomfited near to Tangra, by the Lacedæmonians, who returned from the succour of the Dorians against the Phocians (at which time the Thessalian Horse-men turned from their Allies the Athenians, and fought against them); so about threescore days after, the Athenians entred Bœotia under the conduct of Myronides, where beating that Nation, they wan Phocis on the gulf of Oeteus, and evened the Walls of Tenagra to the ground. Finally, they enforced Ægina to render upon most base conditions, as to beat down the Walls of their City, and to give them hostages for Tribute; the siege whereof they had continued, notwithstanding all their other brabbles and attempts elsewhere. Besides these victories, they sackt and spoiled many places upon the Sea-coast of Peloponnesus, belonging to the Lacedæmonians; wan upon the Corinthians, and overthrew the Sicyonians that came to their succour. These were the undertakings of the Athenians and their Allies, during the time of those six years that a part of their forces made War in Egypt. In the end whereof, they attempted Thessaly, perswaded thereunto by Orestes, but were resisted by the King Pharsalus, who had chased Orestes out of his Dominions. They also landed in Sicyonia, and had victory over those that resisted; after which they made truce with the Peloponnesians for five years, and sent Cimon into Cyprus with two hundred ships; but they were again allured by Amyrteus, one of the race of their former Kings, who held the Marish and Woody parts of Egypt from the Persians, to whom they sent sixty of their ships. The rest of their Army failing in their enterprise at Cyprus, and their fortunate and victorious Leader Cimon dying there, as they coasted the Island, encountred a Fleet of the Phœnicians and Cilicians, over both which Nations they returned victorious into Greece: as also those returned safe which were sent into Egypt.

SECT. VII.

Of Artaxerxes Longimanus: that he was Ahashuerosh the Husband of Queen Hester.

THese Egyptian Troubles being ended, the reign of Artaxerxes continued peaceable; whereof the length is by some restrained unto twenty years; but the more and better Authors give him forty, some allow unto him four and forty. He was a Prince of much humanity, and noted for many examples of gentleness. His favour was exceeding great to the Jews, as appeareth by the Histories of Esdras and Nehemias, which fell in his time.

To prove that this was the King who gave countenance and aid to that great work of building the Temple, it were a needless travel; considering that all the late Divines have taken very much pains to shew, that those two Prophets were licensed by him, and succoured in that building, in such sort as appears in their writings.

This was likewise that King Ahashuerosh who married Hester. Whereof if it be needful to give proof, it may suffice, that Ahashuerosh lived in Susa, reigning from India to Æthiopia, and therefore must have been a Persian; That he lived in peace, as appears by the circumstances of the History, and used the counsel of the seven Princes, the authority of which Princes began under Darius the son of Hystaspes; wherefore he could be neither Cyrus nor Cambyses.

The continual Wars which exercised King Darius the son of Hystaspes, together with the certainty of his marriages with sundry Wives, from none of whom he was divorced, but left his first Wife Atossa the daughter of Cyrus alive in great honour, she being mother to Xerxes the succeeding King, do manifestly prove that Hester was not his. Whereunto is added by Philo the Jew, That at the perswasion of Mardocheus, Jojachim the High Priest the son of Jesua, caused the feast of Purim to be instituted in memory of that deliverance. Now the time of Jojachim was in the reign of Artaxerxes at the coming of Esdras and Nehemias: Jesua his father dying about the end of Darius.

The same continuance of Wars with other his furious and tragical loves wherewith Xerxes did consume such little time as he had free from War, are enough to prove that the story of Hester pertained not unto the time of Xerxes, who lived but one and twenty years, whereas the two and thirtieth of Ahasuerus or Artasastha is expressed by Nehemias. Again, it is well known that Xerxes in the seventh year of his reign (wherein this marriage must have been celebrated) came not near to Susa. Of the Princes that succeeded Artaxerxes Longimanus, to prove that none of them could be Ahashuerosh, it is enough to say, that Mardocheus having been carried from Hierusalem captive, with Jechonia, by Nabuchadnezzar, was unlikely to have lived until their times.

But of this Artaxerxes it is true, that he lived in Susa, reigned from India to Æthiopia, lived in peace, was contemporary with Jojachim the high Priest, and further he had happily by his Lieutenants reclaimed the rebellious Egyptians in that seventh year of his reign; which good fortune might well give occasion to such a Royal Feast as is described in the beginning of Hester. This is the sum of the arguments brought to prove the age of Hesters story by the learned and diligent Krentzhemius who adds the authorities of Josephus affirming the same, and of Philo giving to Mardocheus eighteen years more than Isaac the Patriarch lived, namely one hundred fourscore and eighteen years in all, which expire in the five and thirtieth year of this Artaxerxes, if we suppose him to have been carried away captive, being a Boy of ten years old.

SECT. VIII.

Of the troubles in Greece, foregoing the Peloponnesian War.

BUt it is fit that we now return to the affairs of the Greeks, who from this time forward, more vehemently prosecuting their Civil Wars, suffered the Persians for many ages to rest in peace, this Egyptian Expedition being come to nought. Soon after this the Lacedæmonians undertook the War called Sacred, recovered the Temple and Isle of Delphos, and delivered both to the Inhabitants; but the Athenians regained the same, and gave it in charge to the Phocians. In the mean while the banished Bœotians re-entred their own Land, and mastered two of their own Towns possest by the Athenians, which they soon recovered again from them; but in their return towards Athens the Bœotians, Eubœans, and Locrians (Nations oppress by the Athenians) set upon them with such resolution, as the Athenians were in that fight all slain or taken, whereby the Bœotians recovered their former liberty, restoring to the Athenians their prisoners. The Islanders of Eubœa took such courage upon this, that they revolted wholly from the Athenians, whom when Pericles intended to reconquer, he was advertised that the Megarians (who first left the Lacedæmonians and submitted themselves to Athens) being now weary of their yoke, had slain the Athenian Garrisons, and joined themselves with the Corinthians, Sycionians, and Epidaurians. These news hastened Pericles homeward with all possible speed; but ere he could recover Attica, the Peloponnesians led by Plistoanax the son of Pausanias, had invaded it, pillaged and burnt many parts thereof, after whose return Pericles went on with his first intent, and recovered Eubœa. Finally, the Athenians began to treat of peace with the Peloponnesians, and yielded to deliver up all the places which they held in the Country of Peloponnesus: and this truce was made for thirty years.

After six of these years were expired, the Athenians (favouring the Mylesians against the Samians) invaded Samos by Pericles; and after many repulses, and some great losses, both by Sea and Land, the Citizens were forced to yield up themselves upon most lamentable conditions: Namely, to deliver up all their ships, to break down their own Walls, to pay the charge of the War, and to restore whatsoever had been taken by themselves, or by their practice from the Athenians. In the neck of which followed that long and cruel Peloponnesian War, whereof I have gathered this Brief following: the same contention taking beginning fifty years after the flight of Xerxes out of Greece. But, becauſe there was no City thereof, which either in the beginning of this War, or in the continuance of it, was not drawn into the quarrel; I hold it convenient now at the firſt to ſhew briefly the eſtate of the Country at that time, and eſpecially the condition of thoſe two great Cities Athens and Sparta, upon which all the reſt had moſt dependance.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Peloponneſian War.

SECT. I.

Upon what terms the two principal Cities of Greece, Athens and Sparta, ſtood at the beginning of the Peloponneſian War.

Greece was never united under the Government of any one Prince or Eſtate until Philip of Macedon, and after him Alexander, brought them rather to Union and League againſt the Perſians, whereof they were Captains, than into any abſolutee ſubjection. For every Eſtate held their own, and were governed by Laws far different, and by their own Magiſtrates, notwithſtanding the power of the Macedonians, to whom they did yield obedience no otherwiſe than as to ſuch who were (perforce) their Leaders in the Perſian War (deemed the general quarrel of Greece) and took the profit and honour of the victory to their own uſe and increaſe of greatneſs. But the Kings which afterwards reigned in Macedonia did ſo far enlarge their authority, that all Greece was by them brought under ſuch obedience, as differed little from ſervitude; very few excepted who could hardly ſometimes with arms, and ſometimes with gifts preſerve their liberty: of whom the Lacedæmonians and Athenians were chief; which two people deſerved beſt the plague of Tyranny, having firſt given occaſion thereunto by their great ambition, which wearied and weakned all the Country by perpetual War. For until theſe two Cities of Athens and Sparta diſtracted all Greece, drawing every State into the quarrel on the one or other ſide, and ſo gave beginning to the Peloponneſian War (the effects whereof in true eſtimation ceaſed not before the time that Philip had overmaſtered all, foraſmuch as every concluſion of one War afforded henceforth matter of ſome new diſtraction of the whole Country) the Wars commenced between one City of Greece and another, were neither great nor of long continuance. All controverſies were ſoon decided, either by the authority of the Amphictiones, who were the general Councel of Greece, or by the power of the Lacedæmonians, whoſe aid was commonly held as good as the aſſurance of victory.

Theſe Lacedæmonians had lived about four hundred years under one form of Government when the Peloponneſian War began. Their education was only to practiſe feats of Arms; wherein they ſo excelled, that a very few of them were thought equal to very great numbers of any other people. They were poor, and cared not much for wealth; every one had an equal portion of the common field, which ſufficed to maintain him in ſuch manner as they uſed. For bravery they had none, and curious building or apparel they regarded not. Their diet was ſimple, their feaſts and ordinary meals being in common Halls, where all fared alike. They uſed Money of Iron, whereof they could not be covetous, nor great hoarders. Briefly, they lived Utopian-like, ſave that they uſed no other occupation than War, placing all their felicity in the glory of their valour. Hereby it came to paſs, that in all enterprizes whereof they were partakers, the leading and high command was granted to them, and all Greece followed their conduct. But the Athenians were in all points contrary to this. For they ſought wealth, and meaſured the honours of their victories by the profit; they uſed mercenary Soldiers in their Wars, and exacted great tribute of their Subjects, which were for the moſt part Iſlanders compelled to obey them, becauſe the Athenian Fleet was great.

As in form of policy and in courſe of life, ſo in conditions natural, the difference between theſe two people was very much. The Athenians were eager and violent, ſudden in their concluſions, and as haſty in the execution. The Lacedemonians very ſlow in their deliberations, full of gravity, but very reſolute, and ſuch as would in cold blood perform what the Athenians did uſually in flagrant. Whereby it came to paſs, that the Lacedemonians had all the Eſtates of Greece depending upon them, as on men firm and aſſured, that ſought honour and not riches; whereas the Athenians were followed by ſuch as obeyed them perforce, being held in ſtreight ſubjection. But the Signiory of the Athenians was nothing large, until ſuch time as the Perſian Xerxes had invaded Greece, pretending only a quarrel to Athens: For then the Citizens perceiving well that the Town of Athens could not be defended againſt his great Army of ſeventeen hundred thouſand men, beſtowed all their wealth upon a Navy, and (aſſiſted by the other Gracians) overthrew the Fleet of Xerxes, whoſe Land-forces were ſoon after diſcomfited by them and the Greeks, who all ſerved under conduct of the Spartans. After theſe victories, the Athenians being now very mighty in Fleet, reduced all the Iſlands of the Greekiſh Seas under their obedience; impoſing upon them a hard tribute, for maintenance (as they pretended) of War againſt the Perſian; though indeed they imployed their forces chiefly to the conqueſt of ſuch Iſlands and Haven-Towns of their Countrymen as ſtood out againſt them. All which was eaſily ſuffered by the Lacedemonians, who were Inlanders, and men that delighted not in Expeditions to be made far from home. But afterwards perceiving the power of the Athenians to grow great, they held them in much jealousie, and were very apt to quarrel with them; but much more willing to breed contention between them and other Estates. Wherefore at such time as the Thebans would have oppressed the Plataans, when they of Platæa repaired to Sparta for succour, they found there no other aid than this advice, That they should seek help at Athens. Hereby it was thought that the Athenians should be intangled in a long and tedious War with their neighbours of Thebes. But it proved otherwise; for their force was now so great, that all such occasions did only serve to encrease their honour and puissance.

SECT. II.

How Sparta and Athens entred into War.

NEvertheless many Estates of Greece were very ill-affected to Athens, because that City grew very insolent upon sudden prosperity, and maintaining the weaker Towns against the stronger, incroached apace upon their Neighbours, taking their dependants from them. Especially the Corinthians were much enraged, because the people of the Island Corcyra their Colony which had rebelled against them, and given them a great overthrow by Sea, was by the Athenians (who desired to increase their Fleet by adjoining that of Corcyra unto it) taken into protection, and the Corinthians thereby defeated of that revenge which else they would have taken. Now howsoever it were so that these dealings of the Athenians were not directly against the conditions of peace agreed upon among the Greeks, yet were the complaints made at Sparta so vehement, that (though with much ado) they concluded to redress by War the injuries done to their Allies.

First therefore, seeking Religious pretences, they required the Athenians to expiate certain offences committed against the gods; whereto having for answer, That they themselves should expiate other the like offences committed in Sparta, they began to deal plainly, and required that the people of some Towns oppressed by the State of Athens should be set at liberty; and that a Decree made against those of Megara, whereby they were forbidden to enter any Port of the Athenians, should be reversed. This last point they so earnestly prest, that if they might obtain it, they promised to absist from their purpose of making War.

This they desired not as a matter of any great importance (for it was a trifle); but only that by seeming to have obtained somewhat, they might preserve their reputation without entring into a War, which threatned them with greater difficulties apparent, than they were very willing to undergo.

But the Athenians would yield to nothing; for it was their whole desire that all Greece should take notice how far they were from fear of any other City. Hereupon they prepared on both sides very strongly, all that was needful to the War; wherein the Lacedæmonians were superiour both in number and quality, being assisted by most of the Cities in Greece, and having the general favour as men that pretended to set at liberty such as were oppressed: but the Athenians did as far exceed them in all provisions of money, shipping, engines, and absolute power of command among their Subjects; which they held, and afterward found of greater use in such need than the willing readiness of friends, who soon grow weary, and are not easily assembled.

SECT. III.

The beginning of the Peloponnesian War.

THe first and second years Expedition was very grievous to the City of Athens. For the Fields were wasted, the Trees cut down, the Country people driven to fly, with Wives, Children, and Cattel into the Town; whereby a most furious Pestilence grew in the City, such as before they had never felt nor heard of. Hereunto was added the revolt of the Mytilenians in the Isle of Lesbos, and the siege of Platæa their confederated City, which they durst not adventure to raise, besides some small overthrows received. The Lacedæmonians assembling as great forces as they could raise out of Peloponnesus, did in the beginning of Summer enter the Country of Attica, and therein abide until victuals began to fail, wasting and destroying all things round about. The Governours of the Athenians would not suffer the people to issue into the field against them; for they knew the valour of their enemies: but used to send a Fleet into Peloponnesus, which wasted as fast all the Sea-coast of their enemies, whilest they were making War in Attica. So the Peloponnesians being the stronger by Land, wan the Town of Platæa which wanted rescue; the Athenians likewise being more mighty by Sea, did subdue Mytilene which had rebelled, but could not be succoured from Sparta. By these proceedings in that War the Lacedæmonians began to perceive how unfit they were to deal with such enemies. For after that Attica was throughly wasted, it lay not greatly in their power to do any offence equal to such harm as they themselves might and did receive. The Confederates began to set forward very slowly in their Expeditions into Attica; perceiving well that Athens was plentifully relieved with all necessaries, which came by the Sea from the Islands that were subject unto that Estate; and therefore these Invaders took but small pleasure in beholding the Walls of that mighty City, or in wasting a forsaken field, which was to them a pattern of the calamities with which their own Territory was the whilst afflicted. Wherefore they began to set their care to build a strong Navy, wherein they had little good success, being easily vanquished by the Athenians, who both had more and better ships, and were so skilful in Sea-fights, that a few Vessels of theirs durst undertake a great number of the Peloponnesians.

SECT. IV.

Of the great loss which the Spartans received at Pylus.

AMong other losses which the Spartans had felt by Sea, they received at Pylus a very sore blow, that compelled them to sue for peace. A Fleet of Athenian ships bound for Corcyra, wasting in that passage (as their manner was) the Coast of Laconia, and all the half-Isle of Peloponnesus, was by contrary winds detained at Pylus, which is a ragged Promontory joining to the Main by a ſtrange neck of Land. Before it there lies a ſmall barren Iſland of leſs than two miles compaſs, and within that a Creek, which is a good harbour for ſhips, the force of weather being born off by the head-land and Iſle. This Promontory the Athenians fortified as well as in haſte they might; and what was wanting in their artificial fortification, was ſupplied by the natural ſtrength and ſite of the place. By holding this piece of ground and haven, they in reaſon expected many advantages againſt their enemies. For the Country adjoining was inhabited by the Meſſenians, who in ancient times had held very ſtrong and cruel War with Sparta; and (though quite ſubdued) they were held in ſtreight ſubjection; yet was not the old hatred ſo extinguiſhed, that by the near neighbourhood and aſſiſtance of the Athenians it might not be revived. Furthermore it was thought that many ill-willers to the Lacedæmonians, and as many of their bond-ſlaves as could eſcape from them, would repair to Pylus, and from thence make daily incurſions into Laconia, which was not far off: Or, if other hopes failed, yet would the benefit of this Haven, lying almoſt in the mid-way between them and Corcyra, make them able to ſurround all Peloponneſus, and waſte it at their pleaſure. The news of theſe doings at Pylus drew the Peloponneſians thither in all haſte out of Attica, which they had entred a few days before with their whole Army: but now they brought not only their Land-forces, but all their Navy to recover this piece, which how bad a neighbour it might prove in time, they well foreſaw, little fearing the grievous loſs at hand, which they there in few days received. For when they in vain made a general aſſault on all ſides, both by Sea and Land, finding that ſmall Garriſon which the Athenians had left, very reſolute in the defence; they occupied the haven, placing four hundred and twenty choice men, all of them Citizens of Sparta, in the Iſland before mentioned, at each end whereof is a channel that leads into the Port; but ſo narrow, that only two ſhips in front could enter between the Iſle and Pylus; likewiſe but ſeven or eight ſhips could enter at once by the further channel between the Iſland and the Main. Having thus taken order to ſhut up this new Town by Sea, they ſent part of their Fleet to fetch wood, and other ſtuff, wherewith to fortifie round about, and block up the piece on all ſides. But in the mean ſeaſon the Athenian Fleet hearing of their danger that were left at Pylus, returned thither, and with great courage entring the Haven, did break and ſink many of their enemies veſſels; took five, and ſo inforced the reſidue to run themſelves aground.

Now was the Town ſecure, and the Spartans abiding in the Iſland as good as loſt. Wherefore the Magiſtrates were ſent from Sparta to the Camp (as was their cuſtom in great dangers) to adviſe what were beſt for the publick ſafety; who when they did perceive that there was no other way to reſcue their Citizens out of the Iſle, than by compoſition with their enemies, they agreed to entreat with the Athenians about peace, taking truce in the mean while with the Captains at Pylus. The conditions of the Truce were, That the Lacedæmonians ſhould deliver up all the ſhips which were in the Coaſt, and that they ſhould attempt nothing againſt the Town, nor the Athenians againſt the Camp: That a certain quantity of Bread, Wine, Fleſh, ſhould be daily carried into the Iſle, but that no ſhips ſhould paſs into the Iſland ſecretly: That the Athenians ſhould carry the Lacedæmonian Embaſſadors to Athens, there to treat of peace, and ſhould bring them back, at whoſe return the Truce ſhould end; which if in the mean time it were broken in any one point, ſhould be held utterly void in all: That when the Truce was expired, the Athenians ſhould reſtore the Peloponneſian ſhips in as good caſe as they received them. The Embaſſadors coming to Athens, were of opinion, That as they themſelves had begun the War, ſo might they end it when they pleaſed. Wherefore they told the Athenians how great an honour it was that the Lacedæmonians did ſue to them for peace, adviſing them to make an end of War, whilſt with ſuch reputation they might. But they found all contrary to their expectation: For inſtead of concluding upon even terms, or deſiring of meet recompence for loſs ſuſtained, the Athenians demanded certain Cities to be reſtored to them, which had been taken from them by the Lacedæmonians long before this War began; refuſing likewiſe to continue the treaty of peace, unleſs the Spartans which were in the Iſle, were firſt rendred unto them as priſoners. Thus were the Embaſſadors returned without effect; at which time the Truce being ended, it was deſired from the Athenian Captains, that they ſhould according to their Covenant reſtore the ſhips which had been put into their hands. Whereto anſwer was made, that the condition of the Truce was, That if any one Article were broken, all ſhould be held void; now (ſaid the Athenians) ye have aſſaulted our Garriſons, and thereby are we acquitted of our promiſe to reſtore the ſhips. This and the like frivolous allegations which they made, were but meer ſhifts; yet profit ſo far overweighed honour, that better anſwer none could be got. Then were the Lacedæmonians driven to uſe many hard means for conveyance of victuals into the Iſle; which finally was taken by force, and the men that were in it carried priſoners to Athens, where it was decreed, That when the Peloponneſians next invaded Attica, theſe Priſoners ſhould all be ſlain. Whether fearing the death of theſe men, or with-held by the troubles, which (according to the Athenians hope) fell upon them, the Lacedæmonians were ſo far from waſting Attica, that they ſuffered their own Country to be continually over-run, both by the Athenians, who landed on all parts of their Coaſt, and by thoſe which iſſued out of Pylus; which became the Rendezvous of all that were ill-affected unto them.

SECT. V.

How the Lacedæmonians hardly, and to their great diſadvantage obtained a Peace that was not well kept.

THerefore they endeavoured greatly to obtain peace; which the Athenians would not hearken unto. For they were ſo puffed up with continuance of good ſucceſs, that having ſent a few bands of men into Sicily to hold up a faction there, and make what profit they might of the Sicilians quarrels; when afterward they heard that the differences in that Iſle were taken away, and their bands returned without either gain or loſs, they baniſhed the Captains, as if it had been meerly through their default that the Iſle of Sicily was not conquered; which (beſides the longer diſtance) was in power to offend others, or defend it ſelf, no whit inferi-

our unto Peloponneſus. Yet was this their over-weening much abated ſhortly after by ſome diſaſters received, eſpecially in Thrace, where in a battel which they loſt at Amphipolis, Cleon and Braſidas, Generals of the Athenian and Lacedæmonian forces, were both ſlain; which two had moſt been adverſaries to the peace. As the Athenians by their loſſes were taught moderation, ſo the Lacedæmonians, who not only felt the like wounds, but through the great Navy which they had received at Pylus, were fain to proceed lamely in the War againſt ſuch as through commodity of their good fleet, had all advantage that could be found in expedition, were fervently deſirous to conclude the buſineſs ere Fortune by any new favour ſhould revive the inſolence which was at this time well mortified in their Enemies. Neither was it only a conſideration of their preſent eſtate, that urged them to bring the treaty of peace to a good and ſpeedy effect; but other dangers hanging over their heads, and ready to fall on them, which unleſs they compounded with the Athenians, they knew not how to avoid. The eſtate of Argos which had ancient enmity with them, was now after a Truce of thirty years well-nigh expired, ready to take the benefit of their preſent troubles by joining with thoſe who alone found them work enough. Argos was a rich and ſtrong City, which though inferiour to Sparta in valour, yet was not ſo unwarlike, nor held ſuch ill correſpondence with the neighbouring Eſtates, that the Lacedæmonians could ever far prevail upon it, when they had little elſe to do.

This was a thing that in the beginning of this War had not been regarded. For it was then thought that by waſting the Territory of Athens with ſword and fire, the quarrel ſhould eaſily and in ſhort time have been ended, whereby not only the Athenians ſhould have been brought to good order, but the Corinthians and others, for whoſe ſake the War was undertaken, have been ſo firmly knit to the Lacedæmonians, that they ſhould for love of them have abandoned the Argives to their own fortunes. But now the vanity of thoſe hopes appeared, in that the Athenians abounding in ready money, and means to raiſe more, were able to ſecure themſelves by a ſtrong Fleet, from any great harm that the Peloponneſians, wanting wherewith to maintain a Navy, could do unto them; yea, as Maſters of the Sea to weary them out, as in effect already they had done. As for the Confederates of Sparta they could now endure neither War nor peace; their daily travels, and many loſſes had ſo wearied and incenſed them. Wherefore the Lacedæmonians were glad to uſe the occaſion which the inclination of their enemies did then afford, of making a final peace, which with much ado they procured, as ſeemed equal and eaſie; but was indeed impoſſible to be performed, and therefore all their travel was little effectual.

The reſtitution of Priſoners and places taken being agreed upon, it fell out by lot that the Lacedæmonians ſhould reſtore firſt. Theſe had won more Towns upon the Continent from the Athenians, than the Athenians had from them; but what they had won, they had not won abſolutely: For they had reſtored ſome Towns to ſuch of their Allies, from whom the State of Athens had taken them; ſome, and thoſe the moſt, they had ſet at liberty (as reaſon required) which had opened their gates unto them as to their friends and deliverers, and not compelled them to break in as enemies. Now concerning the Towns which were not in their own hands, but had been rendred unto their Confederates, the Spartans found means to give ſome ſatisfaction by permitting the Athenians to retain others which they had gotten in the War; as for the reſt, they promiſed more than afterwards they could perform. The Cities which they had taken into protection, could not endure to hear of being abandoned, neither would they by any means yield themſelves into the hands of their old Lords the Athenians, whom they had offended by revolting, notwithſtanding whatſoever Articles were drawn and concluded for their ſecurity and betterance in time to come. This dull performance of conditions on the ſide of the Spartans, made the Athenians become as backward in doing thoſe things which on their part were required; ſo that reſtoring only the priſoners which they had, they deferred the reſt until ſuch time as they might receive the full ſatisfaction, according to the agreement. But before ſuch time as theſe difficulties brake out into matter of open quarrel, the Lacedæmonians entred into a more ſtraight allyance with the Athenians, making a league offenſive and defenſive with them. Hereunto they were moved by the backwardneſs of the Argives, who being (as they thought) likely to have ſued for peace at their hands, as ſoon as things were once compounded between Athens and Sparta, did ſhew themſelves plainly unwilling to give ear to any ſuch motion. Thinking therefore, that by cutting from Argos all hope of Athenian ſuccour, they ſhould make ſure work, the Spartans regarded not the affections of other States, whom they had either bound unto them by well-deſerving in the late War, or found ſo troubleſome, that their enmity (if perhaps they durſt let it appear) was little worſe than friendſhip. It bred great jealouſies in all the Cities of Greece, to perceive ſuch a conjunction between two ſo powerful Signiories: eſpecially one clauſe threatning every one, that was any thing apt to fear, with a ſecret intent that might be harboured in their proud conceits of ſubduing the whole Country, and taking each what they could lay hold on. For beſides the other Articles, it was agreed, That they might by mutual conſent add new conditions, or alter the old at their own pleaſures. This impreſſion wrought ſo ſtrongly in the Corinthians, Thebans, and other ancient Confederates of Sparta, that the hate which they had born to the Athenians their profeſſed enemies, was violently thrown upon the Lacedæmonians their unjuſt friends: whereby it came to paſs, that they who lately had born chief ſway in Greece, might have been abandoned to the diſcretion of their enemies, as already in effect they were, had the enemies wiſely uſed the advantage.

SECT. VI.

Of the Negotiations and practices held between many States of Greece, by occaſion of the Peace that was concluded.

THe admiration wherein all Greece held the valour of Sparta as unreſiſtable, and able to make way through all impediments, had been ſo exceſſive, that when by ſome ſiniſter accidents that City was compelled to take and ſeek peace upon terms not ſounding very honourable, this common opinion was not only abated, but (as happens uſually in things extream) was changed into much contempt. For it was never thought that any Lacedæmonian monian would have endured to lay down his weapons, and yield himſelf priſoner, nor that any misfortune ſhould have been ſo great as ſhould have drawn that City to relieve it ſelf otherwiſe than by force of Arms. But when once it had appeared that many of their Citizens, among whom were ſome of eſpecial mark, being overlaid by enemies in the Iſland before Pylus, had rather choſen to live in captivity than to die in fight; and that Pylus it ſelf ſticking as a thorn in the foot of Laconia, had bred ſuch anguiſh in that Eſtate as utterly wearying the accuſtomed Spartan reſolution, had made it ſit down and ſeek to refreſh it ſelf by diſhonourable eaſe: then did not only the Corinthians and Thebans begin to conceive baſely of thoſe men which were vertuous though unfortunate; but other leſs Cities joining with theſe in the ſame opinion, did caſt their eyes upon the rich and great City of Argos, of whoſe ability to do much, they conceived a ſtrong belief, becauſe of long time it had done nothing. Such is the baſe condition which through fooliſh envy is become almoſt natural in the greater part of mankind. We curiouſly ſearch into their vices, in whom had they kept ſome diſtance, we ſhould have diſcerned only the vertues; and comparing injuriouſly our beſt parts with their worſt, are juſtly plagued with a falſe opinion of that good in ſtrangers which we know to be wanting in our ſelves.

The firſt that publiſh'd their diſlike of Sparta, were the Corinthians, at whoſe vehement entreaty (though moved rather by envy at the greatneſs of Athens daily encreaſing) the Lacedæmonians had entred into the preſent War. But theſe Corinthians did only murmur at the peace, alledging as grievances that ſome Towns of theirs were left in the Athenians hands. The Mantenæans who during the time of War, had procured ſome part of the Arcadians to become their followers, and forſake their dependency upon the State of Sparta, did more freely and readily diſcover themſelves; fear of revenge to come, working more effectually than indignation at things already paſt. The Argives feeling the gale of proſperous fortune that began to fill their ſails, prepared themſelves to take as much of it as they could ſtand under; giving for that purpoſe unto twelve of their Citizens a full and abſolute commiſſion to make alliance between them and any free Cities of Greece (Athens and Sparta excepted) without any further trouble of propounding every particular buſineſs to the multitude. When the gates of Argos were ſet thus open to all comers; the Mantinæans began to lead the way, and many Cities of Peloponneſus following them, entred into this new Confederacy; ſome incited by private reſpects, others thinking it the wiſeſt way to do as the moſt did. What inconveniency might ariſe unto them by theſe courſes, the Lacedæmonians eaſily diſcerned; and therefore ſent Embaſſadors to ſtop the matter at Corinth, where they well perceived that the miſchief had been hatched. Theſe Embaſſadors found in the Corinthians a very rough diſpoſition, with a gravity expreſſing the opinion which they had conceived of their preſent advantage over Sparta. They had cauſed all Cities which had not entred yet into alliance with Argos, to ſend their Agents to them, in whoſe preſence they gave audience to the Lacedæmonians; the purport of whoſe Embaſſy was this: That the Corinthians without breach of their Oath could not forſake the alliance which they had long ſince made with Sparta; and that Reaſon did as well bind them to hold themſelves contented with the peace lately made, as Religion enforced them to continue in their ancient Confederacy; foraſmuch as it had been agreed between the Spartans and their Aſſociates, that the conſent of the greater part (which had yielded unto peace with Athens) ſhould bind the leſſer number to perform what was concluded, if no divine impediment withſtood them. Hereunto the Corinthians made anſwer, That the Spartans had firſt begun to do them open wrong in concluding the War wherein they had loſt many places without proviſion of reſtitution; and that the very clauſe alledged by the Embaſſadors did acquit them from any neceſſity of ſubſcribing to the late Peace, foraſmuch as they had ſworn unto thoſe people whom they perſwaded to rebel againſt Athens, that they would never abandon them, nor willingly ſuffer them to fall again into the tyrannous hands of the Athenians. Wherefore they held themſelves bound both in Reaſon and Religion to uſe all means of upholding thoſe whom by common conſent they had taken into protection; for that an Oath was no leſs to be accounted a Divine impediment, than were peſtilence, tempeſt, or any the like accident, hindring the performance of things undertaken. As for the alliance with Argos, they ſaid, That they would do as they ſhould find cauſe. Having diſmiſſed the Embaſſadors with this anſwer, they made haſte to join themſelves with Argos, and cauſed other States to do the like; ſo that Sparta and Athens were in a manner left to themſelves, the Thebans and Megarians being alſo upon the point to have entred into this new Confederacy. But as the affections were divers which cauſed this haſty confluence of ſudden friends to Argos, it ſo likewiſe came to paſs that the friendſhip it ſelf, ſuch as it was, had much diverſity both of ſincerity and of continuance. For ſome there were, that hated or feared the Lacedæmonians, as the Mantineans and Eleans; theſe did firmly betake themſelves to the Argives, in whom they knew the ſame affection to be inveterate: others did only hate the peace concluded; and theſe would rather have followed the Spartans than the Argives in War, yet rather the Argives in War than the Lacedæmonians in peace. Of this number were the Corinthians, who knowing that the Thebans were affected like unto themſelves, dealt with them to enter into the ſociety of the Argives as they had done: but the different forms of Government uſed in Thebes and Argos, cauſed the Thebans to hold rather with Sparta, that was ruled by the principal men, than to incur the danger of innovation, by joining with ſuch as committed the whole rule to the multitude.

This buſineſs having ill ſucceeded, the Corinthians began to bethink themſelves of their own danger, who had not ſo much as any Truce with Athens, and yet were unprepared for War. They ſought therefore to come to ſome temporary agreement with the Athenians, and hardly obtained it. For the Athenians who had dealt with all Greece at one time, did not greatly care to come to any appointment with one City, that had ſhewed againſt them, more ſtomach than force; but gave them to underſtand, that they might be ſafe enough from them if they would claim the benefit of that alliance which Athens had lately made with Sparta and her dependants; yet finally they granted unto theſe Corinthians (which were loth to acknowledg themſelves dependantt of Sparta) the Truce that they deſired; but into private Confederacy they would not admit them, being an article of the league between them and the Spartans, That the one ſhould not make peace nor war without the other.

Herein,

Herein, as in many other paſſages, may clearly be ſeen the great advantage which abſolute Lords have, as well in peace as in war, over ſuch as are ſerved by Voluntaries. We ſhall hardly find any Signiory that hath been ſo conſtantly followed as Sparta was by ſo many States, and ſome of them little inferiour to it ſelf, being all as free: whereas contrariwiſe, the Athenians had lately, and by compulſive means gotten their Dominion, wherein they demeaned themſelves as Tyrants. But in performance of conditions agreed upon, the Athenians were able to make their words good, by excluding any State out of their Confederacy, and giving up ſuch places as were agreed upon: of which the Lacedæmonians could do neither the one nor the other. For ſuch Towns as their old Allies had gotten by their means in the late War, could not be reſtored without their conſent which had them in preſent poſſeſſion; and particularly the Town of Panacte which the Thebans held, could by no means be obtained from them by the Lacedæmonians (who earneſtly deſired it, that by reſtitution thereof unto the Athenians as earneſtly demanding it, themſelves might recover Pylus) unleſs that they would agree to make a private alliance with Thebes; which thereupon they were conſtrained to do, though knowing it to be contrary to the laſt agreement between them and Athens.

The Lacedæmonians having broken one article of the league made between them and the Athenians, that by ſo doing they might enable themſelves to the performance of another, were ſhamefully diſappointed of their hopes by the Thebans, who did not give up the Town of Panacte, till firſt they had utterly demoliſhed it, and made it of no worth to the Athenians. This was fought to have been excuſed by the Lacedæmonian Embaſſadors, who coming to Athens (whither they had ſent home all priſoners that had been detained at Thebes) hoping with gentle words to ſalve the matter; ſaying, That from henceforth no enemy of Athens ſhould neſtle in Panacte, for it was deſtroyed. But theſe Embaſſadors had not to deal with tame fools. For the Athenians told them in plain terms, That of three principal conditions agreed upon in their late League, they had not performed any one; but uſed ſuch baſe concluſions as ſtood not with their honour: having made private alliance with the Thebans; having deſtroyed a Town that they ſhould have reſtored; and not having forced their dependants by War, to make good the Covenants of the late concluded peace. Hereupon they diſmiſſed the Embaſſadors with rough words, meaning with as rough deeds to anger thoſe that ſent them.

There were at that time both in Athens and Sparta, many that were ill-contented with the peace: among whom were the Ephori, choſen for that year in Sparta; and Alcibiades, a powerful young Gentleman in Athens. But the Ephori, though deſiring to renew the War, yet wiſhed that firſt they might get from the Athenians as much as was to be rendred to them by Covenant, eſpecially Pylus that had ſo ſorely troubled them. Alcibiades, whoſe Nobility, riches and favour with the people, made him deſire War, as the mean whereby himſelf might procure ſome honourable employment; uſed all means to ſet the quarrel on foot, whilſt the Athenians had yet both advantage enough, as not having rendred ought ſave their priſoners, and pretence enough to uſe that advantage of breaking the peace, by reaſon that the Lacedæmonians (though indeed againſt their wills) had broken all Covenants with them. Now the State of Athens had fully determined to retain Pylus, and to perform nothing that the Lacedæmonians ſhould, and might require, until they had firſt, without any longer halting, fulfilled all Articles whereto they were bound, even to the utmoſt point. This was enough to make them ſweat, who having already done the moſt that they could, had as yet got nothing in recompence, except the delivery of their Citizens which were priſoners. But Alcibiades wiſhing a ſpeedy beginning of open War, ſent privily to the Argives, and gave them to underſtand how fitly the time ſerved for them to aſſociate themſelves with Athens, which was enough to give them ſecurity againſt all enemies.

The Argives upon the firſt confluence of many Eſtates unto their ſociety, had embraced great hopes of working wonders, as if they ſhould have had the conduct of all Greece againſt the Athenians, robbing Sparta of that honour, as having ill uſed it, and thereby leaving their old enemies in caſe of much contempt and diſability. But theſe ſudden apprehenſions of vain joy, were ſuddenly changed into as vain fear; which ill agreed with the great opinion that had lately been conceived of Argos. For when the Thebans had refuſed their alliance; when the Corinthians had ſought ſecurity from Athens; and when a falſe rumour was noiſed abroad, Athens, Thebes, and Sparta, were come to a full agreement upon all points of differences; than began the Argives to let fall their creſts, and ſue for peace unto the Lacedæmonians, who needing it as much as they, or more, yet held their gravity, and were not over-haſty to accept it. At this time, and in this perturbation, the meſſage of Alcibiades came very welcome to the Argives, which were not now conſulting how to become the chief of all others, but how to ſave themſelves. Wherefore they ſent away preſently to Athens their own Embaſſadors, accompanied with the Mantineans and Eleans, to make a League offenſive and defenſive between their Eſtates and the Athenians.

Of this buſineſs the Lacedæmonians knew not what to think: for well they ſaw, that ſuch a combination tended to their great hurt, and therefore were deſirous to prevent it; but to keep the love of the Athenians, the new Ephori thought that more was already done than ſtood with their honour or profit; others held it the wiſeſt way, having done ſo much, not to ſtick upon a little more, but rather by giving full ſatisfaction to retain the friendſhip of that State, which was more to be valued than all the reſt of Greece. This reſolution prevailing, they ſent away ſuch of their Citizens as were beſt affected to the peace, who coming to Athens with full commiſſion to make an end of all Controverſies, did earneſtly labour in the Council-houſe, to make the truth of things appear; ſaying, That their Confederacy with the Thebans had tended to none other end than the recovery of Panacte: concerning which Town, or any other buſineſs, that it much grieved the Lacedæmonians to ſee things fall out in ſuch wiſe as might give to the Athenians cauſe of diſpleaſure; but that all ſhould be done which in reaſon might be required for making matters even between them; to which purpoſe they ſhewed that themſelves had abſolute commiſſion. Wherefore they deſired that Pylus might be reſtored to them, and eſpecially for the preſent; that the Negotiation with the Argives might be called aſide. Favourable audience was given to this propoſition, the rather becauſe they which promiſed amends, had power to make their words good. But all this fair likelihood of good agreement was daſht on the ſudden, by the practice of Alcibiades, who ſecrecly dealing with the Lacedæmonian Embaſſadors, perſwaded them well of his friendſhip towards their City, and adviſed them to take all care that their abſolute power to conclude what they pleaſed in the name of Sparta, might not be known to the Commonalty of Athens, leſt the inſolent multitude ſhould thereupon grow peremptory and yield to nothing, unleſs they could draw them to unreaſonable conditions. The Embaſſadors believed him, and faſhioned their tale in the aſſembly of the people as he had adviſed them. Hereupon the ſame Alcibiades taking preſently the advantage which their double dealing afforded, inveighed openly againſt them, as men of no ſincerity; that were come to Athens for no other purpoſe, than to hinder the people from ſtrengthening themſelves with friends, meaning to draw the Argives and their Adherents to their own alliance, as (contrary to their own Oath) already they had the Thebans. The people of Athens, whom a pleaſing errand would very hardly have ſatisfied, or brought into a good opinion of the Lacedæmonians, (whoſe honeſt meanings had ſo ill been ſeconded with good performance) were now ſo much incenſed with the double dealing of the Embaſſadors, and the ſtrong perſwaſions of Alcibiades, that little wanted of concluding the League with Argos. Yet for the preſent ſo far did Nicias an honourable Citizen, and great friend to the peace, prevail with them, that the buſineſs was put off, until he himſelf with other Embaſſadors might fetch a better anſwer from Sparta.

It may alſo ſeem a great wonder, how ſo poor a trick of Alcibiades was able to carry a matter of ſo great importance, when the Spartan Embaſſadors might have caſt the load upon his own ſhoulders, by diſcovering the truth: But the gravity which was uſually found in the Lacedæmonians, hindred them (perhaps) from playing their game handſomely againſt ſo nimble a wit; and they might well have been thought untruſty men, had they profeſſed themſelves ſuch as would ſay and unſay for their moſt advantage.

Nicias and his Companions had a ſowre meſſage to deliver at Sparta, being peremptorily to require performance of all conditions, and among the reſt, That the Lacedæmonians ſhould take the pains to rebuild Panacte, and ſhould immediately renounce their Alliance made with the Thebans; letting them underſtand, that otherwiſe the Athenians, without further delay, would enter into Confederacy with the Argives, and their adherents. The Ephori at Sparta had no mind to forſake the Thebans, aſſured friends to their State; but wrought ſo hard, that the anger of the Athenians was ſuffered to break out what way it could, which to mitigate, they would do no more than only (at the requeſt of Nicias their honourable friend, who would not ſeem to have effected nothing) ſwear anew to keep the Articles of the league between them and Athens. Immediately therefore upon return of the Embaſſadors, a new League was made between the Athenians, Argives, Mantineans, and Eleans, with very ample proviſion for holding the ſame common friends and enemies; wherein, though the Lacedæmonians were paſſed over with ſilence, yet was it manifeſt that the whole intent of this Confederacy did bend it ſelf chiefly againſt them, as in ſhort while after was proved by effect.

At this time the Lacedæmonians were in ill caſe, who having reſtored all that they could unto the Athenians, and procured others to do the like, had themſelves recovered nothing of their own (priſoners excepted), for default of reſtoring all that they ſhould. But that which did moſt of all diſable them, was the loſs of reputation, which they had not more impaired in the late War by misfortunes, than in ſundry paſſages between them and the Athenians: to procure and keep whoſe Amity, they had left ſundry of their own friends to ſhift for themſelves. Contrariwiſe, the Athenians by the treaty of peace had recovered the moſt part of that which they loſt in War; all their gettings they had retained; and were ſtrengthened by the acceſs of new Confederates.

SECT. VII.

How the Peace between Athens and Sparta was ill kept, though not openly broken.

IT was not long ere the Argives and their fellows had found buſineſs wherewith to ſet the Athenians on work, and make uſe of this conjunction. For preſuming upon the ſtrength of their ſide, they began to meddle with the Epidaurians, whom it concerned the State of Sparta to defend. So many acts of hoſtility were committed, wherein Athens and Sparta did (as principals) infeſt each the other, but came in collaterally, as to the aid of their ſeveral friends.

By theſe occaſions the Corinthians, Bœotians, Phocians, Locrians, and other people of Greece began anew to range themſelves under the Lacedæmonians, and follow their Enſigns. One victory which the Lacedæmonians obtained by their meer valor in a ſet Battel near to Mantinæa, againſt the Argive ſide, helped well to repair their decayed reputation, though otherwiſe it yielded them no great profit. The civil diſſention ariſing ſhortly after within Argos it ſelf, between the principal Citizens, and the Commons, had almoſt thrown down the whole frame of the new combination. For the chief Citizens getting the upper hand, made a league with Sparta, wherein they proceeded ſo far, as to renounce the Amity of the Athenians in expreſs words, and forced the Mantinæans to the like. But in ſhort ſpace of time the multitude prevailing, reverſed all this, and having chaſed away their ambitious Nobility, applied themſelves to the Athenians as cloſely as before.

Beſides theſe uproars in Peloponneſus, many aſſays were made to raiſe up troubles in all parts of Greece, and likewiſe in Macedon to the Athenians; whoſe forces and readineſs for execution prevented ſome things, revenged other, and requited all with ſome proſperous attempts. Finally, the Athenians wanting matter of quarrel, and the Lacedæmonians growing weary, they began to be quiet; retaining ſtill that enmity in their hearts, which they had ſufficiently diſcovered in effects, though not yet breaking out into terms of open War.

SECT. VIII.

The Athenians ſending two Fleets to ſack Syracuſe, are put to flight, and utterly diſcomfited.

DUring this intermiſſion of open War, the Athenians re-entertained their hopes of ſubduing Sicil; whither they ſent a Fleet ſo mighty, as never ver was ſet forth by Greece in any Age before or after.

This Fleet was very well manned, and furniſhed with all neceſſaries to ſo great an expedition. All which came to nought; partly by the factions in Athens, whence Alcibiades, Author of that Voyage, and one of the Generals of their Fleet, was driven to baniſh himſelf, for fear of ſuch judgment as elſe he was like to have undergone among the incenſed people; partly by the invaſion which the Lacedæmonians made upon Attica, whilſt the forces of that State were ſo far from home. Hereunto was added the aid of the King of Perſia, who ſupplied the Peloponneſians with money.

Neither was the ſucceſs of things in Sicilia ſuch, as without help from Athens, could give any likelihood of a good end in that War. For although in the beginning, the enterprize had ſo well ſucceeded, that they beſieged Syracuſe, the chief City of all the Iſland, and one of the faireſt Towns which the Greeks inhabited, obtaining the better in ſundry Battels by Land and Sea; yet when the Town was relieved with ſtrong aid from Peloponneſus, it came to paſs that the Athenians were put to the worſe on all ſides, in ſuch wiſe, that their Fleet was ſhut up into the Haven of Syracuſe, and could not iſſue out.

As the Athenian affairs went very ill in Sicil, ſo did they at home ſtand upon their terms; for that the Lacedæmonians, who had been formerly accuſtomed to make weariſome yearly journeys into Attica, which having pillaged and forraged, they returned home; did now by counſel of Alcibiades (who ſeeking revenge upon his own Citizens, was fled unto them) fortifie the Town of Decelea, which was near to Athens, whence they ceaſed not with daily incurſions to harry all the Country round about, and ſometimes give alarm unto the City it ſelf. In theſe extremities the perverſe obſtinacy of the Athenians was very ſtrange; who leaving at their backs, and at their own doors, an enemy litttle leſs mighty than themſelves, did yet ſend forth another Fleet into Sicil, to invade a people no leſs puiſſant, which had never offended them.

It often happens, that a proſperous event, makes fooliſh counſel ſeem wiſer than it was; which came to paſs many times among the Athenians, whoſe vain Conceits Pallas was ſaid to turn to the beſt. But where unſound advice finding bad proof, is obſtinately purſued, neither Pallas nor Fortune can be juſtly blamed for a miſerable iſſue. This ſecond Fleet of the Athenians, which better might have ſerved to convey home the former that was defeated, after ſome attempts made to ſmall purpoſe againſt the Syracuſans, was finally (together with the other part of the Navy, which was there before) quite vanquiſhed, and barr'd up into the Haven of Syracuſe, whereby the Camp of the Athenians, utterly deprived of all benefit by Sea, either for ſuccour or departure, was driven to break up, and fly away by Land; in which flight they were overtaken, routed, and quite overthrown, in ſuch wiſe that ſcarce any man eſcaped.

This miſchief well deſerved, fell upon the Athenians, who had wickedly condemned into exile Sophocles and Pthiodorus Generals, formerly ſent into that Iſle, pretending that they had taken money for making peace in Sicil, whereas indeed there was not any means or poſſibility to have made War. Hereby it came to paſs, that Nicias who had the chief command in this unhappy enterprize, did rather chuſe to hazard the ruin of his Country by the loſs of that Army, wherein conſiſted little leſs than all the power of Athens; than to adventure his own eſtate, his life, and his honour, upon the tongues of ſhameleſs accuſers, and the ſentence of Judges before his trial reſolved to condemn him, by retiring from Syracuſe, when wiſdom and neceſſity required it. For (ſaid he) they ſhall give ſentence upon us, who know not the reaſon of our doings, nor would give ear to any that would ſpeak in our behalf, but altogether hearken to ſuſpicions and vain rumours that ſhall be brought againſt us: yea theſe our ſoldiers, who now are ſo deſirous to return in ſafety, will in our danger be well contented to frame their tales to the pleaſure of the lewd and inſolent multitude.

This reſolution of Nicias, though it cannot be commended (for it is the part of an honeſt and valiant man to do what reaſon willeth, not what opinion expecteth; and to meaſure honour or diſhonour by the aſſurance of his well-informed conſcience, rather than by the malicious report and cenſure of others) yet it may be excuſed; ſince he had before his eyes the injuſtice of his people, and had well underſtood that a wicked ſentence is infinitely worſe than a wicked fact, as being held a preſident and pattern whereby oppreſſion beginning upon one, is extended as warrantable upon all. Therefore his fear of wrongful condemnation was ſuch as a conſtant man could not eaſily have overmaſtered; but when afterwards the Army, having no other expectation of ſafety than the faint hope of a ſecret flight, he was ſo terrified with an Eclypſe of the Moon, happening when they were about to diſlodg, that he would not conſent to have the Camp break up till ſeven and twenty days were paſt. His timerouſneſs was even as fooliſh and ridiculous, as the iſſue of it was lamentable. For he ſhould not have thought that the powers of the Heavens, and the courſe of Nature would be as unjuſt as his Athenians; or might portend leſs evil to the ſlothful, than to ſuch as did their beſt. Neither do I think that any Aſtrologers can alledg this Ecclypſe, as either a cauſe or prognoſtication of that Armies deſtruction, otherwiſe than as the folly of men did, by application, turn it to their own confuſion. Had C. Caſſius the Roman, he who ſlew Julius Cæſar, imitated this ſuperſtition of Nicias, he had ſurely found the ſame fortune in a caſe very like. But when, he retiring, the broken remainder of Craſſus his Army, defeated by the Parthian Archers, was adviſed, upon ſuch an accident as this, to continue where he then was, till the Sun were paſt the ſign of Scorpio; he made anſwer, That he ſtood not in ſuch fear of Scorpio as of Sagittarius. So adventuring rather to abide the frowning of the Heavens, than the nearer danger of Enemies upon Earth, he made ſuch a ſafe and honourable retreat, as did both ſhew his noble reſolution, and give a fair example to that good rule,

Thus we ſee that God, who ordinarily works by a concatenation of means, deprives the Governours of underſtanding, when he intends evil to the Multitude; and that the wickedneſs of unjuſt men is the ready mean to weaken the virtue of thoſe who might have done them good.

SECT. IX.

Of the troubles whereinto the State of Athens fell, after the great loſs of the Fleet and Army in Sicilia.

THe loſs of this Army was the ruin of the Athenian Dominion, and may be well accounted a very little leſs calamity to that Eſtate, than was the ſubverſion of the Walls, when the City about ſeven years after was taken by Lyſander. For now began the ſubjects of the Athenian Eſtate to rebel: of whom, ſome they reduced under their obedience, others held out; ſome for fear of greater inconvenience were ſet at liberty, promiſing only to be their good friends, as formerly they had been their Subjects; others having a kind of liberty offered by the Athenians, were not therewith contented, but obtained a true and perfect liberty by force. Among theſe troubles it fell out very unſeaſonably, that the principal men of Athens, being wearied with the peoples inſolency, took upon them to change the form of that Eſtate, and bring the Government into the hands of a few. To which purpoſe, conſpiring with the Captains which were abroad, they cauſed them to ſet up the form of an Ariſtocracy in the Towns of their Confederates; and in the mean time, ſome that were moſt likely to withſtand this Innovation, being ſlain at Athens, the Commonalty were ſo diſmaid, that none durſt ſpeak againſt the Conſpirators, whoſe number they knew not, but every man was afraid of his neighbour, leſt he ſhould be a member of the league. In this general fear the Majeſty of Athens was uſurped by four hundred men, who obſerving in ſhew the ancient form of proceeding, did cauſe all matters to be propounded unto the people, and concluded upon by the greater part of voices: but the things propounded were only ſuch as were firſt allowed in private among themſelves; neither had the Commonalty any other liberty, than only to approve and give conſent: for whoſoever preſumed any further, was quickly diſpatched out of the way, and no enquiry made of the murther. By theſe means were many Decrees made, all tending to the eſtabliſhment of this new authority, which nevertheleſs endured not long: For the Fleet and Army which then was in the Iſle of Samos, did altogether deteſt theſe dealings of the four hundred Uſurpers, and held them as Enemies; whereupon they revoked Alcibiades out of Baniſhment, and by his aſſiſtance procured that the ſupplies which the Perſian King had promiſed to the Lacedæmonians, were by Tiſſaphernes his Lieutenant made unprofitable, through the ſlow and bad performance. Alcibiades had at the firſt been very well entertained in Sparta, whilſt his ſervice done unto that State was not grown to be the object of envy. But when it appeared that in Counſel and good performance he ſo far excelled all the Lacedæmonians, that all their good ſucceſs was aſcribed to his wit and valour, then were all the principal Citizens weary of his virtue; eſpecially Agis one of their Kings, whoſe Wife had ſo far yielded her ſelf to the love of this Athenian, that among her inward friends ſhe could not forbear to call her young child by his name. Hereupon order was taken, that Alcibiades ſhould be killed out of the way. But he diſcovering the Spartan treachery, conveyed himſelf unto Tiſſaphernes, whom he ſo bewitched with his great beauty, ſweet converſation, and ſound wit, that he ſoon became the Maſter of that barbarous Viceroys affections, who had free power to diſpoſe the great Kings Treaſures and Forces in thoſe parts. Then began he to adviſe Tiſſaphernes, not ſo far forth to aſſiſt the Lacedæmonians, that they ſhould quite overthrow the State of Athens, but rather to help the weaker ſide, and let them one conſume another, vvhereby all ſhould fall at length into the hands of the Perſian. By this counſel he made vvay to other practices, vvherein by ſtrength of his reputation (as the only favourite of ſo great a Potentate) he played his ovvn game, procuring his reſtitution. At length his Baniſhment being repealed by the Army, but not by the Citizens (who then were oppreſſed by the four hundred) he laboured greatly to reconcile the Soldiers to the Governours; or at leaſt to divert their heat another way, and turn it upon the common Enemy. Some of the four hundred approved his motion, as being weary of the tyranny whereof they were partakers, partly becauſe they ſaw it could not long endure, and partly for that themſelves, being leſs regarded by the reſt of their companions, than ſtood with their good liking, ſought to acquit themſelves of it as honeſtly as they might. But the moſt of that Faction laboured to obtain peace of the Lacedæmonians, deſiring chiefly to maintain both their own authority, and the greatneſs of their City, if they might: but if this could not be, they did rather wiſh to preſerve their own power, or ſafety at leaſt, than the good Eſtate of the Commonwealth. Therefore they made ſundry overtures of peace to the Lacedæmonians, deſiring to compound in as good terms as they might, and affirming that they were fitter to be truſted than the wavering multitude; eſpecially conſidering that the City of Sparta was governed by an Ariſtocracy, to which form they had now reduced Athens. All theſe paſſages between the four hundred (or the moſt and chief of them) and the Lacedæmonians, were kept as ſecret as might be. For the City of Athens, hoping without any great cauſe to repair their loſſes, was not inclined to make compoſition; from which upon juſter ground the Enemy was much more averſe, truſting well that the diſcord of the Athenians (not unknown abroad) might yield ſome fair opportunity to the deſtruction of it ſelf, which in effect (though not then preſently) came to paſs. And upon this hope King Agis did ſometimes bring his forces from Decelea to Athens, where doing no good, he received ſome ſmall loſſes. Likewiſe the Navy of Peloponneſus made ſhew of attempting the City, but ſeeing no likelihood of ſucceſs, they bent their courſe from thence to other places, where they obtained Victories, which in the better fortune of the Athenians might more lightly have been regarded, than in this their decayed eſtate. Yet it ſeems, without any diſparagement to their wiſdom, they ſhould rather have forborn to preſent unto the City, or to the Countrys near adjoining, any terror of the War. For the diſſention within the walls might ſoon have done more good than could be received from the Fleet or Army without, which indeed gave occaſion to ſet the Citizens at unity, though it laſted not very long. The four hundred by means of theſe troubles, were fain to reſign their authority, which they could not now hold, when the people, having taken arms to repell foreign Enemies, would not lay them down, till they had freed themſelves from ſuch as oppreſſed the State at home. Yet was not this alteration of Government a full reſtitution of the ſovereign command unto the people, or whole body of the City, but only to five thousand; which company the four hundred (when their authority began) had pretended to take unto them as assistants: herein seeming to do little wrong or none to the Commonalty, who seldom assembled in greater number. But now when the highest power was come indeed into the hands of so many, it was soon agreed, that Alcibiades and his companions should be recalled from exile, and that the Army at Samos should be requested to undertake the Government: which was forthwith reformed according to the Soldiers desire.

or

SECT. X.

How Alcibiades won many important victories for the Athenians; was recalled from exile; made their General, and again deposed.

THis establishment of things in the City, was accompanied with some good success in the Wars. For the Lacedæmonians were about the same time overthrown at Sea in a great battel by the Athenian Fleet, which had remained at Samos, to which Alcibiades afterwards joining such forces as he could raise, obtained many Victories. Before the Town of Abydus, his arrival with eighteen ships, gave the honour of a great Battel to the Athenians; he overthrew and utterly destroyed the Fleet of the Lacedæmonians commanded by Mindarus; took the Towns of Cyzicus and Perinthus, made the Selymbrians ransome their City, and fortified Chrysopolis. Hereupon Letters were sent to Sparta, which the Athenians intercepting, found to contain the distress of the Army in these few words: All is lost; Mindarus is slain; the Soldiers want victuals; we know not what to do.

Shortly after this, Alcibiades overthrew the Lacedæmonians in fight by Land at Chalcedon, took Selymbria, besieged and won Byzantium, now called Constantinople, which even in those days was a goodly, rich, and very strong City. Hereupon he returned home with very great welcome, and was made High Admiral of all the Navy.

But this his honour continued not long, for it was taken from him, and he driven to banish himself again, only because his Lieutenant contrary to the express command of Alcibiades, fighting with the enemies in his absence, had lost a great part of the Fleet.

The second Banishment of Alcibiades was to the Athenians more harmful than the first; and the loss which thereupon they received, was (though more heavy to them, yet) less to be pitied of others, than that which ensued upon his former exile. For whereas at the first, he had sought revenge upon his own City; now as inured to adversity he rather pitied their fury, who in time of such danger had cast out him that should have repaired their weak estate, than sought by procuring or beholding the calamity of his people, to comfort himself after injury received. Before they who were instituted in the place of Alcibiades, arrived at the Fleet, he presented Battel to Lysander the Lacedæmonian Admiral, who was not so confident upon his former Victory, as to undertake Alcibiades himself, bringing ships more in number (notwithstanding the former loss of fifteen) than his enemies had, and better ordered than they had been under his Lieutenant. But when the Decree of the people was published in the Navy, then did Alcibiades withdraw himself to a Town upon the Hellespont, called Bizanthe, where he had built a Castle.

SECT. XI.

The Battel of Arginusæ, and condemnation of the victorious Athenian Captains by the People.

AFter this time the Athenians receiving many losses and discomfitures, were driven to fly into the Haven of Mytelene, where they were straitly besieged both by Land and Sea. For the raising of this siege necessity inforced them to man all their Vessels, and to put the uttermost of their forces into the hazard of one Battel. This Battel was fought at Arginusæ, where Callicratidas Admiral of the Lacedæmonians, losing the honour of the day, preserved his own reputation by dying valiantly in the fight. It might well have been expected that the ten Captains, who jointly had command in chief over the Athenian Fleet, should for that good days service, and so happy a Victory, have received great honour of their Citizens. But contrariwise, they were forthwith called home and accused, as if wilfully they had suffered many of the Citizens, whose ships were broken and sunk, to be cast away, when by appointing some Vessels to take them up, they might have saved them from being drowned. Hereto the Captains readily made a very just answer, That they pursuing the Victory, had left part of the Fleet under sufficient men, to save those that were wrackt; which if it were not well accomplished, it was because a tempest arising about the end of the fight, had hindred the performance of that, and other their intendments. This excuse availed not. For a leud fellow was brought forth, who said, That he himself escaping in a Meal-tub, had been intreated by those who were in peril of drowning, to desire of the people revenge of their deaths upon the Captains. It was very strange that upon such an accusation maintained with so slender evidence, men that had well deserved of their Country should be overthrown. But their enemies had so incensed the rascal multitude, that no man durst absolve them, save only Socrates the wise and virtuous Philosopher, whose voice in this judgment was not regarded. Six of them were put to death, of whom one had hardly escaped drowning, and was with much ado relieved by other Vessels in the storm: but the Captains which were absent escaped; for when the fury of the people was over-past, this judgment was reversed, and the accusers called into question for having deceived and perverted the Citizens. Thus the Athenians went about to free themselves from the infamy of injustice, but the Divine Justice was not asleep, nor would be so deluded.

SECT. XII.

The Battel at Ægos-Potamos, wherein the whole State of Athens was ruined; with the end of the Peloponnesian War.

THe Peloponnesian Fleet under Lysander, the year next following, having scoured the Ægean Seas, enter Hellespont, where (landing Soldiers) it beſieged and took the Town of Lampſacus. Hereupon all the Navy of Athens, being an hundred and fourſcore ſail, made thither in haſte: but finding Lampſacus taken before their coming, they put in at Seſtos, where having refreſhed themſelves, they ſailed to the River called Ægos-Potamos, which is (as we might name it) Goats-Brook, or the River of the Goat, being on the Continent oppoſite to Lampſacus: and there they caſt Anchors, not one whole league off from Lyſander, who rode at Lampſacus in the Harbor. The next day after their arrival, they preſented fight unto the Peloponneſians, who refuſed it, whereupon the Athenians returned again to Ægos-Potamos; and thus they continued five days, braving every day the Enemy, and returning to their own Harbor when it drew towards Evening.

The Caſtle of Alcibiades was not far from the Navy, and his power in thoſe places was ſuch as might have greatly availed his Country-men, if they could have made uſe of it. For he had waged Mercenaries, and making War in his own name upon ſome people of the Thracians, had gathered much wealth, and obtained much reputation among them. He perceiving the diſorderly courſe of the Athenian Commanders, repaired unto them, and ſhewed what great inconvenience might grow, if they did not ſoon foreſee and prevent it. For they lay in a rode ſubject to every weather; neither near enough to any Town where they might furniſh themſelves with neceſſaries, nor ſo far off as had been more expedient. Seſtos was the next Market-Town; thither both Soldiers and Mariners reſorted, flocking away from the Navy every day, as ſoon as they were returned from braving the Enemy. Therefore Alcibiades willed them either to lye at Seſtos, which was not far off, or at leaſt to conſider how near their Enemy was, whoſe fear proceeded rather from obedience to their General, than from any cowardiſe. This admonition was ſo far deſpiſed, that ſome of the Commanders willed him to meddle with his own matters, and to remember that his authority was out of date. Had it not been for theſe opprobrious words, he could (as he told his familiars) have compelled the Lacedæmonians either to fight upon unequal terms, or utterly to quit their Fleet. And like enough it was that he might ſo have done by tranſporting the light-armed Thracians, his Confederates, and others his followers, over the Streights, who aſſaulting the Peloponneſians by Land, would either have compelled them to put to Sea, or elſe to leave their ſhips to the mercy of the Athenians. But finding their acceptance of his good counſel no better than hath been rehearſed, he left them to their fortune; which how evil it would be, he he did prognoſticate.

Lyſander all this while defending himſelf by the advantage of his Haven, was not careleſs in looking into the demeanour of the Athenians. When they departed, his manner was, to ſend forth ſome of his ſwifteſt Veſſels after them, who obſerving their doings, related unto him what they had ſeen. Therefore underſtanding in what careleſs faſhion they roomed up and down the Country; he kept all his men aboard after their departure: and the fifth day gave eſpecial charge to his Scouts, that when they perceived the Athenians diſimbarking, as their cuſtom was, and walking towards Seſtos, they ſhould forthwith return, and hang up a brazen ſhield in the Prow, as a token for him to weigh Anchor.

The Scouts performed their charge, and Lyſander being in a readineſs, made all ſpeed that ſtrength of Oars could give, to Ægos-Potamos, where he found very few of his enemies aboard their ſhips, nor many near them, and all in great confuſion upon the news of his approach.

Inſomuch that the greateſt induſtry which the Athenians then ſhewed, was in the eſcape of eight or nine ſhips, which knowing how much that loſs imported, gave over Athens as deſperate, and made a long flight into the Iſle of Cyprus; all the reſt were taken, and ſuch of the Soldiers as came into the reſcue, cut in pieces. Thus was the War which had laſted ſeven and twenty years, with variable ſucceſs, concluded in one hour, and the glory of Athens in ſuch wiſe eclipſed, that ſhe never afterward ſhone in her perfect light.

Immediately upon this Victory Lyſander having taken ſuch Towns as readily did yield upon the firſt fame of his exploit, ſet ſail for Athens, and joining his forces with thoſe of Agis and Pauſanias Kings of Sparta, ſummoned the City; which finding too ſtubborn to yield, and too ſtrong to be won on the ſudden, he put forth again to Sea, and rather by terror than violence, compelled all the Iſlands, and ſuch Towns of the Ionians as had formerly held of the Athenians, to ſubmit themſelves to Sparta; he did thereby cut off all proviſion of victuals, and other neceſſaries from the City, and inforced the people by meer Famine to yield to theſe conditions: That the long Walls leading from the Town to the Port, ſhould be thrown down; That all Cities ſubject to their Eſtate, ſhould be ſet at liberty: That the Athenians ſhould be Maſters only of their own Territories, and the fields adjoining to their Town; And that they ſhould keep no more than twelve ſhips; That they ſhould hold as Friends or Enemies, the ſame whom the Lacedæmonians did, and follow the Lacedæmonians as Leaders in the Wars.

Theſe Articles being agreed upon, the Walls were thrown down with great rejoycing of thoſe who had born diſpleaſure to Athens; and not without ſome conſultation of deſtroying the City, and laying waſte the land about it. Which advice, although it was not entertained, yet were thirty Governours, or rather cruel Tyrants, appointed over the people, who recompenced their former inſolency and injuſtice over their Captains, by oppreſſing them with all baſe and intolerable ſlavery.

The only ſmall hope then remaining to the Athenians was, that Alcibiades might perhaps repair what their ovvn folly had ruined. But the Thirty Tyrants perceiving this, advertiſed the Lacedæmonians thereof, vvho contrived, and (as novv domineering in every quarter) ſoon effected his ſudden death.

Such end had the Peloponneſian War. After vvhich the Lacedæmonians abuſing the reputation and great povver vvhich therein they had obtained, grevv very odious to Greece, and by combination of many Cities againſt them, vvere diſpoſſeſſed of their high authority, even in that very age in which they had ſubdued Athens. The greateſt foil that they took, was of the Thebans led by Epaminondas, under whom Philip of Macedon Father to Alexander the Great, had the beſt of his Education. By theſe Thebans the City of Sparta (beſides other great loſſes received) was ſundry times in danger of being taken. But theſe haughty attempts of the Thebans came finally to nothing; for the ſeveral Eſtates and Signiories of Greece, were grown ſo jealous one of anothers greatneſs, that the Lacedæmonians, Athenians, Argives, and Thebans, Thebans, which were the mightiest, associating themselves with the weaker party, did so counterpoize the stronger, that no one City could extend the limits of her jurisdiction so far as might make her terrible to her neighbours. And thus all parts of the Country remained rather evenly ballanced, than well agreeing, till such time as Philip, and after him Alexander, Kings of Macedon, (whose forefathers had been dependants and followers, yea almost meer Vassals to the Estates of Athens and Sparta) found means by making use of their factions, to bring them all into servitude, from which they never could be free, till the Romans presenting them with a shew of liberty, did themselves indeed become their Masters.

Of matters concurring with the Peloponnesian War, or shortly following it.

SECT. I.

How the affairs of Persia stood in those times.

During the times of this Peloponnesian War, and those other less Expeditions foregoing it, Artaxerxes Longimanus having peaceably enjoyed a long reign over the Persians, left it by his death either to Darius, who was called Darius Nothus, or the Bastard, whom the Greek Historians (lightly passing over Xerxes the second, and Sogdianus, as Usurpers, and for their short reign little to be regarded) place next unto them, or to Xerxes the second; who and his Brother Sogdianus after him (seeming to have been the Sons of Hester) held the Kingdom but one year between them, the younger succeeding his elder Brother. It is not my purpose (as I have said before) to pursue the History of the Persians from henceforth, by rehearsal of all the particulars, otherwise than as they shall be incident to the affairs of Greece. It may therefore suffice to say, That Xerxes the second being a vicious Prince, did perish after a month or two, if not by surfeit, then by the treachery of his riotous Brother Sogdianus. Likewise of Sogdianus it is found, that being as ill as his Brother, and more cruel, he slew unjustly Bagoraxus a principal Eunuch, and would have done as much to his Brother Darius the Bastard, had not he foreseen it, and by raising a stronger Army than this hated King Sogdianus could levy, seized at once upon the King and Kingdom. Darius having slain his Brother, held the Empire nineteen years. Amyrtæus of Sais an Egyptian, rebelled against him, and having partly slain, partly chased out of the Land the Persian Garisons, allied himself so firmly with the Greeks, that by their aid he maintained the Kingdom, and delivered it over to his posterity, who (notwithstanding the fury of their Civil Wars) maintained it against the Persian all the days of this Darius, and of his Son Artaxerxes Mnemon. Likewise Amorges a subject of his own, and of the Royal blood, being Lieutenant of Caria, rebelled against him; confederating himself with the Athenians. But the great calamity before spoken of, which fell upon the Athenians in Sicil, having put new life into the Spartans, and given courage to the Islanders and others, subject to the State of Athens, to shake off the yoke of their long continued bondage; It fell out well for Darius that the Lacedæmonians being destitute of money, wherewith to defray the charge of a great Navy, without which it was impossible to advance the War against the State of Athens, that remained powerful by Sea, were driven to crave his assistance, which he granted unto them, first upon what conditions best pleased himself, though afterwards the Articles of the league between him and them, were set down in more precise terms; wherein it was concluded, That he and they should make War jointly upon the Athenians, and upon all that should rebel from either of them, and (which was highly to the Kings honour and profit) that all the Cities of Asia which had formerly been his, or his Predecessors, should return to his obedience. By this Treaty, and the War ensuing (of which I have already spoken) he recovered all that his Grandfather and Father had lost in Asia. Likewise by assistance of the Lacedæmonians he got Amorges alive into his hands, who was taken in the City of Jasus; the Athenians wanting either force or courage to succour him. Nevertheless Egypt still held out against him; the cause whereof cannot be the employment of the Persian forces on the parts of Greece: for he abounded in men, of whom he had enough for all occasions, but they wanted manhood, which caused him to fight with Gold; which effected for him by Soldiers of other Nations, and his natural enemies, what the valour of his own Subjects was insufficient to perform. Darius had in marriage Paryfatis his own Sister, who bare unto him (besides other Children) Artaxerxes called Mnemon, that is to say, the Mindful, or the Rememberer, who succeeded him in the Kingdom; and Cyrus the younger, a Prince of singular virtue, and accounted by all that knew him, the most excellent man that ever Persia bred after Cyrus the great. But the old King Darius, intending to leave unto his eldest Son Artaxerxes the inheritance of the great Empire, did cast a jealous eye upon the doings of young Cyrus, who being Lieutenant of the lower Asia, took more upon him than befitted a Subject: for which cause his Father sent for him, with intent to have taken some very sharp course with him, had not his own death prevented the coming of his younger Son, and placed the elder in his Throne. Of the War between these Brethren, and summarily of Artaxerxes, we shall have occasion to speak somewhat in more convenient place.

SECT.

SECT. II.

How the Thirty Tyrants got their Dominion in Athens.

I Hold it in this place very convenient to ſhew the proceedings of the Greeks, after the ſubverſion of the Walls of Athens, which gave end to that War called the Peloponneſian War, but could not free the unhappy Country of Greece from civil broils. The thirty Governours, commonly called the thirty Tyrants of Athens, were choſen at the firſt by the people to compile a body of their Law, and make a collection of ſuch ancient Statutes as were meet to be put in practice: the condition of the City ſtanding as it did in that ſo ſudden alteration. To this charge was annexed the Supream Authority, either as a recompence of their labours, or becauſe the neceſſity of the times did ſo require it, wherein the Law being uncertain, it was fit that ſuch men ſhould give judgment in particular cauſes, to whoſe judgment the Laws themſelves, by which the City was to be ordered, were become ſubject. But theſe Thirty having ſo great power in their hands, were more careful to hold it, than to deſerve it by faithful execution of that which was committed to them in truſt.

Therefore apprehending ſuch troubleſome fellows as were odious to the City, though not puniſhable therefore by Law; they condemned them to death; which proceeding was by all men highly approved, who conſidered their leud conditions, but did not withal bethink themſelves how eaſie a thing it would be unto theſe thirty men to take away the lives of Innocents, by calling them perturbers of the peace, or what elſe they liſted, when condemnation without true trial and proof had been once well allowed. Having thus plauſibly entred into a wicked courſe of Government, they thought it beſt to fortifie themſelves with a ſure guard, ere they brake out into thoſe diſorders, which they muſt needs commit for the eſtabliſhing of their authority. Wherefore diſpatching two of their own company to Sparta, they informed the Lacedæmonians, that it was the full intent of the Thirty to keep the City free from all rebellious motions: to which purpoſe it behoved them to cut off ſuch as were ſeditious; and therefore deſired the Lacedæmonians to ſend them a Gariſon, which they promiſed at their own coſt to maintain. This motion was well approved, and a Guard ſent, the Captain of which was ſo well entertain'd by the Thirty, that none of their miſdeeds could want his high commendations at Sparta. Hereupon the Tyrants began to take heart, and looking no more after baſe and deteſted perſons, invaded the principal men of the City, ſending armed men from houſe to houſe, who drew out ſuch as were of great reputation, and likely or able to make any head againſt this wicked form of Government: whereby there was ſuch effuſion of blood, as to Theramenes (one of the Thirty) ſeemed very horrible, and unable to eſcape vengeance. His diſlike of their proceedings being openly diſcovered, cauſed his fellows to bethink themſelves, and provide for their own ſecurity, and his deſtruction, leſt he ſhould make himſelf a Captain of the diſcontented (which were almoſt the whole City) and redeem his own peace with their ruin. Wherefore they ſelected three thouſand of the Citizens, whom they thought meeteſt, and gave unto them ſome part of the publick Authority, the reſt they diſarmed; and having thus increaſed their own ſtrength, and weakned their oppoſites, they began afreſh to ſhed the blood, not only of their private enemies, but of ſuch whoſe money, or goods, might inrich them, and enable them for the payment of their Guard. And to this purpoſe they concluded, that every one of them ſhould name one man, upon whoſe goods he ſhould ſeize, putting the owner to death. But when Theramenes uttered his deteſtation of ſo wicked intent, then did Critias, who of all the Thirty was moſt tyrannical, accuſe him to the Council, as a treacherous man, and (whereas one main privileg of the three thouſand was, that none of them ſhould ſuffer death at the appointment of the Thirty, but have the accuſtomed trial) he took upon him to ſtrike out of that number the name of Theramenes, and ſo reduced him under the trial and ſentence of that order. It was well alledged by Theramenes that his name was not more eaſie to be blotted out of the Catalogue, than any other mans; upon which conſideration, he adviſed them all to conceive no otherwiſe of his caſe than as of their own, who were liable to the ſame form of proceeding: but every man chuſing rather to preſerve his own life by ſilence, than preſently to draw upon himſelf the danger, which as yet concerned him little, and perhaps would never come near him; the Tyrants interpreting ſilence as conſent, condemned him forthwith, and compelled him to drink poyſon.

SECT. III.

The Conſpiracy againſt the thirty Tyrants, and their depoſing.

After the death of Theramenes, the Thirty began to uſe ſuch out-rage as excelled their former villanies. For having three thouſand (as they thought) firm unto them, they robbed all others without fear or ſhame, deſpoiling them of lands and goods, and cauſed them to fly into baniſhment, for ſafeguard of their lives. This flight of the Citizens procured their liberty, and the general good of the City. For the baniſhed Citizens who were fled to Thebes, entred into conſultation, and reſolved to hazard their lives in ſetting free the City of Athens. The very thought of ſuch a practice had been treaſon at home, which had no other danger abroad, than might be found in the execution. Seventy men or thereabout, were the firſt undertakers, who with their Captain Thraſybulus took Phyla, a place of ſtrength in the Territory of Athens. No ſooner did the Thirty hear of their exploit, than ſeek means to prevent further danger; aſſembling the three thouſand, and their Lacedæmonian Guard, with which force they attempted Phyla, but were with ſome loſs of their men repelled. Finding the place too ſtrong to be taken by aſſault, they intended to beſiege it; which purpoſe came to nought by means of ſnow that fell, and other ſtormy weather, againſt which they had not made proviſion. Retiring therefore to the City, which above all they were to make good, they left the moſt of their Guard, and two companies of Horſe, to weary out them which lay in Phyla, with a flying ſiege. But it was not long ere the followers of Thraſybulus were encreaſed from ſeventy to ſeven hundred, which adventured to give charge upon thoſe Guards, of whom they cut off above an hundred and twenty. These small but prosperous beginnings, added more to the number of those in Phyla, who now with a thousand men got entrance into Piræus, the suburb of Athens, lying on the Port. Before their coming, the Thirty had resolved to fortifie the Town of Eleusine to their own use, whereinto they might make an easie retrait, and save themselves from any sudden peril. It may well seem strange, that whereas their barbarous manner of Government had brought them into such danger, they were so far from seeking to obtain mens good will, that contrariwise to assure themselves of Eleusine, they got all of the place who could bear arms into their hands by a train, and wickedly (though under form of Justice) murthered them all. But Sceleribus tutum per scelera est iter, the mischiefs which they had already done were such, as left them no hope of going backward, nor any other apparent likelihood of safety, than by extending their cruelty unto all, seeing few or none were left, whom they could trust. When Thrasybulus and his fellows, who as yet were termed conspirators, had taken the Piræus, then were the three thousand armed again by the Tyrants, and brought to assault it; but in this enterprize Thrasybulus had the better, and repelled his enemies, of whom though there were slain to the number of seventy only, yet the Victory seemed the greater, because Critias, and one other of the Thirty, perished in that fight. The death of Critias, and the stout defence of Piræus, together with some exhortations used by Thrasybulus to the Citizens, wrought such effect, that the Thirty were deposed. Nevertheless there were so many of the three thousand, who having communicated with the Thirty in their misdeeds, feared to be called to a sharp account, that no peace, nor quiet form of Government could be established. For Embassadors were sent to Sparta, who craving aid against Thrasybulus and his follower, had favourable audience, and a power sent to their assistance, both by land and sea, under the conduct of Lysander, and his Brother; whom Pausanias the Spartan King did follow, raising an Army of the Cities confederate with the Lacedæmonians. And here appeared first the jealousie, wherein some people held the State of Sparta. The Bœotians and Corinthians, who in the late Wars had been the most bitter enemies to Athens, refused to follow Pausanias in this expedition; alledging that it stood not with their oaths, to make War against that people, who had not hitherto broken any one article of the League: but fearing indeed lest the Lacedæmonians should annex the Territory of Athens to their own Demains. It is not to be doubted, that Pausanias took this answer in good part. For it was not his purpose to destroy those against whom he went, but only to cross the proceedings of Lysander, whom he envied. Therefore having in some small skirmishes against them of Thrasybulus his party, made a shew of War, he finally wrought such means that all things were compounded quietly: the thirty men, and such others as were like to give cause of tumults, being sent to Sparta. The remainder of that Tyrannical faction, having withdrawn themselves to Eleusine, were shortly after found to attempt some innovation; whereupon the whole City rising against them, took their Captains, as they were coming to Parley, and slew them: which done, to avoid further inconvenience, a law was made, that all injuries past should be forgotten, and no man called into question for wrongs committed. By which order, wisely made, and carefully observed, the City returned to her former quietness.

CHAP. X.

Of the Expedition of Cyrus the younger.

The grounds of Cyrus his attempt against his brother.

THE matters of Greece standing upon such terms, that no one Estate durst oppose it self against that of Lacedæmon; young Cyrus, Brother to Artaxerxes King of Persia, having in his Fathers life-time very carefully prosecuted the War against Athens, did send his messengers to Sparta, requesting that their love might appear no less to him, than that which he had shewed towards them in their dangerous War against the Athenians. To this request, being general, the Lacedæmonians gave a suitable answer; commanding the Admiral to perform unto Cyrus all service that he should require of him. If Cyrus had plainly discovered himself, and the Lacedæmonians bent their whole power to his assistance, very like it is, that either the Kingdom of Persia should have been the recompence of his deserts; or that, he perishing in battel, as after he did, the subversion of that Empire had forthwith ensued. But it pleased God rather to shew unto the Greeks the ways, which under the Macedonian Ensigns, the victorious foot-steps of their posterity should measure; and opening unto them the riches, and withal the weakness of the Persian, to kindle in them both desire and hope of that Conquest, which he reserved to another generation; than to give into their hands that mighty Kingdom, whose hour was not yet come. The love which Paryſatis the Queen-mother of Persia bare unto Cyrus her younger son, being seconded by the earnest favour of the people, and ready desires of many principal men, had moved this young Prince in his Fathers old age, to aspire after the Succession. But being sent for by his Father (as hath before been shewed) whose meaning was to curb this ambitious Youth; he found his elder brother Artaxerxes established so surely by the old Kings favour, that it were not safe to attempt any means of displanting him, by whose whose disfavour himself might easily lose the place of a Viceroy, which he held in Asia the less, and hardly be able to maintain his own life. The nearest neighbour to Cyrus of all the Kings Deputies in the lower Asia, was Tissaphernes, a man compounded of cowardise, treachery, craft, and all vices which accustomably branch out of these. This man accompanied Cyrus to his Father, using by the way all fair shews of friendship as to a Prince for whom it might well be thought that Queen Parysatis had obtained the inheritance of that mighty Empire. And it was very true, that Parysatis had used the best of her endeavour to that purpose, alledging that (which in former ages had been much available to Xerxes, in the like disceptation with his elder brother) Artaxerxes was born whilst his Father was a private man, but Cyrus, when he was crowned King. All which not sufficing; when the most that could be obtained for Cyrus was the pardon of some presumptuous demeanor, and confirmation of his place in Lydia, and the parts adjoining: then did this Tissaphernes discover his nature, and accuse his friend Cyrus to the new King Artaxerxes, of a dangerous Treason intended against his person. Upon this accusation, whether true or false, very easily believed, Cyrus was arrested, and by the most vehement intreaty of his Mother very hardly delivered, and sent back into his own Province.

SECT. II.

The preparation of Cyrus, and his first entry into the War.

THE form of Government which the Persian Lieutenants used in their several Provinces, was in many points almost Regal. For they made war and peace, as they thought it meet, not only for the Kings behoof, but for their own reputation; usually indeed with the Kings enemies, yet sometimes one with another: which was the more easily tolerated, because their own heads were held only at the Kings pleasure, which caused them to frame all their doings to his will, whatsoever it were, or they could conjecture it to be. Cyrus therefore being setled in Lydia, began to consider with himself the interest that he had in the Kingdom; the small assurance of his Brothers love, held only by his Mothers intercession; the disgrace endured by his late imprisonment; and the means which he had by love of his own people, and that good neighbourhood of the Lacedæmonians, whom he had bound unto him, to obtain the Crown for himself. Neither was it expedient that he should long sit idle, as waiting till occasion should present it self: but rather enterprise somewhat whilst yet his Mother lived, who could procure a good interpretation to all his actions, if they were no worse than only questionable. Hereupon he first began to quarrel with Tissaphernes, and seized upon many Towns of his Jurisdiction, annexing them to his own Province, which displeased not Artaxerxes at all, who (besides that he was of condition somewhat simple) being truly paid by Cyrus the accustomable Tributes out of those places, was well contented to see his Brothers hot spirit exercised in private quarrels. But Tissaphernes whose base conditions were hated, and cowardise despised, although he durst not adventure to take arms against Cyrus, yet perceiving that the Milesians were about to give up themselves into the hands of that young Prince, as many other Towns of the Ionians had done, thought by terror to preserve his reputation, and keep the Town in his own hands. Wherefore he slew many, and many he banished, who flying to Cyrus, were gently entertained, as bringing fair occasion to take arms, which was no small part of his desire. In levying Soldiers he used great policy; for he took not only the men of his own Province, or of the Countrys adjoining, whose lives were ready at his will; but secretly he furnished some Grecian Captains with money, who being very good men of War, entertained Soldiers therewith, some of them warring in Thrace, others in Thessaly, others elsewhere in Greece; but all of them ready to cross the Seas, at the first call of Cyrus, till which time they had secret instructions to prolong their several Wars, that the Soldiers might be held in continual exercise, and ready in arms upon the sudden. Cyrus having sent a power of men to besiege Miletus, forthwith summoned these bands of the Greeks, who very readily came over to his assistance, being thirteen thousand very firm Soldiers, and able to make head (which is almost incredible) against the whole power of Artaxerxes. With this Army, and that which he had levied before, he could very easily have forced Miletus, and chased away Tissaphernes out of Asia the less: but his purpose was not so to lose time in small matters, that was to be imployed in the accomplishment of higher designs. Pretending therefore that the Pisidians, a people of Asia the less, not subject to the Persian, had invaded his Territory; he raised the siege of Miletus, and with all speed marched Eastward, leaving Tissaphernes much amazed, who had no leisure to rejoice that Cyrus had left him to himself, when he considered that so great an Army, and so strong, was never levied against the Rovers of Pisidia, but rather against the great King his Master. For which cause taking a band of five hundred horse, he posted away to carry tidings to the Court of this great preparation.

SECT. III.

How Cyrus took his journey into the higher Asia, and came up to his brother.

THE Tumult which his coming brought, was very great, and great the exclamations of the Queen Statira against Parysatis, the Queen-Mother, whom she called the Author and occasioner of the War. But whilst the King in great fear was arming the high Countrys in his defence, the danger hasted upon him very fast. For Cyrus made great marches, having his number much increased by the repair of his Countrymen, though most strengthened by the access of seven hundred Greeks, and of other four hundred of the same Nation, who revolted unto him from the King. How terrible the Greeks were to the Barbarians, he found by trial in a Muster, which (to please the Queen of Cicilia, who had brought him aid) he made in Phrygia; where the Greeks by his direction making offer of a charge upon the rest of his Army, which contained a hundred thousand men, the whole Camp (not perceiving that this was but a bravery) fled amain, the victuallers and baggagers forsaking their Cabins, and running all away for very fear. This was to Cyrus a joyful spectacle, who knew very well that his Brother was followed by men of the same ſame temper, and the more unlikely to make reſiſtance; becauſe they were preſt to the War againſt their will and diſpoſitions, whereas his Army was drawn along by meer affection and good will. Nevertheleſs he found it a very hard matter to perſwade the Greeks to paſs the River of Euphrates. For the very length of the way which they had trodden, wearied them with the conceit of the tedious return. Therefore he was driven, being yet in Cicilia, to ſeek excuſes, telling them, that Abrocomas, one of the Kings principal Captains, and his own great enemy, lay by the River, againſt whom he requeſted them to aſſiſt him. By ſuch devices, and exceſſive promiſe of reward, he brought them to Euphrates; where ſome of the Greeks conſidering, That whoſo paſſed the River firſt, ſhould have the moſt thanks, and might ſafely return if the reſt ſhould refuſe to follow them; they entred the Foords, whereby all were finally perſwaded to do as ſome had begun: and being allured by great hopes, they reſolved to ſeek out Artaxerxes whereſoever he was to be found. The King in the mean time having raiſed an Army of nine hundred thouſand men, was not ſo confident upon this huge multitude, as to adventure them in trial of a plain battel. Abrocomas, who with three hundred thouſand men, had undertaken to make good the Streights of Syria, which were very narrow, and fortified with a ſtrong wall, and other defences of nature and art, which made the place to ſeem impregnable, had quitted the paſſage, and retired himſelf toward the Kings forces, not daring to look Cyrus in the face; who deſpairing to find any way by land, had procured the Lacedæmonian Fleet, by the benefit whereof to have tranſported his Army. I do not find that this cowardiſe of Abrocomas, or his Soldiers, who arrived not at the Camp till five days were paſt after the battel, received either puniſhment, or diſgrace; for they toward whom he withdrew himſelf, were all made of the ſame metal.

Therefore Artaxerxes was upon the point of retiring to the uttermoſt bounds of his Kingdom, until by Teribazus, one of his Captains, he was perſwaded not to abandon ſo many goodly Provinces to the enemy, who would thereby have gathered addition of ſtrength, and (which in the ſharp diſputtaion of Title to a Kingdom is moſt available) would have grown ſuperiour in reputation. By ſuch advice, the King reſolved upon meeting with his Brother, who now began to be ſecure, being fully perſwaded that Artaxerxes would never dare to abide him in the field. For the King having caſt up a Trench of almoſt forty miles in length, about thirty foot broad, and eighteen foot deep, intended there to have encamped: but his courage failing him, he abandoned that place, thinking nothing ſo ſafe as to be far diſtant from his enemies.

SECT. VI.

The Battel between Cyrus and Artaxerxes.

THe Army of Cyrus having overcome many difficulties of evil ways, and ſcarcity of victuals, was much incouraged by perceiving this great fear of Artaxerxes; and being paſt this Trench, marched careleſly in great diſorder, having beſtowed their Arms in Carts, and upon Beaſts of carriage; when on the ſudden one of their Van-currors brought news of the Kings approach. Hereupon with great tumult they armed themſelves, and had ranged their Battels in good order upon the ſide of the River Euphrates, where they waited for the coming of their enemies, whom they ſaw not till it was afternoon. But when they ſaw the cloud of duſt raiſed by the feet of that huge multitude, which the King drew after him, and perceived by their near approach how well they were marſhalled, coming on very orderly in ſilence; whereas it had been expected, that ruſhing violently with loud clamors, they ſhould have ſpent all their force upon the firſt brunt; and when it appeared that the fronts of the two Armies were ſo unequal in diſtent, being all embattelled in one body and ſquare, that Cyrus taking his place (as was the Perſian manner) in the midſt of his own, did not with the corner, and utmoſt point thereof, reach to the half breadth of Artaxerxes his battel, who carried a front proportionable to his number, exceeding nine times that of Cyrus: then did the Greeks begin to diſtruſt their own manhood, which was not accuſtomed to make proof of it ſelf upon ſuch exceſſive odds. It was almoſt incredible, that ſo great an Army ſhould be ſo eaſily chaſed. Nevertheleſs it quickly appeared, that theſe Perſians having learned (contrary to their cuſtom) to give charge upon their enemies with ſilence, had not learned (for it was contrary to their nature) to receive a ſtrong charge with courage. Upon the very firſt offer of an on-ſet, made by the Greeks, all that beaſtly rabble of cowards fled amain, without abiding the ſtroke, or ſtaying till they were within reach of a dart. The Chariots armed with hooks and ſithes (whereof Artaxerxes had two hundred, and Cyrus not twenty) did ſmall hurt that day, becauſe the drivers of them leaping down, fled away on foot. This baſe demeanour of his enemies gave ſo much confidenee to Cyrus and his Followers, that ſuch as were about him forthwith adored him as King. And certainly, the Title had been aſſured unto him that day, had not he ſought how to declare himſelf worthy of it, ere yet he had obtained it. For perceiving that Artaxerxes, who found that part of the field which lay before him void, was about to encompaſs the Greeks, and to ſet upon them in the rear, he advanced with ſix hundred Horſe, and gave ſo valiant a charge upon a ſquadron of ſix thouſand, which lay before the King, that he brake it, ſlaying the Captain thereof Artagerſes with his own hands, and putting all the reſt to flight. Hereupon his whole company of ſix hundred, very few excepted, began to follow the chaſe, leaving Cyrus too ill attended; who perceiving where the King ſtood in troop, uncertain whether to fight, or leave the field, could not contain himſelf, but ſaid, I ſee the man: and preſently with a ſmall handful of men about him, ran upon his Brother, whom he ſtroke through the Curace, and wounded in the breaſt. Having given this ſtroke, which was his laſt, he received immediately the fatal blow, which gave period at once to his ambition and life, being wounded under the eye with a Dart, thrown by a baſe fellow; wherewith aſtoniſhed, he fell dead from his horſe, or ſo hurt, that it was unpoſſible to have recovered him, though all which were with him, did their beſt for his ſafety; not caring afterwards for their own lives, when once they perceived that Cyrus their Maſter was ſlain. Artaxerxes cauſed the head and right hand of his Brother to be forthwith ſtricken off, and ſhewed to his people, who now purſuing them, fled apace, calling upon the name of Cyrus, and deſiring him to pardon them. But when this great accident had breathed new courage into the Kings troops, and utterly diſmaid ſuch Perſian

Captains as were now even in their own eyes no better than rebels; it was not long ere the Camp of Cyrus was taken, being quite abandoned; from whence Artaxerxes making all speed, arrived quickly at the quarter of the Greeks, which was about three miles from the place where Cyrus fell. There he met with Tissaphernes, who having made way through the Battel of the Greeks, was ready now to join with his Master in spoiling their Tents. Had not the news which Artaxerxes brought with him of his Brothers death been sufficient to countervail all disasters received, the exploit of Tissaphernes in breaking through the Greeks, would have yielded little comfort. For Tissaphernes had not slain any one man of the Greeks; but contrariwise, when he came upon them, they opening their Battel, drave him with great slaughter through them, in such wise, that he rather escaped as out of an hard passage, than forced his way through the squadron of the Greeks. Hereof the King being informed by him, and that the Greeks, as Masters of the field, gave chase to all that came in their sight; they ranged their Companies into good order, and followed after these Greeks, intending to set upon them in the rear. But these good Soldiers perceiving the Kings approach, turned their faces, and made head against him; who not intending to seek honour with danger of his life, wheeled about and fled, being pursued unto a certain Village that lay under a hill, on the top whereof he made a stand, rather in a bravery, than with purpose to attempt upon these bold fellows any further. For he knew well, that his brothers death had secured his estate, whom he would seem to have slain with his own hand, thinking that fact alone sufficient to give reputation to his valour; and this reputation he thought that he might now preserve well enough, shewing a manly look half a mile off. On the top of this Hill therefore he advanced his Standard, a golden Eagle displaid on the top of a Spear. This Ensign might have encouraged his people, had not some of the Greeks espied it, who not meaning that he should abide so near them, with all their power marched toward him. The King discovering their approach, fled upon the spur; so that none remained in the place of battel, save only the Greeks, who had lost that day not one man, nor taken any other harm, than that one of them was hurt with an arrow. Much they wondred that they heard no news of Cyrus; but thinking that he was pursuing the Army, they thought it was fittest for them, having that day done enough, to return to their Quarter, and take their Supper, to which they had good appetite, because the expectation of the Kings coming had given them no leisure to dine.

SECT. V.

The hard estate of the Greeks after the fight; and how Artaxerxes in vain sought to have made them yield unto him.

IT was now about the setting of the Sun, and they bringing home dark night with them, found their Camp spoiled, little or nothing being left that might serve for food: so that wanting victuals to satisfie their hunger, they refreshed their weary bodies with sleep. In the mean season Artaxerxes returning to his Camp, which he entred by Torch-light, could not enjoy the pleasure of his good fortune entire, because he perceived that the baseness of his people, and weakness of his Empire, was now plainly discovered to the Greeks: which gave him assurance, that if any of these who had beheld the shameful demeanor of his Army, should live to carry tidings home, it would not be long ere with greater forces they disputed with him for his whole Signory. Wherefore he resolved to try all means whereby he might bring them to destruction, and not let one escape to carry tidings of that which he had seen: to which purpose he sent them a brave message the next morning; charging them to deliver up their Arms, and come to his Gates, to await there upon his Mercy. It seems that he was in good hope to have found their high courages broken, upon report of his Brothers death: but he was greatly deceived in that thought. For the Greeks being advertised that morning from Arieus, a principal Commander under Cyrus, that his Master being slain, he had retired himself to the place of their last encamping, about eight miles from thence, whence intending to return into Ionia, his meaning was to dislodg the next day, awaiting for them so long if they would join with him, but resolving to stay no longer: they sent answer back to Arieus, that having beaten the King out of the field, and finding none that durst resist them, they would place Arieus himself in the Kings Throne, if he would join with them, and pursue the Victory. Before they received any reply to this answer, the Messengers of Artaxerxes arrived at the Camp, whose errand seemed to the Captains very insolent: One told them, that it was not for the Vanquishers to yield their Weapons; another, that he would die ere he yielded to such a motion: a third asked, Whether the King, as having the Victory, required their Weapons; if so, why did he not fetch them? or, whether he desired them in a way of friendship; for then would they first know, with what courtesie he meant to requite their kindness. To this question Phalinus a Grecian, waiting upon Tissaphernes, answered, That the King having slain Cyrus, knew no man that could pretend any Title to his Kingdom, in the midst whereof he held them fast enclosed with great Rivers, being able to bring against them such numbers of men, as they wanted strength to kill if they would hold up their throats; for which cause he accounted them his prisoners. These words to them who knew themselves to be free, were nothing pleasant. Therefore one told Phalinus, That having nothing left but their Arms and Valour, whilest they kept their Arms, their Valour would be serviceable; but should they yield them, it was to be doubted, that their bodies would not long remain their own. Hereat Phalinus laughed, saying, This young man did seem a Philosopher, and made a pretty speech, but that his deep speculation shewed his wits to be very shallow, if he thought with his Arms and Valour to prevail against the great King. It seems that Phalinus being a Courtier, and imployed in a business of importance, thought himself too profound a Statesman, to be checkt in his Embassage by a bookish discourser. But his wisdom herein failed him. For whatsoever he himself was (of whom no more is known, than that he brought an unhonest message to his own Countrymen, perswading them basely to surrender their Weapons and Lives to the merciless Barbarians) this young Scholar by him despised, was that great Xenophon who when all the principal Commanders were surprized by treachery of the Persians, being a private Gentleman, and having never seen the Wars before, undertook the conduct of the Army, which he brought safe into Greece, freeing it from all those, and from greater dangers dangers than Phalinus could propound. Some there were who promiſed to be faithful to the King, as they had been to Cyrus, offering their ſervice in Egypt, where they thought Artaxerxes might have uſe of them. But the final anſwer was, That without Weapons they could neither do the King good as Friends, nor defend themſelves from him as Enemies. Hereupon Phalinus delivered the Kings further pleaſure, which was to grant them Truce, whilſt they abode where they then were, denouncing War if they ſtirred thence; Whereunto he required their anſwer. Clearchus the General told him, They liked it. How (ſaith Phalinus) muſt I underſtand you? As chooſing peace if we ſtay, or otherwiſe War, ſaith Clearchus. But whether War or peace, quoth this politick Embaſſador? To whom Clearchus (not willing to acquaint him with their purpoſe), Let our doings tell you; and ſo diſmiſſed him no wiſer than he came. All that day the Greeks were fain to feed upon their Horſes, Aſſes, and other Beaſts, which they roſted with Arrows, Darts, and wooden Targets, thrown avvay by the Enemies.

SECT. VI.

How the Greeks began to return homewards.

AT night they took their vvay tovvards Arieus, to vvhom they came at midnight; being forſaken by four hundred foot, and forty horſe, all Thracians, who fled over to the King; by whom, how they were entertained, I do not find. Like enough it is that they were cut in pieces, for had they been kindly uſed, it may well be thought that ſome of them ſhould have accompanied Tiſſaphernes, and ſerved as Stales to draw in the reſt. Arieus being of too baſe a temper and birth, to think upon ſeeking the Kingdom for himſelf, with ſuch aſſiſtance as might have given it unto Cyrus, was very well pleaſed to make Covenant with them for mutual aſſiſtance unto the laſt: Whereunto both parts having ſworn, he adviſed them to take another way homeward, which ſhould be ſomewhat longer, yet ſafer and fitter to relieve them with victuals, than that by which they came. The next day, having made a weariſome march, and tired the Soldiers, they found the Kings Army which had coaſted them, lodged in certain Villages, where they purpoſed themſelves to have encamped: towards which Clearchus made directly, becauſe he would not ſeem by declining them, to ſhew fear, or weakneſs. That the Kings men were contented to remove, and give place to their betters, it cannot be ſtrange to any that hath conſidered their former behaviour; Nor ſtrange, that the Grecians, being weary and hungry, and lying among enemies in an unknown Country, ſhould be very fearful: but it is almoſt paſt belief, that the noiſe which was heard of theſe poor men, calling one to another tumultuouſly, as the preſent condition inforced them to do, ſhould make the Perſians fly out of their Camp, and ſo affright the great King, that inſtead of demanding their Arms, he ſhould crave peace of them. The next day very early came meſſengers from Artaxerxes, deſiring free acceſs for Embaſſadors, to entreat of peace. Were it not that ſuch particulars do beſt open the quality of the perſons, by whom things were managed, I ſhould hold it fitter, to run over the general paſſages of thoſe times, than to dwell among circumſtances. But ſurely it is a point very remarkable, That when Clearchus had willed the Meſſengers to bid the King prepare for Battel, becauſe the Greeks (as he ſaid) wanting whereupon to dine, could not endure to hear of Truce till their bellies were full; Artaxerxes diſſembling the indignity, was contented ſweetly to ſwallow down this pill, ſending them guides, who conducted them to a place where was plenty of victuals to relieve them.

SECT. VII.

How Tiſſaphernes under colour of peace, betrayed all the Captains of the Greeks.

HItherto the Greeks, relying upon their own virtue, had rather advanced their affairs, than brought themſelves into any ſtreights or terms of diſadvantage. But now came unto them the ſubtil Fox Tiſſaphernes, who circumventing the Chief Commanders by fine ſleights, did miſchievouſly entrap them, to the extream danger of the Army. He told them that his Province, lying near unto Greece, had cauſed him greatly to deſire, that their deliverance might be wrought by his procurement; knowing well that in time to come, both they, and their Countrymen at home, would not be unthankful for ſuch a benefit. Herewithal he forgot not to rehearſe the great ſervice that he had done to his Maſter, being the firſt that advertiſed him of Cyrus his intent, and having not only brought him a good ſtrength of men, but in the day of battel ſhewed his face to the Greeks, when all others turned their backs: that he, together with the King, did enter their Camp, and gave chaſe to the Barbarians that ſtood on the part of Cyrus. All this (quoth he) did I alledg to the King, entreating that he would give me leave to conduct you ſafe into Greece; in which ſute I have good hope to ſpeed, if you will ſend a mild anſwer to him, who hath willed me to ask you, For what cauſe ye have born Arms againſt me? The Captains hearing this, were contented to give gentle words, which Tiſſaphernes relating to the King, procured (though very hardly, as he ſaid) that peace ſhould be granted: the conditions whereof were; That they ſhould paſs freely through all the Kings Dominions, paying for that they took, and committing no ſpoil: yet that it ſhould be lawful for them to take victuals by force, in any place that refuſed to afford them an open Market Hereupon both parties having ſworn, the League was concluded; and Tiſſaphernes, returning to the King to take leave, and end all buſineſs, came unto them again after twenty days, and then they ſet forward. This interim of twenty days, which Tiſſaphernes did ſpend at the Court, miniſtred great occaſion of miſtruſt to his new Confederates. For beſides his long abſence, which alone ſufficed to breed doubt, the Brethren, the Kindred of Arieus, repairing daily to him, and other Perſians to his Soldiers, did vvork him and them ſo vvith aſſurance of pardon, and other allurements, that he daily grevv more ſtrange to the Greeks than formerly he had been. This cauſed many to adviſe Clearchus, rather to paſs forvvard as vvell as he might, than to relye upon Covenants, and ſit ſtill vvhilſt the King layed ſnares to entrap them. But he on the contrary perſvvaded them, to reſt contented vvhilſt they vvere vvell, and not to caſt themſelves again into thoſe difficulties, out of vvhich they vvere newly freed by the late Treaty; reciting with their own wants, and the Kings means, but especially the Oaths mutually given and taken, wherewith he saw no reason why the enemy should have clogged himself if he meant mischief, having power enough to do them harm by a fair and open War.

Tissaphernes was a very honourable man (if honour may be valued by greatness and place in Court) which caused his Oath to be the more esteemed; forasmuch as no inforcement, or base respect, was like to have drawn it from him. But his falshood was such, both in substance and in success, as may fitly expound that saying, which proceeded from the fountain of Truth, I hate a rich man a lyar. A lye may find excuse when it grows out of fear: for that passion hath his original from weakness. But when Power, which is a Character of the Almighty, shall be made the supporter of untruth, the falshood is most abominable; for the offender, like proud Lucifer, advancing his own strength against the Divine Justice, doth commit that sin with an high hand, which commonly produceth lamentable effects, and is followed with sure vengeance. It was not long ere Tissaphernes found means to destroy all the Captains, whom he subtilly got into his power by a train; making the General Clearchus himself the mean to draw in all the rest. The business was contrived thus: Having travelled some days together, in such wise that the Persians did not encamp with the Greeks, who were vey jealous of the great familiarity appearing between Tissaphernes and Arians; Clearchus thought it convenient to root out of Tissaphernes his brains all causes of distrust, whereof many had grown in that short time. To which purpose obtaining private conference with him, he rehearsed the Oath of Confederacy, which had past between them, shewing how religiously he would keep it; and repeating the benefits which the Greeks did receive by the help of Tissaphernes, he promised that their love should appear to him not unfruitful, if he would make use of their service against the Mysians, or Pisidians, who were accustomed to infest his Provinces; or against the Egyptians, who were then Rebels to the great King. For which cause he desired him, that whereas all divine and humane respects had linked them together, he would not give place to any close accusation or suspicion, whereby might grow sudden inconvenience to either of them, upon no just ground. The faithless Persian was very much delighted with this speech, which ministred fair occasion to the execution of his purpose. Therefore he told Clearchus, that all this was by him wisely considered, wishing him further to call to mind how many ways he could have used to bring them to confusion; without peril to himself; especially by burning the Country, through which they were to pass, whereby they must needs have perished by meer famine. For which cause he said, that it had been great folly, to seek by perjury, odious to God and Man, the destruction of such as were already in his hands. But the truth was, that his own love to them had moved him to work their safety, not only for those ends which Clearchus had recounted, of pleasures that might redound to himself, and the King, by their assistance; but for that he might by their friendship hope to obtain what Cyrus had mist. Finally, he invited the credulous Gentleman to Supper, and sent him away so well assured of his good will, that he promised to bring all the Captains with him to the same place, where in presence of them all, Tissaphernes likewise promised to tell openly which of them had by secret information sought to raise dissention between them. Clearchus himself being thus deceived, with great importunity drew all the chief Commanders, and many of the inferiour Leaders to repair with him to the Camp of Tissaphernes, whither followed them about two hundred of the common Soldiers, as it had been to some common Fair. But being there arrived, Clearchus with other the five principal Colonels, were called into the Tent, the rest staying without, where they had not waited long ere a sign was given, upon which they within were apprehended, and the residue slain. Forthwith certain bands of Persian Horsemen scoured the field, killing as many Greeks as they met, and riding up to the very Camp of the Gracians, who wondred much at the tumult, whereof they knew not the cause, till one escaping sorely wounded, informed them of all that had been done. Hereupon the Greeks took Arms in haste, thinking that the enemy would forthwith have assailed their Camp. Anon they might perceive the Embassadors of Tissaphernes, among whom were his own Brother, and Arieus followed with three hundred Horse, who called for the principal men in the Army, saying, That they brought a message from the King, which Arieus delivered to this effect: That Clearchus having broken his faith, and the League made, was justly rewarded with death; that Mnemon and Proxenus, two other of the five Colonels, for detecting his treachery, were highly honoured; and finally, that the King required them to surrender their arms which were due to him, as having belonged unto his servant Cyrus. When some altercation had followed upon this message, Xenophon told the Embassadors, That if Clearchus had in such sort offended, it was well that he was in such sort punished: but he willed them to send back Mnemon and Proxenus, whom they had so greatly honoured, that by them, as by common friends to both Nations, the Greeks might be advised how to answer the Persian. Hereunto the Embassadors knew not how to frame any reply, and therefore departed without speaking one word more. Clearchus and the other four were sent to Artaxerxes, by whose commandment their heads were stricken off. I hold it not amiss to prevent the order of time, annexing to this perfidiousness of Tissaphernes, the reward which he afterward received. He saw his Province wasted by the Greeks, against whom receiving from his Master convenient aid of men and money, he did so ill manage his affairs, that neither subtilty, nor perjury (to which he failed not to have recourse) availed him; finally, the King was jealous of his cunning head, and sent a new Lieutenant into those parts, who took it from his shoulders. Such was the recompence of his treachery, which made him so mistrusted at home, that the service which he could not do, he was thought upon private ends to neglect; and so hated abroad, that he knew not which way to fly from the stroke, all the world being shut against him. But now let us return to the prosperity wherein he triumphed with great cause, having betrayed braver men than himself, and intending to bring the like mischief upon the whole Army.

SECT.

SECT. VIII.

How Xenophon heartned the Greeks, and in deſpight of Tiſſaphernes went off ſafely.

GReat was the heavineſs of the Soldiers, being now left deſtitute of Leaders, and no leſs their fear of the evil hanging over their heads, which they knew not well how to avoid. Among the reſt, Xenophon, whoſe learning ſupplied his want of experience, finding the deep ſadneſs of the whole Army, to be ſuch as hindred them from taking any courſe of preventing the danger at hand, began to adviſe the under-officers of Proxenus his Companies, whoſe familiar friend he had been, to bethink themſelves of ſome mean, whereby their ſafety might be wrought, and the Soldiers encouraged: ſetting before their eyes whatſoever might ſerve for to give them hope, and above all, perſwading them in no wiſe to yield to the mercy of their barbarous enemies.

Hereupon they deſired him to take upon him the charge of that Regiment; and ſo together with him, the ſame night calling up ſuch as were remaining of any account, they made choice of the fitteſt men to ſucceed in the places of thoſe who were ſlain, or taken. This being done, and order ſet down for disburdening the Army of all ſuperfluous impediments, they eaſily comforted themſelves for the loſs of Tiſſaphernes his aſſiſtance, hoping to take victuals by force better cheap than he had been wont to ſell them; To which purpoſe they intended to take up their lodging two or three miles further, among ſome plentiful Villages, and ſo to proceed, marching towards the heads of thoſe great Rivers, which lay in their way, and to paſs them where they were foordable. Many attempts were made upon them by Tiſſaphernes, whom they, ſerving all on foot, were not able to requite for the harm which they received by the Perſian Archers, who ſhot at a farther diſtance than the Greeks could reach. For this cauſe did Xenophon provide ſlings, wherewith he overreached the enemy; and finding ſome Horſes fit for ſervice, that were employed among the carriages, he ſet men upon them; training likewiſe his Archers to ſhoot compaſs, who had been accuſtomed to the point-blank. By theſe means did he bear off the Perſians, who aſſailed him; and ſometimes gave them chaſe with that band of fifty Horſe, which being well backt with a firm body of footmen, and ſeconded with troops of the light-armed ſhot and ſlingers, compelled the enemy to lye aloof. Tiſſaphernes not daring to come to handy-gripes with theſe reſolute men, did poſſeſs the tops of mountains, and places of advantage, by which they were to paſs. But finally, when their valour made way through all ſuch difficulties, he betook himſelf to that courſe, which was indeed the ſureſt, of burning the Country. With great ſorrow did the Greeks behold the Villages on fire, and thereby all hope of victuals cut off. Some adviſed to defend the Country, as granted by the enemy himſelf to be theirs; others to make more fires, if ſo perhaps the Perſians might be aſhamed to do that which was the deſire of ſuch as made paſſage in hoſtile manner; but theſe were faint comforts. The beſt counſel was, that being near unto the Carduchi, a people enemy to the Perſian, they ſhould enter into their Country, paſſing over ſome high mountains which lay between them. This courſe they followed, which could not have availed them, if Tiſſaphernes had begun ſooner to cut off their victuals, rather than to ſeek to force, or circumvent them by his fine wit.

SECT. IX.

The difficulties which the Greek Army found in paſſing thorow the Land of the Carduchi.

ENtring upon the Land of the Carduchi, they were encountred with many difficulties of ways, but much more afflicted by the fierce Inhabitants, who accuſtomed by force to defend themſelves againſt the huge Armies of the Perſian, were no way inferiour to the Greeks in daring, but only in the art of War. They were very light of foot, skilful Archers, and uſed the Sling well; which weapons in that mountainous Country were of much uſe againſt theſe poor travellers, afflicting them in ſeven days which they ſpent in that paſſage, far more than all the power of the Great King had done. Between the Territory of theſe Carduchi, and the parts of Armenia confining them, ran Centrites a great River, upon which the Greeks refreſhed themſelves one day, rejoicing that they had ſo well eſcaped theſe dangers, and hoping that the remainder would prove eaſie. But the next morning they ſaw certain troops of Horſe, that lay to forbid their paſſage. Theſe were levied by the Kings Deputies in thoſe parts; Tiſſaphernes and his Companies having taken their way towards Ionia. The River was broad and deep, ſo that it was not poſſible for ſuch as would enter it, to make reſiſtance againſt thoſe which kept the oppoſite banks. To increaſe theſe dangers, the Carduchi following upon them, lay on the ſide of a Mountain, within leſs than a mile of the water. But it was their good hap to diſcover a Foord, by which the greater number of them paſſing over, did eaſily chaſe away the ſubjects of the Perſian, and then ſending back the moſt expedite men, gave ſuccour to the Rearward, againſt which the Carduchi being ſlightly armed, could not on plain ground make reſiſtance hand to hand. Theſe Carduchi ſeem to have inhabited the Mountains of Niphates, which are not far from the Springs of Tygris, though Ptolomy place them far more to the Eaſt upon the River of Cyrus in Media; wherein he differs much from Xenophon, whoſe relation being grounded upon his own knowledg, doth beſt in this caſe deſerve credit. Of the River Centrites (as of many other Rivers, Towns and Places mentioned by Xenophon) I will not labour to make a conjecture, which may endure the ſeverity of a Critick. For Ptolomy, and the whole Nation of Geographers, add ſmall light to this Expedition: only of this laſt, I think it the ſame which falleth into Tygris, not much above Artaſigarta, ſpringing out of Niphates, and running by the Town of Sardeva in Gordene, a Province of Armenia the Great, wherein the Greeks having paſſed Centrites, did arrive.

SECT. X.

How Teribasus Governour of Armenia, seeking to entrap the Greeks with terms of feigned peace, was disappointed, and shamefully beaten.

THE Army finding in Armenia good provision, marched without any disturbance about fifty or threescore miles to the heads of the River Tygris, and passing over them, travelled as far further without resistance, till they were encountred by Terizabus, at the River Teleboa, which Xenophon commends as a goodly water, though small, but Ptolemy and others omit it. Teribazus governed that Countrey for the Persian, and was in great favour with Artaxerxes, whose Court may seem to have been a School, where the Art of falshood was taught as wisdom. He desired peace of the Greeks, which was made upon this condition, That they should take what they pleased, but not burn down the Towns and Villages in their way. As soon as he had made this league, he levied an Army, and besetting the streights of certain Mountains which they were to pass, hoped well to make such benefit of their security, as might give him the commendation of being no less craftily dishoneſt than Tissaphernes. Yet his cunning failed of success. For a great Snow fell, which caused the Greeks to make many fires, and scatter themselves abroad in the Villages. Teribazus also made many fires, and some of his men wandred about seeking relief. By the fires he was discovered, and by a Soldier of his that was taken prisoner, the whole plot was revealed. Hereupon the Greeks, taking this captive with them for a guide, sought him out, and coming upon his Camp, did so affright him, that before the whole Army could arrive there, the shout which was raised by the Van-currors, chased him away. They took his Pavillion, wherein (besides many slaves, that were Artificers of voluptuousnes) very rich furniture was left by the treacherous coward, who returned no more to challenge it. From hence the Army went Northward, and passing Euphrates not far below the springs thereof, travelled with much difficulty through deep snow, being followed aloof by the Enemy, who durst not approach them, but did cut off such as they found straggling behind. The inhabitants of the Countrey through which they marched, had their wintering-houses under ground, wherein was found great plenty of Victuals, and of Cattel, which likewise did winter in the same Cellars with the Owners. Having refreshed themselves in those parts, and taken sufficient ease after the miserable journey, which had consumed many of them with extream cold; they departed, leading with them many bond-slaves, and taking away (besides other Horses and Cattel) some Colts that were bred up for the great King.

SECT. XI.

The passage of the Army to Trabyzond, thorow the Countries bordering upon the River of Phasis, and other obscure Nations.

SO without impediment they came to the River Phasis, near whereunto the people called Phasiani, Tacchi, and Chalybes, were seated. These Nations joined together, and occupying the tops of a ledg of Mountains which the Greeks were to pass, made countenance of war: but some companies being sent by night to seize upon a place of equal height to that whereon the enemies lay, making good the piece of ground which they had taken, secured the ascent of the rest; which caused these people to flye, every one retiring to the defence of his own. The first upon whose Countrey the Greeks did enter, were the Tacchi, who conveying all their provision of victuals into strong holds, brought the Army into much want, until with hard labour one place was forced, wherein great store of Cattel were taken; the people to avoid captivity, threw themselves head-long down the rocks, the very women throwing down first their own children, and then casting themselves upon them. Here was taken a great booty of cattel, which served to feed them, travelling through the Land of Chalybes, of whom they got nothing but strokes. The Chalybes were a very stout Nation, well armed at all points, and exceeding fierce. They encountred the Greeks hand to hand, killing as many as they took prisoners, and cutting off their heads, which they carried away, singing and dancing, to the great grief of their companions living, who were glad when after seven days journey they escaped from those continual skirmishes wherewith they had been vexed by these Barbarians. Hence travelling through a good Corn-countrey inhabited by an obscure Nation called the Scythini, they came to a rich Town, the Lord whereof, and of the Region adjoining, used them friendly, and promised to guide them to a Mountain, whence they might discover the Euxine Sea. From Gymnius (which was the name of his Town) he led them through the Territory of his Enemies, desiring them to waste it with sword and fire. After five days march, they came to a Mountain called Teches, being (as I think) a part of the Mountains called Moschici, whence their Guide shewed them the Sea, towards which they bent their course; and passing friendly through the Region of the Macrones (with whom, by means of an Interpreter found among themselves, who, born in that place, had been sold into Greece, they made a good peace) they arrived in the Land of Cholchos, wherein stands the City of * Trabyzond, called then Trapezus, a Colony of the Greeks. The Colchi entertaining them with hostility, were requited with the like; for the Army having now good leisure to repose themselves among their friends the Trapezuntians, did spoil the Countrey thirty days together, forbearing only the borderers upon Trabizond, at the Citizens request.

* Trabizond, a Colony of the Greeks situate in the bottom of the Euxine Sea.

SECT. XII.

How the Army began at Trabizond to provide a Fleet wherewith to return home by Sea: how they came into the Territory of Synope, & there prosecuted the same purpose.

HAving now found an Haven-Town, the Soldiers were desirous to take shipping, and change their tedious Land-journeys into an easie Navigation. To which purpose Cherisophus a Lacedemonian, one of the principal Commanders, promised by means of Anaxibus the Lacedemonian Admiral, who was his friend, that he would provide Vessels to embark embark them. Having thus concluded, they likewise took order for the staying of such ships as should pass that way, meaning to use them for their Navigation. Lest all this provision should be found insufficient for the transportation of the whole Army, Xenophon perswaded the Cities adjoining to clear the ways, and make an easie passage for them by Land; whereunto the Soldiers were utterly unwilling to give ear, being desirous to return by Sea; but the Country, fearing what inconvenience might grow by their long stay, did readily condescend to Xenophons request. Two ships they borrowed of the Trapezuntians, which they manned and sent to Sea: the one of them sailed directly into Greece, forsaking their Companions, who had put them in trust to bring Ships into the Port of Trabizond: the other took Merchants and passengers, whose goods were safely kept for the owners, but the Vessels were stayed to increase the Fleet. After long abode, when Victuals began to fail, by reason that all the Land of the Colchi, near unto the Camp, was already quite wasted, they were fain to embark their sick men, with the women, children, and such of the baggage as might best be spared, in those few Ships which they had already provided. The rest of the Army took their way by land to Cerasus, a Greek Town, where the Fleet likewise arrived. Here the Army being mustered, was found to consist of Eight thousand and six hundred men. From hence they passed through the Country of the (a) Mosynaci, who were divided into factions. The stronger party despising their friendship, caused them to join them with the weaker, whom they left Masters of all.

a Mosynaci a Nation of Pontus Cappadocius.

The next place of their abode was (b) Cotyora, a Greek Town likewise, and a Colony of the Sinopians, as Trapezus and Cerasus were; but the entertainment which here they found was very churlish, having neither an open Market afforded to them, nor the sick men that were among them admitted into any house. Hereupon the Soldiers entred the Town by force, and (committing no outrage) bestowed those which were sick in convenient lodging, taking into their own hands the custody of the Gates. Provision for the Army they made by strong hand, partly out of the Territory of the Paphlagonians, partly out of the Lands belonging to the Town. These news were unwelcome to (c) Sinope, whence Embassadors were sent to the Camp, who complaining of these dealings, and threatning to join with the Paphlagonians, if redress could not otherwise be had, were roundly answered by Xenophon, That meer necessity had enforced the Army to teach those of Cotyora good manners in so bad a method: letting them know, that he feared not to deal with them and the Paphlagonian at once; though perhaps the Paphlagonian would be glad to take Sinope it self; to which, if cause were given, they would lend assistance. Upon this answer the Embassadors grew better advised, promising all friendship that the State of Sinope could shew, and commanding the Town of Cotyora to relieve the Soldiers as well as they might. Further, they promised to assist them with Shipping, letting them understand how difficult the passage by Land would prove, in regard of the many and great Rivers, as Thermodon, Iris, Halys, and Parthenius, which crossed their way. This good counsel, and the fair promises accompanying it, were kindly accepted by the Army, which well perceived, that the City of Sinope would spare for no cost, to be freed from such a neighbourhood. It was therefore decreed that they would pass the rest of the way by Sea; provided, that if there should want such number of Vessels as might serve to imbark every one of them; then would they not put from the shore:

b Cotyora a Port-Town in the same Region.

c Sinope a Port-Town in Leucosyria, a Colony of the Milesian.

SECT. XIII.

Of Dissention which arose in the Army, and how it was embarked.

HItherto the danger of Enemies, and miseries of weather and wants, had kept the company in firm unity; which now began to dissolve and to thaw, by the neighbouring air of Greece, warming their heads with private respects to their several ends and purposes. Whilst they, who were sent as Agents from the Camp, remained at Sinope, Xenophon considering the strength and valour of his men, and the opportunity of the coast whereon they lay, thought it would be an honourable work to build a City in those parts, which were soon like to prove great and wealthy, in regard both of their own puissance, and of the great repair of the Greeks into that quarter. For this cause he made sacrifice, according to the superstition of his time and Country, divining of his success by the entrails of beasts. The Soothsayer whom he imployed, had received a great reward of Cyrus, for conjecturing aright, that Artaxerxes would not give battel in ten days: he therefore having preserved his money carefully, was desirous to be soon at home, that he might freely enjoy his gettings. By him the purpose of Xenophon was divulged, which was interpreted according to the diversity of mens opinions; some approving the motion, but the greater part rejecting it. They of Sinope and Heraclea, being informed of this consultation, were sore afraid, lest the poverty of the Soldiers, who had not wherewith to maintain themselves at home, should give success to the project. Which to prevent, they promised to supply the Army with a sufficient Fleet, and likewise offered money to some of the Captains, who thereupon undertook to give the Soldiers pay, if they would presently set sail for Greece. One of these Captains being a banished man, desired them to follow him into Troas; another offered to lead them into Cherronesus. Xenophon, who desired only the common good, was pleased greatly with these Propositions, and professed openly that he would have them to set forward, and hold together in any case, punishing him as a Traytor that should forsake the Army, before such time as they were arrived at their journeys end. Silanus the Soothsayer, who had uttered Xenophons purpose, was hereby stayed from out-running his fellows, and driven to abide with his wealth among poor men, longer than stood with his good liking. Also the other Captains were much troubled and afraid, when they perceived that Ships were prepared sufficient for their Navigation; but that the money promised to them, and by them to the Soldiers, came not. For the people of Sinope and Heraclea, knowing that the Army was now resolved for the Voyage, and that Xenophon whom they feared, had perswaded them to this resolution, thought it the wisest way to furnish them with a Navy, whilst they were in good readiness to depart, but to keep the money to themselves. The Captains therefore, who being disappointed by these Towns, found themselves in great danger of their men, whom they had deceived ved with fair hopes, repented much of their fair offers, and signifying as much to Xenophon, prayed him to make proposition to the Army, of taking the Ships, and sailing to Phasis, where they might seize upon Lands, and plant themselves in such wise as should stand best with their good liking. But finding him cold in the business, they began to work the principal of their own followers, hoping by them to draw in all the rest. These news becoming publick, bred a suspition of Xenophon, as if he had won the rest of the Captains to his purpose, and meant now to carry the Army quite another way from their own home. Wherefore assembling the Companies, he gave them satisfaction, and withal complained of some disorders, which he caused them to redress. A general inquisition was likewise made of offences committed since the death of Cyrus; which being punished, all things were in quiet. Shortly after came Embassadors from Corylas, Lord of the Paphlagonians, who sending presents, desired peace of the Greeks: the Embassadors were friendly entertained, and peace concluded, which needed not to have been sought, for that the Greeks having now their Fleet in a readiness, did soon weigh Anchors, and set sail for Harmene the Port of Synope, whither Cherisophus came, bringing with him a few Gallies from the Admiral Anaxibus, who promised to give the Army pay as soon as they came into the parts of Greece.

SECT. XIV.

Another great dissention and distraction of the Army. How the Mutiners were beaten by the Barbarians, and rescued by Xenophon.

THE nearer that they approached to Greece, the greater was their desire to make provision for themselves, that they might not return home empty-handed. Wherefore trusting well that if the charge of the Army were absolutely committed to one sufficient man, he might the more conveniently procure the good of them all, they determined to make Xenophon sole Commander of all; in whose favour as well the Captains as the common Soldiers were very earnest and violent. But he, either fearing to displease the Lacedæmonians, who were jealous of him already (being incensed by that fugitive who forsook the Army at Trabizond, flying with one of their two Ships) or moved by some tokens appearing to him in the intrails that threatned ill success to his Government, procured with vehement contention, that this honour was laid upon Cherisophus a Lacedæmonian. It seems that Xenophon, considering the vexation incident to the conduct of a Voluntary Army, wanting pay, did wisely in yielding to such tokens as forbad him to accept it: especially knowing so well their desire, which was, by right or by wrong, to get wealth whersoever it might be found, without all regard of friend or foe. Cherisophus had been General but six or seven days when he was deposed; for having been unwilling to rob the Town of Heraclea, which had sent Presents to the Camp, and been very beneficial unto them in lending Ships for their transportation. Two days they had sailed by the coast of Asia, when being past those great Rivers, which would have given impediment to their journy by Land, they touched at Heraclea, where consulting how to take their way onwards, whether by Land or Sea, one seditious man began to put them in mind of seeking to get somewhat for themselves; telling them that all their provision would be spent in three days; and that being now come out of the Enemies Country, victuals and other necessaries could not be had without money; for which cause he gave advice to send messengers into the Town of Heraclea, giving the Citizens to understand what their wants were, and demanding of them three thousand pieces of money, called Cyzicens; which sum amounteth, to two thousand and five hundred pound sterling, or thereabout. This motion was greatly applauded, and the sum raised to ten thousand Cyzicens at least; which to require, they thought Cherisophus, as being General, the fittest man; others had more desire to send Xenophon, but in vain, for they both refused it, and renounced the action as dishoneſt. Lest therefore either of these should fail in managing the business which agreed not with his disposition, others of more impudency and less discretion were sent; who in such wise delivered their insolent message, that the Citizens taking time to deliberate upon their request, brought what they could out of the fields into the Town, and shutting the Gates, did forthwith man the Walls. When the Soldiers perceived themselves to be disappointed of their ravenous purpose, they fell to mutiny, saying, That their Leaders had betrayed them: and being for the most part of them Arcadians and Achæans, they forsook immediately Cherisophus and Xenophon, chusing new Leaders out of their own number. Above four thousand and five hundred they were, all heavily armed; who electing ten Captains, sailed into the Port of Calphas, which is in the midway between Heraclea and Byzantium, with purpose to assail the Bythinians on the sudden. With Cherisophus there abode two thousand and one hundred, of whom one thousand and four hundred were armed weightily: Xenophon had two thousand foot, three hundred whereof were lightly armed, and forty horse; which small band had done good service already, and could not have been spared now. Cherisophus had agreed with Cleander Governour of Byzantium, to meet him at the mouth of the River Calphas, whither Cleander promised to bring some Gallies to convey him over into Greece; for which cause he took his way thither by Land, leaving to Xenophon such Shipping as he had; who passing some part of the way by Sea, landed upon the confines of Heraclea, and Thrasia Asiatica, intending to make a cut through the midland Country to the Propont. The Mutiners who had landed at Calphas by night, with purpose to take spoils in Bythinia, divided themselves into ten Companies, every Captain leading his own Regiment into some Village five or six miles from the Sea; in the greater Towns were two Regiments quartered: and so was that part of the Country surprized on the sudden, and sacked all at one time. The place of Rendezvous was an high piece of Ground, where some of them arrived, finding no disturbance; others not without much trouble and danger: two Companies were broken and defeated, only eight men escaped, the rest were all put to the sword. For the Thracians which had slipt at first out of the Soldiers hands, did raise the Country; and finding the Greeks loaden with booty, took the advantage of their disorder, cutting in pieces those two Regiments: which done, they attempted the rest, encompassing the hill whereon they encamped. One great advantage the Thracians had, that being being all light armed, they could at pleasure make retreat from these Arcadians and Achæans, who wanting the assistance of horse, and having neither Archers nor Slingers among them, were driven to stand meerly upon their defence, bearing off with great danger and many wounds received, the Darts and Arrows of the Barbarians, till finally they were driven from their watering place, and enforced to crave parely. Whatsoever the Articles of composition were, the Thracians yielded to all; but pledges for assurance they would give none, without which the Greeks well knew, that all promises of such people, especially so incensed, were nothing worth. In the mean time Xenophon holding his way quietly through the Inland-Region, did enquire of some Travellers, whether they knew ought of any Grecian Army, passing along those parts: and receiving by them true information of the desperate case into which these Gallants had foolishly thrown themselves, he marched directly towards the place where they lay, taking with him for guides, them who gave him the intelligence. His horsemen he sent before to discover, and to scour the ways; the light armed footmen took the hill-tops on either hand, all of them setting fire on whatsoever they found combustible: whereby the whole Country seemed to be on a light flame, to the great terror of the enemies, who thought that some huge Army had approached. That night he encamped on a hill, within five miles of the Arcadians, encreasing still the numbers of his fires, which he caused hastily to be quenched soon after Supper. The enemies perceiving this, thought certainly that he would have fallen upon them in the dark, which caused them in all haste to dislodg. Early in the next morning Xenophon coming thither in very good order, to have given battel, found that his device to affright the Thracians, had taken full effect; but he marvelled that the Greeks were also departed, concerning whom he learned by enquiry, that they removed at break of day, and perceived by signs that they had taken the way to the Port of Calphas, in which journey he overtook them. They embraced him and his with great joy: confessing that they themselves had thought the same which the enemies did, looking that he should have come by night; wherein finding themselves deceived, they were afraid lest he had forsaken them, and therefore hastened away to overtake him, and join with him. So they arrived at the Haven of Calphas, where it was decreed, That whosoever from thenceforth made any motion to disjoin the Army, should suffer death.

SECT. XV.

Of divers pieces of service done by Xenophon; and how the Army returned into Greece. The occasions of the War between the Lacedæmonians and the Persians.

THE Haven of Calphas lay under a goodly Head-land, that was very strong, and abounding with all kind of Grain and Fruits, except Olives. There was also Timber for building and shipping, and a very convenient Sea for a great City. All which commodities that might have allured the Soldiers to stay there, and to plant, caused them to haste away, fearing lest Xenophon should find some device to have setled himself and them in that place. For the greater part of them had good means to live at home; neither did they so much for hope of gain follow Cyrus in that War, as in regard of his Honour, and the love which they bare unto him: the poorer sort were such as left their Parents, Wives and Children, to whom (though failing of the riches which they had hoped to purchase) they were now desirous to return. But whether it were so, that Xenophon found advantage by their own superstition, to make them stay, which they greatly suspected; or whether the signs appearing in the intrails, did indeed forbid their departure; so long they were inforced to abide in the place till victuals failed: neither would the Captains lead them forth to forage the Country until the Sacrifices should promise good success. Cherisophus was dead of an Ague, and his ships were gone, being returned to the Heracleans, of whom they were borrowed. His followers were joined to the rest of the Army, which the greater it was, the more provision it needed, and the sooner felt want. For which cause, he that was chosen Colonel into the place of Cherisophus, would needs adventure to gratifie the Soldiers with the spoil of some Villages that stood near at hand; in which enterprize he found ill success, the whole Country lying in wait to intrap him, and an Army of Horse being set by Pharnabazus the Satrapa, or Viceroy of Phrygia, to the assistance of these Bythinian Thracians; which troops falling upon the Greeks that were scattered abroad in seeking booty, slew five hundred of them, and chased the rest to a certain Mountain thereby. The news of this overthrow coming to Xenophon, he led forth a part of the Army to the rescue of those that survived, and brought them safe to the Camp; upon which the Bythinians made an offer that night, and breaking a Corps du guarde, slew some, pursuing the rest to the very Tents. This new courage of the enemy, together with the present condition of the Army, so disheartned and unfurnished of necessaries, caused the Greeks to remove their Camp to a place of more strength; which having intrenched, and committed to the defence of such as were least able to endure travel, Xenophon with the firmest and best able men went forth, both to bury those which were lately slain, and to abate the pride of the Thracians, and their assistants. In this journey his demeanor was very honourable. For having given burial to the dead, the enemy was discovered, lying on the tops of the hills adjoining, to whom (notwithstanding that the way was very rough and troublesome, so that some thought it a matter of too great danger, to leave at their backs a Wood scarce passable) he marched directly, telling his men plainly, That he had rather follow the enemy with half the number, than turn his back to them with twice as many; and letting them further know, that if they did not charge the Barbarians, he would not fail with the greater resolution to pursue them; from whom if they could safely retire to the Camp, yet what should they do there, wanting victuals to sustain them in the place, and ships to carry them away? Wherefore he willed them rather to fight well that day, having eaten their Dinners, than another day fasting; and not to regard the uneasie return, which might serve to stay Cowards from running away, but to wish unto the Enemy a fair and easie way, by which he might fly from them. These perswasions were followed with so valiant execution, that both Persians and Bythinians being chased out of the field, abandoned the Country forthwith, removing their Families, and leaving all that could not ſuddenly be conveighed away, to the diſcretion of the Greeks, who had good leiſure, gathered the Harveſt of theſe bad Neighbours fields. This was the laſt fight which they had on the ſide of Aſia. For they were not only ſuffered quietly to enjoy the ſpoil of the Country, but when the opinion grew common in thoſe parts, that it was the intent of Xenophon to plant a Colony on the Port of Calpas, Embaſſadors were ſent from the Neighbour people, to deſire friendſhip, and make offer of their beſt aſſiſtance. But the Soldiers had no mind to ſtay. Wherefore entring further into Bythinia, they took a great booty, which they carried away unto Chryſopolis, a City near unto Chalcedon, where they ſold it. Pharnabazus, Lieutenant in Phrygia to Artaxerxes, did greatly fear, leſt their long ſtay in that Country might breed in them a deſire to viſit his Province, where they might have found great wealth, and little power to guard it. Therefore he ſent to the Lacedæmonian Admiral, intreating him with much inſtance and large promiſes to waft them over into Europe; to whom Anaxibius the Admiral condeſcending, promiſed to give the Soldiers pay, as ſoon as they arrived at Byzantium. So were they carried out of Aſia at the intreaty of the Perſian, who in the height of his pride had thought them ſo ſurely impriſoned with mighty Rivers, that he not only denied to permit their quiet departure, but willed them to ſurrender their Arms into his hands, and ſo to yield their lives to his diſcretion. How diſcourteouſly they were intreated by Anaxibius, and how to requite his injurious dealings, they ſeized upon Byzantium, which by Xenophons perſwaſion they forbare to ſack, I hold it ſuperfluous to relate. For the reſidue of their doings appertain little to the general courſe of things. But this expedition, as in all ages it was glorious, ſo did it both diſcover the ſecrets of Aſia, and ſtir up the Greeks to think upon greater enterprizes than ever their forefathers had undertaken. Likewiſe it was the only remarkable action which the time afforded. For the Roman Wars did hitherto extend no further than to the next neighbouring Towns of Italy; and in Greece all things were quiet; the Lacedæmonians ruling inſolently, but without diſturbance. True it is, that the ſeeds of the War ſhortly following, which the Lacedæmonians made upon Artaxerxes, were already ſown, before theſe Companies returned out of the high Countrys of Aſia. For the Towns of Ionia which had ſided with young Cyrus againſt Tiſſaphernes, if not againſt the Great King, prepared to rebel; which they thought ſafer, than to fall into the hands of Tiſſaphernes, who was now appointed Lieutenant, both of his old Province, and of all that had belonged to Cyrus. Wherefore the Ionians beſought the Lacedæmonians to ſend them aid, whereby to recover their liberty; and obtained their requeſt. For a power was ſent over, under conduct of Thimbro a Spartan, who beſtowed his men in ſuch Towns as had already revolted, to ſecure the Cities, and their Fields, but not to make any offenſive War.

CHAP. XI.

Of the Affairs of Greece, whilſt they were managed by the Lacedæmonians.

SECT. I.

How the Lacedæmonians took courage by example of Xenophons Army, to make War upon Artaxerxes.

IT ſeems that the Lacedæmonians did well perceive in how ill part Artaxerxes took their favour ſhewed unto his Brother, and yet were timorous in beginning an open War againſt him, thinking it ſufficient to take all care that no advantage might ſlip, which could ſerve to ſtrengthen their Eſtate, by finding the Perſian work beyond the Sea. But when Xenophons Army had revealed the baſeneſs of thoſe effeminate Aſiatiques, and rehearſed the many Victories which they themſelves had gotten, upon terms of extream diſadvantage; then was all Greece filled with deſire of undertaking upon this huge unweildy Empire, thinking it no hard matter for the joint-forces of that whole Nation to hew out the way to Suſa, whereof one handful had opened the paſſage to Babylon; and further, finding no power that was able to give them reſiſtance, in all that long journey of four and thirty thouſand two hundred and fifty five furlongs, ſpent in going and returning, which make of Engliſh miles about four thouſand two hundred fourſcore and one, a very painful march of one year and three months. Nevertheleſs the Civil diſtraction wherewith Greece was miſerably torn, and eſpecially that hot fire of the Theban War, which kindled with Perſian Gold, brake forth ſuddenly into a great flame, drew back out of Aſia the power of the Lacedæmonians, to the defence of their own Eſtate; leaving it queſtionable, whether Ageſilaus having both the ſame, and far greater forces, could have wrought proportionable effects. Sure it is, that in the whole ſpace of two years, which he ſpent in Aſia, his deeds procured more commendation of magnanimity and fair behaviour, than of ſtout courage, and great or profitable atchievements. For how highly ſoever it pleaſed Xenophon, who was his friend, and follower in this, and in other Wars, to extol his virtue; his exploits being only a few incurſions into the Countrys lying near the Sea, carrying no proportion to Xenophons own journey, which I know not whether any Age hath parallel'd: the famous retreat of Conon the Briton, with ſix thouſand men from Aqualeia, to his own Country, through all the breadth of Italy, and length of France, in deſpight of the Emperour Theodoſius, being rather like it, than equal. But of Ageſilaus and his Wars in Aſia and Greece, we ſhall ſpeak more in due place.

Ageſilaus

SECT. II.

The proſperous beginnings of the War in Aſia.

THimbro receiving Xenophons men, began to take in Towns, and to entertain all ſuch as were willing to revolt from the Perſian, who were many, and ſome of them ſuch as had been highly beholding to the King; who ſeem to have had no other cauſe of diſcontent, than that they were to live under the Government of Tiſſaphernes, whom all others did as vehemently hate, as the King his Maſter did love him. The managing of the War begun by Thimro, was for his oppreſſions taken out of his hands, and committed to Dercyllidas a Spartan, who behaved himſelf as a good man of War, and a wiſe Commander. For whereas the Rule of the low Countries of Aſia was divided between Pharnabazus and Tiſſaphernes, who did ill agree, Pharnabazus being the Worthier man, but the other by his Princes favour the greater, and having the chief command in thoſe Wars againſt the Greeks; Dercyllidas, who did bear a private hatred to Pharnabazus (knowing well that Tiſſaphernes was of a miſchievous nature, and would not be ſorry to ſee his Corrival throughly beaten, though to the Kings loſs) made an appointment with Tiſſaphernes, and forthwith entred Æolis, which was under the juriſdiction of Pharnabazus, which Province in few days he brought into his own power.

That Country of Æolis had about the ſame time ſuffered a violent alteration, which gave eaſie ſucceſs to the attempts of Dercyllidas. Zenis a Dardanian, had been Deputy to Pharnabazus in thoſe parts; after whoſe death his Wife Mania procured his Office, wherein ſhe behaved her ſelf ſo well, that ſhe not only was beloved of the people under her Government, but enlarged her Territory, by the conqueſt of certain Towns adjoining; and ſundry times gave aſſiſtance to Pharnabazus in his Wars againſt the Myſians and Perſians. For ſhe had in pay ſome Companies of Greeks, whoſe valour by her good uſage, did her great ſervice. But ſomewhat before the arrival of Dercyllidas in thoſe parts, a Son in law of hers called Midias, whom ſhe truſted and loved much, being blinded with ambition, found means to ſtifle her, and kill her Son of ſeventeen years old; which done, he ſeized upon two of her principal Towns, wherein her Treaſure lay, hoping to have been admitted into poſſeſſion of her whole Eſtate. Being denied entrance by her Soldiers that lay in Gariſon, he ſent Meſſengers with Preſents to Pharnabazus, deſiring him to make him Governour in the place of Mania. His Preſents were not only rejected by Pharnabazus, but revenge of his foul Treaſon threatned, whereby the wicked villain was driven into terms of almoſt utter deſperation. In the mean time came Dercyllidas, to whom the Towns of Mania that held againſt Midias, did quickly open their gates. One only Town ſtood out four days (againſt the will of the Citizens, who were covetous of liberty) the Governour ſtriving in vain to have kept it to the uſe of Pharnabazus. Now remained only two Cities, Gergethe and Scepſis, which the Traytor held; who fearing all men, as being loved of none, ſent Embaſſadors to Dercyllidas, deſiring leave to ſpeak with him, and pledges for his ſecurity: upon the delivery of which, he iſſued out of Scepſis, and coming into the Camp, made offer to join with the Greeks upon ſuch conditions as might ſeem reaſonable. But he was plainly told by Dercyllidas, that other condition there was none, than to ſet the Citizens freely at liberty. And preſently upon theſe words they marched toward Scepſis. When Midias perceived that it was in vain to ſtrive againſt the Army, and the Townſmen, who were all of one mind; he quietly went along with Dercyllidas, who remaining but a few hours in the City, did a ſacrifice to Minerva, and then leading away the Gariſon of Midias, he left the City free, and departed toward Gergethe. Midias did not forſake his company, but followed him, earneſtly entreating that he might be ſuffered to retain Gergethe: but coming to the Gates, he was bidden to command his Soldiers that they ſhould be opened; for (quoth Dercyllidas) I muſt here likewiſe do a ſacrifice to Minerva. The Traytor not daring to make denial, cauſed his Mercenaries to open the Gates, whereby Dercyllidas, taking poſſeſſion of the place, tendred pay to the Gariſon, who did not refuſe to ſerve under his Enſigns. This done, all the goods of Mania were ſeized upon, as belonging to one that had been ſubject to Pharnabazus, who was enemy to the Greeks: and ſo the murderous Wretch was ſent away naked, not knowing in what part of the World he might find any place to hide his deteſted head. Dercyllidas having in eight days taken nine Cities, purpoſed for the eaſe of his Confederates to winter in Bythinia, to which end he took Truce with Pharnabazus, who had not any deſire of War. That Winter, and the Summer enſuing, the Truce being continued, held; in which time, beſides the waſting of Bythinia, the neck of land joining Cherronea to the Main, was fortified, being four or five miles in breadth; by which means eleven Towns, with much good Land belonging to them, were freed from the incurſions of the wild Thracians, and made fit and able to victual the Camp. Likewiſe the City of Atarne was taken, which was of great ſtrength, and very well ſtored with proviſion. After this, Dercyllidas had command from Sparta to divert the War into Caria, where was the ſeat of Tiſſaphernes; for that hereby it was thought not uneaſie to recover all the Towns of Ionia; Pharax the Admiral of the Fleet (which was a yearly office) being appointed to join with him. Though it was manifeſt that Tiſſaphernes had neglected Pharnabazus in time of neceſſity; yet was he not in his own danger requited with the like. For Pharnabazus having reſpect to the Kings ſervice, came to aſſiſt his private enemy Tiſſaphernes, and ſo paſſing into Caria, they thruſt Gariſons into all places of ſtrength; which done, they marched towards Ionia, hoping to find the Towns ill manned for reſiſtance. As theſe Perſians were deſirous to keep the War from their own doors, ſo was Dercyllidas willing to free his Confederates the Ionians from the ſpoil and danger of the War, by transferring it into Caria. For which cauſe he paſſed the River of Meander; and not looking to have been ſo ſoon encountred, marched careleſly through the Country: when on the very ſudden the whole Army of Tiſſaphernes and Pharnabazus was diſcovered, conſiſting of Perſians, Carians, and ſome Mercenary Greeks, who were all marſhalled in very good order to preſent battel. The odds was too apparent, both in numbers of men, and in readineſs, as alſo in advantage of ground: for the Perſians had a great multitude of Horſe, the Greeks very few and feeble, being to fight in an open plain. Therefore all the Ionians, together with the Iſlanders and others, of ſuch places as bordered upon the Kings Dominions, did either betake themſelves to preſent flight; or abiding a while for ſhame, did plainly diſcover by their looks, that they meant not to be more bold than wiſe. Only Dercyllidas with his Peloponneſians, regarding their Honour, prepared to endure the fight, which muſt needs have brought them to deſtruction, if the counſel of Pharnabazus had been followed; who perceiving the opportunity of ſo great a victory, was not willing to let it ſlip. But Tiſſaphernes, who naturally was a coward, ſeeing that countenance of reſiſtance was made, began to conſider, what ſtrange defence the Soldiers of Xenophon had ſhewed; and thinking that all the Greeks were of the like reſolution, held it the wiſeſt way to crave parley; the concluſion of which was, That a Truce ſhould be made, to laſt until Tiſſaphernes might receive anſwer from the King, and Dercyllidas from Sparta, concerning the demands propounded in the Treaty; which were on the one part, That all the Greeks in Aſia might enjoy their own liberty and laws; but contrariwiſe on the other ſide, That the Lacedæmonians ſhould depart Aſia, and leave the Towns to the Kings pleaſure. This Treaty was of none effect; only it ſerved to free the Greeks from the preſent danger, and to gain time unto Tiſſaphernes, who deſired to avoid the War by procraſtination, which he durſt not adventure to finiſh by trial of a Battel.

SECT. III.

How the Lacedæmonians took revenge upon the Eleans for old diſpleaſures. The diſcontents of the Corinthians and Thebans conceived againſt the State of Sparta.

IN the mean ſeaſon the Lacedæmonians, who found none able to withſtand them in Greece, began to call the Eleans to account for ſome diſgraces received by them during the late Wars, when leiſure was wanting to the requital of ſuch petty injuries. Theſe Eleans being Preſidents of the Olympian Games, had ſet a fine upon the City of Sparta; for Non-payment of which, they forbad them to come to the ſolemnity; and publickly whipt one of them that was of note, for preſuming to contend againſt their Decree. Likewiſe they hindred Agis King of Sparta from doing ſacrifice to Jupiter; and in all points uſed great contempt toward the Spartans, who now had no buſineſs that could hinder them from taking revenge: and therefore ſent a peremptory meſſage to the Eleans, commanding them to ſet at liberty the Cities which they held in ſubjection. This was the uſual pretence which they made the ground of all their Wars: though little they cared for the liberty of ſuch Towns which they cauſed afterwards to become followers, and little better than meer Vaſſals of the Lacedæmonians. In their late Wars with Athens, the ſtrong oppoſition which they found, cauſed this goodly Title of Liberty to work very ſlowly: but having now to do with a State of great ſpirit, and ſmall force, it gave preſent ſucceſs to their deſires. Two years together they ſent an Army into the Country of the Eleans; the firſt year an Earthquake (held in thoſe times a prodigious ſign, and which did always forbid the proſecution of any enterprize in hand) cauſed them to retire: the ſecond year all the Towns of the Eleans did haſtily revolt, and the City it ſelf was driven to ſubmiſſion; conſenting both to ſuffer their old ſubjects freely to enjoy their liberty, and to have her own Walls thrown down. Only the Preſidentſhip of the Olympian Games was left unto them, which it was not to be doubted that they would in time coming uſe modeſtly, finding themſelves to ſtand at the mercy of Sparta. In this Expedition all the Greeks were aſſiſtant to the Lacedæmonians, excepting the Corinthians and Bœotians, whoſe aid having been of as much importance in the late Peloponneſian War, as the force of Sparta it ſelf, they could not ſmother their diſlike of their unequal diviſion following the victory; which gave to Sparta the command of all Greece; to Thebes and Corinth only ſecurity againſt Athens, but ſuch a ſecurity as was worſe than the danger. For when the equal greatneſs of two mighty Eſtates did counterpoiſe each the other, it was in the power of theſe Neutral Commonweals to adhere to either, as the condition of their affairs required; but when to revenge injuries, they had by mortal hatred proſecuted the War to extremity, leaving the one City naked of power and friends, the other mightily increaſed in both; it was then (if not neceſſary to obey the greatneſs which themſelves had made, yet) fooliſh and dangerous to provoke it. Nevertheleſs, it was not the purpoſe of the Spartans, to take occaſion of any quarrel, which they could not finiſh at pleaſure, till ſuch time as they had by victory or compoſition made ſome good end with the Perſian, toward whom they bent all their care and forces.

SECT. IV.

The paſſage of Ageſilaus into Aſia. His War with Tiſſaphernes. How Tiſſaphernes was put to death; and the War diverted into another Province, through perſwaſion and gifts of Tithrauſtes his ſucceſſor. How careleſs the Perſian Lieutenants were of the Kings good.

A*Geſilaus* newly made King of Sparta, was deſirous to have the honour of the Victory, which not without cauſe he expected upon thoſe of Aſia; and therefore procuring a great Army to join with that of Dercyllidas, he took his way in great pomp to Aulis in Bœotia, a Haven lying oppoſite to the Iſland of Eubœa; in which place Agamemnon (leading the power of all Greece to the War againſt Troy many Ages before) had imbarked his men. In imitation of Agamemnon, he meant alſo to do ſacrifice in Aulis; which the Thebans, Lords of that Country, would not permit, but ſaying, that the performance of ſuch Ceremonies in that place, belonged unto their Officers; they were ſo unable to conceal their malice, that ſending ſome Companies of horſe, they threw down his ſacrifice from the Altar. It was not then convenient time for Ageſilaus to entangle himſelf and his Country in a new War; therefore waiting better opportunity of revenge, he quietly ſwallowed the contumely, and followed his main intendment. Having landed his men at Epheſus, he was entertained by Tiſſaphernes with a Treaty of peace, wherein Ageſilaus peremptorily requiring that the Perſian ſhould reſtore to liberty all the Greek Tovvns in Aſia, vvas promiſed that the King, being firſt informed of his demand, ſhould ſend anſvver to his good liking, if he vvould in the mean vvhile make Truce. Truce vvas therefore made, vvhich Tiſſaphernes had ſought, only to vvin time of making proviſion for the War, and getting ſupply of men and money from Artaxerxes, vvhilſt Ageſilaus vvas buſie in ſetling the Eſtates of his confederate Cities on that

ſide of the Sea. The end of this long vacation from War, was at the coming down of theſe Forces which Artaxerxes had ſent: at what time Ageſilaus received a plain meſſage from Tiſſaphernes, That either he muſt forthwith depart out of Aſia, or make good his abode by ſtrong hand. Ageſilaus returning word, that he was glad to hear that his enemies had by perjury deſerved vengeance from heaven, prepared to invade them; and ſending word to all the Towns which lay between him and Caria, that they ſhould provide victuals and other neceſſaries for his Army, did eaſily make Tiſſaphernes believe, that his intent was to invade that Province wherein Tiſſaphernes dwelt, and which was unfit for Horſe, in which part of his Forces the Perſian had moſt confidence. Therefore Tiſſaphernes beſtowing all his Companies of foot in Caria, entred with his Horſe into the Plains of Mæander, hoping thereby to ſtop the paſſage of a heavy foot-army, not ſuffering them to paſs into that Country which was fitteſt for their ſervice. But the Greeks left him waiting there in vain, and marched directly into Phrygia, where they took great ſpoil without reſiſtance, till ſuch time as the Horſemen of Pharnabazus met him, who in a ſmall skirmiſh having the better of the Greeks, were the occaſion that Ageſilaus returned to Epheſus. Although in this laſt fight only twelve men were loſt, yet Ageſilaus perceiving by that trial how hard it would be to prevail, and hold the maſtery of the field, without a greater ſtrength of Horſe, took all poſſible care to increaſe that part of his forces. By which means having enabled himſelf whilſt Winter laſted, he entred upon the Country of Tiſſaphernes, as ſoon as the ſeaſon of the year would permit, and not only took a great booty, but finding the Horſemen of Tiſſaphernes in the plain of Mæander, without aſſiſtance of their Infantry, he gave them battel, and had a great Victory, taking their Camp, in which he found great riches. The blame of this loſs fell heavy upon Tiſſaphernes, who either upon cowardiſe had abſented himſelf from the battel, or following ſome other buſineſs, was then at Sardis. For which cauſe his Maſter having him in diſtruſt, and thinking that peace might be the ſooner had, which he much deſired, if the man ſo odious to the whole Nation of the Greeks, were taken out of the way; he ſent into thoſe parts Tithrauſtes a Perſian, to cut off the head of Tiſſaphernes, and ſucceed him in the Government. Such was the end of this baſe and cowardly Politician, who little caring to offend Heaven, when by perjury he could advance his purpoſes on Earth, failed at the laſt, through too much overweening of his own wiſdom, even in that part of cunning wherein he thought himſelf moſt perfect; for ſuppoſing that by his great skill in ſubtil negotiation he ſhould one way or other circumvent the Greeks, and make them weary of Aſia; he did not ſeek to finiſh the War, and according to his Maſters wiſh, bring all things ſpeedily to quiet, but rather to temporize, till he might find ſome opportunity of making ſuch end as might beſt ſtand with the Kings honour and his own. Wherein it ſeems that he much miſtook his Princes diſpoſition, who though he had highly rewarded him for the aid which he did bring in his time of danger, yet would he much more gladly have taken it, if he could have found ſuch means whereby the danger it ſelf might have been avoided: as not loving to have War, whilſt by any conditions (honourable or not) he might obtain peace. And this appeared well by the courſe which Tithrauſtes took at his firſt poſſeſſion of the low Countrys. For he ſent Embaſſadors to Ageſilaus, in very friendly ſort letting him know, that the man who had been author of the War, was now taken out of the way; and that it was the Kings pleaſure to let the Greeks enjoy their own laws and liberty, upon condition, that they ſhould pay him the tribute accuſtomed, and the Army be forthwith diſmiſſed. The anſwer to this propoſition was by Ageſilaus referred to the Council of Sparta; in the mean ſeaſon he was content to transfer the War into the Province of Pharnabazus, at the requeſt of Tithrauſtes, who bought his departure with thirty Talents.

This was a ſtrange manner of War, both on the offenſive, and the defenſive part. For Ageſilaus having entertained great hopes of vanquiſhing the great King, was contented to forbear his ſeveral Provinces, at the entreaty of the Lieutenants: and thoſe Lieutenants being employed by the King to maintain his Eſtates againſt all enemies (wherein if they failed, they knew that their heads might eaſily be taken from their ſhoulders) were little offended at any loſs that fell on their next neighbour Princes, which were ſubject likewiſe to the ſame Crown of Perſia, ſo long as their own Government could be preſerved from waſte and danger. The cauſe of this diſorder on the Perſian ſide, I can aſcribe to nothing ſo deſervedly as to the corrupted eſtate of the Court, wherein Eunuchs, Concubines, and miniſters of pleaſure, were able by partial conſtruction, to countenance or diſgrace the actions of ſuch as had the managing of things abroad; and to that fooliſh manner of the Kings (which was ſo uſual, that it might be called a rule) to reward or puniſh the Provincial Governour, according to the benefit or loſs which the Country given in charge unto each of them received, during the time of his Rule. Whereby it came to paſs, that as every one was deſirous to make his own Territory yield a large increaſe to the Kings treaſure, ſo no man was careful to aſſiſt his borderers, if loſs or danger might thereby grow to himſelf and his; but ſate ſtill as an idle beholder, when perhaps by joining their forces, it had not been uneaſie to recompence the ſpoil of one Country, by conquering another, or defending a third from greater miſeries.

SECT. V.

The War and Treaty between Ageſilaus and Pharnabazus.

Ageſilaus having thus compounded with Tithrauſtes, entred Phrygia, burning and waſting the Country without reſiſtance. He took the Palace of Pharnabazus, and by his Lieutenant drave him out of the Camp. Theſe actions, together with his honourable behaviour, which added much to their luſtre, were more glorious than profitable. For he did not win Cities and places of ſtrength, which might have encreaſed his power, and given aſſurance to the reſt of his proceedings: but purchaſed fame and high reputation, by which he drew unto him ſome that were diſcontented and ſtood upon bad terms with the great King; whom he loſt again as eaſily, by means of ſome ſlight injury done to them by his under Captains. Pharnabazus did not encloſe himſelf in any Town, for fear of being beſieged, but kept the field; lying as near as he could ſafely, to the enemies, with whom it was not his purpoſe to fight, but to make ſome good end by compoſition, which he found not uneaſie to do. For the pleaſures by him formerly done to the State of Sparta, in the times of their moſt neceſſity, had been ſo great, that when he (obtaining parley) did ſet before their eyes his his bounty towards them, and his love, (which had been such, that besides many other hazards of his person, he had for the rescue of their Fleet, when it was driven to run ashore at Abydus, adventured to ride into the Seas as far as he could find any ground, and fight on Horseback against the Athenians) together with his faith which had never been violated in word or deed: they knew not how to excuse their ingratitude, otherwise then by telling him, That having War with his Master, they were inforced against their will to offend him. Agesilaus did make a fair offer to him, that if he would revolt from the King to them, they would maintain him against the Persian, and establish him free Prince of the Country wherein he was at that time only Deputy to Artaxerxes. But Pharnabazus told him plainly, That if the King his Master did put him in trust to make War against them, he would not fail to do the best that he could as their enemy; if the charge were taken out of his hand, and he commanded to obey another, he would then shift side, and betake himself to their alliance. The issue of this parley was, That the Army should no longer abide in Phrygia, nor again return into it, whilest employment could be found elsewhere. The excuse made by Agesilaus, and the withdrawing of his forces out of those parts, were not sufficient to appease Pharnabazus, whom he had not invaded for want of more necessary business elsewhere; but because his Country would yield great booty, and for the hire of thirty Talents. By this means the Lacedæmonians changed an honourable Friend into a hot Enemy, who afterwards requited their unthankfulness with full revenge.

SECT. VI.

The great commotions raised in Greece by the Thebans and others, that were hired with Gold from the Persian.

IN the mean while Tithrauſtes perceiving that Agesilaus meant nothing less than to return into Greece, and let Artaxerxes rest quietly in Asia, took a wise course, whereby the City of Sparta was not only driven to look to her own, and give over her great hopes of subverting the Empire; but was beaten out of all that had been gotten by many late Victories, and saw her Dominion restrained unto the narrow bounds of her own Territory. He sent into Greece fifty Talents of Silver to be imployed in raising War against the Lacedæmonians; which Treasure was by the subtil practice of him that was put in trust with it, in such wise dispersed among the principal men of the Thebans, Argives, and Corinthians, that all those Estates having formerly born secret hate to that of Sparta, were now desirous of nothing so much as of open War. And lest this great heat of the incensed multitude should for want of present exercise, begin to faint and vanish away in idle words, occasion was found out to thrust the Lacedæmonians into Arms, that they themselves might seem Authors of the quarrel. Some land there was in the tenure of the Locrians, to which the Thebans had in former time laid claim; but the Phocians either having the better title, or finding the greater favour, had it adjudged unto them, and received yearly money for it. This money the Locrians were either hired or perswaded to pay now to the Thebans who readily accepted it. The Phocians not meaning so to lose their Rent, made a distress by strong hand, recovering a great deal more than their own; which the Thebans (as in protection of their new Tenants) requited with an invasion made upon Phocis, wasting that Country in the manner of open War. Such were the beginnings of professed hostility between Thebes and Sparta, and the first breaking out of their close enmity, that had long time, though hardly, been concealed. For when the Phocian Embassadors came to Sparta, complaining of the violence done by the Thebans, and requesting succour, they had very favourable audience, and ready consent to their suit, it being the manner of the Lacedæmonians to defer the acknowledgment of injuries received, until occasion of revenge were offer'd, and then to discover their indignation in cold blood. At this time they had very good opportunity to work their own wills, having no other War to disturb them in Greece, and hearing out of Asia no news that could offend or trouble them. Wherefore they sent Lysander to raise all the Countries about Phocis, and with such forces as he could levy, to attend the coming of Pausanias King of Sparta, (for Sparta, as hath been shewed before, had two Kings) who should follow him with the strength of Peloponnesus. Lysander did as he was appointed, and being of great reputation in those parts, he drew the Orchomenians to revolt from Thebes. Pausanias likewise raised all Peloponnesus, except the Corinthians (who refused to assist him in that enterprise) meaning to join with Lysander, and make a speedy end of the War. The consideration of so great a danger, approaching so swiftly, caused the Thebans to seek what help they could abroad, forasmuch as their own strength was far too little to make resistance against such mighty preparations. It was not unknown to them, that many followers of the Lacedæmonians were otherwise affected in heart, than they durst utter in countenance; but the good wishes of such people were little available, considering that the most which could be expected from them, was, that they should do as little hurt as they could: by which manner of tergiversation, the Corinthians did at that present cast themselves into the displeasure of the Spartans, to the no great benefit of Thebes. Wherefore it was thought the safest course to procure the assistance of some Estate that might presently declare it self on their side, which would cause many others to follow the example, and make their party strong. To this end they sent Embassadors to Athens, excusing old offences, as either not committed by publick allowance, or done in time of the general War, and recompenced with friendship lately shewn in their refusal of assisting Pausanias, when he came in behalf of the thirty Tyrants against the good Citizens of Athens. In regard of which, and for their own Honour sake, they requested them of aid in the present War, offering to do the best that they could for the restoring of Athens to her former estate and dignity. Thrasybulus and his Friends, who persecuted by the Thirty, had been well entertained at Thebes, procured now the City to make a large requital of the courtesie which they had received. For it was decreed, That the State of Athens should not only refuse to aid the Lacedæmonians in this War, but that it should assist the Thebans, and engage it self in their cause. Whilst Pausanias lay still waiting the arrival of his Confederates; Lysander being desirous to do somewhat that might advance the business in hand, came to Haliartus, where, though Pausanias did not meet him, as had been appointed, yet he attempted the Town, and was slain in fight by the Thebans, who came hastily to the rescue. As this victory did incourage the Thebans, so the coming of Pausanias with his his great Army did again amaze them, with presentation of extream danger; but their spirits were soon revived by the strong succour which was brought from Athens, in consideration of which, and of the late battel, Pausanias durst not hazard a new fight with them, but receiving the bodies of those that were slain by composition, departed out of their Territory; for which, either cowardise or indiscretion, he was at his return to Sparta condemned as a Traytor, and driven to flie unto Tegea, where he ended his days in banishment.

How Agesilaus was called out of Asia to help his Country. A Victory of the Spartans. Conon the Athenian assisted by Pharnabazus, overcomes the Lacedæmonian Fleet; recovers the mastery of the Seas, and rebuilds the walls of Athens.

THis good success, and the Confederacy made with Athens, gave such reputation to the Thebans, that the Argives, Corinthians, Eubœans, Locrians, and Acarnanes, did forthwith side with them, and raising a strong Army, determined to give battel to the Lacedæmonians as near as they might, to their own doors; considering that the force of Sparta it self was not great, but grew more and more by the adjunction of their Confederates. The Magistrates of Sparta perceiving the danger, sent for Agesilaus, who readily obeyed them, and promising his friends in Asia to return speedily to their assistance, passed the streights of Hellespont into Europe. In the mean time the Cities of the new League had given battel to the Lacedæmonians, and the remainder of their Associates; but with ill success. For when the right wing of each part had gotten the better hand, the Argives and Thebans returning from the chase in some disorder, were broken and defeated by the Lacedæmonians, who meeting them in good order, won from them the Honour which they had gotten by forcing the left wing of the Lacedæmonians, and made the victory of that day entirely their own. The reporters of this battel meeting Agesilaus at Amphipolis, were by him sent over into Asia, wherein it is not likely that they brought much comfort unto his friend, who had since his departure seen the Spartan Fleet beaten, and Lysander the Admiral slain. The same man, whose endeavour had brought the Athenians into order by advancing the Sea-forces of the Lacedæmonians with money, and all manner of supplies, was now the occasion that the power of Athens grew strong at Sea, when the City was despoiled of her old reputation, and scarcely able to maintain an Army by Land for her defence. Pharnabazus considering how much it imported the King his Master, to have the Greeks divided into such factions as might utterly disable them from undertaking abroad, thought it the safest way for himself, during these broils, to take such order, that he should not need any more to seek peace by intreaty and commemoration of old benefits, at their hands, who unprovoked, had sold his love for thirty Talents. To which purpose he furnished Conon the Athenian with eight Ships, who had escaped when the Fleet of Athens was surprized by Lysander at Ægos-Potamos; giving him the command of a great Navy, wherewith he requited the loss received at Ægos Potamos, by repaying the Lacedæmonians with the like destruction of their Fleet at Cnidus. After this Victory, Conon sailed to Athens, bringing with him, partly as the liberality of Pharnabazus, partly as the fruit of his Victory, so strong a Navy, and so much Gold, as encouraged the Athenians to rebuild their Walls, and think more hopefully upon recovering the Seigniory which they had lost.

SECT. VIII.

Of sundry small Victories gotten on each part. The Lacedæmonians lose all in Asia; the Athenians recover some part of their old Dominion.

NEvertheless the Lacedæmonians by many Victories at Land, maintained for some years the honour of their Estate, endangered very greatly by this loss at Sea. For Agesilaus obtained the better with his horsemen from the Thessalians, who were accounted the best riders in Greece. He wasted Bœotia, and fought a great Battel at Coronea against the Thebans and their Allies, whom he overthrew; and by his Marshal Gylis foraged the Country of Locris: which done, he returned home.

The gain of these Victories was not great, and the reputation of them was, by many losses, much defaced. For the Thebans did in the battel of Coronea vanquish the Orchomenians, who stood opposite unto them, and retired unbroken to Mount Helicon, opening way perforce when Agesilaus charged them in the return from the pursuit. Likewise Gylis was slain with a great part of his Army by the Locrians; and some other exploits by the Lacedæmonians performed against the Corinthians, were repayed with equal damage received in the parts adjoining; many Towns being easily taken, and as easily recovered. The variety of which enterfeats was such, that the Thebans themselves were drawn by the loss of the Haven of Corinth, to sue for peace, but could not get audience, till such time as the news came of a great Victory obtained by Iphicrates, General of the Athenian forces at Lechæum; whereupon the Theban Embassadors being sent for, and willed to do their message, required only in scorn to have a safe conduct given them, that they might enter into Corinth. From this time forward the War was made for a while only by incursions, wherein the Achæans, Confederates of Sparta, felt much loss, their whole State being endangered by the Acarnanians; who held with the contrary side, until Agesilaus repayed these invaders with equal, or greater calamities brought upon their own Lands, which did so afflict the Acarnanins, that they were driven to sue for peace. But the affairs at Sea were of most consequence, upon which the success of all depended. For when the Towns of Asia perceived that the Lacedæmonians were not only intangled in a hard War at home, but almost disabled to pass the Seas, having lost their Fleet at Cnidus; they soon gave ear to Pharnabazus, who promised to allow that they should use their own laws, if they would expel the Spartan Governours. Only the City of Abydus did stand firm, wherein Dercyllidas lay, who did his best to contain all the Towns about Hellespont, in the Alliance of the Lacedæmonians; which he could not do, because the Athenian Fleet under Thrasibulus, took in Bizantium, Chalcedon, and other places thereabout, reducing the Isle of Lesbos to their ancient acknowledgment of Athens.

SECT. IX.

The baſe conditions offered unto the Perſian by the Lacedæmonian. Of ſundry fights and other paſſages in the War. The Peace of Antalcidas.

ABout this time the Spartans began to perceive how uneaſie a thing it would be to maintain the War againſt men as good as themſelves, aſſiſted with the treaſures of Perſia: wherefore they craved peace of Artaxerxes, moſt baſely offering not only to renounce the Greeks inhabiting Aſia, and to leave them to the Kings diſpoſition; but withal to ſet the Iſlanders, and every Town in Greece, as well the little as the great, at full and abſolute liberty, whereby they ſaid that all their principal Eſtates of their Country would be ſo weakened, that no one, nor all of them ſhould be able to ſtir againſt the great King. And ſure it was, that the power of the Country being ſo broken and rent into many ſmall pieces, could neither have diſquieted the Perſian by an offenſive War, nor have made any good defence againſt him, but would have left it eaſie for him in continuance of time to have taken the Cities one after another, till he had made himſelf Maſter of all. The Spartans were not ignorant of this, but were ſo carried with envy, that perceiving how the dominion of the Seas was like to return to Athens, they choſe rather to give all from themſelves and others, and make all alike weak, than to permit that any of their own Nation ſhould grow ſtronger than themſelves, who ſo lately had commanded all. Yet this great offer was not at the firſt accepted; both in regard that the other Eſtates of Greece, who had in the Kings behalf joined together againſt the Lacedæmonians, did by their ſeveral Embaſſadors oppoſe themſelves unto it; and for that it was thought ſafeſt for Artaxerxes rather to weaken the Lacedæmonians yet more, than by interpoſing himſelf to bring friends and foes on the ſudden to an equality. Eſpecially Struthas, whom Artaxerxes had ſent as his Lieutenant into the low Countrys, did ſeek to repay the harm done by Ageſilaus in thoſe parts: which his intent appearing plain, and all hope of the peace being thereby cut off, Thimbro was ſent into Aſia to make War upon Struthas; and others were appointed to other places: whereby the War being ſcattered about, all the Iſles and Towns on the firm land, grew almoſt to the manner of Pyracy, and Robbery, affording many skirmiſhes, but few great actions worthy of remembrance. Thimbro was ſlain by Struthas, and in his place Diphridas was ſent, who demeaned himſelf more warily. Dercyllidas was removed from his charge at Abydus, becauſe he had not impeached Thraſybulus in his enterprizes about Helleſpont; Anaxibius who ſucceeded him, was ſurprized and ſlain in a skirmiſh by Iphicrates the Athenian. Thraſybulus departing from Lesbos toward Rhodes, was ſlain by the way at Aſpendus. The City of Rhodes had long before joined with the Lacedæmonians, who erected there (as was their manner) an Ariſtocracy, or the Government of a few of the principal Citizens; whereas contrariwiſe the Athenians were accuſtomed to put the Soveraignty into the hands of the people, each of them ſeeking to aſſure themſelves by erecting in the Town of their Confederates a Government like unto their own: which doing (where more eſpecial cauſe did not hinder) cauſed the Nobility to favour Sparta, and the Commons to incline to Athens. The people of Ægina roved upon the Coaſt of Attica, which cauſed the Athenians to land an Army in Ægina, and beſiege their Town: but this ſiege being raiſed by the aſſiſtance of the Lacedæmonian Fleet, the Iſlanders began anew to moleſt Attica, which cauſed the Athenians to man their Ships again, that returned beaten, having loſt four of thirteen. The loſs of theſe Ships was ſoon recompenced by a Victory which Chabrias the Athenian General had in Ægina, whereupon the Iſlanders were fain to keep home, and leave to the Athenians the Seas free. It may well ſeem ſtrange that the City of Athens, having but newly raiſed her Walls, having not by any fortunate and important Battel ſecured her Eſtate from dangers by land; but only depending upon the aſſiſtance of ſuch Confederates as carried unto different ends, had often diſcovered themſelves irreſolute in the common cauſe, would ſend a Fleet and an Army to Cyprus, in defence of Evagoras, when the Maſtery of the Seas was ſo ill aſſured, that an Iſland in the eye of Pyræus, had ability to vex the Coaſt of Attica. But as the overweening of that City did cauſe it uſually to embrace more than it could compaſs; ſo the inſolency and ſhameleſs injuſtice of the people, had now bred in the chief Commanders a deſire to keep themſelves far out of ſight, and to ſeek employments at ſuch diſtance as might ſecure them from the eyes of the envious, and from publick judgments, out of which few or none eſcaped. For which cauſe Timotheus did paſs away much part of his time in the Iſle of Lesbos; Iphicrates in Thrace; and Chabrias now did carry away into Cyprus a greater force than his Country could well have ſpared: with which he returned not when the buſineſs in Cyprus came to an end, but ſought new adventures in Egypt; whereby aroſe neither thanks to himſelf, nor profit to his City, though honour both to him and it. The Athenians being thus careleſs of things at hand, had a notable blow given unto them, ſhortly after that Chabrias was gone to Cyprus, even within their own Haven. For Telutias a Lacedæmonian being made Governour of Ægina, conceived a ſtrong hope of ſurprizing the Navy of Athens as it lay in Piræus; thinking aright, that it was a harder matter to encounter with ten Ships prepared for the fight, than with twenty lying in harbour, whoſe Mariners were aſleep in their Cabbins, or drinking in Taverns. Wherefore he ſailed by night into the mouth of the Port, which entring at the break of day, he found (according to his expectation) moſt of the men on ſhore, and few or none left aboard to make reſiſtance: by which means he took many Ships laden with Merchandizes, many fiſhermen, paſſengers, and other Veſſels, alſo three or four Gallies; having ſunk or broken, and made unſerviceable, as many of the reſt as the time would ſuffer. About this time Pharnabazus the Lieutenant of Phrygia, had one of the Kings Daughters given to him in Marriage, with whom he lived about the Court; and many Officers that favoured the Lacedæmonians, were placed in the lower Aſia; by whoſe aſſiſtance the Fleet of Sparta grew victorious about Helleſpont; in ſuch wiſe, that perhaps they ſhould not have needed the peace, which they themſelves procured by Antalcidas from the great King; the conditions whereof were ſuch as are mentioned before, giving freedom to all the Cities of Greece, and dividing the Country into as many ſeveral States as were petty Boroughs in it. Thus Artaxerxes having bought his own peace with money, did likewiſe by his money become Arbitrator and decider of Controverſies between the Greeks, diſpoſing of their buſineſs in ſuch wiſe, as ſtood beſt with his own good. The tenor of Artaxerxes his Decree was, That all

Aſia

Asia and Cyprus should be his own; the Isles of Lemnos, Imbrus, and Scirus, be subject to Athens; all other Greek Towns, as well the little as the great, be set at liberty; and that whosoever should refuse this peace, upon them the approvers of it should make War, the King assisting them by Land and Sea, with men, and ships, and treasure. The Athenians were so discouraged by their losses at Sea; the Lacedæmonians by revolt of their Confederates, and the necessity of maintaining many Garisons, for which they wanted money; and other States by the miseries of the War, whereof they saw no end; that all (excepting the Thebans) did consent unto these Articles. This was called the peace of Antalcidas: whereof the Lacedæmonians taking upon themselves the execution, did not only compell the Argives to depart out of Corinth, (which under pretence of defending, they held by Garisons, lately thrust into it, not as Patrons, but as Lords), and the Thebans to leave Bœotia free, of which Province Thebes had always held the Government, the Thebans themselves being also comprehended under the name of the Bœotians; but caused the Mantineans to throw down their own City, and to dwell in Villages: alledging that they had formerly been accustomed so to do, though purposing indeed to chastise them, as having been ill-affected to Sparta in the late War. By these courses the Lacedæmonians did hope that all the small Towns in Greece would, when occasion should require it, willingly follow them in their Wars, as Authors of their Liberty; and that the great Cities having lost all their dependants, would be unable to make opposition.

SECT. X.

The War which the Lacedæmonians made upon Olynthus. They take Thebes by Treason, and Olynthus by Famine.

WHilst these Wars, which ended without either victory or profit, consumed the riches and power of Greece, the City of Olynthus in Thrace was grown so mighty, that she did not only command her neighbour-Towns, but was also become terrible to places far removed, and to Sparta it self. Great part of Macedonia, together with Pella, the principal City of that Kingdom, was taken by the Olynthians, who following the usual pretence of the Lacedæmonians, to set at liberty the places over which King Amyntas did tyrannize, had almost now driven him out of his Dominions, and taken all to themselves. The Citizens of Acanthus, and of Apollonia, being neerest unto the danger of those incroaching neighbours, acquainted the Lacedæmonians with their fear, affirming that this Dominion of the Olynthians would be too strong for all Greece, if continuance of time should give it reputation, which only it wanted: wherefore they requested assistance, but in such terms as did sound of compulsion, protesting that either they must War upon Olynthus, or become subject unto her, and fight in her defence. Hereupon was made a hasty levy of men, two thousand being sent presently away, with promise to be seconded by a greater Army. Whilst these two thousand gave such beginning to the War, as agreed with their small number, the body of the Army following them, surprized the Cittadel of Thebes, which was betrayed into the hand of Phœbidas the Lacedæmonian, by some of the Magistrates, who sought to strengthen their faction by the slavery of their Country. The Thebans were ill affected to Sparta, but had not in any point violated the peace lately made between them; which caused the Lacedæmonians to doubt, whether this act of Phœbidas were more worthy of reward or of punishment. In conclusion, profit so far overweighed honesty, that the deed was approved, many principal Citizens of Thebes condemned to death, many driven into banishment, and the Traitors rewarded with the Government of the City: by whose authority, and the force of the Garison, the Thebans were compelled to serve the Lacedæmonians in all, and more than all that they could require. This access of power having strengthened the Lacedæmonians, caused them to entertain the greater forces about Olynthus, (which notwithstanding the loss of one great Battel, and some other disasters) they compelled at length by famine to render it self unto their obedience.

SECT. XI.

AFter this Olynthian War, which endured almost three years, it seemed that no Estate in Greece was able to make head against that of Sparta: but it was not long ere the Thebans found a means to shake off their yoak, and gave both example and means to others to do the like. One of the banisht men found by conference with a Scribe of the Theban Magistrates, coming to Athens, that the tyranny wherewith his Country was oppressed, pleased him no better than it did those, who for fear of it were fled from home. Whereupon a plot was laid between these two, that soon found very good success, being managed thus. Seven of the banished men forsook Athens privily, and entred by night into the fields of Thebes; where spending the next day secretly, they came late in the evening to the Gates like Husbandmen returned from work, and so passed undiscovered unto the house of Charon, whom Phyllidas the Scribe had drawn into the Conspiracy. The day following, a solemn Feast being then held in the City, Phyllidas promised the Governours, who were insolent and lustful men, that he would convey unto them that night the most beautiful Dames of the Town, with whom they should take their pleasure. Having cheared them with such hope, and plenty of good Wine, he told them when the time of performance (which they urged) came, that he could not make good his promise, unless they would dismiss their followers, because the Gentlewomen who attended without the Chamber, would not endure that any of the servants should see their faces. Upon this occasion the attendants were dismissed, and the Conspirators attired like Ladies, and their Maids, brought into the place; who taking advantage of the Governours loose behaviour, slew them all upon the sudden with Daggers, which they brought hidden under their Garments. Then presently casting off their disguise, they went to other places, where feigning themselves to come to the Governours upon business, they got admittance, and likewise slew those which were of the Lacedæmonian faction. By the like device they brake into the Prison, slew the Gaoler, and set at liberty such as they thought meet; and being followed by these desperate men, proclaimed liberty, making the death of the Tyrants known. The Captain of the Castle hearing the sudden Proclamation, thought the Rebels to be stronger than indeed they were: the Citizens contrariwiſe miſtruſted, that it was a practice to diſcover ſuch as would be forward upon occaſion of revolting. But as ſoon as day-light revealed the plain truth, all the people took Arms and beſieged the Caſtle, ſending haſtily to Athens for ſuccour. The Gariſon alſo ſent for aid unto the Towns adjoining, whence a few broken Troops coming to the reſcue, were defeated on the way by the horſemen of Thebes. On the other ſide, the baniſhed Thebans did not only make ſpeed to aſſiſt their Countrymen, but procured ſome Athenians to join with them, and thereby came ſo ſtrong into the City, that the Caſtle was yielded, more through fear than any neceſſity, upon condition that the Soldiers might quietly depart with their Arms; for which compoſition, the Captain at his return to Sparta was put to death. When the news of the doings at Thebes, and the ſucceſs arrived at Sparta, an Army was raiſed forthwith, and all things prepared as earneſtly for the recovering of that City, as if ſome part of their ancient Inheritance had been taken from the Lacedæmonians, and not a Town perfidiouſly uſurped by them, reſtored to her own liberty. Cleombrotus one of the Kings, was ſent on this Expedition, who having wearied his followers with a toilſom Winters journey, returned home without any good or harm done; leaving Sphodrias with part of his Army, at Theſpies, to infeſt the Thebans; who doing them ſome diſpleaſures, made large amends by a fooliſh attempt upon the Haven of Athens; which failing to take, he waſted the Country adjoining, and drave away Cattel, cauſing by this outrage the Athenians to enter with all their power into the War, out of which they were before very carefully ſeeking how they might poſſibly withdraw themſelves.

CHAP. XII.

Of the flouriſhing Eſtate of Thebes, from the Battel of Leuctra, to the Battel of Mantinæa.

SECT. I.

How Thebes and Athens joined together againſt Sparta. How the Athenians made peace for themſelves, and others, out of which the Thebans were excluded. The Battel of Leuctra, and beginning of the Theban greatneſs.

THe Lacedæmonians were men of great reſolution, and of much gravity in all their proceedings; but one diſhonourable Rule they held, That all reſpects withſtanding the commodity of Sparta, were to be neglected; the practice of which Doctrine, even by the beſt and wiſeſt of them, did greatly blemiſh that Eſtate: but when it was put in execution by inſufficient overweening men, it ſeldom failed to bring upon them, inſtead of profit unjuſtly expected, both ſhame and loſs. And ſo it befell them in theſe enterprizes of Phœbidas, upon the Caſtle of Thebes, and Sphodrias upon the Piræus. For howſoever Ageſilaus did ſpoil the Country about Thebes, in which he ſpent two Summers; yet the diligence of the Thebans repaired all, who by the good ſucceſs of ſome attempts grew ſtronger than they were at the firſt.

The Athenians likewiſe began to look abroad, ſailing to the Iſle of Corcyra, where they ordered things at their pleaſure, and having in ſome fights at Sea prevailed, began as in the Peloponneſian War, to ſurround Peloponneſus with a Navy; afflicting ſo the Lacedæmonians, that had not the Thebans by their inſolency wearied their friends, and cauſed them to ſeek for peace, it had been very likely that the end of this War ſhould have ſoon come to a good end, which nevertheleſs being proſecuted by the Thebans (who oppoſed at once both theſe two great Eſtates) left the City of Sparta as much dejected, as the beginnings found it proud and tyrannous. But the Athenians perceiving how Thebes encroached every day upon her weak Neighbours, not ſparing ſuch as had been dependants upon Athens, and finding themſelves, whileſt engaged in ſuch a War, unable to relieve their complaining friends, reſolved to ſettle the affairs of Greece, by renewing that form of peace which Antalcidas had brought from the Perſian. Wherefore they ſent Meſſengers to Thebes, peremptorily ſignifying, That it was their intent to finiſh the War, to which purpoſe they willed the Thebans to ſend Embaſſadors along with them to Sparta; who readily condeſcended, fearing otherwiſe that they ſhould be left out of the Treaty of Peace: which came to paſs, being ſo wrought by the couragious wiſdom of Epaminondas, who underſtood it far better than his Countrymen, what was to be feared or hoped. In this Treaty the Lacedæmonians and Athenians did ſoon agree; but when the Thebans offered to ſwear to the Articles in the name of the Bœotians, Ageſilaus required them to ſwear in their own name, and to leave the Bœotians free, whom they had lately reduced under their obedience. Whereunto Epaminondas made anſwer, That the City of Sparta ſhould give example to Thebes by ſetting the Laconians free; for that the Seigniory of Bœotia did by as good right appertain to the Thebans, as that of Laconia to the Spartans. This was well and truly ſpoken; but was heard with no patience: for Ageſilaus bearing a vehement hatred unto thoſe of Thebes, by whom he was drawn back out of Aſia into Greece, and diſappointed of all the glory which he had hoped to atchieve by the Perſian War, did now paſſionately urge that point of ſetting the Bœotians at liberty; and finding it as obſtinately refuſed, he daſht the name of the Thebans out of the League. At the ſame time Cleombrotus the other King of Sparta lay in Phocis, who received command from the Governours of Sparta forthwith to enter upon the Land of the Thebans with all his power; which he did, and was there ſlain at Leuctra, and with him him the flower of his Army. This Battel of Leuctra being one of the most famous that ever were fought between the Greeks, was not so notable for any circumstance foregoing it, or for the managing of the fight it self, as for the death of the King, and many Citizens of Sparta; but especially, for that after this Battel (between which and the conclusion of the general Peace, there passed but twenty days) the Lacedæmonians were never able to recover the strength and reputation which had formerly made them redoubted far and near: whereas contrariwise the Thebans, whose greatest ambition had in former times confined it self unto the little Region of Bœotia, did now begin to undertake the leading and command of many People and Estates, in such wise, that soon after they brought an Army of threescore and ten thousand strong unto the Gates of Sparta. So much do the afflictions of an hard War, valiantly endured, advance the affairs of the distressed, and guide them into the way of conquest, by stiffning that resolution with a manly temper, which wealth and ease had through luxury, wretchlesness, and many other vices or vanities, made rusty and effeminate.

SECT. II.

How the Athenians took upon them to maintain the Peace of Greece. New troubles hence arising. Epaminondas invadeth and wasteth the Territory of Lacedæmon.

THe Athenians refusing to take advantage of this overthrow faln upon their old Enemies, and new Confederates the Lacedæmonians, did nevertheless finally give them to understand, that their Dominion was expired, and therefore their pride might well be laid away. For taking upon themselves the maintenance of the Peace lately concluded, which Agesilaus (perhaps of purpose to make benefit of quarrels that might arise) had left unperfect, they assembled the Deputies of all the Estates confederated at Athens; where the general liberty of all Towns, as well small as great, was ratified under the stile of the Athenians, and their Associates. Hereupon began fresh garboils. The Mantineans, claiming power by this Decree to order their affairs at their own pleasure did (as it were) in despight of the Spartans, who had enforced them to raze their Town, re-edifie it, and allie themselves with such of the Arcadians as stood worst affected to Sparta. The Arcadians, a strong Nation, consisting of many Cities, were distracted with factions; some desiring to hold good correspondency with the Lacedæmonians; some to weaken and keep them low; yet all pretending other ends. The Lacedæmonians durst not give impeachment to the Mantineans, nor take upon them to correct their ill-willers among the Arcadians, till such time as the factions brake out into violence, and each party called in foreign help. Then was an Army sent from Sparta, as it were in defence of the people of Tegea, against the Mantineans, but indeed against them both. Agesilaus had the leading of it, but effected nothing. The Thebans had by this time subdued the Phocians, and were become head of the Locrians, Acarnanians, Eubœans, and many others; with the power of which Countrys they entred Peloponnesus in favour of the Arcadians, who had upon expectation of their coming, abstained from giving Battel to Agesilaus. The Army of the Spartans being dismissed, and Epaminondas joined with the Arcadians, the Region of Laconia was invaded and spoiled: a thing so strange, that no Oracle could have found belief if any had foretold it. Almost 600 years were spent, since the Dorians under the posterity of Hercules had seized upon Laconia; in all which time the sound of an Enemies Trumpet was not heard in that Country. Ten years were not fully past, since all Greece was at the devotion of the Spartans: but now the Region which neither Xerxes with his huge Army could once look upon, nor the mighty forces of Athens, and other enemy-States had dared to set foot on, saving by stealth, was all on a light fire, the very smoke whereof the Women of Sparta were ashamed to behold. All which indignity notwithstanding, the Lacedæmonians did not issue out of Sparta to fight, but sought how to preserve the Town, setting at liberty as many of their Heilotes, or slaves, as were willing to bear Arms in defence of the State, and somewhat pitifully entreated the Athenians, to give them succour. From Corinth, and some Towns of Peloponnesus, they received speedy assistance; the Athenians came forward more slowly, so that Epaminondas returned without battel, having rebuilded the City of Messene, and peopled it anew by calling home the ancient Inhabitants, whom the Lacedæmonians many ages before had chased away to other Countrys, possessing their Territories themselves.

SECT. III.

The Composition between Athens and Sparta for command in War against the Thebans; who again invade and spoil Peloponnesus. The unfortunate presumption of the Arcadians.

THis journey therefore utterly defaced the reputation of the Spartans, in such wise, that they did no longer demand the conduct of the Army, which was to be raised, nor any manner of precedence: but sending Embassadors from Sparta, and from all the Cities which held League with it, unto Athens, they offered to yield the Admiralty to the Athenians, requesting that they themselves might be Generals by Land. This had been a composition well agreeing with the situation and quality of those two Cities; but it was rejected, because the Mariners and others that were to be employed at Sea, were men of no mark or estimation, in regard of those companies of horse and foot, whereof the Land-Army was compounded; who being all Gentlemen or Citizens of Athens, were to have served under the Lacedæmonians. Wherefore it was agreed that the Authority should be divided by time, the Athenians ruling five days, the Lacedæmonians other five, and so successively that each of them should have command of all, both by Land and by Sea. It is manifest, that in this conclusion, vain ambition was more regarded than the common profit; which must of necessity be very slowly advanced, where consultation, resolution, and performance are so often to change hands. This appeared by a second invasion of Peloponnesus, wherein the Thebans found their enemies so unable to impeach them, that having fortified Isthmus from Sea to Sea, as in former times they had done against Xerxes, they were driven out of their strength by Epaminondas, who foraged the Country without resistance. But as the Articles of this League between Athens and Sparta did, by dividing the conduct in such manner, disable the Society, and make it insufficient to those ends for which it was concluded; so the example of it wrought their good, by filling the enemies heads with the like vanity. For the Arcadians considering their own numbers which they brought into the field, and having found by many trials that their people were not inferiour to others in strength of body, in courage, or in good Soldiership, thought it good reason that they should in like manner share the Government with their friends the Thebans; and not always continue followers of others, by increasing whose greatness they should strengthen their own yoke. Hereupon they began to demean themselves very insolently, whereby they grew hateful to their Neighbour, and suspected of the Thebans in an ill time. For a motion of general peace having been made (which took not effect, because the City Messene was not abandoned to the Lacedæmonians) the next enterprize of the Spartans and their friends was upon these Arcadians, who relying too much upon their own worth, were overthrown in a great battel, their calamity being as pleasing to their Confederates, as to their Enemies.

SECT. IV.

The great growth of the Theban Estate. Embassages of the Greeks to the Persian; with the reasons why he most favoured the Thebans. Troubles in the Persian Empire. The fruitless issue of the Embassages.

THe Thebans especially rejoiced at the Arcadians misfortune; considering that without their aid, the success of all enterprizes proved so ill; whereas they themselves had by their own power accomplished very well whatsoever they took in hand, and were become not only victorious over the Lacedæmonians, but Patrons over the Thessalonians, and moderators of great quarrels that had risen in Macedonia; where compounding the differences about that Kingdom, as pleased them best, they carried Philip the son of Amyntas, and father of Alexander the Great, as an Hostage unto Thebes. Having therefore obtained such reputation, that little seemed wanting to make them absolute Commanders of all Greece, they sought means of alliance with the Persian King, to whom they sent Embassador the great and famous Captain Pelopidas, whose reputation drew Artaxerxes to grant unto the Thebans all that they desired; whereof two especial points were, That Messene should remain free from the Lacedæmonians, and that the Athenians should forbear to send their ships of War to Sea; only the latter of these two was somewhat qualified with reference to further advice. The other States of Greece did also send their Embassadors at the same time, of whom few or none received much contentment. For the King having found by long experience, how far it concerned him to maintain a sure party in Greece, did upon many weighty considerations resolve to bind the Thebans firmly unto him; justly expecting that their greatness should be on that side his own security. The Athenians had been ancient Enemies to his Crown; and having turned the profit of their victories upon the Persians to the purchase of a great Estate in Greece, maintained their Seigniory in such puissant manner, that (sundry grievous misfortunes notwithstanding) they had endured a terrible War, wherein the Lacedæmonians being followed by most of the Greeks, and supplied with treasure, and all sorts of aid by Darius Nothus, were not able to vanquish them till their own indiscretion brought them on their knees. The Lacedæmonians being victorious over Athens, had no sooner established their Dominion at home, than they undertook the conquest of Asia, from which though by the commotion raised in Greece with Persian Gold, they were called back; yet having renewed their power, and setled things in Greece, it was not unlikely that they should upon the next advantage have pursued the same enterprize, had not they been impeached by this Theban War. But the Thebans contrariwise had always discovered a good affection to the Crown of Persia. They had sided with Xerxes in his invasion of Greece; with Darius and the Lacedæmonians against Athens: And finally, having offered much contumely to Agesilaus when he put to Sea, they drew him home by making War on the Confederates of Sparta. Besides all these their good deservings, they were no Seamen, and therefore unlikely to look abroad; whereupon if perchance they should have any desire, yet were they disabled by the want of good Haven-Towns; which they could not seize upon without open breach of that peace, whereof they intended to become the Executors, giving liberty to all Cities that had at any time been free. Wherefore Artaxerxes did wholly condescend unto the requests of Pelopidas, as far forth as he might, without giving open defiance to the rest of Greece; and by that mean he purchased his own quiet, being never afterward molested by that Nation in the lower Asia. The ill means which the Greeks had to disturb Artaxerxes was very beneficial to the Estate of Persia shortly after these times, in that great rebellion of all the Maritimate Provinces. For had then the affairs of Greece been so composed, that any one City might without impeachment of the rest have transported an Army to assist the revolting Satrapæ, or Vice-roys of Caria, Phrygia, Lydia, Mysia, Lycia, Pisidia, Pamphylia, Cilicia, Syria, and Phœnicia; humane reason can hardly find the means, by which the Empire could have been preserved from that ruine, which the Divine Counsel had deferred unto the days of Alexander. But this great Conspiracy of so many large and wealthy Provinces, wanting a firm body of good and hardy Soldiers, was in short space discussed, and vanished like a mist, without effect: these effeminate Asiaticks, wearied quickly with the travels and dangers incident to War, forsaking the common cause, and each man striving to be the first, that by treason to his company should both redeem the former treason to his Prince, and purchase withal his own promotion with encrease of riches. Of this commotion which in course of time followed some actions not as yet related, I have rather chosen to make short mention in this place, than hereafter to interrupt the Narration of things more important; but for that it was like a sudden storm, rashly commenced, idly followed, and foolishly laid down, having made a great noise without effect, and having small reference to any other action agreeable; as also because in the whole reign of Artaxerxes, from the War of Cyrus to the invasion of Egypt, I find nothing (this insurrection, and a fruitless journey against the Cadusians excepted) worthy of any mention, much less of digression from the course of the business in Greece. All, or the most of his time passed away so quietly, that he enjoyed the pleasures which an Empire so great and wealthy could afford unto such an absolute Lord, with little disturbance. The troubles which he found were only, or chiefly Domestical; growing out of the hatred which Parysatis the Queen-Mother bare unto his Wife Statira, and to such as had been the greatest enemies to her Son Cyrus, or gloried in his death: upon whom, when by poyson and mischievous practices she had satisfied her feminine appetite of revenge, thenceforth she wholly applied her self to the Kings disposition, cherishing in him the lewd desire of marrying his own Daughter, and filling him with the perswasion which Princes not endued with an especial grace, do readily entertain; That his own will was the supream law of his subjects, and the rule by which all things were to be measured and adjudged to be good or evil. In this imaginary happiness Pelopidas, and the other Embassadors of Greece, both found and left him; but left him by so much more assured than they found him, by how much the conclusion of this Treaty with them, being altogether to his own advantage, did seem to promise, if not the perpetuity, a long endurance of the same felicity to him and his, or (at the least) a full security of danger from Greece, whence only could any danger be feared. But such foundations of eternity laid by mortal men in this transitory world, like the Tower of Babel, are either shaken from heaven, or made vain and unprofitable, ere the frame can be raised to full height, by confusion of tongues among the builders. Hereof was found a good example in the Thebans, and other Estates of Greece that had sent Embassadors to the Persian. For whereas it had been concluded, that all Towns, as well the little as the great, should be set at liberty, and the Thebans made Protectors of this common peace, who thereby should become the Judges of all Controversies that might arise, and Leaders in War of all that would enter into this Confederacy; the Kings Letters being solemnly published at Thebes, in the presence of Embassadors drawn thither from all parts of Greece: when an Oath was required for observation of the form of peace therein set down, a dilatory answer was made by the Embassadors, who said, that they were sent to hear the articles, not to swear unto them. Hereby the Thebans were driven to send unto each of the Cities to require the Oath; but in vain. For when the Corinthians had boldly refused it, saying, that they did not need it; others took courage by their example to do the like, disappointing the Thebans of their glorious hopes, to whom this negotiation with Artaxerxes gave neither addition nor confirmation of greatness, but left them as it found them to relie upon their own swords.

SECT. V.

How all Greece was divided between the Athenians and Lacedæmonians on the one side, and Thebans on the other. Of the great tumult arising in Arcadia.

THe condition of things in Greece at that time did stand thus: Athens and Sparta, which in former times had commanded all that Nation, and each upon envy of the others greatness, drawn all their followers into a cruel and intestine War, by which the whole Country, and especially the Estates of these two Cities was brought very low, did now conjoin their forces against the Thebans, who sought to make themselves Lords of all. The Eleans, Corinthians, and Achaians, followed the party of these ancient Governing Cities; either for the old reputation of them, and benefits received, or in dislike of those, who by strong hand were ready to become Rulers, to which authority they could not suddenly aspire without some injury and much envy. The City of Thebes abounding with men, whom necessity had made warlike, and many Victories in few years had filled with great spirits; and being so mighty independants, that she had reduced all the Continent of Greece without Peloponnesus (the Region of Attica, and very little part beside, excepted) under such acknowledgment as wanted not much of meer Vassallage, did hope to bring all Peloponnesus to the like obedience, wherein already she had set good footing by her conjunction with the States of Argos, and of Arcadia. The Argives had been always bad Neighbours to the Spartans, to whom they thought themselves in ancient Nobility superiors, but were far under them in valour, having been often beaten out of the field by them, and put in danger of losing all: which caused them to suspect and envy nothing more than the greatness and honour of Sparta, taking Truce with her when she was at rest, and had leisure to bend her whole force against them; but firmly joining with her enemies whensoever they found her entangled in a difficult War. As the Argives were, in hatred of Sparta, sure friends of Thebes; so the Arcadians transported with a great opinion of their own worthiness, had formerly renounced and provoked against them their old Confederates and Leaders, the Lacedæmonians, and were now become very doubtful adherents to the Thebans. In which regard, it was thought convenient by Epaminondas and the State of Thebes, to send an Army into Peloponnesus, before such time as these wavering friends should fall further off, and become either Neutral, or which was to be feared, open enemies. And surely great cause there was to suspect the worst of them, considering that without consent of the Thebans, they had made peace with Athens, which was very strange, and seemed no less to the Athenians themselves, who holding a firm League with Sparta at the same time when the Arcadians treated with them, did nevertheless accept this new Confederacy, not relinquishing the old, because they found that howsoever these Arcadians were enemies to the Lacedæmonians, they should hereby be drawn somewhat further from their alliance with Thebes, which without them was unlikely to invade Peloponnesus with a strong Army. But this did rather hasten, than by any means stay the coming of Epaminondas; who finding the way somewhat more clear for him (because the City of Corinth, which lay upon the Isthmus, and had been adverse to Thebes, was now by miseries of this grievous War, driven to become Neutral) took occasion hereby, and by some disorders among the Arcadians, to visit Peloponnesus with an Army, consisting of all the power of Thebes. A great tumult had risen in Arcadia about consecrated money, which many principal men among them had laid hands on, under pretence of employing it to publick uses. In compounding the differences grown upon this occasion, such as had least will to render account of the money which had come into their hands, procured the Captains of some Theban Soldiers lying in Tegea, to take prisoners many of their Countrymen, as people desirous of innovation. This was done, but the uproar thereby caused was so great, that the prisoners were forthwith enlarged, and the Arcadians, who had in great numbers taken Arms, with much ado scarce pacified. When complaint of the Captains proceedings came to Thebes, Epaminondas turned all the blame upon them who had made the peace with Athens, letting them know, that he would be shortly among them to judg of their fidelity, by the assistance which they should give him in that War which he intended to make in Peloponnesus. These Lordly words did greatly amaze the Arcadians; who needing not the aid of so mighty a power as he drew along with him, did vehemently suspect that great preparation to be made against themselves. Hereupon such of them as had before sought means to settle the affairs of their Country, by drawing things to ſome good concluſion of peace, did now forthwith ſend to Athens for help, and withal diſpatched ſome of the principal among them as Embaſſadors to Sparta, by whom they offered themſelves to the common defence of Peloponneſus, now ready to be invaded. This Embaſſage brought much comfort to the Lacedæmonians, who feared nothing more than the coming of Epaminondas, againſt whom they well knew, that all their forces and beſt proviſions would be no more than very hardly ſufficient. Forbearing therefore to diſpute about Prerogatives, they (who had been accuſtomed unto ſuch a ſupremacy, as they would in no wiſe communicate with the powerful City of Athens, till other hope of ſecuring their own Eſtate could not be thought upon) did now very gently yield to the Arcadians, that the command of the Army in chief ſhould be given for the time to that City in whoſe Territory it lay.

by

SECT. VI.

A terrible Invaſion of Peloponneſus by Epaminondas.

CErtain it is, that the condition of things did at that time require a very firm conſent, and uniform care of the common ſafety. For beſide the great forces raiſed out of the other parts of Greece, the Argives and Meſſenians prepared with all their ſtrength to join with Epaminondas; who having lain a while at Nemea to intercept the Athenians, received their intelligence, that the Army coming from Athens would paſs by Sea, whereupon he diſlodged, and came to Tegea, which City, and the moſt of all Arcadia beſides, forthwith declared themſelves his. The common opinion was, that the firſt attempt of the Thebans, would be upon ſuch of the Arcadians as had revolted; which cauſed the Lacedæmonian Captains to fortifie Mantinæa with all diligence, and to ſend for Ageſilaus to Sparta, that he bringing with him all that ſmall force of able men which remained in the Town, they might be ſtrong enough to abide Epaminondas there. But Epaminondas held ſo good eſpial upon his Enemies, that had not an unknown fellow brought haſty advertiſment of his purpoſe to Ageſilaus, who was then well onward in the way to Mantinæa, the City of Sparta had ſuddenly been taken. For thither with all ſpeed and ſecrecy did the Thebans march, who had ſurely carried the City, notwithſtanding any defence that could have been made by that handful of men remaining within it, but that Ageſilaus in all flying-haſte got into it with his Companies, whom the Army of his Confederates followed thither to the reſcue as faſt it was able. The arrival of the Lacedæmonians and their friends, as it cut off all hope from Epaminondas of taking Sparta, ſo it preſented him with a fair advantage upon Mantinæa. It was the time of Harveſt, which made it very likely, that the Mantinæans finding the War to be carried from their Walls into another quarter, would uſe the commodity of that vacation, by fetching in their Corn, and turning out their Cattel into the fields, whilſt no enemy was near that might impeach them. Wherefore he turned away from Sparta to Mantinæa, ſending his horſemen before him, to ſeize upon all that might be found without the City. The Mantinæans according to the expectation of Epaminondas) were ſcattered abroad in the Country, far more intent upon their Harveſt-buſineſs, than upon the War, whereof they were ſecure, as thinking themſelves out of diſtance. By which preſumption it fell out, that great numbers of them, and all their Cattel, being unable to recover the Town, were in a deſperate caſe; and the Town it ſelf in no great likelihood of holding out, when the enemy ſhould have taken all their proviſion of victuals, with ſo many of the people as had not over-dearly been redeemed, by that Cities returning to ſociety with Thebes. But at the ſame time the Athenians coming to the ſuccour of their Confederates, whom they thought to have found at Mantinæa were very earneſtly entreated by the Citizens to reſcue their goods and people from the danger whereinto they were fallen, if it were poſſible by any couragious adventure to deliver thoſe who otherwiſe were given as loſt. The Thebans were known at that time to be the beſt Soldiers of all the Greeks, and the commendation of good Horſemanſhip had always been given to the Theſſalians, as excelling in that quality all other Nations; yet the regard of honour ſo wrought upon the Athenians, that for the reputation of their City, which had entred into this War upon no neceſſity of her own, but only in deſire of relieving her diſtreſſed friend, they iſſued forth of Mantinæa, not abiding ſo long as to refreſh themſelves, or their Horſes with meat; and giving a luſty charge upon the enemy, who as bravely received them, after a long and hot fight, they remained Maſters of the field, giving by this Victory a ſafe and eaſie retreat to all that were without the Walls. The whole power of the Bœotians arrived in the place ſoon after this Battel, whom the Lacedæmonians and their Aſſiſtants were not far behind.

E*Paminondas* conſidering that his Commiſſion was almoſt now expired, and that his attempts of ſurprizing Sparta and Mantinæa having failed, the impreſſion of terror which his name had wrought in the Peloponneſians would ſoon vanquiſh, unleſs by ſome notable act he ſhould abate their courage in their firſt growth, and leave ſome memorable character of his Expedition, reſolved to give them Battel, whereby he reaſonably hoped both to ſettle the doubtful affections of his own Aſſociates, and to leave the Spartans as weak in ſpirit and ability as he found them, if not wholly to bring them into ſubjection. Having therefore warned his men to prepare for that Battel, wherein Victory ſhould be rewarded with Lordſhip of all Greece; and finding the alacrity of his Soldiers to be ſuch as promiſed the accompliſhment of his own deſire; he made ſhew of declining the enemy, and entrenching himſelf in a place of more advantage, that ſo by taking from them all expectation of fighting that day, he might allay the heat of their valour, and afterward ſtrike their ſenſes with amazement, when he ſhould come upon them unexpected. This opinion deceived him not. For with very much tumult, as in ſo great and ſudden a danger, the enemy ran to Arms, neceſſity enforcing their reſolution, and the conſequence of that days ſervice, urging them to do as well as they might. The Theban Army conſiſted of thirty thouſand foot, and three thouſand horſe; the Lacedæmonians and their friends were ſhort of this number, both in horſe and in foot, by a third part. The Mantinæans (becauſe the War was in their Country) ſtood in the right wing, and with them the Lacedæmonians; the Athenians had the left wing; the Achæans, Eleans, and others of leſs account filled the body of the Army. The Thebans ſtood in the left wing of their own Battel, oppoſite to the Lacedæmonians, having by them the Arcadians, the Eubœans, Locrians, Sicyonians, Meſſenians, and Theſſalians, with others, compounding the main Battel; the Argives held the right wing, the horſemen on each part were placed in the flanks, only a troop of the Eleans were in the rear. Before the footmen could join, the encounter of the horſe on both ſides was very rough, wherein finally the Thebans prevailed, notwithſtanding the valiant reſiſtance of the Athenians: who not yielding to the enemy either in courage or skill, were overlaid with numbers, and ſo beaten upon by Theſſalian ſlings, that they were driven to forſake the place, and leave their Infantry naked. But this retreat was the leſs diſgraceful, becauſe they kept themſelves together, and did not fall back upon their own footmen; but finding the Theban horſe to have given them over, and withal diſcovering ſome Companies of foot which had been ſent about by Epaminondas, to charge their Battel in the rear, they brake upon them, routed them, and hewed them all in pieces. In the mean ſeaſon the Battel of the Athenians had not only to do with the Argives, but was hardly preſſed by the Theban horſemen, in ſuch wiſe that it begun to open, and was ready to turn back, when the Elean ſquadron of horſe came up to the relief of it, and reſtored all on that part. With far greater violence did the Lacedæmonians and Thebans meet, theſe contending for Dominion, the other for the maintenance of their ancient honour; ſo that equal courage, and equal loſs on both ſides made the hope and appearance of Victory to either equally doubtful: unleſs perhaps the Lacedæmonians being very firm abiders, might ſeem the more likely to prevail, as having born the firſt brunt and fury of the onſet, which was not hitherto remitted; and being framed by diſcipline, as it were by nature, to excel in patience, whereof the Thebans by practice of a few years, cannot be thought to have gotten a habit ſo ſure and general. But Epaminondas perceiving the obſtinate ſtiffneſs of the Enemies to be ſuch, as neither the bad ſucceſs of their own horſe, nor all the force of the Bœotian Army, could abate ſo far, as to make them give one foot of ground; taking a choice company of the moſt able men, whom he caſt into the form of a Wedg, or Diamond, by the advantage of that figure againſt a ſquadron, and by his own exceeding virtue, accompanied with the great ſtrength and reſolution of them which followed him, did open their ranks, and cleave the whole Battel in deſpight of all reſiſtance. Thus was the honour of that day won by the Thebans, who may juſtly be ſaid to have carried the Victory, ſeeing that they remained Maſters of the ground whereon the Battel was fought, having driven the Enemy to lodg farther off. For that which was alledged by the Athenians, as a token that the Victory was partly theirs, the ſlaughter of thoſe Mercenaries upon whom they lighted by chance in their own flight, finding them behind their Army, and the retaining of their dead bodies; it was a ceremony regardable only among the Greeks, and ſerved meerly for oſtentation, ſhewing that by the fight they had obtained ſomewhat, which the enemy could not get from them otherwiſe than by requeſt. But the Thebans arrived at the general immediate end of the Battel; none daring to abide them in the field: whereof a manifeſt confeſſion is expreſſed from them, who forſook the place which they had choſen or accepted, as indifferent for trial of their ability and proweſs. This was the laſt work of the incomparable virtue of Epaminondas, who being in the head of that Warlike troop of men, which broke the Lacedæmonians ſquadron, and forced it to give back in diſaray, was furiouſly charged on the ſudden by a deſperate Company of the Spartans, who all at once threw their Darts at him alone; whereby receiving many wounds, he nevertheleſs with a ſingular courage maintained the fight, uſing againſt the enemies many of their Darts, which he drew out of his own body; till at length by a Spartan called Anticrates, he received ſo violent a ſtroke with a Dart, that the wood of it brake, leaving the iron, and piece of the trunchion in his breaſt. Hereupon he ſunk down, and was ſoon conveyed out of the fight by his friends; having by his fall ſomewhat animated the Spartans (who fain would have got his body); but much more inflamed with revengeful indignation, the Thebans who raging at his heavy miſchance, did with great ſlaughter compel their diſordered enemies to leave the field; though long they followed not the chaſe, being wearied more with the ſadneſs of this diſaſter, than with all the travel of the day. Epaminondas being brought into his Tent, was told by the Phyſicians, that when the head of the Dart ſhould be drawn out of his body, he muſt needs die. Hearing this, he called for his ſhield, which to have loſt, was held a great diſhonour: It was brought unto him. He bade them tell him, which part had the Victory; anſwer was made, that the Bœotians had won the field. Then ſaid he, It is a fair time for me to die; and withal ſent for Iolidas and Diophontes, two principal men of War, that were both ſlain: which being told him, he adviſed the Thebans to make peace, whilſt with advantage they might, for that they had none left that was able to diſcharge the office of a General. Herewithal he willed, that the head of the weapon ſhould be drawn out of his body, comforting his friends that lamented his death, and want of iſſue, by telling them, that the Victories of Leuctra and Mantinæa were two fair daughters, in whom his memory ſhould live.

So died Epaminondas, the worthieſt man that ever was bred in that Nation of Greece, and hardly to be matched in any Age or Country: for he equalled all others in the ſeveral Virtues, which in each of them were ſingular. His Juſtice and Sincerity, his Temperance, Wiſdom, and high Magnanimity, were no way inferior to his Military virtue; in every part whereof he ſo excelled, that he could not but properly be called a Wary, a Valiant, a Politick, a Bountiful, or an Induſtrious, and a Provident Captain. Neither was his private Converſation unanſwerable to thoſe high parts, which gave him praiſe abroad. For he was Grave, and yet very Affable and Courteous; reſolute in publick buſineſs; but in his own particular eaſie, and of much mildneſs: a lover of his people, bearing with mens infirmities; witty and pleaſant in ſpeech, far from inſolence. Maſter of his own affections, and furniſhed with all qualities that might win and keep love. To theſe graces were added great ability of body, and much Eloquence, and very deep knowledg in all parts of Philoſophy and Learning, wherewith his mind being enlightned, reſted not in the ſweetneſs of Contemplation, but brake forth into ſuch effects as, gave unto Thebes, which had evermore been an underling, a dreadful reputation among all people adjoining, and the higheſt command in Greece.

SECT. VIII.

Of the Peace concluded in Greece after the Battel of Mantinæa. The Voyage of Ageſilaus into Egypt. His death and qualities; with an examination of the compariſon made between him and Pompey the Roman.

THis Battel of Mantinæa was the greateſt that had ever been fought in that Country between the Naturals, and the laſt. For at Maranthon and Platæa, the populous Armies of the barbarous Nations gave rather a great fame, than a hard trial to the Græcian Valour; neither were the practice of Arms and Art Military ſo perfect in the beginnings of the Peloponneſian War, as long continuance, and daily exerciſe had now made them. The times following produced no actions of worth or moment, thoſe excepted which were undertaken againſt foreign enemies, proving for the moſt part unfortunate. But in this laſt fight all Greece was intereſſed, which never had more able Soldiers and brave Commanders, nor ever contended for Victory with greater care of the ſucceſs, or more obſtinate reſolution. All which notwithſtanding, the iſſue being ſuch as hath been related, it was found beſt for every particular Eſtate, that a general Peace ſhould be eſtabliſhed, every one retaining what he preſently had, and none being forced to depend upon another. The Meſſenians were by name comprized in this new League; which cauſed the Lacedæmonians not to enter into it. Their ſtanding out hindred not the reſt from proceeding to concluſion, conſidering that Sparta was now too weak to offend her Neighbours, and therefore might well be allowed to ſhew that anger in Ceremonies, which had no power to declare it ſelf in execution. This peace, as it gave ſome breath and refreſhing to all the Country, ſo to the Cities of Athens and Sparta it afforded leiſure to ſeek after wealth by foreign employment in Egypt, whither Ageſilaus was ſent with ſome ſmall Forces to aſſiſt, or indeed as a Mercenary, to ſerve under Tachos King of Egypt in his War upon Syria. Chabrias the Athenian, who had before commanded under Acoris King of Egypt, went now as a Voluntary, with ſuch Forces as he could raiſe by entreaty, and offer of good pay, to the ſame ſervice. Theſe Egyptian Kings deſcended from Amyrtæus of Sais, who rebelled againſt Darius Nothus, having retained the Country, notwithſtanding all inteſtine diſſentions, and foreign invaſions, during three Generations of their own race, were ſo well acquainted with the valour of the Greeks, that by their help (eaſily procured with Gold) they conceived great hope, not only to aſſure themſelves, but to become Lords of the Provinces adjoining, which were held by the Perſian. What the iſſue of this great enterprize might have been, had it not fallen by Domeſtical Rebellion, it is uncertain. But very likely it is, that the Rebellion it ſelf had ſoon come to nothing, if Ageſilaus had not proved a falſe Traytor, joining with Nectanebus, who roſe againſt his Prince, and helping the Rebel with that Army which the money of Tachos had waged. This falſhood Ageſilaus excuſed, as tending to the good of his own Country, though it ſeem rather, that he grudged becauſe the King took upon himſelf the conduct of the Army, uſing his ſervice only as Lieutenant, who had made full account of being appointed the General. Howſoever it came to paſs, Tachos being ſhamefully betrayed by them, in whom he had repoſed his chief confidence, fled unto the Perſian, who upon his ſubmiſſion gave him gentle entertainment; and Nectanebus (who ſeems to have been the Nephew of Tachos) reigned in his ſtead. At the ſame time the Citizens of Mendes had ſet up another King; to whom all, or moſt of the Egyptians yielded their obedience. But Ageſilaus fighting with him in places of advantage, prevailed ſo far, that he left Nectanebus in quiet poſſeſſion of the Kingdom; who in recompence of his Treaſon to the former King Tachos, and good ſervice done to himſelf, rewarded him with 230 Talents of Silver; with which booty ſailing homewards, he died by the way. He was a Prince very temperate and valiant, and a good Leader in War, free from Covetouſneſs, and not reproached with any blemiſh of luſt; which praiſes are the leſs admirable in him, for that the Diſcipline of Sparta was ſuch as did endue every one of the Citizens (not carried away by the violent ſtream of an ill nature) with all, or the chief of theſe good qualities. He was nevertheleſs very arrogant, perverſe, unjuſt and vain-glorious, meaſuring all things by his own will, and obſtinately proſecuting thoſe courſes, whoſe ends were beyond hope. The Expedition of Xenophon had filled him with an opinion, that by his hand the Empire of Perſia ſhould be overthrown; with which conceit being tranſported, and finding his proceedings interrupted by the Thebans and their Allies, he did ever after bear ſuch hatred unto Thebes, as compelled that Eſtate by meer neceſſity to grow warlike, and able, to the utter diſhonour of Sparta, and the irrepairable loſs of all her former greatneſs. The commendations given to him by Xenophon his good friend, have cauſed Plutarch to lay his name in the ballance againſt Pompey the great; whoſe actions (the ſolemn gravity of carriage excepted) are very diſproportionable. Yet we may truly ſay, That as Pompey made great Wars under ſundry Climates, and in all the Provinces of the Roman Empire, exceeding in the multitude of employments all that were before him; ſo Ageſilaus had at one time or other ſome quarrel with every Town in Greece, had made a War in Aſia, and medled in the buſineſs of the Egyptians, in which variety he went beyond all his Predeceſſors: yet not winning any Countrys, as Pompey did many, but obtainining large wages, which Pompey never took. Herein alſo they were very like; Each of them was the laſt great Captain which his Nation brought forth in time of Liberty, and each of them ruined the Liberty of his Country by his own Lordly wilfulneſs. We may therefore well ſay, Similia magis omnia quam paria; the reſemblance was nearer than the equality. Indeed the freedom of Rome was loſt with Pompey, falling into the hands of Cæſar, whom he had enforced to take Arms; yet the Roman Empire ſtood, the form of Government only being changed: But the Liberty of Greece, or Sparta it ſelf, was not forfeited unto the Thebans, whom Ageſilaus had compelled to enter into a Victorious War; yet the Signiory, and ancient renown of Sparta was preſently loſt; and the freedom of all Greece being wounded in the Theban War, and after much blood loſt, ill healed by the Peace enſuing, did very ſoon upon the death of Ageſilaus give up the ghoſt, and the Lordſhip of the whole Country was ſeized by Philip King of Macedon, whoſe actions are now on foot, and more to be regarded than the Contemporary paſſages of things, in any other Nation.

CHAP. I.

of Philip the Father of Alexander the Great, King of Macedon,

SECT. I.

What Kings Reigned in Macedon before Philip.

THE Greeks of whom we have already made large diſcourſe, not as yet wearied with inteſtine War, nor made wiſe by their vain contention for ſuperiority, do ſtill, as in former times, continue the invaſion and vaſtation of each other.

Againſt Xerxes, the greateſt Monarch of that part of the World, they defended their liberty, with as happy ſucceſs as ever Nation had, and with no leſs honour, than hath ever been acquired by deeds of Arms. And having had a tryal and experience more than fortunate, againſt thoſe Nations, they ſo little regarded what might come from them, who had ſo often forfeited the reputation of their Forces, as whatſoever could be ſpared from their own diſtraction at home, they tranſported over the Helleſpont, as ſufficient, to entertain and buſie them withall.

But, as it commonly falleth out with every man of mark in the world, that they underfal, and periſh by the hands and harms which they leaſt fear; ſo fared it at this time with the Greeks. For of Philip of Macedon (of whom we are now to ſpeak) they had ſo little regard, as they grew even then more violent in devouring each other, when the faſt-growing greatneſs of ſuch a Neighbour-King, ſhould, in regard of their own ſafeties, have ſerved them for a ſtrong argument of union and accord. But the glory of their Perſian victories, wherewith they were pampered and made proud, taught them to neglect all Nations but themſelves, and the rather to value at little the power and purpoſes of the Macedonians, becauſe thoſe Kings and States, which ſate nearer them than they did, had in the time of Amyntas, the Father of Philip, ſo much weakned them, and won upon them, that they were not (as the Grecians perſwaded themſelves) in any one Age, likely to recover their own, much leſs to work any wonders againſt their borderers. And indeed, it was not in their Philoſophy to con-ſider, That all great alterations are, ſtorm-like, ſudden and violent; and that it is then over-late to repair the decayed and broken banks, when great rivers are once ſwollen, faſt-running, and enraged. No, the Greeks did rather employ themſelves, in breaking down thoſe defences which ſtood between them and this inundation, than ſeek to rampire and re-enforce their own fields, which by the Level of reaſon they might have found to have lien under it. It was therefore well concluded by Oroſius: Graciæ Civitates imperare ſingulæ cupiunt, imperium omnes perdiderunt; The Cities of Greece loſt their command, by ſtriving each of them to command all. Oroſ. l. 3. cap. 12.

The Kingdom of Macedon, ſo called of Macedon the ſon of Oſiris, or, as other Authors affirm, of Jupiter and Æthra, is the next Region towards the North, which bordereth Greece; It hath to the Eaſt, the Ægean Sea; it is bounded on the North and North-weſt, by the Thracians and Illyrians: and on the South and South-weſt by Theſſaly and Epirus.

Their Kings were of the family of Temenus, of the race of Hercules, and by Nation Argives; who are liſted as followeth. About ſome ſix years after the tranſlation of the Aſſyrian Empire, Ambaces then governing Media; Caranus of Argos, commanded by an Oracle to lead a Colony into Macedon, departed thence with many people: and as he was marching through that Countrey, the weather being rainy and tempeſtuous, he eſpied a great herd of Goats, which fled the ſtorm as faſt as they could, haſting them to their known place of covert. Whereupon Caranus, calling to mind, that he had alſo by another Oracle been directed to follow the firſt troop of Beaſts, that ſhould either lead him, or flee before him; he purſued theſe Goats to the Gates of Edaſſa, and being undiſcovered by the Inhabitants, by reaſon of the darkneſs of the Air, he entred their City without reſiſtance, and poſſeſt it. Soon after this, by the overthrow of Ciſſeus, Caranus became Lord of the reſt of Macedon, and held it eight and twenty years. Cœnus ſucceeded Caranus, and reigned twelve years. Tyrimas followed Cœnus and ruled eight and twenty years. Paul. Diac. Conſ. Theop. Antio. 6. Euſeb. in Chro.

Perdiccas the firſt, the ſon of Tyrimas governed one and fifty years: a Prince for his great valour and many other virtues, much renowned, Solinus, Pliny, Juſtine, Euſebius, Theophilus, Antiochenus, and others, affirm, that he appointed a place of burial for himſelf, and for all the Kings of Macedon his Succeſſors, at Ægæ, aſſuring them that the Kingdom ſhould ſo long continue in his Line and Race, as they continued to lay up their bodies in that Sepulchre: wherein it is ſaid, that becauſe Alexander the Great failed, therefore the poſterity of the Temenedæ failed in him: a thing rather deviſed after the effect, as I conceive, than foretold by Perdiccas. Sol. c. 14. Plin. l. 4. c. 10.

Argæus ſucceeded unto Perdiccas, and ruled eight and twenty years.

Philip the firſt, his ſucceſſor, reigned eight and twenty years. Euſeb. in Chro.

Æropus followed Philip, and governed ſix and twenty years: in whoſe infancy the Illyrians invaded Macedon, and having obtained a great victory, they purſued the ſame to the great danger of that State. Whereupon the Macedonians gathering new forces, and reſolving either to recover their former loſs or to loſe at once both their Kingdom and their King, they carried him with them in his cradle into the field, and returned victorious: for they were either confident that their Nation could not be beaten, (their King being preſent) or rather they perſwaded themſelves, that there was no man ſo void of honour and compaſſion, as to abandon their natural Lord, being an Infant, and no way (but by the hands of his ſervants) able to defend himſelf from deſtruction. The like is reported by Aimonius of Clotarius the ſon of Fredegunda. Euſeb. Juſtin. Ammian. Theſ. Ant. &c. Aimon. l. 3. c. 82.

Alcetas ſucceeded Æropus, and ruled nine and twenty years.

Amyntas the firſt, ſucceeded Alcetas, and reigned fifty years: He lived at ſuch time as Darius Hyſtaſpes, after his unproſperous return out of Scythia, ſent Megabazus with an Army into Europe, who in Darius name required Amyntas to acknowledge him for his Supream Lord, by yielding unto him Earth and Water. But his Ambaſſadours, as you have heard before, were for their inſolent behaviour toward the Macedonian Ladies, ſlain by the direction of Alexander, who was the ſon of Amyntas, and his Succeſſor. Her. Euſ. Juſt. &c.

Alexander ſirnamed the Rich, the ſon of Amyntas, governed Macedon three and forty years. He did not only appeaſe the wrath of Megabazus, for the ſlaughter of the Perſian Ambaſſadours by giving Gygea his Siſter, to Bubares of the blood of Perſia: but by that match he grew ſo great in Xerxes his grace, as he obtained all that Region between the Mountains of Olympus and Hemus, to be united to the Kingdom of Macedon. Yet could not theſe benefits buy his affection from the Greeks. For Xerxes being returned into Aſia, and Mardonius made General of the Perſian Army; Alexander acquainted the Greeks with all his intents and purpoſes againſt them. He had three ſons, Perdiccas, Alcetas and Philip. Her. l. 8. Plut. Euſeb. Juſt. &c.

Perdiccas the ſecond, the ſon of Alexander, lived in the time of the Peloponneſian War, and reigned in all eight and twenty years. The wars which he made were not much remarkable: the Story of them is found here and there by pieces in Thucydides his firſt ſix Books. He left behind him two ſons, Perdiccas, who was very young: and Archelaus, who was baſe-born.

Perdiccas the third, being delivered to the cuſtody and care of Archelaus, was at ſeven years of age caſt into a well and drowned by his falſe Guardian, who excuſing this Fact to Cleopatra the Mother of the young King, ſaid, That the child in following a Gooſe haſtily, fell thereinto by miſadventure. But Archelaus ſtayed not here: for having thus diſpatched his Brother, he ſlew both his Uncle Alcetas the ſon of Alexander the Rich, and Alexander the ſon of this Alcetas, his Couſin Germain, and enjoyed the Kingdom of Macedon four and twenty years.

This Archelaus, of whom both Plato and Ariſtotle make mention, though he made himſelf King by wicked murder, yet performed many things greatly to the profit of his Nation. It is ſaid, That he ſought by all means to draw Socrates unto him, and that he greatly loved and honoured Euripides the Tragedian. He had two Sons, Archelaus and Oreſtes. Plat. in Gorg. Ariſt. in Pol. 5.

Archelaus the ſecond ſucceeded his Father: and having reigned ſeven years, he was ſlain in hunting, either by chance, or of purpoſe, by Crateus.

Oreſtes his younger ſon was committed to the education of Æropus of the Royal blood of Macedon, and had the ſame meaſure which Archelaus had meaſured to his Pupil, for Æropus murthered him, and uſurped the Kingdom, which he held ſome ſix years: the ſame who denied paſſage to Ageſilaus King of Sparta, who deſired, after his return from the Aſian expedition to paſs by the way of Macedon into Greece.

This Usurper left three sons, Pausanias, Argæus, and Alexander. Pausanias succeeded his Father Æropus, and having reigned one year, he was driven out by Amyntas the son of Philip, the son of the first Perdiccas, the son of Alexander the Rich, which Philip was then preserved, when Archelaus the Bastard slew his Brother Perdiccas; his Uncle Alcetas, and his son Alexander. This Amyntas reigned (though very unquietly) four and twenty years, for he was not only infested by Pausanias, assisted by the Thracians, and by his Brother Argæus, encouraged by the Illyrians; and by the said Argæus, for two years possest of Macedon: but on the other side, the Olynthians, his Neighbours near the Ægean Sea, made themselves for a while Masters of Pella, the chief City of Macedon.

Amyntas the second, had by his wife Eurydice the Illyrian, three sons; Alexander the second, Perdiccas the third, and Philip the second, Father of Alexander the Great: and one Daughter called Euryone, or Exione. He had also by his second wife Gygæa, three sons; Archelaus, Argæus, and Menelaus, afterward slain by their Brother Philip. He had more by a Concubine, Ptolomy sirnamed Alorites, of the City of Alorus, wherein he was born.

Alexander the second reigned not much above one year, in which time he was invaded by Pausanias, the son of Æropus, but defended by Iphicrates the Athenian, while he was at that time about Amphipolis. He was also constrained (for the payment of a great sum of money) to leave his youngest Brother Philip in Hostage with the Illyrians, who had subjected his Father Amyntas to the payment of tribute. After this, Alexander being invited by the Alevadæ against Alexander the Tyrant of Pheres in Thessaly, having redeemed his brother Philip, to draw the Thebans to his assistance, entred into confederacy with Pelopidas, being at that time in the same Countrey, with whom he also left Philip with divers other principal persons, for the gage of his promises to Pelopidas. But Eurydice his Mother falling in love with her Son in Law, who had married her Daughter Euryone, or Exione, practised the death of Alexander her son, with a purpose to confer the Kingdom on her Paramour, which Ptolomy Alorites did put in execution: by means whereof, he held Macedon for three years, but was soon after slain by Perdiccas the brother of Alexander. Diodore hath it otherwise of Philip being made pledge; and saith, That Amyntas his Father delivered him for hostage to the Illyrians, by whom he was conveyed to Thebes, there to be kept: others report that Philip (while his Father was yet living) was first ingaged to the Thebans, and delivered for hostage a second time by Alexander his brother.

Diod. l. 15. & 16.

Perdiccas the third, after he had slain Alorites, his base Brother, governed Macedon five years, and was then slain in a Battel against the Illyrians, according to Diodorus; but Justin affirmeth, that he perished by the practice of Eurydice his Mother, as Alexander did.

SECT. II.

The beginning of Philip's Reign, and how he delivered Macedon from the troubles wherein he found it intangled.

PHilip the second, the youngest son of Amintas by Eurydice, having been instructed in all knowledge, requisite unto the Government of a Kingdom, in that excellent education which he had under Epaminondas, making an escape from Thebes, returned into Macedon, in the first year of the hundred and fifth Olympiad, which was after the building of Rome three hundred fourscore and thirteen years: and finding the many enemies and dangers wherewith the Kingdom was invironed, he took on him, not as a King (for Perdiccas left a son, though but an Infant) but as the Protector of his Nephew, and Commander of the men of War. Yet his fruitful ambition soon over-grew his modesty, and he was easily perswaded by the people to accept both the title of King, and withal, the absolute rule of the Kingdom. And to say the truth, the necessity of the State of Macedon at that time required a King both prudent and active. For, besides the incursions of the Illyrians and Pannonians, the King of Thrace did set up in opposition, Pausanias; the Athenians, Argæus; son of the late Usurper, Æropus: each of these labouring to place in Macedon a King of their own election. These heavy burdens when Philip could not well bear, he bought off the weightiest by money, and by fair promises unloaded himself of so many of the rest, as he ran under the remainder happily enough. For, notwithstanding that his Brother Perdiccas had his death accompanied with four thousand Macedonians, beside those that were wounded and taken prisoners, and that the Pannonians were destroying all before them in Macedon; and that the Athenians with a Fleet by Sea, and three thousand Souldiers by Land under Mantias, did beat upon him on all sides and quarters of his Country: yet after he had practised the men of War of Pannonia, and corrupted them with gifts; and had also bought the King of Thrace from Pausanias, he forthwith made head against the Athenians his stiffest enemies: and for the first, he prevented their recovery of Amphipolis, a City on the Frontier of Macedon: and did then pursue Argæus, the son of Æropus, set against him by the Athenians, and followed him so hard at the heels, in his retreat from Æges, that he forced him to abide the battel, which Argæus lost, having the greatest part of his Army slain in the place. Those of the Athenians, and others, which remained unbroken, took the advantage of a strong piece of ground at hand, which though they could not long defend, yet avoiding thereby the present fury of the Souldiers, they obtained of the Vanquishers life and liberty to return into Attica. Whereupon a peace was concluded between him and the Athenians for the present, and for this clemency he was greatly renowned and honoured by all the Greeks.

Diod. l. 16.

SECT. III.

The good success which Philip had in many enterprizes.

NOw had Philip leisure to look North-ward, and to attend the Illyrians and Pæonians, his irreconcilable Enemies and borderers: both which he invaded with so prosperous success, as he slew Bardillis, King of the Illyrians, with seven thousand of his Nation, and thereby recovered all those places which the Illyrians held in Macedon: and withal, upon the death of the King of Pannonia, he pierc'd that Country, and after a main Victory obtained, he enforc'd them to pay him tribute. This was no sooner done, than (without staying to take longer breath) he hasted speedily towards Larissa, upon the River Peneus in Thessaly, of which Town he ſoon made himſelf Maſter; and thereby he got good footing into that Country, whereof he made uſe in time following. Now although he reſolved either to ſubdue the Theſſalians, or to make them his own againſt all others, becauſe the horſe-men of that Country were the beſt, and moſt feared in that part of Europe; yet he thought it moſt for his ſafety to cloſe up the entrances out of Thrace, leſt while he invaded Theſſaly and Greece towards the South, thoſe ample Nations lying towards the North, ſhould either withdraw him, or over-run Macedon, as in former times. He therefore attempted Amphipolis, ſeated on the famous river of Strimon, which parteth Thrace from Macedon, and won it. He alſo recovered Pynda, and (to the North of Amphipolis) the City of Crenides (ſometime Datus) and called it after his name Philippi: to the people whereof, Saint Paul afterward directed one of his Epiſtles. This place, wherein Philippi ſtood, is very rich in Mines of Gold, out of which, greatly to the advancement of Philip's affairs, he drew yearly a thouſand Talents, which make ſix hundred thouſand French Crowns.

And that he might with the more eaſe diſburthen the Thracian ſhores of the Athenian Garriſons, to which he had given a great blow by the taking in of Amphipolis, he entred into league with his Father's malicious enemies, the Olynthians, whom the better to faſten unto him, he gave them the City of Pynda with the Territory, meaning nothing leſs, than that they ſhould enjoy it, or their own Eſtate, many years.

Now that he might by degrees win ground upon the Greeks, he took the fair occaſion to deliver the City of Pheres in Theſſaly, from the Tyrants Lycophron and Liſiphonus: who, after they had conſpired with Thebe the Wife of Alexander, who uſurped upon the liberty of that State, they themſelves (Alexander being murdered) held it alſo by the ſame ſtrong hand and oppreſſion that Alexander did, till by the aſſiſtance of Philip they were beaten out, and Pheres reſtored to her former liberty. Which act of Philip did for ever after faſten the Theſſalians unto him, and to his exceeding great advantage, bind them to his ſervice.

SECT. IV.

Of the Phocian War, which firſt drew Philip into Greece.

ABout this time, to wit, in the ſecond year of the hundred and ſixth Olympiad eight years after the Battel of Mantinea, and about the eighth year of Artaxerxes Ochus, began that War, called Sacred. Now, as all occaſions, concur towards the execution of eternal providence, and of every great alteration in the World, there is ſome preceding preparation, though not at the firſt eaſily diſcerned; ſo did this revengeful hatred by the Thebans, Theſſalians, and Locrians, conceived againſt the Phocians, not only teach Philip how he might with half a hand wreſt the ſword out of their fingers; but the Greeks themſelves, beating down their own defences, to give him an eaſie paſſage; and beating themſelves to give him Victory without peril; left nothing unperformed towards their own ſlavery, ſaving the title and impoſition. Of this War the Thebans (made overproud by their Victory at Leuctra) were the inflamers. For at the Council of the Amphyctiones, or of the general Eſtates of Greece, in which at that time they ſwayed moſt, they cauſed both the Lacedemonians and Phocians to be condemned in greater ſums of money than they could well bear; the one for ſurpriſing the Caſtle of Cadmea in the time of peace, the other for ploughing up a piece of ground belonging to the Temple of Delphos. The Phocians being reſolved not to obey this Edict, were ſecretly ſet on, and encouraged by the Lacedemonians: and for refuſal were expoſed as Sacrilegers, and accurſed to all their neighbour-Nations, for whom it was then lawful to invade, and deſtroy them at their pleaſures.

The Phocians perſwaded thereunto by Philomelus, a Captain of their own, caſt the ſame dice of hazard that Cæſar after many Ages following did; but had not the ſame chance. Yet they dealt well enough with all the enemies of their own Nation. And the better to bear out an ungracious quarrel, of which there was left no hope of compoſition, they reſolved to ſack the Temple it ſelf. For ſeeing that for the ploughing of a piece of Apollo's ground, they had ſo much offended their Neighbour-god, and their Neighbour-Nations, as worſe could not befal them than already was intended; they reſolved to take the gold with the ground, and either to periſh for all, or to prevail againſt all that had commiſſion to call them to account. The treaſure which they took out of the Temple in the beginning of the War, was ten thouſand Talents, which in thoſe days ſerved them to wage a great many men; and ſuch was their ſucceſs in the beginning of the War, as they won three great battels againſt the Thebans, Theſſalians, and Locrians; but being beaten in the fourth, their Leader Philomelus caſt himſelf head-long over the Rocks.

In the mean while the Cities of Cherſoneſus, both to defend themſelves againſt their bad neighbour Philip, who encroached upon them, and to draw others into their quarrel, rendred themſelves to the Athenians. Philip prepareth to get them into his hands, and at the ſiege of Methone loſt one of his eyes. It is ſaid, That he that ſhot him, did purpoſely direct his Arrow toward him, and that it was written on the ſhaft thereof: After Philippo; After to Philip: for ſo he was called that gave him the wound. This City he evened with the ſoil. Plut. in Ulpian. Strab. l. 8.

The Tyrant Lycophron before mentioned, while Philip was buſied on the border of Thrace, and the Theſſalians engaged in the holy War, entred Theſſaly with new Forces, being aſſiſted by Onomarchus Commander of the Phocian Army, in place of Philomelus. For hereby the Phocians, hoped ſo to entertain the Theſſalians at home, as they ſhould not find leiſure to invade them. Hereupon was Philip the ſecond time called into Theſſaly; but both the Theſſalians and Macedonians (Philip being preſent) were utterly overthrown by Onomarchus, and great numbers of both Nations loſt. From Theſſaly, Onomarchus drew ſpeedily towards Bœotia, and with the ſame Victorious Army brake the forces of the Bœotians, and took from them their City of Coronea. But Philip, impatient of his late miſadventure, after he had re-enforced his Army, returned with all ſpeed into Theſſaly, there to find again the honour which he lately loſt: and was the ſecond time encountred by Onomarchus, who brought into the field twenty thouſand foot, and five hundred horſe. All this great preparation ſufficed not; for Onomarchus was by Philip ſurmounted, both in numbers and in good fortune. his Army

Army overturned, six thousand slain, and three thousand taken: of which number himself being one, was among others hanged by Philip. Those that fled, were in part received by the Athenian Gallies, which sailed along the Coast, commanded by Caves; but the greatest number of those that took the Sea, were therein devoured e're they recovered them. Lycophron was now again driven out of Thessaly, and Pheres made free as before.

SECT. V.

Of the Olynthian War. The ambitious practices of Philip.

FRom hence Philip resolved to invade Phocis it self, but the Athenians did not favour his entrance into those parts, and therefore with the help of the Lacedemonians, they retrench'd his passage at the Straits of Thermopylis. Whereupon he returned into Macedon, and after the taking of Micybrne, Torone, and other Towns, he quarrelled with the Olynthians, whom not long before he had wooed to his alliance, and bought his peace of them. For the Olynthians were very strong, and had evermore both braved and beaten the Macedonians. It is said, that Philip having put to death Archelaus his half Brother (for Amyntas had three sons by Eurydice the Mother of Philip, and three other Sons by Gygea: but Philip's elder Brother by the same Mother being dead, he determined to rid himself also of the rest) the two younger held themselves within Olynthus; and that the receiving of them by the Olynthians was the cause of the War, Justine affirmeth. Just quarrels are ballanced by just Princes, but to this King all things were lawful that might serve his turn; all his affections, and passions, how divers soever in other men, were in his ambition swallowed up, and thereinto converted. For he neither forbare the murder of his own Brothers, the breach of faith, the buying of other mens fidelity: he esteemed no place strong where his Ass loaden with gold might enter; nor any City or State unconquerable, where a few of the greatest, to be made greater, could lose the sense of other mens sorrow and subjection. And because he thought it vain to practise the winning of Olynthus, till he had inclosed all the power they had within their own walls, he entred their Territory, and by the advantage of a well compounded and trained Army, he gave them two overthrows e're he sate down before the City it self: which done, he bought Euthicrates and Lasthenes from their people, and from the service of their Countrey and Common-weal, by whose treason he entred the Town, slew his Brothers therein, sackt it, and sold the Inhabitants for slaves by the drum. By the spoil of this place, he greatly enriched himself, and had treasure sufficient to buy in other Cities withal, which he daily did. For so was he advised by the Oracle in the beginning of his undertaking, That he should make his assaults with silver spears: Whereupon Horace well and truly said, Hor. Carm. Od. 16.

——Diffidit Urbium
Portas vir Macedo, & subruit æmulos
Reges muneribus.——

By gifts the Macedon clave Gates asunder,
And Kings envying his estate brought under.

And it is true, that he won more by corruption and fraud than he did by force. For as he had in all the principal Cities of Greece his secret workers (which way of Conquest was well followed by Philip the second of Spain:) So when in the contention between the Competitors for the Kingdom of Thrace, he was chosen Arbitrator, he came not to the Council accompanied with Piety and Justice, but with a powerful Army, and having beaten and slain both Kings, gave sentence for himself, and made the Kingdom his own.

SECT. VI.

How Philip ended the Phocian War.

THe War still continued between the Phocians and the Associates of the holy War: the Beotians, finding themselves unable to subsist without some present aid, sent unto Philip for succour, who willingly yielded to their necessities, and sent them such a proportion of men, as were neither sufficient to master their enemies; nor to assure themselves; but yet to enable them to continue the War, and to waste the strength of Greece. They also sent to Artaxerxes Ochus for supply of treasure, who lent them thirty Talents, which makes a hundred and fourscore thousand Crowns: but when with these supplies they had still the worst against the Phocians, who held from them three of the strongest Cities within Beotia it self, they then besought Philip of Macedon that he would assist them in person, to whom they would give an entrance into their Territory, and in all things obey his Commandments in War.

Now had Philip what he longed for; for he knew himself in state to give the law to both, and so quitting all his other purposes towards the North, he marched with a speedy pace towards Beotia, where being arrived, Phallechus who commanded the Phocian Army, fearing to shock with this victorious King, made his own peace, and withdrew himself with a Regiment of eight thousand Souldiers into Peloponnesus, leaving the Phocians to the mercy of the Conquerour; and for conclusion, he had the glory of that War called Sacred, which the Grecians in many mutual slaughters had continued for ten years; and besides the glory, he possest himself of Orchomene, Coronea, and Corsia, in the Country of the Beotians, who invited him to be victorious over themselves. He brought the Phocians into servitude, and wasted their Cities, and gave them but their Villages to inhabit, reserving unto himself the yearly tribute of threescore Talents, which make six and thirty thousand French Crowns. He also hereby (besides the fame of piety for service of the gods) obtained the same double voice in the Council of the Amphyctions which the Phocians had, with the superintendency of the Pythian games, forfeited by the Corinthians, by being partakers in the Phocian sacrilege.

SECT.

SECT. VII.

How Philip with ill succeſs attempted upon Perinthus, Byzantium, and the Scythians.

Philip, after his triumphant return into Macedon, by the Lieutenant of his Army Parmenio, ſlaughtered many thouſand of Illyrians and Dardanians, and brought the Thracians to pay him, the tenth part of all their Revenues. But his next enterprize againſt the Perinthians ſtayed his fury. Perinthus was a City of Thrace, ſeated upon Propontis, in the mid-way between Seſtos and Byzantium, a place of great ſtrength, and a people reſolved to defend their liberty againſt Philip, where the Athenians encouraged and aſſiſted them. Philip ſate down before it with a puiſſant Army, made many fair breaches, gave many furious aſſaults, built many over-topping and commanding towers about it. But he was repelled with equal violence. For whereas Philip thought by his continual aſſaults to weary them, and waſte both their men and munition, they were ſupplied, not only from the Perſian with men and money, and ſuccoured from Byzantium, which ſtood upon the ſame Sea-coaſt, but they were relieved from Athens, Chio, and Rhodes, by the conduction of Phocion, with whatſoever was wanting to their neceſſity. But becauſe thoſe of Byzantium by reaſon of their neighbourhood, and eaſie paſſage by water, gave them often and ready help, Philip removed the one half of his Army, and beſieged it, leaving fifteen thouſand foot before Perinthus to force it if they could: But to be ſhort, he failed in both attempts, (as all Princes commonly do that undertake divers enterprizes at one time) and returned into Macedon with no leſs diſhonour than loſs: whereupon he made an overture of peace with the Athenians, and greatly deſired it: to which though Phocion perſwaded them all he could, and that by the occaſion offered they might greatly advantage their conditions; yet Demoſthenes with his eloquence prevailed in the refuſal. In the mean while, Philip having digeſted his late affront, and ſupplied his expence, by the taking of an hundred threeſcore and ten Merchants ſhips, he gathered new forces, and being accompanied with his ſon Alexander, led them into Scythia: but he was alſo unproſperous in that enterprize: for the Triballi, a people of Maſia, ſet on him in his return, wounded him, and took from him the greateſt part of the ſpoils which he had gathered.

SECT. VIII.

How Philip overthrowing the Greeks in the battel of Cheronæa, was choſen Captain General of Greece. The death of Philip.

AMong theſe Northern Nations (part of which he ſuppreſt, and part quieted) he ſpent ſome eight years; and in the ninth year after the end of the Holy War, he was, by his great advantage, invited again by the Grecians to their aſſiſtance. For the Citizens of Amphiſſa having diſobeyed the decree of Amphyctiones, in which Philip had a double voice, and who by reaſon that the Thebans and Locrians gave countenance and aid to the Amphiſſonians, the reſt were not of themſelves able to conſtrain them, they beſought Philip to come in perſon to their aſſiſtance. Now you muſt think that Philip was not long in reſolving upon this enterprize; he needed no drawing on, whom nothing could keep back, nor other diſſwaſion then a maſtering power could hold thence. He therefore commanded his Army forthwith to march; the ſame being compounded of thirty thouſand Foot, and two thouſand Horſe; and with as much expedition as could be made, he entred Phocis, won Platæa, and brought into ſubjection all that Region.

The reſt, and eſpecially the Athenians, although they had good cauſe to fear that a great part of this ſtorm would fall on themſelves, yet were they diſſwaded by Demoſthenes from accepting ſuch reaſonable conditions of peace as Philip offered, and rather made choice (having drawn the Thebans to joyn with them) to leave the enjoying of their eſtates, and their freedom to the chance of one battel, than to hold it either by compoſition, or by the grace of Philip. But this their Oratour's eloquence coſt them dear. It is true, that he could far more eaſily mind them of the vertue of their Anceſtors, than make them ſuch as they were. He might repeat unto them (with words moving paſſion) the wonders they wrought at Marathon, but he could not transform the Macedonians into Perſians, nor draw from the dead, a Miltiades, or Ariſtides, a Themiſtocles, or a Cimon, or any of thoſe famous Commanders, whoſe great vertues they had payed with the greateſt ingratitude that ever Nation did. A Phocion they had, but by the ſtrength of a contrary faction he was at this time in diſgrace, and not employed; in ſo much as when the Armies of Philip and the confederates encountred, although ſome thouſands of the Athenians did abide the killing, and the like number well near of the Thebans died with them; yet the want of the worthy men on that ſide to hold up the reſt, and to draw them on, and the many choice Captains of the Macedonians, encouraged by a King of a growing fortune, as it gave to Philip ſo ſhining a victory; that Alexander by the light thereof found his way (in deſpight of the Nations interjacent) into Perſia, India, and Egypt, ſo it cut to the ground, and gave end and date to all the Grecian glory; Yea their liberty (ſaith Curtius) with their large Dominion, won with ſo many difficulties, continued for ſo many Ages, and ſo often defended againſt the greateſt Kings, was now loſt in a moment, and for ever loſt.

Now this adviſed King (never paſſionate to his diſadvantage) to the end he might obtain the Soveraignty over all Greece, and be acknowledged for their Captain-General againſt the Perſians, without any further hazard or trouble, was content to let go thoſe Athenians that were taken at this battel of Cheronæa, as he alſo forbare to attempt any thing againſt their City: but in Thebes (which lately by the vertue of Epaminondas triumphed over the reſt) he lodged a Garriſon of Macedonians. And being ſoon after (according to the long deſire which he had nouriſhed of this Soveraignty) by the general States at Corinth, ſtiled the firſt Commander of all the Grecians, and contribution of men and money granted him, he compounded an Army of great ſtrength, and under the Commandment of Attalus and Parmenio, tranſported the ſame over the Helleſpont into Aſia, to begin the War. Of his enterprize againſt Perſia, he he ſought ſucceſs from the Oracle at Delphos, from whence he received ſuch another convertible riddle, as Cræſus did, when he attempted Cyrus, and was in like ſort miſtaken in the expoſition.

But as it is hard to diſcern and withſtand the flatteries of our own appetites, ſo did Philip's ambitious deſire to invade Perſia, abuſe his judgement, ſo far, that the death wherewith himſelf was threatned, he underſtood to be delivered of his enemy, whom he intended preſently to invade. Before his purpoſed departure into Aſia, he prepared for the marriage of his Daughter Cleopatra, with Alexander King of Epirus; to which feaſt and paſtimes thereat appointed, he invited all his Friends and Allies, with the principal perſons of the Grecian Cities, from whom he received much honour and many rich Preſents: but this was indeed the Feaſt of his Funeral. For, having refuſed to do Juſtice to one Pauſanias, a Gentleman of his Guard, whom Attalus (greatly favoured by Philip) had firſt made drunk, and then left to be carnally abuſed by divers baſe perſons; this Pauſanias grew into ſo great a deteſtation of the King's partiality in ſo foul a fact, as, when Philip was paſſing towards the Theater; he drew a ſword from under his long garment and wounded him to death, when he had lived ſix and forty years, and reigned five and twenty. Juſtine reports it, that Olympias encouraged Pauſanias to murder the King her husband; which after his death ſhe bodily avowed, by the honour ſhe did unto Pauſanias, in crowning his dead body, in conſecrating his ſword unto Apollo, by building for him a Monument, and other like Graces.

SECT. XI.

What good foundations of Alexander's greatneſs were laid by Philip. Of his laudable qualities and iſſue.

NOw although he were then taken from the World, when he had maſtered all oppoſition on that ſide of the Sea; and had ſeen the fruits of his hopes, and labours, changing colour towards ripeneſs and perfection; yet he was herein happy, that he lived to ſee his Son Alexander at Man's eſtate, and had himſelf been an eye-witneſs of his reſolution and ſingular valour in this laſt battel.

The foundation of whoſe future greatneſs he had laid ſo ſoundly for him, with ſo plain a pattern of the Buildings which himſelf meant to erect, as the performance and finiſhing was far more eaſie to Alexander, though more glorious than the beginnings unto Philip, though leſs famous. For, beſides the recovery of Macedon it ſelf in competition between him and the Sons of Æropus, the one aſſiſted by the Thracians, the other by the Athenians; and beſides the regaining of many places poſſeſt by the Illyrians, the cruſhing of all thoſe Northern Kings his Neighbours, the overthrow of Olynthus, a State that deſpiſed the power of his Father, the many Maritimate Cities taken, of great ſtrength and ancient freedom; and the ſubjection of that famous Nation of Greece, which for ſo many Ages had defended it ſelf againſt the greateſt Kings of the World, and won upon them; He left unto his Son, and had bred up for him, ſo many choice Commanders, as the moſt of them, both both for their valour and judgement in the War, were no leſs worthy of Crowns, than himſelf was that ware a Crown: For it was ſaid of Parmenio (whom Alexander, ungrateful to ſo great virtue, impiouſly murthered) That Parmenio had performed many things challenging eternal fame, without the King; but the King without Parmenio never did any thing worthy of renown: as for the reſt of his Captains, though content to obey the Son of ſuch a Father, yet did they not after Alexander's death endure to acknowledge any man Superiour to themſelves.

Of this Prince it is hard to judge, whether his ambition had taught him the exerciſe of more vices, than Nature and his excellent education had enriched him with virtues. For, beſides that he was Valiant, Wiſe, Learned, and Maſter of his Affections, he had this favour of piety, that he rather laboured to ſatisfie thoſe that were grieved, than to ſuppreſs them. Whereof (among many other) we find a good example in his dealing with Arcadion and Nicanor. Whom when for their evil ſpeech of Philip, his familiars perſwaded him to put to death, he anſwered them, That firſt it ought to be conſidered, whether the fault were in them that gave him ill language, or in himſelf: Secondly, that it was in every man's own power to be well ſpoken of; and this was ſhortly after proved; for after Philip relieved their neceſſities, there were none within his Kingdom that did him more honour than they did. Whereupon he told thoſe that had perſwaded him to uſe violence, that he was a better phyſician for evil ſpeech than they were.

His Epiſtles to Alexander his Son are remembred by Cicero and Gellius; and by Dion and Chryſoſtome exceedingly commended. His Stratagems are gathered by Polyænus and Erontinus; his wiſe ſayings, by Plutarch. And albeit he held Macedon as in his own right, all the time of his reign, yet was he not the true and next Heir thereof; for Amyntas the Son of his Brother Perdiccas (of whom he had the protection during his Infancy) had the right. This Amyntas he married to his daughter Cyna, who had by him a daughter called Eurydice, who was married to Philip's baſe Son Aridæus, her Uncle by the Mothers ſide: both which Olympias, Philip's firſt Wife, and Mother to Alexander the Great, put to death; Aridæus by extream torments, Eurydice ſhe ſtrangled.

Philip had by this Olympias, the daughter of Neoptolemus, King of the Moloſſians (of the race of Achilles) Alexander the Great, and Cleopatra. Cleopatra was married to her Uncle Alexander, King of Epirus, and was after her Brother Alexander's death ſlain at Sardis, by the commandment of Antigonus.

By Audita an Illyrian, his ſecond Wife, he had Cyna, married as is ſhewed before.

By Nicaſipolis, the Siſter of Jaſon, Tyrant of Pheres, he had Theſſalonica, whom Caſſander, after he had taken Pidna, married; but ſhe was afterward by her Father-in-Law Antipater put to death.

By Cleopatra the Neece of Attalus, he had Caranus, whom others call Philip: him Olympias, the Mother of Alexander the Great, cauſed to be roſted to death in a Copper Pan. Others lay his murder to Alexander himſelf. By the ſame Cleopatra he had likewiſe a daughter called Europa, whom Olympias alſo murdered at the Mothers breaſt.

By

By Phila and Meda he had no issue.

He had also two Concubines, Arsinoe, whom after he had gotten with child, he married to an obscure man, called Lagus, who bare Ptolomy King of Ægypt, called the Son of Lagus, but esteemed the Son of Philip: by Philinna his second Concubine, a publick Dancer, he had Aridæus, of whom we shall have much occasion to speak hereafter.

CHAP. II.

Of Alexander the Great.

SECT. I.

A brief rehearsal of Alexander's doings, before he invaded Asia.

Alexander, afterwards called the Great, succeeded unto Philip his Father; being a Prince no less valiant by Nature, than by Education, well instructed, and enriched in all sorts of Learning and good Arts. He began his Reign over the Macedonians four hundred and seventeen years, after Rome was built, and after his own Birth twenty years. The strange dreams of Philip his Father, and that one of the gods in the shape of a Snake, begat him on Olympias his Mother, I omit as foolish Tales; but, that the Temple of Diana (a work the most magnificent of the World) was burnt upon the day of his Birth, and that so strange an accident was accompanied with the news of three several Victories, obtained by the Macedonians, it was very remarkable, and might with the reason of those times be interpreted for ominous, and fore-shewing the great things by Alexander afterward performed. Upon the change of the King, the Neighbour Nations, whom Philip had oppress, began to consult about the recovery of their former liberty, and to adventure it by force of Arms. Alexander's young years gave them hope of prevailing, and his suspected severity increased courage in those, who could better resolve to die, than to live slavishly. But Alexander gave no time to those swelling humours, which might speedily have endangered the health of his Estate. For after revenge taken upon the Conspirators against his Father, whom he slew upon his Tomb, and the celebration of his Funerals, he first fastned unto him his own Nation, by freeing them from all exactions and bodily slavery, other than their service in his Wars; and used such Kingly austerity towards those that contemned his young years, and such clemency to the rest that perswaded themselves of the cruelty of his disposition, as all affections being pacified at home, he made a present journey into Peloponnesus, and so well exercised his spirits among them, as by the Council of the States of Greece, he was, according to the great desire of his heart, elected Captain General against the Persians, upon which War Philip had not only resolved, (who had obtained the same Title of General Commander) but had transported under the leading of Parmenio and Attalus, a part of his Army, to recover some places on Asia side, for the safe descent of the rest.

This enterprize against the Persian occupied all Alexander's affections: those fair marks of Riches, Honour, and large Dominion, he now shot at both sleeping and waking; all other thoughts and imaginations were either grievous or hateful. But a contrary wind ariseth: for he receiveth advertisement, that the Athenians, Thebans and Lacedemonians, had united themselves against him, and by assistance from the Persian, hoped for the recovery of their former freedom, Hereunto they were perswaded by Demosthenes, himself being thereto perswaded by the gold of Persia: the device he used was more subtle than profitable; for he caused it to be bruited, that Alexander was slain in a battel against the Triballes, and brought into the assembly a companion, whom he had corrupted, to affirm that himself was present and wounded in the battel. There is indeed a certain Doctrine of policy (as policy is now a-days defined by falsehood and knavery) that devised rumours and lies, if they serve the turn but for a day or two, are greatly available. It is true, Common people are sometimes mockt by them as Souldiers are by false Alarums in the wars; but in all that I have observed, I have found the success as ridiculous as the invention, For as those that find themselves at one time abused by such like bruits, do at other times neglect their duties, when they are upon true reports, and in occasions perilous summoned to assemble; so do all men in general condemn the Venters of such trumpery, and for them, fear upon necessary occasion to entertain the truth it self. This labour unlooked for, and loss of time, was not only very grievous to Alexander, but by turning his sword from the ignoble and effeminate Persians, against which he had directed it, towards the manly and famous Grecians, of whose assistance he thought himself assured, his present undertaking was greatly disordered. But he that cannot endure to strive against the wind, shall hardly attain the Port, which he purposeth to recover: and it no less becometh the worthiest men to oppose misfortunes, than it doth the weakest children to bewail them.

He therefore made such expedition towards these Revolters, as that himself, with the Army that followed him, brought them the first news of his preparation. Hereupon all stagger, and the Athenians, as they were the first that moved, so were they the first that fainted, seeking by their Ambassadour to pacifie the King, and to be received again into his grace. Alexander was not long in resolving; for the Persians perswaded him to pardon the Grecians. Wise men are not easily drawn from great purposes by such occasions as may easily be taken off, neither hath any King ever brought to effect any great affair, who hath entangled himself in many enterprises at once, not tending to one and the same certain end.

And having now quieted his borderers towards the South, he resolved to assure those Nations which lay on the North-side of Macedon, to wit, the Thracians, Triballes, Peones, Getes, Agreans, and other salvage people, which had greatly vexed with incursions, not only other of his Predecessors, but even Philip his Father: with all which, after divers Overthrows given them, he made peace, or else brought them into subjection. Notwithstanding this good success, he could not yet find the way out of Europe. There is nothing more natural to man than liberty: the Greeks had enjoyed it over-long, and lost it too late to forget it; they therefore shake off the yoke once again. The Thebans who had in their Cittadel a Garrison of three thousand Macedonians, attempt to force it; Alexander hasteneth to their succour, and presents himself with thirty thousand foot, all old Souldiers, and three thousand Horse, before the City, and gave the Inhabitants some days to resolve, being even heart-sick with the desire of passing into Asia. So unwilling, indeed, he was to draw blood of the Grecians, by whom he hoped to serve himself elsewhere, that he offered the Thebans remission, if they would only deliver into his hands Phœnix and Prothytes, the stirrers up of the Rebellion. But they opposing the mounting fortune of Alexander, (which bare all resistance before it, like the breaking in of the Ocean Sea) instead of such an Answer, as men besieged and abandoned should have made, demanded Philotas and Antipater to be delivered unto them; as if Thebes alone, then layed in the ballance of Fortune with the Kingdom of Macedon, and many other Provinces, could either have evened the scale or swayed it. Therefore in the end they perished in their obstinacy. For while the Thebans oppose the assailant, they are charged at the back by the Macedonian Garrison, their City taken and rased to the ground, six thousand slain, and thirty thousand sold for slaves, at the price of four hundred and forty Talents. This the King did to the terrour of the other Grecian Cities.

Many arguments were used by Cleadas one of the Prisoners, to perswade Alexander to forbear the destruction of Thebes. He prayed the King to believe that they were rather mis-led, by giving hasty credit to false reports, than any way malicious; for being perswaded of Alexander's death, they rebelled but against his successour. He also besought the King to remember, that his Father Philip had his education in that City, yea, that his Ancestor Hercules was born therein: but all perswasions were fruitless; the times wherein offences are committed do greatly aggravate them. Yet for the honour he bare to learning, he pardoned all the race of Pindarus the Poet, and spared, and set at liberty Timoclea the Sister of Theagenes, who died in defence of the liberty of Greece against his Father Philip. This noble woman being taken by a Thracian, and by him ravished, he threatned to take her life, unless she would confess her treasure: she led that Thracian to a Well, and told him, that she had therein cast it: and when the Thracian stooped to look into the Well, she suddenly thrust him into the mouth thereof and stoned him to death.

Now because the Athenians had received into their City so many of the Thebans, as had escaped and fled unto them for succour, Alexander would not grant them peace, but upon condition to deliver into his hands both their Oratours which perswaded this second revolt, and their Captains; yet in the end, it being a torment unto him to retard the enterprize of Persia, he was content that the Oratours should remain, and accepted of the banishment of the Captains; wherein he was exceeding ill advised, had not his fortune, or rather the providence of God, made all the resistance against him unprofitable: for these good Leaders of the Grecians betook themselves to the service of the Persian, whom after a few days he invaded.

SECT. II.

How Alexander passed into Asia, fought with the Persians upon the River of Granicus.

WHen all was now quieted at home, Alexander, committing to the trust of Antipater both Greece and Macedon, in the first of the Spring did pass the Hellespont, and being ready to dis imbark, he threw a Dart towards the Asian shore, as a token of defiance, commanding his Souldiers, not to make any waste in their own Territory, or to burn, or deface those buildings which themselves were presently, and in the future to possess. He landed his Army, consisting of two and thirty thousand foot, and five thousand horse, all old Souldiers, near unto Troy, where he offered a solemn sacrifice upon Achilles's Tomb, his maternal Ancestor.

But before he left his own coast, he put to death without any offence given him, all his Mother-in-laws Kinsmen, whom Philip his Father had greatly advanced, not sparing such of his own as he suspected. He also took with him many of his tributary Princes, of whose fidelity he doubted; thinking by unjust cruelty to assure all things, both in the present and future. Yet the end of all fell out contrary to the policy which his Ambition had commended unto him, though agreeing very well with the Justice of God; for all that he had planted, was soon after withered and rooted up; those whom he most trusted were the most traiterous; his mother, friends, and children, fell by such another mercilesse sword as his own, and all manner of confusion followed his dead body to the grave, and left him there.

When the knowledge of Alexander's landing on Asia side was brought to Darius, he so much scorned the Army of Macedon, and had so contemptible an opinion of Alexander himself, as having stiled him his servant in a letter which he wrote unto him, reprehending his disloyalty and audacity (for Darius intitled himself King of Kings, and the Kinsman of the gods) he gave order withal to his Lieutenants of the lesser Asia, that they should take Alexander alive, whip him with rods, and then convey him to his presence: that they should sink his ships, and send the Macedonians taken prisoners beyond the Red-Sea; belike into Æthiopia, or some other unhealthful part of Africa.

In this sort did this glorious King, confident in the glittering, but heartless multitude which he commanded, dispose of the already-vanquished Macedonians: But the ill destinies of men bearing them to the ground, by what ſtrong confidence ſoever armed. The great numbers which he gathered together, and brought in one heap into the field, gave rather an exceeding advantage to his enemies, than any diſcouragement at all. For, beſides that they were men utterly unacquainted with dangers; men, who by name, and countenance of their King were wont to prevail againſt thoſe of leſs courage than themſelves; men that took more care how to embroider with gold and ſilver their upper garments, as if they attended the invaſion but of the Sun-beams, than they did to arm themſelves with Iron and Steel againſt the ſharp pikes, ſwords and darts of the hardy Macedonians; I ſay, beſides all theſe, even the opinion they had of their own numbers, of which every one in particular hoped that it would not fall to his turn to fight, filled every one of them with the care of their own ſafety, without any intent at all to hazard any thing but their own breath, and that of their Horſes, in running away. The Macedonians, as they came to fight, and thereby to enrich themſelves with the Gold and Jewels of Perſia, both which they needed; ſo the Perſians, who expected nothing in that War but blows and wounds, which they needed not, obeyed the King, who had power to conſtrain them in aſſembling themſelves for his ſervice; but their own fears and cowardiſe, which in time of danger had moſt power over them, they only then obeyed, when their rebellion againſt ſo ſervile a paſſion did juſtly and violently require it. For, ſaith Vegetius, Quem admodum bene exercitatus miles prælium cupit, ita formidat indoctus; nam ſciendum eſt in pugna uſum amplius prodeſſe quàm vires. As the well practiſed Souldier deſires to come to battel, ſo the raw one fears it: for we muſt underſtand, that in fight it more avails to have been accuſtomed unto the like, than only to have rude ſtrength. What manner of men the Perſians were, Alexander diſcovered in the firſt encounter; before which time it is ſaid, by thoſe that write his ſtory, that it was hard to judge, whether his daring to undertake the Conqueſt of an Empire ſo well peopled with an handful of men, or the ſucceſs he had, were more to be wondred at. For at the River of Granick, which ſevereth the Territory of Troy from Propontis, the Perſians ſought to ſtop his paſſage, taking the higher ground and bank of the River to defend, which Alexander was forced (as it were) to clime up unto, and ſcale from the Level of the water. Great reſiſtance (ſaith Curtius) was made by the Perſians, yet in the end Alexander prevailed. But it ſeems to me that the Victory then gotten was exceeding eaſie, and that the twenty thouſand Perſian footmen, ſaid to be ſlain, were rather killed in the back, in running away, than hurt in the boſoms by reſiſting. For had thoſe twenty thouſand foot, and two hundred and fifty horſemen, or, after Plutarch, two thouſand and five hundred horſe-men, dyed with their faces towards the Macedonians, Alexander could not have bought their lives at ſo ſmall a rate, as with the loſs of four and thirty of all ſorts of his own. And if it were alſo true, that Plutarch doth report, how Alexander encountred two of the Perſian Commanders, Spithridates and Rœſaches; and that the Perſian horſe-men fought with great fury, though in the end ſcattered; and laſtly, how thoſe Grecians in Darius his pay, holding themſelves in one body upon a piece of ground of advantage, did (after mercy was refuſed them) fight it out to the laſt; how then doth it reſemble truth, that ſuch reſiſtance having been made, yet of Alexander's Army there fell but twelve footmen, and two and twenty horſemen.

SECT. III.

A digreſſion concerning the defence of hard paſſages. Of things following the Battel of Granick.

THe winning of this paſſage did greatly encourage the Macedonians, and brought ſuch terrour upon all thoſe of the leſſer Aſia, as he obtained all the Kingdoms thereof without a blow, ſome one or two Towns excepted. For in all invaſions, where the Nations invaded have once been beaten upon a great advantage of the place, as in defence of Rivers, Straits, and Mountains, they will ſoon have perſwaded themſelves, that ſuch an enemy upon equal terms and even ground; can hardly be reſiſted. It was therefore Machiavel's counſel, That he which reſolveth to defend a paſſage, ſhould with his ableſt force oppoſe the Aſſailant. And to ſay truth, few Regions of any great circuit are ſo well fenced, that Armies of ſuch force as may be thought ſufficient to conquer them, can be debarred all entrance, by the natural difficulties of the ways. One paſſage or other is commonly left unguarded: if all be defended, then muſt the forces of the Country be diſtracted; and yet lightly ſome one place will be found that is defended very weakly. How often have the Alpes given way to Armies, breaking into Italy? Yea, Where ſhall we find that ever they kept out an Invader? Yet are they ſuch as (to ſpeak briefly) afflict with all difficulties thoſe that travel over them; but they give no ſecurity to thoſe that lye behind them: for they are of too large extent. The Towns of Lombardy perſwaded themſelves that they might enjoy their quiet, when the Warlike Nation of the Switzers had undertaken to hinder Francis the French King from deſcending into the Dutchy of Milan: but whilſt theſe Patrons of Milan, whom their own dwelling in thoſe Mountains had made fitteſt of all other for ſuch a ſervice, were buſied in cuſtody of the Alpes; Francis appeared in Lombardy, ſo much the greater terrour of the Inhabitants, by how much the leſs they had expected his arrival. What ſhall we ſay of thoſe Mountains, which lock up whole Regions in ſuch ſort, as they leave but one Gate open; The Straits, or (as they were called) the Gates of Taurus in Cilicia, and thoſe of Thermopylæ, have ſeldom been attempted, perhaps becauſe they were thought impregnable: but how ſeldom (if ever) have they been attempted in vain? Xerxes, and long after him, the Romans, forced the entrance of Thermopylæ; Cyrus the younger, and after him Alexander, found the Gates of Cilicia wide open; how ſtrongly ſoever they had been locked and barred, yet were thoſe Countries open enough to a Fleet that ſhould enter on the backſide. The defence of Rivers, how hard a thing it is, we find examples in all histories that bear good witness. The deepest have many Foords; the swiftest and broadest may be passed by Boats, in case it be found a matter of difficulty to make a Bridge. He that hath men enough to defend all the length of his own bank, hath also enough to beat his enemy; and may therefore do better to let him come over, to his loss, than by striving in vain to hinder the passage, as a matter tending to his own disadvantage, till the heads of his Souldiers with an opinion, that they are in ill case, having their means of safeguard taken from them by the skill or valour of such as are too good for them. Certainly, if a River were sufficient defence against an Army, the Isle of Mona, now called Anglesey, which is divided from North Wales, by an Arm of the Sea, had been safe enough against the Romans, invading it under the conduct of Julius Agricola. But he wanting, and not meaning to spend the time in making Vessels to transport his forces, did assay the foords. Whereby he so amazed the enemies attending for ships and such like provisions by Sea, that surely believing nothing could be hard or invincible to men, which came so minded to War, they humbly intreated for peace, and yielded the Island. Yet the Britains were men stout enough, the Persians were very dastards.

It was therefore wisely done of Alexander, to pass the River of Granick in face of the enemy; not marching higher to seek an easier way, nor labouring to convey his men, over it by some safer means. For, having beaten them upon their own ground, he did thereby cut off no less of their reputation, than of their strength, leaving no hope of succour to the partakers and followers of such unable Protectors.

Soon after this Victory he recovered Sardis, Ephesus, the Cities of the Tralians, and Magnesia, which were rendred unto him. The Inhabitants of which, with the people of the Countrey, he received with great grace, suffering them to be governed by their own Laws. For he observed it well; Novum Imperium incheantibus, utilis clementiæ fama; It is commodious unto such as lay the foundations of a new Soveraignty, to have the fame of being merciful. He then by Parmenio wan Miletus, and by force mastered Halicarnassæus, which because it resisted obstinately, he rased to the ground. From whence he entred into Caria, where Ada the Queen, who had been cast out of all that she held (except the City of Alinda) by Darius his Lieutenants, presented her self unto him, and adopted him her Son and Successor; which Alexander accepted in so gracious part, as he left the whole Kingdom to her disposing. He then entred into Lycia, and Pamphylia, and obtained all the Sea-coasts, and, subjecting unto him Pisidia, he directed himself towards Darius (who was said to be advanced towards him with a marvellous Army) by the way of Phrygia: For, all the Province of Asia the less, bordering upon the Sea, his first Victory laid under his feet.

While he gave order for the government and settling of Lycia, and Pamphylia, they sent Cleander to raise some new Captains in Peloponnesus, and marching towards the North, he entred Celenæ, seated on the River Meander, which was abandoned unto him; the Castle only holding out, which also after forty days was given up: for so long time he gave them to attend succour from Darius. From Celenæ he pass'd through Phrygia towards the Euxine Sea, till he came to a City called Gordium, the Regal Seat, in former times of King Midas. In this City it was, that he found the Gordian-knot, which when he knew not how to undo, he cut it asunder with his Sword. For there was an ancient Prophecy did promise to him that could untie it, the Lordship of all Asia; whereupon Alexander, not respecting the manner how, so it were done, assumed to himself the fulfilling of the Prophecy, by hewing it in pieces.

But before he turned from this part of Asia the less towards the east, he took care to clear the Sea-coast on his back, and to thrust the Persians out of the Islands of Lesbos, Chio, and Coos: the charge whereof he committed unto two of his Captains, giving them such order as he thought to be most convenient for that service; and delivering unto them fifty Talents to defray the charge, and withal out of his first spoil gotten, he sent threescore Talents more to Antipater his Lieutenant in Greece and Macedon. From Celenæ he removed to Ancira, now called Anguori, standing on the same River of Sangarias, which runneth through Gordium: there he mustered his Army, and then entred Paphlagonia, whose people submitted themselves unto him, and obtained freedom of tribute: where he left Catus Governour with one Regiment of Macedonians lately arrived.

Here he understood of the death of Memnon, Darius's Lieutenant, which heartned him greatly to pass on towards him; for of this only Captain he had more respect than of all the multitude by Darius assembled, and of all the Commanders he had besides. For so much hath the spirit of some one man excelled; as it hath undertaken and effected the alteration of the greatest States and Commonweals, the erection of Monarchies, the Conquest of Kingdoms and Empires, guided handfuls of men against multitudes of equal bodily strength, contrived victories beyond all hope and discourse of reason, converted the fearful passions of his own followers into magnanimity, and the valour of his enemies into cowardize; such spirits have been stirred up in sundry Ages of the world, and in divers parts thereof, to erect and cast down again, to establish and to destroy, and to bring all things, Persons and States, to the same certain ends, which the infinite Spirit of the Universal, piercing, moving and governing all things, hath ordained. Certainly, the things that this King did, were marvellous, and would hardly have been undertaken by any man else: and though his Father had determined to have invaded the lesser Asia, it is like enough that he would have contented himself with some part thereof, and not have discovered the River of Indus as this man did. The swift course of victory, wherewith he ran over so large a portion of the World in so short a space, may justly be imputed unto this, that he was never encountred by an equal spirit, concurring with equal power against him. Hereby it came to pass that his actions being limited by no greater opposition, than desart places, and the meer length of tedious journies could make, were like the Colossus of Rhodes, not so much to be admired for the workmanship, though therein also praise worthy, as for the huge bulk. For certainly the things performed by Xenophon, discover as brave a spirit as Alexander's, and working no less exquisitely, though the effects were less material, as were also the forces and power of command, by which it wrought. But he that would find the exact pattern of a noble Commander, must look upon such as Epaminondas, that encountring worthy Captains, and those better followed than themselves, have by their singular vertue over topped their valiant enemies, and ſtill prevailed over thoſe, that would not have yielded one foot to any other. Such as theſe are do ſeldom live to obtain great Empires. For it is a work of more labour and longer time, to maſter the equal forces of one hardy and well-ordered State, than to tread down and utterly ſubdue a multitude of ſervile Nations, compounding the body of a groſs and unwieldy Empire. Wherefore theſe Parvo-Potentes, men that with little have done much upon enemies of like ability, are to be regarded as choice examples of worth; but great Conquerors, to be rather admired for the ſubſtance of their actions, than the exquiſite managing: exactneſs and greatneſs concurring ſo ſeldom, that I can find no inſtance of both in one, ſave only that brave Roman, Cæſar.

Having thus far digreſſed, it is time that we return unto our Eaſtern Conquerour; who is travelling haſtily towards Cilicia, with a deſire to recover the Straits thereof before Darius ſhould arrive there. But firſt making a diſpatch unto Greece, he ſent to thoſe Cities, in which he repoſed moſt truſt, ſome of the Perſian Targets which he had recovered in this firſt battel, upon which by certain inſcriptions, he made them partakers of his Victory. Herein he well adviſed himſelf; for he that doth not as well impart of the honour which he gains in the Wars, as he doth of the ſpoils, ſhall never be long followed of thoſe of the better ſort. For men which are either well-born, or well-bred, and have more of wealth than of reputation, do as often ſatisfie themſelves with the purchaſe of glory, as the weak in fortune, and ſtrong in courage, do with the gain of gold and ſilver.

The Governour of Cilicia hearing of Alexander's coming on, left ſome Companies to keep the Straits, which were indeed very defenſible; and withal, as Curtius noteth, he began over-late to priſe and put in execution the Counſel of Memnon: who in the beginning of the Wars adviſed him to waſt all the proviſions for Men and Horſe, that could not be lodged in ſtrong places, and always to give ground to the Invader, till he found ſome ſuch notable advantage as might aſſuredly promiſe him the obtaining of Victory. For the fury of an invading Army is beſt broken, by delays, change of diet, and want, eating ſometimes too little, and ſometimes too much, ſometimes repoſing themſelves in beds, and oftner on the cold ground. Theſe and the like ſudden alterations bring many Diſeaſes upon all Nations out of their own Countries. Therefore if Darius had kept the Macedonians but a while from meat and ſleep, and refuſing, to give or take battel, had wearied them with his light horſe, as the Parthians afterward did the Romans, he might perchance have ſaved his own life, and his eſtate. For it was one of the greateſt encouragements given by Alexander to the Macedonians, in the third and laſt fatal battel, That they were to fight with all the ſtrength of Perſia at once.

Xerxes, when he invaded Greece and fought abroad, being beaten, loſt only his men; but Darius being invaded by the Greeks, and fighting at home by being beaten, loſt his Kingdom. Pericles though the Lacedemonians burnt all in Attica to the Gates of Athens, yet could not be drawn to hazard a battel: for the invaded ought evermore to fight upon the advantage of time and place. Becauſe we read Hiſtories to inform our underſtanding by the examples therein found, we will give ſome inſtances of thoſe that have periſhed by adventuring in their own Countries, to charge an invading Army. The Romans, by fighting with Hannibal, were brought to the brink of their deſtruction.

Pompey was well adviſed for a while, when he gave Cæſar ground; but when by the importunity of his Captains he adventured to fight at Pharſalia, he loſt the battel, loſt the freedom of Rome, and his own life.

Ferdinand, in the Conqueſt of Naples, would needs fight a battel with the French to his confuſion, though it was told him by a man of ſound Judgement, that thoſe Counſels which promiſe ſurety in all things, are honourable enough.

The Conſtable of France made fruſtrate the mighty preparation of Charles the fifth, when he invaded Provence, by waſting the Country, and forbearing to fight; ſo did the Duke of Alva weary the French in Naples, and diſſolve the boiſtrous Army of the Prince of Orange in the Low-Countries.

The Leigers, contrary to the advice of their General, would needs fight a battel with the Bourgonians, invading their Country, and could not be perſwaded to linger the time, and ſtay their advantage; but they loſt eight and twenty thouſand upon the place. Philip of Valois ſet upon King Edward at Creſſie; and King John (when the Engliſh were well near tired out, and would in ſhort time by an orderly purſuit have been waſted to nothing) conſtrained the black Prince with great fury, near Poictiers, to joyn battel with him: But all men know what lamentable ſucceſs theſe two French Kings found. Charles the fifth of France, made another kind of Fabian-Warfare; and though the Engliſh burnt and waſted many places, yet this King held his reſolution to forbear blows, and followed his advice, which told him, That the Engliſh could never get his inheritance by ſmoak. And it is reported by Belloy and Herrault, that King Edward was wont to ſay of this Charles, that he wan from him the Dutchy of Guyen without ever putting on his Armour.

But where God hath a purpoſe to deſtroy, wiſe men grow ſhort lived, and the charge of things is committed unto ſuch as either cannot ſee what is for their good, or know not how to put in execution any ſound advice. The courſe which Memnon had propounded, muſt in all appearance of reaſon, have brought the Macedonians to a great perplexity, and made him ſtand ſtill a while at the Straits of Cilicia, doubting whether it were more ſhameful to return, or dangerous to proceed. For, had Cappadocia, and Paphlagonia been waſted while Alexander was far off; and the Straits of Cilicia been defended by Arſenes, Governour of that Province, with the beſt of his forces; hunger would not have ſuffered the enemy, to ſtay the trial of all means that might be thought upon, of forcing that paſſage: or if the place could not have been maintained, yet might Cilicia, at better leiſure have been ſo throughly ſpoiled, that the heart of his Army ſhould have been broken, by ſeeking out miſeries by painful travel.

But Arſenes leaving a ſmall number to defend the Straits, took the beſt of his Army with him, to waſte and ſpoil the Country; or rather, as may ſeem, to find himſelf ſome work, by pretence of which he might honeſtly run further away from Alexander. He ſhould rather have adventured his perſon in cuſtody of the Straits, whereby he might perhaps have ſaved the Province; and in the mean time, all that was in the fields, would have been con-conveyed into ſtrong Towns. So ſhould his Army, if it were driven from the place of advantage; have found good entertainment within walled Cities, and himſelf with his horſmen have had the leſs work in deſtroying that little which was left abroad. Handling the matter as he did, he gave the Cilicians cauſe to wiſh for Alexander's coming; and as great cauſe to the Keepers of the paſſage not to hinder it. For cowards are wiſe in apprehending all forms of danger. Theſe Guardians of the Straits, hearing that Arſenes made all haſte to joyn himſelf with Darius, burning down all as he went, like one deſpairing of the defence began to grow circumſpect, and to think that ſurely their General, who gave as loſt the Country behind their backs, had expoſed themſelves unto certain death, as men that were good for nothing elſe but to dull the Macedonian Swords. Wherefore not affecting to dye for their Prince and Country (which honour they ſaw that Arſenes himſelf could well forbear) they ſpeedily followed the footſteps of their General, gleaning after his Harveſt. Thus Alexander without labour got both the entrance of Cilicia, abandoned by the cowardiſe of his enemies, and the whole Province that had been alienated from the Perſian ſide by their indiſcretion.

SECT. IV.

Of the unwarlike Army levied by Darius againſt Alexander. The unadviſed courſes which Darius took in this expedition. He is vanquiſhed at Iſſus; where his Mother, Wife and Children are made Priſoners: of ſome things following the battel of Iſſus.

IN the mean ſeaſon Darius approached, who (as Curtius reports) had compounded an Army of more than two hundred and ninety thouſand Souldiers, out of divers Nations; Juſtine muſters them at three hundred thouſand Foot, and a hundred thouſand Horſe; Plutarch, at ſix hundred thouſand.

The manner of his coming on, as Curtius deſcribes it, was rather like a Masker than a man of War, and like one that took more care to ſet out his glory and riches, than to provide for his own ſafety, perſwading himſelf, as it ſeemed, to beat Alexander with pomp and ſumptuous Pageants. For, before the Army there was carried the holy Fire, which the Perſians worſhipped, attended by their Prieſts; and after them three hundred and threeſcore and five young men, anſwering the number of the days of the year, covered with Scarlet; then the Chariot of Jupiter drawn with white Horſes, with their Riders cloathed in the ſame colour, with rods of gold in their hands; and after it, the Horſe of the Sun: Next after theſe follow ten ſumptuous Chariots, inlayed and garniſht with ſilver and gold; and then the Vantguard of their horſe, compounded of twelve ſeveral Nations, which the better to avoid confuſion, did hardly underſtand each others language; and theſe marſhall'd in the head of the reſt, being beaten, might ſerve very fitly to diſorder all that followed them: in the tail of theſe horſes the Regiment of Foot marched, which the Perſians called Immortal, becauſe if any died, the number was preſently ſupplied: and theſe were armed with chains of gold, and their coats with the ſame mettal embroidered, whereof the ſleeves were garniſhed with pearl: baits, either to catch the hungry Macedonians withal, or to perſwade them that it were great incivility to cut, and to deface ſuch glorious garments. But it was well ſaid, Sumptuosè indutus miles, ſe virtute ſuperiorem aliis non exiſtimet, cum in præliis oporteat fortitudine animi, & non veſtimentis muniri, quoniam hoſtes veſtibus non debellantur; Let no man think that he exceedeth thoſe in valour, whom he exceedeth in gay garments; for it is by men armed with fortitude of mind, and not by the apparel they put on, that enemies are beaten. And it was perchance from the Roman Papyrius that this advice was borrowed, who when he fought againſt the Samnites in that fatal battel, wherein they all ſware either to prevail or dye, thirty thouſand of them having apparelled themſelves in white garments, with high creſts, and great plumes of feathers, bade the Roman Souldiers to lay aſide all fear: Non enim criſtas vulnera facere, & per picta atque aurata ſcuta tranſire Romanum pilum; For theſe plumed creſts would wound no body, and the Roman pile would bore holes in painted and guilded ſhields.

To ſecond this Court-like company, fifteen thouſand were appointed more rich and glittering than the former, but apparelled like Women (belike to breed the more terror) and theſe were honoured with the title of the King's Kinſmen. Then came Darius himſelf, the Gentlemen of his Guard-robe, riding before his Chariot, which was ſupported with the Gods of his Nation, caſt and cut in pure gold; theſe the Macedonians did not ſerve, but they ſerved their turns of theſe, by changing their maſſie-bodies into thin, portable, and currant coyn. The head of this Chariot was ſet with pretious ſtones, with two little golden Idols, covered with an open winged Eagle of the ſame metal: The hinder part whereon Darius ſate, had a covering of ineſtimable value. This Chariot of the King was followed with ten thouſand Horſe-men, their Lances plated with ſilver, and their heads guilt; which they meant not to imbrue in the Macedonian blood, for fear of marring their beauty. He had for the proper guard of his own perſon, two hundred of the blood Royal; blood, too Royal and pretious to be ſpilled by any valorous adventure (I am of opinion that two hundred ſturdy fellows, like the Switzers would have done him more ſervice) and theſe were backt with thirty thouſand foot-men, after whom again were led four hundred ſpare horſes for the King, which if he had meant to have uſed, he would have marſhalled ſomewhat nearer him.

Now followed the Reer-ward, the ſame being led by Siſygambis the King's Mother, and by his Wife, drawn in glorious Chariots, followed by a great train of Ladies their attendants on horſe-back, with fifteen Wagons of the King's Children, and the Wives of the Nobility, waited on by two hundred and fifty Concubines, and a world of Nurſes and Eunuchs, moſt ſumptuouſly apparalled. By which it ſhould ſeem that Darius thought that the Macedonians had been Comedians or Tumblers; for this Troop was far fitter to behold thoſe ſports than to be preſent at battels. Between theſe and a company of ſlight-armed ſlaves, with a world of Varlets, was the King's treaſure, charged on ſix hundred Mules, and three hundred Camels brought as it proved, to pay the Macedonians. In this ſort came the May-game-King into the field, incumbred with with a moſt unneceſſary train of Strumpets, attended with troops of divers Nations, ſpeaking divers languages, and for their numbers impoſſible to be marſhalled; and for the moſt part ſo effeminate, and ſo rich in gold and in garments, as the ſame could not but have encouraged the naked'ſt Nation of the World againſt them. We find it in daily experience, that all diſcourſe of Magnanimity, of National Virtue, of Religion, of Liberty, and whatſoever elſe hath been wont to move and encourage Virtuous men, hath no force at all with the common Souldier, in compariſon of ſpoil and riches. The rich ſhips are boarded upon all diſadvantage, the rich Towns are furiouſly aſſaulted, and the plentiful Countries willingly invaded. Our Engliſh Nation have attempted many places in the Indies, and run upon the Spaniards head-long, in hope of their Royals of Plate, and Piſtolets; which, had they been put to it upon the like diſadvantages in Ireland, or in any poor Country, they would have turned their Pieces and Pikes againſt their Commanders, conteſting that they had been brought without reaſon to the butchery and ſlaughter. It is true that the War is made willingly, and for the moſt part with good ſucceſs, that is ordained againſt the richeſt Nations; for as the needy are always adventurous, ſo plenty is wont to ſhun peril, and men that have well to live, do rather ſtudy how to live well, I mean wealthily, than care to dye (as they call it) honourably. Car où il n'y a rien a gaigner que des coups, volontiers il n'y va pas. No man makes haſt to the market, where there is nothing to be bought but blows.

Now if Alexander had beheld this preparation before his conſultation with his Sooth-ſayers, he would have ſatisfied himſelf by the out-ſides of the Perſians, and never have looked into the intrails of Beaſts for ſucceſs. For leaving the deſcription of this ſecond battel (which is indeed no where well deſcribed; neither, for the confuſion and haſty running away of the Aſians, could it be) we have enough by the ſlaughter that was made of them, and by the few that fell of the Macedonians, to inform us what manner of reſiſtance was made. For if it be true that threeſcore thouſand Perſian footmen were ſlain in this battel, with ten thouſand of their horſemen; Or (as Curtius ſaith) an hundred thouſand footmen, with the ſame number of horſemen, and beſides this ſlaughter, 40000. taken priſoners, while of Alexander's Army there miſcarried but two hundred and fourſcore of all ſorts, of which numbers Arrianus and other Hiſtorians cut off almoſt the one half; I do verily believe, that this ſmall number rather died with the over-travel and pains-taking in killing their enemies, than by any ſtrokes received from them. And ſurely if the Perſian Nation (at this time degenerate and the baſeſt of the World) had any ſavour remaining of the ancient valour of their forefathers, they would never have ſold ſo good cheap, and at ſo vile a price, the Mother, the Wife, the Daughters, and other the King's children; had their own honour been valued by them at nothing, and the King's ſafety and his eſtate at leſs. Darius by this time found it true, that Charidemus a baniſhed Grecian of Athens had told him, when he made a view of his Army about Babylon, to wit, That the multitude which he had aſſembled of divers Nations, richly attired, but poorly armed, would be found more terrible to the Inhabitants of the country, whom in paſſing by they would devour, than to the Macedonians, whom they meant to aſſail; who being all old and obedient Souldiers, imbattelled in groſs ſquadrons, which they call their Phalanx, well covered with Armour for defence, and furniſhed with weapons for offence of great advantage, would make ſo little accompt of his delicate Perſians, loving their eaſe and their pallat, being withal ill armed, and worſe diſciplined, as except it would pleaſe him to entertain (having ſo great abundance of treaſure to do it withal) a ſufficient number of the ſame Grecians, and ſo to encounter the Macedonians with men of equal courage, he would repent him overlate, as taught by the miſerable ſucceſs like to follow.

But this diſcourſe was ſo unpleaſing to Darius (who had been accuſtomed to nothing ſo much as to his own praiſes, and to nothing ſo little as to hear truth) as he commanded that this poor Grecian ſhould be preſently ſlain: who while he was a ſundring in the Tormentor's hands, uſed this ſpeech to the King, That Alexander, againſt whom he had given this good counſel, ſhould aſſuredly revenge his death, and lay deſerved puniſhment upon Darius for deſpiſing his advice.

It was the ſaying of a Wiſe man: Deſperata ejus Principis ſalus eſt, cujus aures ita formatæ ſunt, ut aſperæ quæ utilia, nec quicquam niſi jucundum accipiat; That Prince's ſafety is in a deſperate caſe, whoſe ears judge all that is profitable to be too ſharp, and will entertain nothing that is unpleaſant.

For, liberty in Council is the life and eſſence of Council; Libertas conſilii eſt ejus vita & eſſentia, quâ crepta conſilium evaneſcit.

Darius did likewiſe value at nothing the advice given him by the Grecian Souldiers that ſerved him, who intreated him not to fight in the Straits: But had they been Counſellers and Directors in that War, as they were underlings and commanded by others, they had with the help of a good troop of horſemen been able to have oppoſed the fury of Alexander, without any aſſiſtance of the Perſian foot-men. For when Darius was overthrown with all his cowardly and confuſed rabble, thoſe Grecians, under their Captain Amyntas, held firm, and marched away in order, in deſpight of the Vanquiſhers. Old Souldiers are not eaſily diſmayed: we read in Hiſtories ancient and modern, what brave retreats have been made by them, though the reſt of the Army in which they have ſerved, hath been broken.

At the battel of Ravenna, where the Imperials were beaten by the French, a ſquadron of Spaniards, old Souldiers, came off unbroken and undiſmayed; whom when Gaſton de Foix, Duke of Neumours, and Nephew to Lewis the twelfth, charged, as holding the Victory not entire by their eſcape, he was overturned and ſlain in the place. For it is truly ſaid of thoſe men, who, by being acquainted with dangers fear them not, That, Neglecto periculo imminentis mali, opus ipſum, quantumvis difficile, aggrediuntur; They go about the buſineſs it ſelf, how hard ſoever it be, not ſtanding to conſider of the danger, which the miſchief hanging over their heads may bring: and as truly of thoſe that know the Wars but by hear-ſay; Quod valentes ſunt & prævalentes ante pericula, in ipſis tamen periculis diſcedunt; They have ability enough, and to ſpare, till dangers appear; but when peril indeed comes, they get them gone.

Theſe Grecians alſo that made the retreat, adviſed Darius to retire his Army into the plain of Meſopotamia, to the end that Alexander being entred into thoſe large fields and great Champians, he might have invironed the Macedonians on all ſides with with his multitude; and withal they counſelled him to divide that his huge Army into parts, not committing the whole to one ſtroke of Fortune, whereby he might have fought many battels, and have brought no greater number at once than might have been well marſhalled and conducted. But this Counſel was ſo contrary to the cowardly affections of the Perſians, as they peſwaded Darius to inviron the Grecians which gave the advice, and to cut them in pieces as Traytors. The infinite wiſdom of God doth not work always by one and the ſame way, but very often in the alteration of Kingdoms and Eſtates, by taking underſtanding from the Governours, ſo as they can neither give nor diſcern of Counſels. For Darius that would needs fight with Alexander upon a ſtraitned piece of ground, near unto the City of Iſſus, where he could bring no more hands to fight than Alexander could (who by the advice of Parmenio ſtayed there, as in a place of beſt advantage) was utterly overthrown, his Treaſure loſt, his Wife, Mother, and Children (whom the Grecians his followers had perſwaded him to leave in Babylon, or elſewhere) taken priſoners, and all their Train of Ladies ſpoiled of their rich Garments, Jewels, and Honour. It is true, that both the Queen, and her Daughters, who had the good hap to be brought to Alexander's preſence, were entertained with all reſpect due unto their birth, their Honours preſerved, and their Jewels and rich Garments reſtored unto them, and though Darius's Wife was a moſt beautiful Lady, and his Daughters of excellent form, yet Alexander maſtred his affections towards them all: only it is reported out of Ariſtobulus the Hiſtorian that he imbraced the Wife of the valiant Memnon, her Husband lately dead, who was taken flying from Damaſcus by Parmenio, at which time the Daughters of Ochus, who reigned before Darius, and the Wives and Children of all the Nobility of Perſia in effect, fell into captivity; at which time alſo Darius's Treaſure (not loſt at Iſſus) was ſeized, amounting to ſix thouſand and two hundred Talents of coyn, and of Bullion five hundred Talents, with a world of riches beſides.

Darius himſelf leaving his brother dead, with divers other of his chief Captains, (caſting the Crown from his head) hardly eſcaped.

After this overthrow given unto Darius, all Phœnicia (the City of Tyre excepted) was yielded to Alexander, of which Parmenio was made Governor.

Aradus, Zidon, and Biblos, Maritimate Cities of great importance, of which one Strato was King (but hated of the people) acknowledged Alexander. Good fortune followed him ſo faſt, that it trod on his heels; for Antigonus, Alexander's Lieutenant in Aſia the leſs, overthrew the Cappadocians, Paphlagonians, and others lately revolted; Ariſtodemus, Darius's Admiral had his Fleet partly taken, and in part drowned by the Macedonians newly levied; the Lacedemonians that warred againſt Antipater were beaten; four thouſand of thoſe Greeks which made the retreat at the laſt battel, forſaking both the party of Darius and of Alexander, and led by Amyntas into Egypt, to hold it for themſelves, were buried there, for the time was not yet come to divide Kingdoms.

Alexander to honour Epheſtion, whom he loved moſt, gave him power to diſpoſe of the Kingdom of Zidon. A man of a moſt poor eſtate, that laboured to ſuſtain his life, being of the Royal blood was commended by the people unto him, who changed his Spade into a Scepter, ſo as he was beheld both a Beggar and a King in one and the ſame hour.

It was a good deſire of this new King, when ſpeaking to Alexander, he wiſht that he could bear his proſperity with the ſame moderation, and quietneſs of heart, that he had done his adverſity; but ill done of Alexander, in that he would not perform in himſelf that which he commended in another man's deſire: for it was a ſign that he did but accompany, and could not Govern his felicity.

While he made ſome ſtay in thoſe parts; he received a letter from Darius, importing the ranſome of his Wife, his Mother, and his Children, with ſome other conditions of peace, but ſuch as rather became a Conquerour, than one that had now been twice ſhamefully beaten, not vouchſafing in his direction, to ſtile Alexander King. It is true, that the Romans, after that they had received an overthrow by Pyrrhus, returned him a more ſcornful anſwer upon the offer of peace, than they did before the tryal of his force. But as their fortunes were then in the Spring, ſo that of Darius had already caſt leaf; the one a reſolved, well armed and diſciplined Nation, the other cowardly and effeminate. Alexander diſdained the offers of Darius, and ſent him word, that he not only directed his letter to a King, but to the King of Darius himſelf.

SECT. V.

How Alexander beſieged and won the City of Tyre.

Alexander coming near the City of Tyre, received from them the preſent of a golden Crown, with great ſtore of victuals and other preſents, which he took very thankfully, returning them anſwer, That he deſired to offer a Sacrifice to Hercules, the Protector of their City, from whom he was deſcended. But the Tyrians like not his company within their Walls, but tell him that the Temple of Hercules was ſeated in the old City adjoyning, now abandoned and deſolate. To be ſhort, Alexander reſolved to enter it by force: and though it were a place in all mens opinion impregnable, becauſe the Iſland whereon it was built, was eight hundred furlongs from the Main, yet, with the labour of many hands, having great ſtore of ſtone from the old Tyre, and timber ſufficient from Lybanus, he filled the paſſage of the Sea between the Iſland and the Main, which being more than once carried away by the ſtrength of the Sea upon a ſtorm of wind, ſometimes by the Tyrians fired, and ſometimes torn aſunder; yet with the help of his Navy which arrived (during the ſiege) from Cyprus, he overcame all difficulties and prevailed, after he had ſpent ſeven months in that attempt. The Tyrians in the beginning of the Siege had barbarouſly drowned the meſſengers ſent by Alexander, perſwading them to render the City, in reſpect whereof, and of the great loſs of time and men, he put eight thouſand to the ſword, and cauſed two thouſand of thoſe that eſcaped the fury, to be hanged on Croſſes on the Sea-ſhore, and reſerved for ſlaves (ſaith Diodore) thirteen thouſand; Arrianus reckons them at thirty thouſand. Many more had died, had not the Zidonians, that ſerved Alexander, conveyed great numbers by ſhipping unto their own City. Arrian.

Happy it was for Apollo that the Town was taken: for one of the Tyrians having dreamt, that Juſt. l. 18.

this god meant to forsake the City, they bound him fast with a golden chain to the Idol of Hercules; but Alexander like a gracious Prince, loosed him again.

It is true, that it was a notable enterprize, and a difficult, but great things are made greater. For Nebuchodonosor had taken it before, and filled up the chanel that lay between the Island and the Main.

The Government of this Territory he gave to Philotas the Son of Parmenio; Cilicia, he committed to Socrates, and Andromachus Lieutenant under Parmenio; Ephestion had charge of the Fleet, and was directed to find Alexander at Gaza towards Egypt.

SECT. VI.

How Darius offered Conditions of Peace to Alexander. Alexander wins Gaza, and deals graciously with the Jews.

IN the mean while Darius sends again to Alexander, sets before him all the difficulties of passing on towards the East, and layeth the loss of the last Battel to the straitness of the place: he hoped to terrifie him by threatning to encompass him in the plain Countries, he bids him to consider, how impossible it was to pass the Rivers of Euphrates, Tigris, Araxes, and the rest, with all such other fearful things: for he that was now filled with nothing but fear, had arguments enough of that nature to present unto another. All the Kingdoms between the River of Alys, and the Hellespont, he offered him in Dower with his beloved Daughter. But Alexander answered, That he offered him nothing but his own, and that which victory and his own virtue had possest him of; That he was to give conditions, and not to receive any, and that he having passed the Sea it self, disdained to think of resistance in transporting himself over Rivers. It is said, That Parmenio, who was now old, and full of honour and Riches, told the King, That were he Alexander, he would accept of Darius his offers; to which Alexander answered, That so would he, if he were Parmenio.

But he goes on towards Egypt, and coming before Gaza, Betis, a faithful servant to Darius, shuts the Gate against him, and defends the Town with an absolute resolution, at the siege whereof Alexander received a wound in the shoulder, which was dangerous, and a blow on his leg with a stone. He found better men in this place than he did at the former Battels; for he left so many of his Macedonians buried in the Sands of Gaza, that he was forced to send for a new supply into Greece. Here it was, that Alexander first began to change condition, and to exercise cruelty. For after that he had entred Gaza by assault, and taken Betis (whom Josephus calleth Babemesis) that was weakned with many wounds, and who never gave ground to the Assailants; he bored holes thorow his feet, and caused him to be drawn about the street, whilst he was yet alive; who being as valiant a man as himself, disdained to ask him either life or remission of his torments. And what had he to countenance this his Tyranny, but the imitation of his Ancestor Achilles, who did the like to Hector? It is true, that cruelty hath always somewhat to cover her deformity.

From Gaza (saith Josephus) he led his Army towards Jerusalem, a City, for the antiquity, and great fame thereof, well known unto him; while he lay before Tyre, he had sent for some supply thither, which Jaddus the High-Priest, being subject and sworn to Darius, had refused him. The Jews therefore fearing his revenge, and unable to resist, committed the care of their estates and safety to Jaddus, who, being taught by God, issued out of the City covered with his Pontifical Robes, to wit, an upper garment of Purple, embroidered with gold, with his Mitre, and the plate of gold wherein the Name of God was written, the Priests and Levites in their rich Ornaments, and the people in white garments, in a manner so unusual, stately, and grave, as Alexander greatly admired it. Josephus reports it, that he fell to the ground before the High-Priest, as reverencing the name of God, and that Parmenio reprehended him for it. Howsoever it was, I am of opinion, that he became so confident in his enterprize, and so assured of the success after the Prophecy of Daniel had been read unto him, wherein he saw himself, and the Conquest of Persia so directly pointed at, as nothing thenceforth could discourage him, or fear him. He confessed to Parmenio (saith Josephus) that in Dio a City of Macedon, when his mind laboured the Conquest of Asia, he saw in his sleep such a person as Jaddus, and so apparelled, professing one and the same God; by whom he was encouraged to pursue the purpose he had in hand, with assurance of victory. This apparition formerly apprehended only by the light of his fantasie, he now beheld with his bodily eyes, wherewith he was so exceedingly pleased and emboldened, as contrary to the practice of the Phœnicians (who hoped to have sacked and destroyed Jerusalem) he gave the Jews all, and more than they desired, both of liberty and immunity, with permission to live under their own Laws, and to exercise and enjoy their own Religion. Lib. 11. ca. ult.

SECT. VII.

Alexander wins Egypt: and makes a journey to the Temple of Hammon.

FRom Jerusalem, Alexander turned again towards Egypt, and entred it; where Darius his Lieutenant, Astaces, received him, and delivered into his hand the City of Memphis, with eight hundred Talents of Treasure, and all other the King's riches. By this we see, that the King of Persia, who had more of affection than of judgement, gave to the valianteſt man he had, but the command of one City, and to the veryest coward the Government of all Egypt. When he had set things in order in Egypt, he began to travel after God-head, towards Jupiter Hammon; so foolish had prosperity made him. He was to pass over the dangerous and dry Sands, where, when the water which he brought on his Camels backs was spent, he could not but have perished, had not a marvellous shower of rain fallen upon him, when his Army was in extream despair. All men that know Egypt, and have written thereof, affirm, That it never rains there: but the purposes of the Almighty God are secret, and he bringeth to pass what it pleaseth him; for it is also said, That when he had lost his way in those desarts, that a flight of Crows flew flew before the Army; who making faster wing when they were followed, and fluttering slowly when the Army was cast back, guided them over those pathless Sands to Jupiter's Temple.

Arrianus, from the report of Ptolomy, the Son of Lagus, says, That he was led by two Dragons; both which reports may be alike true. But many of those wonders and prodigious things, are feigned by those that have written the story of Alexander; as, That an Eagle lay hovering directly over his head at the battel of Issus; That a Swallow flew about his head when he slept, and would not be feared from him, till it had wakened him at Halicarnassus, fore-shewing the treason of Æropus, practised by Darius to have slain him; That from the Iron bars of which the Tyrians made their defensive Engines, when Alexander besieged them, there fell drops of blood; and that the like drops were found in a loaf of bread, broken by a Macedonian Souldier, at the same time; That a Turf of earth fell on his shoulder, when he lay before Gaza, out of which there flew a Bird into the Air. The Spaniards in the Conquest of the West Indies have many such pretty tales; telling how they have been assisted in battel by the presence of our Lady, and by Angels riding on white horses, with the like Romish miracles, which I think themselves do hardly believe. The strangest thing that I have read of in this kind, being certainly true, was, That the night before the battel at Novara, all the Dogs which followed the French Army, ran from them to the Switzers, leaping and fawning upon them, as if they had been bred and fed by them all their lives, and in the morning following, Trivulzi and Tremouille, Generals for Lewes the twelfth, were by these imperial Switzers utterly broken and put to ruine.

The place of this Idol of Jupiter Hammon is ill described by Curtius: for he bounds it by the Arabian Troglodites on the South, between whom, and the Territory of Hammon, the Region Thebais, or the superiour Egypt, with the Mountains of Lybia, and the River of Nilus, are interjacent; and on the North he joyns it to a Nation called Nasamones, who bordering the Sea-shore, live (saith he) upon the spoils of shipwrack: whereas the Temple or Grove of this Idol hath no Sea near it by two hundred miles and more, being found on the South part of Lybia; these Nasamones being due West from it, in the South part of Marmarica.

When Alexander came near the place, he sent some of his Parasites before him to practise the Priests attending the Oracle, That their answer might be given in all things, agreeable to his mad ambition; who affected the title of Jupiter's Son. And so he was saluted, Son of Jupiter, by the Devil's Prophet, whether prepared before to flatter him, or rather (as some think) defective in the Greek Tongue; For whereas he meant to say, O paidion, he said, O pai dios; that is, O Son of Jupiter, instead of O dear Son: for which Grammatical errour he was richly rewarded, and a rumour presently spread, that the great Jupiter had acknowledged Alexander for his own.

He had heard that Perseus and Hercules had formerly consulted the Oracle: The one when he was employed against Gorgon, the other against Anteus and Busiris; and seeing those men had derived themselves from the gods, why might not he: By this it seems, that he hoped to make his followers and the World fools, though indeed he made himself one, by thinking to cover from the World's knowledge his vanity and vices; and the better to confirm his followers in the belief of his Deity, he had practised the Priests to give answer to such as consulted with the Oracle, that it should be pleasing to Jupiter to honour Alexander as his Son.

Who this Ammon was, and how represented, either by a Bos carried in a Boat, or by a Ram, or a Ram's head; I see that many wise men have troubled themselves to find out; but, as Arrianus speaks of Dionysius or Liber Pater (who lived, saith St. Augustine, in Moses's time) Ea quæ de diis veteres fabulis suis conscripsere, non sunt nimium curiosè pervestiganda; We must not over-curiously search into the fables which the Ancients have written of their gods. Curt 3.4.

But this is certain and notable, that after the Gospel began to be Preached in the World, the Devil, in this, and all other Idols, became speechless. For, that this Hammon was neglected in the time of Tiberius Cæsar, and in the time of Trajan altogether forgotten, Strabo and Plutarch witness.

There is found near his Temple a Fountain called Fons solis (though Ptolomy in his third African Table sets it farther off) that at Midnight is as hot as boiling water, and at Noon as cold as any Ice: to which I cannot but give credit, because I have heard of some other Wells of like nature, and because it is reported by St. Augustine, by Diodore, Herodotus, Pliny, Mela, Solinus, Arrianus, Curtius, and others; and indeed our Bathes in England are much warmer in the night than in the day.

SECT. VIII.

How Alexander marching against Darius, was opposed very unskilfully by the Enemy.

FRom the Temple of Hammon he returned to Memphis, where among many other learned men, he heard the Philosopher Psammones, who belike understanding that he affected the title of Jupiter's Son, told him that God was the Father King of all men in general; and refining the pride of this haughty King, brought him to say, That God was the Father of all mortal Men, but that he acknowledged none for his children, save good men.

He gave the charge of the several Provinces of Egypt, to several Governours, following the rule of his Master Aristotle, That a great Dominion should not be continued in the hands of any one: whom therein the Roman Emperours also followed, not daring to commit the government of Egypt to any of their Senators, but to men of meaner rank and degree. He then gave order for the founding of Alexandria upon the Westermost branch of Nilus. And having now settled (as he could) the estate of Egypt, with the Kingdoms of the lesser Asia, Phœnicia, and Syria (which being but the pawns of Darius his ill fortune, one happy victory would readily have redeemed) he led his Army towards Euphrates, which passage, though the same was committed to Mazeus to defend, yet was it abandoned, and Alexander without resistance past it. From thence he marched towards Tygris, a River for the swiftness thereof called by the Persians, The Arrow. Here, as Curtius, and reason it self tells us, might Darius easily have repelled the invading Macedonians: for the violent course of the stream was such, as it drave before it many weighty stones, and those that moved not, but lay in the Aristot. Pol. lib. 5. Curt. l. 4.

bottom, were so round and well polished by a continual rolling, that no man was able to fight on so slippery a footing; nor the Macedonian footmen to wade the River, otherwise than by joyning their hands, and enterlacing arms together, making one weighty and entire body to resist the swift passage, and furious race of the stream. Besides this notable help, the Chanel was so deep towards the Eastern shore, where Darius should have made head as the footmen were enforced to lift their Bows and Arrows, and Darts, over their heads to keep them from being moistned, and made unserviceable by the Waters. But it was truly, and understandingly said of Homer,

Talis est hominum terrestrium mens,
Qualem quotidie ducit pater virorumq; Deorumq;

The minds of men are ever so affected,
As by God's will they daily are directed.

And it cannot be denied, that as all Estates of the world, by the surfeit of misgovernment have been subject to many grievous, and sometimes mortal diseases: So had the Empire of Persia at this time brought it self into a burning and consuming Feaver, and thereby become frantick, and without understanding, fore-shewing manifestly the dissolution and death thereof.

But Alexander hath now recovered the Eastern shores of Tygris, without any other difficulty, than that of the nature of the place; where Mazeus (who had charge to defend the Passage both of Euphrates and it) presented himself to the Macedonians, followed with certain companies of Horsemen, as if with even forces he durst have charged them on even ground, when as with a multitude far exceeding them, he forsook the advantage which no valour of his enemies could easily have overcome. But it is commonly seen, that fearful and cowardly men do ever follow those ways and counsels, whereof the opportunity is already lost.

It is true, that he set all provisions a fire, wherewith the Macedonians might serve themselves over Tygris, thinking thereby greatly to have distressed them; but the execution of good counsel is fruitless, when unseasonable. For now was Alexander so well furnished with carriages, as nothing was wanting to the competency of the Army which he conducted. Those things also which he sought to waste, Alexander being now in sight, were by his Horse-men saved and recovered. This Mazeus might have done some days before at good leisure; or at this time with so great a strength of Horsemen, as the Macedonians durst not have pursued them, leaving the strength of their foot out of sight, and far behind.

SECT. IX.

The new Provisions of Darius. Accidents foregoing the Battel of Arbela.

Darius, upon Alexander's first return out of Egypt, had assembled all the forces, which those Regions next him could furnish, and now also were the Arians, Scythians, Indians, and other Nations arrived; Nations (saith Curtius) that rather served to make up the names of men, than to make resistance. Arrianus hath numbred them with their Leaders; and finds of foot-men of all sorts ten hundred thousand, and of horse four hundred thousand, besides armed Chariots, and some few Elephants. Curtius, who musters the Army of Darius at two hundred thousand foot, and near fifty thousand Horse, comes (I think) nearer to the true number; and yet seeing he had more confidence in the multitude than in the valour of his Vassals, it is like enough that he had gathered together of all sorts some three or four hundred thousand, with which he hoped in those fair plains of Assyria, to have overborn the few numbers of the invading Army. But it is a rule in the Philosophy of the War;

In omni prælio non tam multitudo, & virtus indocta, quam ars & exercitium solent præstare victoriam; In every Battel skill and practice do more towards the Victory, than multitude and rude audacity.

While Alexander gave rest to his Army after the passage over Tygris, there hapned an Eclipse of the Moon, of which the Macedonians not knowing the cause and reason, were greatly affrighted. All that were ignorant (as the multitude always are) took it for a certain presage of their overthrow and destruction, insomuch as they began not only to murmur, but to speak it boldly; That for the ambition of one man, a man that disdained Philip for his Father, and would needs be called the Son of Jupiter, they should all perish; for he not only enforced them to make War against worlds of enemies, but against Rivers, Mountains, and the Heavens themselves.

Hereupon, Alexander being ready to march forward, made a halt, and to quiet the minds of the multitude, he called before him the Egyptian Astrologers, which followed him thence, that by them the Souldiers might be assured that this defection of the Moon was a certain presage of good success; for, that it was natural, they never imparted to the common people, but reserved the knowledge to themselves, so as a sorry Almanack-maker had been no small fool in those days.

Of this kind of superstitious observation Cæsar made good use, when he fought against Arioviſtus, and the Germans: for they being perswaded by the casting of lots, that if they fought before the change of the Moon, they should certainly lose the battel, Cæsar forced them to abide it, though they durst not give it; wherein, having their minds already beaten by their own superstition, and being resolutely charged by the Romans, the whole Army in effect perished.

These Egyptians gave no other reason than this, That the Grecians were under the aspect of the Sun, the Persians of the Moon; and therefore the Moon failing and being darkned, the estate of Persia was now in danger of failing, and their glory of being obscured. This judgement of the Egyptian Priests being noised through all the Army, all were satisfied, and their courage redoubled. It is a principle in the War, which, though devised since, was well observed then: Exercitum terrore plenum Dux ad pugnam non ducat; Let not a Captain lead his Army to the fight when it is possessed with matter of terrour.

It is truly observed by Curtius, that the people are led by nothing so much as by superstition; yea, we find it in all stories, and often in our own, that by such inventions, devised tales, dreams and Prophecies, the people of this Land have been carried head-long into many dangerous tumults and insurrections, and still to their own loss and ruine.

As Alexander drew near the Persian Army, certain Letters were surprized, written by Darius to the Grecians, perswading them for great sums of money, either to kill or betray Alexander. But these, by the advice of Parmenio, he suppressed.

At this time also Darius his fair Wife, oppresst with sorrow, and wearied with travel, died. Which accident Alexander seemed no less to bewail than Darius, who upon the first bruit, suspected that some dishonourable violence had been offered her, but being satisfied by an Eunuch of his own that attended her, of Alexander's Kingly respect towards her, from the day of her being taken, he desired the immortal gods, That if they had decreed to make a new Master of the Persian Empire, then it would please them to confer it on so just and continent an Enemy as Alexander; to whom he once again, before the last tryal by Battel, offered these conditions of Peace.

That with his Daughter in marriage he would deliver up, and resign all Asia the less; and, with Egypt, all those Kingdoms between the Phœnician Sea, and the River of Euphrates; That he would pay him for the Ransom of his Mother, and his other Daughters, thirty thousand Talents, and that for the performance thereof, he would leave his Son Ochus in hostage: To this they sought to perswade Alexander by such arguments as they had. Alexander causing the Ambassadours to be removed, advised with his Council, but heard no man speak but Parmenio, the very right hand of his good fortune; who perswaded him to accept of these fair conditions. He told him, That the Empire between Euphrates and the Hellespont, was a fair addition to Macedon; that the retaining of the Persian Prisoners was a great cumber, and the treasure offered them for them of far better use than their persons, with divers other arguments; all which Alexander rejected. And yet it is probable, that if he had followed his advice, and bounded his ambition within those limits, he might have lived as famous for Virtue, as for Fortune, and left himself a Successour of able age to have enjoyed his estate, which afterward indeed he much enlarged, rather to the greatning of others than himself: who, to assure themselves of what they had usurped upon his Issues, left not one of them to draw breath in the world within a few years after. The truth is, That Alexander in going so far into the East, left behind him the reputation which he brought out of Macedon, the reputation of a just and prudent Prince, a Prince temperate, advised, and grateful: and being taught new Lessons by abundance of prosperity, became a lover of wine, of his own flattery, and of extream cruelty. Yea, as Seneca hath observed, the taint of one unjust slaughter, amongst many, defaced and withered the flourishing beauty of all his great acts, and glorious victories obtained. But the Persian Ambassadours stay his answer, which was to this effect, That whatsoever he had bestowed on the wife and children of Darius, proceeded from his own natural clemency and magnanimity, without any respect to their Master; but thanks to an enemy was improper: that he made no Wars against adversity, but against those that resisted him; not against Women and Children, but against armed enemies: and although by the reiterated practice of Darius, to corrupt his Souldiers, and by great sums of money to perswade his friends to attempt upon his person, he had reason to doubt that the peace offered was rather pretended than meant; yet he could not (were it otherwise and faithful) resolve in haste to accept the same, seeing Darius had made War against him, not as a King with Royal and overt-force, but as a Traitor by secret and base practice; That for the Territory offered him, it was already his own, and if Darius could beat him back again over Euphrates, which he had already past, he would then believe that he offered him somewhat in his own power: Otherwise he propounded to himself for the reward of the War which he had made, all those Kingdoms as yet in Darius's possession; wherein, whether he were abused by his own hopes or no, the Battel which he meant to fight in the day following should determine. For in conclusion he told them, that he came into Asia to give, and not to receive; That the Heavens could not hold two Suns: and therefore if Darius would be content to acknowledge Alexander for his Superiour, he might perchance be perswaded to give him conditions fit for a second Person, and his Inferiour.

SECT. X.

The Battel of Arbela: and that it could not be so strongly fought as report hath made it.

With this Answer the Ambassadours return; Darius prepares to fight, and sends Mazeus to defend a passage, which he never dared yet so much as to hazard. Alexander consults with his Captains. Parmenio perswades him to force Darius his Camp by night; so that the multitude of enemies might not move terrour in the Macedonians being but few. Alexander disdains to steal the Victory, and resolves to bring with him the daylight, to witness his valour. But it was the success that made good Alexander's resolution, though the counsel given by Parmenio was more sound: For it is a ground in War, Si pauci necessario cum multitudine pugnare cogantur, consilium est noctis tempore belli fortunam tentare. Notwithstanding upon the view of the multitude at hand, he staggers and trenches himself upon a ground of advantage, which the Persian had abandoned: And Darius for fear of surprize had stood with his Army in Armour all the day, and forborn sleep all the night. Alexander gave his men rest and store of food; for reason had taught him this Rule in the War, In pugna Milites validiùs resistunt, si cibo potuque refecti fuerint; nam fames intrinsecùs magis pugnat, quàm ferrum exteriùs: Souldiers do the better stand to it in fight, if they have their bellies full of meat and drink; for hunger within, fights more eagerly than steel without.

The numbers which Alexander had, saith Arrianus, were forty thousand foot, and seven thousand horse; these belike were of the European Army: for he had besides, both Syrians, Indians, Egyptians, and Arabians, that followed him out of those Regions. He used but a short speech to his Souldiers to encourage them. And I think that he needed little Rhetorick; for by the two former Battels upon the River of Granick, and in Cilicia, the Macedonians were best taught with what men they were to encounter. And it is a true saying, Victoria victoriam parat, animumque victoribus auget, & adverſariis aufert; One victory begets another, and puts courage into thoſe that have already had the better, taking ſpirit away from thoſe that have been beaten.

Arrianus and Curtius make large deſcriptions of this Battel, fought at Gaugamela; They tell us of many charges, and re-charges; That the victory inclined ſometimes to the Perſians, ſometimes to the Macedonians; That Parmenio was in danger of being overthrown who led the left wing; That Alexander's Rere-guard was broken, and his carriages loſt; That for the fierce and valorous encounters on both ſides, Fortune her ſelf was long unreſolved on whom to beſtow the Garland: And laſtly, that Alexander in perſon wrought wonders, being charged in his retreat. But in concluſion, Curtius delivers us in account but three hundred dead Macedonians, in all this terrible days work, ſaying, That Epheſtion, Perdiccas, and others of name were wounded. Arrianus finds not a third part of this number ſlain; of the Perſians there fell forty thouſand (ſaith Curtius) thirty thouſand, according to Arrianus; ninety thouſand, if we believe Diodore. But what can we judge of this great encounter, other than that, as in the two former Battels, the Perſians upon the firſt charge ran away, and that the Macedonians purſued; For if thoſe four or five hundred thouſand Aſians brought into the field by Darius, every man had caſt but a dart or a ſtone, the Macedonians could not have bought the Empire of the Eaſt at ſo eaſie a rate, as ſix or ſeven hundred men in three notorious Battels. Certainly, if Darius had fought with Alexander upon the banks of Euphrates, and had armed but fifty or threeſcore thouſand of this great multitude, only with Spades (for the moſt of all he had were fit for no other weapon) it had been impoſſible for Alexander to have paſt that River ſo eaſily, much leſs the River of Tigris. But as a man whoſe Empire God in his Providence had determined, he abandoned all places of advantage, and ſuffered Alexander to enter ſo far into the bowels of his Kingdom, as all hope and poſſibility of eſcape by retreat being taken from the Macedonians, they had preſented unto them the choice, either of death or victory; to which election Darius could no way conſtrain his own, ſeeing they had many large Regions to run into from thoſe that invaded them.

SECT. XI.

Of things following the Battel of Arbela. The yielding of Babylon and Suſa.

Darius, after the rout of his Army, recovered Arbela the ſame night, better followed in his flight, than in the fight. He propounded unto them that ran after him, his purpoſe of making a retreat into Media, perſwading them that the Macedonians, greedy of ſpoil and riches, would rather attempt Babylon, Suſa, and other Cities filled with Treaſure, than purſue the vanquiſhed. This miſerable reſolution his Nobility rather obeyed than approved.

Alexander ſoon after Darius his departure arrives at Arbela, which with a great maſs of treaſure, and Princely ornaments, was rendred to him: for the fear which conducted Darius, took nothing with it but ſhame and diſhonour. He that had been twice beaten, ſhould rather have ſent his treaſure into Media, than brought it to Arbela, ſo near the place where he abid the coming of his enemies; if he had been victorious, he might have brought it after him at leiſure; but being overcome, he knew it unpoſſible to drive Mules and Camels laden with gold from the purſuing enemy, ſeeing himſelf, at the overthrow he had in Cilicia, caſt the Crown from his head, to run away with the more ſpeed. But errours are then beſt diſcerned when moſt incurable; Et præterita magis reprehendi poſſunt quàm corrigi; It is eaſier to reprehend than amend what is paſt.

From Arbela, Alexander took his way towards Babylon, where Mazeus, in whom Darius had moſt confidence, rendred himſelf, his Children, and the City. Alſo the Captain of the Caſtle who was keeper of the Treaſure, ſtrewed the ſtreets with flowers, burnt Frankincenſe upon Altars of ſilver, as Alexander paſſed by, and delivered unto him whatſoever was committed to his truſt. The Magi (the Chaldean Aſtrologers) followed this Captain in great ſolemnity to entertain their new King: after theſe came the Babylonian horſemen, infinite rich in attire, but exceeding poor in warlike furniture. Between theſe (though not greatly to be feared) and himſelf, Alexander cauſed his Macedonian footmen to march. When he entred the Caſtle, he admired the glory thereof, and the abundance of Treaſure therein found, amounting to fifty thouſand Talents of ſilver uncoyned. The City it ſelf I have elſewhere deſcribed, with the Walls, the Towers, the Gates and Circuit, with the wonderful place of pleaſure about two miles in Circuit, ſurrounded with a wall of fourſcore foot high, and on the top thereof (being under-born with Pillars) a Grove of beautiful and fruitful Trees, which it is ſaid, that one of the Kings of Babylon cauſed to be built: that the Queen and other Princeſſes might walk privately therein. In this City, rich in all things, but moſt of all in voluptuous pleaſures, the King reſted himſelf and the whole Army four and thirty days, conſuming that time in banquetting, and in all ſorts of effeminate exerciſe; which ſo much ſoftned the minds of the Macedonians, not acquainted till now with the like delicacies, as the ſevere diſcipline of War, which taught them the ſufferances of hunger and thirſt, of painful travel, and hard lodging, began rather to be forgotten, than neglected.

Here it was that thoſe bands of a thouſand Souldiers were erected, and Commanders appointed over them, who thereupon were ſtiled Chiliarchi. This new order Alexander brought in, was to honour thoſe Captains which were found by certain ſelected Judges to have deſerved beſt in the late War. For before this time the Macedonian companies conſiſted but of five hundred. Certainly the drawing down of the foot-bands in this latter age hath been the cauſe (ſaith the Marſhal Monluc) that the title and charge of a Captain hath been beſtowed on every Pieque Bœuf, or Spurn-Cow; for when the Captains of foot had a thouſand Souldiers under one Enſign, and after that five hundred, as in the time of Francis the firſt, the title was honourable, and the Kings were leſs charged, and far better ſerved. King Henry the eighth of England never gave the Command of any of his good Ships, but to men of known valour, and of great eſtate; nay ſometimes he made two Gentlemen of quality Commanders in one ſhip: but all orders and degrees are fallen from the reputation they had.

While

While Alexander was yet in Babylon, there came to him a great supply out of Europe; for Antipater sent him six thousand foot, and five hundred horse out of Macedon; of Thracians three thousand foot and the like number of horse; and out of Greece four thousand and four hundred horse, by which his Army was greatly strengthned: for those that were infected with the pleasures of Babylon, could hardly be brought again, De quitter la plume pour dormir sur la dure; To change from soft beds to hard boards.

He left the Castle and City of Babylon, with the Territories about it, in charge with three of his own Captains. to wit, Agathon, Minetus, and Apollidorus; to supply all wants, a thousand Talents, but to honour Mazeus, who rendred the City unto him, he gave him the title of his Lieutenant over all, and took with him Bagastines that gave up the Castle, and having distributed to every Souldier a part of the Treasure, he left Babylon, and entred into the Province Satrapene: from thence he went on toward Susa in Persia, the same which Ptolomy, Herodotus, and Elianus call Memnonia, situate on the River Eulens, a City sometimes governed by Daniel the Prophet. Abulites also, Governour of this famous City, gave it up to the Conquerour, with fifty thousand Talents of silver in bullion, and twelve Elephants for the War, with all other the treasures of Darius. In this sort, did those Vassals of fortune, lovers of the King's prosperity, not of his person (for so all ambitious men are) purchase their own peace and safety with the King's treasures. And herein was Alexander well advised, that whatsoever titles he gave to the Persians, yet he left all places of importance in trust with his own Captains, to wit, Babylon, Susa, and Persepolis, with other Cities and Provinces by him conquered; for if Darius (as yet living) had beaten the Macedonians but in one battel, all the Nobility of Persia would have returned unto their natural Lord. Those that are Traitors to their own Kings, are never to be used alone in great enterprises by those Princes that entertain them, nor ever to be trusted with the defences of any Frontier-Town, or Fortress of weight, by the rendring whereof they may redeem their liberty and estates lost. Hereof the French had experience, when Don Pedro de Navarra, being banished out of Spain, was trusted with Fonterabe, in the year 1523.

Diodor. speaketh of more than forty thousand talents in bullion, & of nine millions of gold. Sub Dorica forma excusi.

While Alexander spoiled Arbela, Mazeus might have furnished the King from Babylon; and while he stayed four and thirty days at Babylon, Abulites might have holpen him from Susa; and while he feasted there, Tiridates from Persepolis might have relieved him; for the great mass of Treasure was laid up in that City. But who hath sought out and friended fearful adversity? It is certain, that benefits bind not the ambitious, but the honest? for those that are but greedy of themselves, do in all changes of fortune only consult the conservation of their own greatness.

The Government of Susa, with the Castle and Treasure, he committed to his own Macedonians, making Abulites, who rendred it unto him, his Lieutenant, as he had done Mazeus and others, in giving them titles, but neither trust nor power; for he left three thousand old Souldiers in Garrison to assure the place; and Darius's mother and her children to repose themselves.

It is said that Charles the fifth, having promised Charles of Bourbon the Government of Marseilles, if he could have forc'd it, and whereof he made sure account, told some of his neareſt Counsellors, that he meant nothing less than the performance of that promise, because he should thereby have left the Duke (revolted from his Master) very well wherewithal to have recovered his favour.

SECT. XII.

How Alexander came to Persepolis, and burnt it.

FRom Susa, Alexander leadeth his Army toward Persepolis, and when he sought to pass those Mountains which sunder Susiana and Persia, he was soundly beaten by Ariobarzanes, who defended against him those Straits, called Pylæ Persidis, or Susidæ, and after the loss of many Companies of his Macedonians, he was forc'd to save himself by retreat, causing his Foot to march close together, and to cover themselves with their Targets from the stones tumbled on them from the Mountain-top. Yet in the end he found out another path, which a Lycian, living in that Country discovered unto him, and came thereby suddenly in view of Ariobarzanes, who being enforc'd to fight upon even ground, was by Alexander broken, whereupon he fled to Persepolis; but (after that they of Persepolis had refused to receive him) he returned and gave a second charge upon the Macedonians, wherein he was slain. In like manner did King Francis the first, in the year 1515, find a way over the Alpes, the Switzers, undertaking to defend all the passages, who if their footmanship had not saved them upon the King's descent on the other side, they had been ill paid for their hard lodging on those Hills.

Four thousand Greeks, saith Curtius; Justine numbers them at eight hundred) having been taken prisoners by the Persians, presented themselves to Alexander now in sight of Persepolis. These had the barbarous Persians so maimed and defaced, by cutting off their hands, noses, ears, and other members, as they could no way have been known, to their Country-men, but by their voices; to each of these Alexander gave three hundred Crowns, with new garments, and such Lands as they liked to live upon.

Tiridates, one of Darius his false hearted Grandees, hearing of Alexander's approach, made him know that Persepolis was ready to receive him, and prayed him to double his pace, because there was a determination in the people to spoil the King's Treasure. This City was abandoned by many of her Inhabitants upon Alexander's arrival, and they that stayed followed the worst Counsel; for all was left to the liberty of the Souldiers, to spoil and kill at their pleasure. There was no place in the world at that time, which if it had been laid in the ballance with Persepolis, would have weighed it down. Babylon indeed, and Susa were very rich, but in Persepolis lay the bulk and main store of the Persians. For after the spoil that had been made of money, curious Plate, Bullion, Images of Gold and Silver, and other Jewels, there remained to Alexander himself one hundred and twenty thousand Talents. He left the same number of three thousand Macedonians in Persepolis, which he had done in Susa, and gave the same formal honour to the Traitor Tiridates, that he had done to Abulites; but but he that had the truſt of the place was Nicarides, a creature of his own. The body of his Army he left here for thirty days, of which the Commanders were Parmenio and Craterus, and with a thouſand Horſe, and certain Troops of choſen foot, he would needs view in the Winter-time thoſe parts of Perſia, which the Snow had covered: a fruitleſs and fooliſh enterprize, but, as Seneca ſays: Non ille ire vult, ſed non poteſt ſtare: He hath not a will to go, but he is unable to ſtand ſtill. It is ſaid and ſpoken in his praiſe, That when his Souldiers cryed out againſt him, becauſe they could not endure the extream froſt, and make way, but with extream difficulty, through the ſnow, that Alexander forſook his Horſe, and led them the way. But what can be more ridiculous than to bring other men into extremity, thereby to ſhew how well himſelf can endure it? His walking on foot did no otherwiſe take off their wearineſs that followed him, than his ſometimes forbearing to drink, did quench their thirſt, that could leſs endure it. For mine own little Judgement, I ſhall rather commend that Captain that makes careful proviſion for thoſe that follow him, and that ſeeks wiſely to prevent extream neceſſity, than thoſe witleſs arrogant fools, that make the vaunt of having endured equally with the common Souldier, as it that were a matter of great glory and importance.

We find in all the Wars that Cæſar made, or the beſt of the Roman Commanders, that the proviſion of victuals was their firſt care. For it was a true ſaying of Coligni, Admiral of France: That who ſo will ſhape that Beaſt (meaning War) muſt begin with his belly.

But Alexander is now returned to Perſepolis, where thoſe Hiſtorians that were moſt amorous of his virtues, complain, that the opinion of his valour, of his liberality, of his clemency towards the vanquiſhed, and all other his Kingly conditions were drowned in drink; That he ſmothered in carouſing cups all the reputation of his actions paſt, and that by deſcending, as it were, from the reverend Throne of the greateſt King, into the company and familiarity of baſe Harlots, he began to be deſpiſed both of his own, and all other Nations. For being perſwaded, when he was inflamed with Wine, by the infamous Strumpet Thais, he cauſed the moſt ſumptuous and goodly Caſtle and City of Perſepolis to be conſumed with Fire, notwithſtanding all the arguments of Parmenio to the contrary, who told him, that it was a diſhonour to deſtroy thoſe things by the perſwaſions of others, which by his proper vertue and force he had obtained; and that it would be a moſt ſtrong perſwaſion to the Aſians, to think hardly of him, and thereby alien their hearts; for they might well believe that he which demoliſhed the goodlieſt Ornaments they had, meant nothing leſs than (after ſuch vaſtation) to hold their poſſeſſion. Poſt vinolentiam crudelitas ſequitur; Cruelty doth commonly follow Drunkenneſs: For it ſo fell out ſoon after, and often, in Alexander.

Ser. Epiſt. 8. 4.

SECT. XIII.

The Treaſon of Beſſus againſt Darius. Darius his death.

ABout this time he received a new ſupply of Souldiers out of Cilicia, and goes on to find Darius in Media. Darius had there compounded his fourth and laſt Army, which he meant to have increaſed in Bactria, had he not heard of Alexander's coming on, with whom (truſting to ſuch companies as he had, which were numbred at thirty or forty thouſand) he determined once again to try his Fortune. He therefore calls together his Captains and Commanders, and propounds unto them his reſolution, who being deſperate of good ſucceſs uſed ſilence for a while. Artabazus, one of his eldeſt men of War, who had ſometimes lived with Philip of Macedon, brake the ice, and proteſting that he could never be beaten by any adverſity of the Kings, from the faith which he had ever ought him, with firm confidence, that all the reſt were of the ſame condition (whereof they likewiſe aſſured Darius by the like proteſtation) he approved the King's reſolution. Two only, and thoſe of the greateſt, to wit, Naburzanes and Beſſus, whereof the later was Governour of Bactria, had conſpired againſt their Maſter; and therefore adviſed the King to lay a new foundation for the War, and purſue it by ſome ſuch perſon for the preſent, againſt whom neither the gods nor fortune had in all things declared themſelves to be an enemy: this preamble Naburzanes uſed, and in concluſion adviſed the election of his Fellow-Traytor Beſſus, with promiſe that, the Wars ended, the Empire ſhould again be reſtored to Darius. The King ſwollen with diſdain, preſt towards Naburzanes to have ſlain him, but Beſſus and the Bactrians whom he commanded, being more in number than the reſt, with-held him. In the mean while Naburzanes with-drew himſelf, and Beſſus followed him, making their quarter a part from the reſt of the Army. Artabazus, the King's faithful ſervant, perſwaded him to be adviſed and ſerve the time, ſeeing Alexander was at hand, and that he would at leaſt make ſhew of forgetting the offence made; which the King, being of a gentle diſpoſition, willingly yielded unto. Beſſus makes his ſubmiſſion, and attends the King, who removes his Army. Patron, who commanded a Regiment of four thouſand Greeks, which had in all the former battels ſerved Darius with great fidelity, and always made the retreat in ſpight of the Macedonians, offered himſelf to guard his perſon, proteſting againſt the Treaſon of Beſſus; but it was not his deſtiny to follow their advice who from the beginning of the War gave him faithful counſel, but he inclined ſtill to Beſſus, who told him, that the Greeks, with Patron their Captain, were corrupted by Alexander, and practiſed the diviſion of his faithful ſervants. Beſſus had drawn unto him thirty thouſand of the Army, promiſing them all thoſe things, by which the lovers of the World, and themſelves are wont to be allured, to wit, riches, ſafety, and honour.

Now the day following, Darius plainly diſcovered the purpoſes of Beſſus, and being overcome with paſſion, as thinking himſelf unable to make head againſt theſe ungrateful and unnatural Traytors, he prayed Artabazus his faithful ſervant to depart from him, and to provide for himſelf. In like like ſort he diſcharged the reſt of his attendants, all ſave a few of his Eunuchs; for his Guards had voluntarily abandoned him: His Perſians being moſt baſe cowards, durſt not undertake his defence againſt the Bactrians, notwithſtanding that they had four thouſand Greeks to joyn with him, who had been able to have beaten both Nations. But it is true, that him, which forſakes himſelf, no man follows. It had been far more Man-like, and King-like, to have died in the head of thoſe four thouſand Greeks, which offered him the diſpoſition of their lives, (to which Artabazus perſwaded him) than to have lien bewailing himſelf on the ground, and ſuffering himſelf to be bound like a ſlave by thoſe ambitious monſters that laid hands on him, whom neither the conſideration of his former great eſtate, nor the honour he had given them, nor the truſt repoſed in them, nor the world of benefits beſtowed on them, could move to pity: no, nor his preſent adverſity, which above all things ſhould have moved them, could pierce their viperous and ungrateful hearts. Vain it was indeed to hope it; for, Infidelity hath no compaſſion.

Now Darius, thus forſaken, was bound and laid in a Cart, covered with hides of Beaſts, to the end that by any other ornament he might not be diſcovered; and, to add deſpight and deriſion to his adverſity, they faſtned him with Chains of Gold, and ſo drew him on among their ordinary Carriages and Carts. For Beſſus and Naburzanes, perſwaded themſelves to redeem their lives and the Provinces they held, either by delivering him a priſoner to Alexander, or, if that hope failed, to make themſelves Kings by his ſlaughter; and then to defend themſelves by force of Arms. But they failed in both. For it is againſt the nature of God, who is moſt juſt, to pardon ſo ſtrange villany, yea, though againſt a Prince purely Heatheniſh and an Idolater.

Alexander having knowledge that Darius was retired towards Bactria, and durſt not abide his coming, haſtned after him with a violent ſpeed, and becauſe he would not force his footmen beyond their powers, he mounted on horſe-back certain ſelected companies of them, and beſt armed, and with ſix thouſand other Horſe, rather ran than marched after Darius. Such as hated the Treaſon of Beſſus, and ſecretly forſook him, gave knowledge to Alexander of all that had happened, informing him of the way that Beſſus took, and how near he was at hand: for many men of worth daily ran from him. Hereupon Alexander again doubled his pace, and his Vant-guard being diſcovered by Beſſus his Rear, Beſſus brought a Horſe to the Cart, where Darius lay bound; perſwading him to mount thereon, and to ſave himſelf. But the unfortunate King refuſing to follow thoſe that had betrayed him, they caſt Darts at him, wounded him to death, and wounded the Beaſts that drew him, and ſlew two poor ſervants that attended his perſon. This done, they all fled that could, leaving the reſt to the mercy of the Macedonian ſwords.

Polyſtratus a Macedonian, being by purſuit of the vanquiſhed preſt with thirſt, as he was refreſhing himſelf with ſome water that he had diſcovered, eſpying a Cart with a Team of wounded beaſts breathing for life, and not able to move, ſearched the ſame, and therein found Darius bathing in his own blood: And by a Perſian Captive which followed this Polyſtratus, he underſtood that it was Darius, and was informed of his barbarous Tragedy. Darius alſo ſeemed greatly comforted (if dying men ignorant of the living God can be comforted) that he caſt not out his laſt ſorrows unheard, but that by this Macedonian, Alexander might know and take vengeance on thoſe Traitors, which had dealt no leſs unworthily than cruelly with him, recommending their revenge to Alexander by this meſſenger, which he beſought him to purſue, not becauſe Darius had deſired it, but for his own honour, and for the ſafety of all that did, or ſhould after wear Crowns. He alſo having nothing elſe to preſent, rendred thanks to Alexander for the Kingly grace uſed towards his Wife, Mother, and Children, deſiring the immortal gods to ſubmit unto him the Empire of the whole World. As he was thus ſpeaking, impatient Death preſſing out his few remaining ſpirits, he deſired water, which Polyſtratus preſented him, after which he lived but to tell him, that of all the beſt things that the world had, which were lately in his power, he had nothing remaining but his laſt breath, wherewith to deſire the gods to reward his compaſſion.

SECT. XIV.

IT was now hoped by the Macedonians, that their travels were near an end, every man preparing for his return. Hereof when Alexander had knowledge, he was greatly grieved, for the bounded earth ſufficed not his boundleſs Ambition. Many arguments he therefore uſed to draw on his Army farther into the Eaſt, but that which had moſt ſtrength was, that Beſſus, a moſt cruel Traitor to his Maſter Darius, having at his devotion the Hyrcanians and Bactrians, would in ſhort time (if the Macedonians ſhould return) make himſelf Lord of the Perſian Empire, and enjoy the fruits of all their former travels. In concluſion he wan their conſents to go on: which done, leaving Craterus with certain Regiments of foot, and Amyntas with ſix thouſand horſe in Parthenia, he enters not without ſome oppoſition into Hyrcania; for the Mardons, and other barbarous Nations, defended certain paſſages for a while. He paſſeth the River of Zioberis, which taking beginning in Parthia, diſſolves it ſelf in the Caſpian Sea: it runneth under the ledge of Mountains, which bound Parthia and Hyrcania, where hiding it ſelf under ground for three hundred furlongs, it then riſeth again, and followeth its former courſe. In Zadracarta, or Zeudracarta, the ſame City which Ptolomy writes Hyrcania, the Metropolis of that Region, he reſted fifteen days, banquetting and feaſting there.

Phataphernes, one of Darius his greateſt Commanders, with others of his beſt followers, ſubmit themſelves to Alexander, and were reſtored to their places and Governments. But of all others he graced Artabazus moſt highly for his approved and conſtant faith to his Maſter Darius. Artabazus brought with him ten thouſand and five hundred Greeks, the remainder of all thoſe that had ſerved Darius; He treats with Alexander for their pardon, before they were yet arrived, but in the end, they render themſelves ſimply without promiſe or compoſition: he pardons all but the Lacedemonians, whom he impriſoned, their Leader having ſlain himſelf. He was alſo wrought (though to his great great dishonour) to receive Nabarzanes that had joyned with Bessus to murder Darius.

SECT. XV.

Of Thalestris Queen of the Amazons; where, by way of digression, it is shewed, that such Amazons have been and are.

HEre it is said, that Thalestris or Minothea, a Queen of the Amazons, came to visit him, and her sute was, (which she easily obtained) that she might accompany him till she were made with child by him: which done, (refusing to follow him into India) she returned into her own Country.

Plutarch citeth many Historians, reporting this meeting of Thalestris with Alexander, and some contradicting it. But indeed, the letters of Alexander himself to Antipater, recounting all that befel him in these parts, and yet omitting to make mention of this Amazonian business, may justly breed suspicion of the whole matter as forged. Much more justly may we suspect it as a vain tale, because an Historian of the same time reading one of his books to Lysimachus (then King of Thrace) who had followed Alexander in all his Voyage, was laught at by the King for inserting such news of the Amazons; as Lysimachus himself had never heard of. One that accompanied Alexander, took upon him to write his acts; which to amplifie, He told how the King had fought single with an Elephant, and slain it. The King hearing such stuff, caught the book, and threw it into the river of Indus; saying, That it were well done to throw the Writer after it, who by inserting such Fables, disparaged the truth of his great exploits. Yet as we believe and know that there are Elephants, though it were false that Alexander fought with one; so may we give credit unto Writers making mention of such Amazons, whether it were true or false that they met with Alexander; as Plutarch leaves the matter undetermined. Therefore I will here take leave to make digression, as well to shew the opinions of the ancient Historians, Cosmographers, and others, as also of some modern discoverers, touching these warlike Women, because not only Strabo, but many others of these our times make doubt, whether or no there were any such kind of people. Julius Solinus seats them in the North-parts of Asia the less. Pom. Mela finds two Regions filled with them; the one on the River Thermodoon, the other near the Caspian Sea; Quas (saith he) Sauromatidas appellant; Which the people call Sauromatides. The former of these two had the Cimerians for their neighbours; Certum est (saith Vadianus, who hath commented upon Mela) illos proximos Amazonibus fuisse; It is certain that the Cimerians were the next Nations to the Amazons. Ptolomy set them farther into the Land Northwards, near the Mountains Hippaci, not far from the Pillars of Alexander. And that they had Dominion in Asia it self toward India, Solinus and Pliny tell us. Where they governed a people called the Pandeans or Padeans, so called after Pandea the Daughter of Hercules, from whom all the rest derive themselves. Claudian affirms, That they commanded many Nations: For he speaks (largely perhaps as a Poet) thus:

Sol. c. 27. & 65.

Lib. 1.

Ptol lib. 6. c. 12 Tab. 2. Plin. l. 6. c. 20.

——Medis levibusque Sabeis imperat hic Sexus: Reginarumque sub armis, Barbariæ pars magna jacet.

Claud. de cap. Proserpinæ.

Over the Medes, and light Labeans reigns
This Female Sex: and under arms of Queen, Great part of the Barbarian Land remains.

Diodorus Siculus had heard of them in Lybia, who were more ancient (saith he) than those which kept the banks of Thermodoon, a River falling into the Euxine Sea, near Heraclium.

Herodotus doth also make report of these Amazons, whom he tells us that the Scythians call Æorpatas, which is as much as Viricidas, or men-killers. And that they made incursion into Asia the less, sackt Ephesus, and burnt the Temple of Diana, Manethon and Aventinus report; which they performed forty years after Troy was taken, At the siege of Troy it self we read of Penthesilea, that she came to the succour of Priamus. Æneid 1. l. 3.

Am. Marcellinus gives the cause of their inhabiting upon the River of Thermodoon, speaking confidently of the wars they made with divers Nations, and of their overthrow. L. 22. c. 7.

Plutarch in the life of Theseus; out of Philochorus, Hellenecus and other ancient Historians, reports the taking of Antiopa Queen of the Amazons by Hercules, and by him given to Theseus; though some affirm, That Theseus himself got her by stealth, when she came to visit him aboard his ship. But in substance there is little difference; all confessing, That such Amazons there were. The same Author in the life of Pompey speaks of certain companies of the Amazons, that came to aid the Albanians against the Romans, by whom after the battel, many Targets and Buskins of theirs were taken up: and he saith farther, That these women entertain the Gelæ and Legales once a year, Nations inhabiting between them and the Albanians.

But to omit the many Authors, making mention of Amazons that were in the old times, Fran. Lopez, who hath written the Navigation of Orellana, which he made down the River of Amazons from Peru in the year, 1542. (upon which River, for the divers turnings, he is said to have sailed six thousand miles) reports from the relation of the said Orellana, to the Council of the Indies, That he both saw those women, and fought with them, where they sought to impeach his passage towards the East-Sea. Hist. Ind. par. 1. c. 18

It is also reported by Ulrichus Schmidel, that in the year, 1542. when he sailed up the Rivers of Paragua and Parabol, that he came to a King of that Country, called Scherves, inhabiting under the Tropick of Capricorn, who gave his Captain Ernando Rieffere, a Crown of silver, which he had gotten in fight from a Queen of the Amazons in those parts.

Ed. Lopez, in his description of the Kingdom of Congo, makes relation of such Amazons, telling us, That (agreeably to the reports of elder times) they burn off their right breasts, and live apart from men, save at one time of the year, when they feast and accompany them for one month. These (saith he) possess a part of the Kingdom of Monomotapa in Africa, nineteen degrees to the Southward of the line: and that these women are the strongest Guards of this Emperour, all the East-Indian Portugals know.

I have produced these authorities in part, to justifie mine own relation of these Amazons, because cauſe that which was delivered me for truth by an ancient Cacique of Guiana, how upon the River of Papamena (ſince the Spaniſh diſcoveries called Amazons) that theſe ſtill live and govern, was held for a vain and unprofitable report.

SECT. XVI.

How Alexander fell into the Perſian Luxury: and how he further purſued Beſſus.

NOw as Alexander had begun to change his conditions after the taking of Perſepolis: ſo at this time his proſperity had ſo much overwrought his virtue, as he accounted clemency to be but baſeneſs, and the temperance which he had uſed all his life-time, but a poor and dejected humour, rather becoming the inſtructers of his youth, than the condition and ſtate of ſo mighty a King as the World could not equal. For he perſwaded himſelf, that he now repreſented the greatneſs of the gods; he was pleaſed that thoſe that came before him, ſhould fall to the ground and adore him; he ware the Robes and Garments of the Perſians, and commanded that his Nobility ſhould do the like: he entertained in his Court and Camp, the ſame ſhameleſs rabble of Curtiſans, and Sodomitical Eunuchs, that Darius had done; and imitated in all things the proud, voluptuous and deteſted manners of the Perſians, whom he had vanquiſhed. So licentious is felicity, as notwithſtanding that he was fully perſwaded, that the gods whom he ſerved (deteſting the vices of the invaded) aſſiſted him in all attempts againſt them, he himſelf contrary to the Religion he profeſt (which how Idolatrous ſoever it were, could not be but fearful unto him by neglecting it) became by imitation, and not by ignorance or education, a more foul and fearful Monſter than Darius, from whoſe tyranny he vaunted to have delivered ſo many Nations. Yea, thoſe that were deareſt and neareſt unto him, began to be aſhamed of him, entertaining each other with this, and the like ſcornful diſcourſe; That Alexander of Macedon was become one of Darius his licentious Courtiers; That by his example, the Macedonians were in the end of ſo many travels, more impoveriſhed in their virtue, than inriched by their victories; and it was hard to Judge whether the Conquerors, or the Conquered, were the baſer ſlaves. Neither were theſe opinions ſo reſerved, but that the noiſe of them came to his ears. He therefore with great gifts ſought to pacifie the better ſort, and thoſe of whoſe judgements he was moſt Jealous; and making it known to the Army, that Beſſus had aſſumed the title of a King, and called himſelf Artaxerxes, and that he had compounded a great Army of the Bactrians, and other Nations; he had arguments enow to perſwade them to go on, to the end that all already gotten, might not with themſelves (ſo far engaged) be caſt away. And becauſe they were peſtered with the ſpoils of ſo many Cities, as the whole Army ſeemed but the guard of their carriages (not much unlike the warfare of the French) having commanded every man's fardels to be brought into the Market-place, he, together with his own, cauſed all to be conſumed with fire. Certainly, this could not but have proved moſt dangerous unto him, ſeeing the common Souldiers had more intereſt in theſe things which they had bought with their painful travels, and with their blood, than in the King's ambition; had not (as Seneca often obſerved) his happy temerity overcome all things. As he was in his way, news came to him, that Satribarzanes, whom he had eſtabliſhed in his former Government over the Arians, was revolted; whereupon leaving the way of Bactria, he ſought him out; but the Rebel, hearing of his coming, fled to Beſſus, with two thouſand Horſe. He then went on towards Beſſus, and by ſetting a great pile of wood on fire, with the advantage of a ſtrong wind, won the paſſage over an high and unacceſſible Rock, which was defended againſt him with thirteen thouſand Foot. For the extremity of the flame and ſmoke forced them from the place, otherwiſe invincible. I ſaw in the third Civil War of France, certain Caves in Languedoc, which had but one entrance, and that very narrow, cut out in the mid-way of high Rocks, which we knew not how to enter by any ladder or engine, till at laſt, by a certain bundle of ſtraw, let down by an Iron chain, and a weighty ſtone in the midſt, thoſe that defended it, were ſo ſmothered, as they rendred themſelves, with their plate, money, and other goods therein hidden. There were alſo ſome three yaers before my arrival in Guiana, three hundred Spaniards well mounted, ſmothered to death, together with their Horſes, by the Country-people, who did ſet the long dry graſs on fire to the Eaſtward of them (the wind in thoſe parts being always Eaſt) ſo as, notwithſtanding their fleeing from the ſmoke, there was not any one that eſcaped. Sir John Burrowes alſo, with a hundred Engliſh was in great danger of being loſt at Margarita, in the Weſt-Indies, by having the graſs fired behind him; bnt the ſmoke being timefully diſcovered, he recovered the Sea-ſhore with the loſs of ſixteen of his men. I remember theſe things; but to give caution to thoſe that ſhall in times to come invade any part of thoſe Countries, that they always, before they paſs into the Land, burn down the graſs and ſedge, to the Eaſt of them; they may otherwiſe, without any other enemy, than a handful of ſtraw ſet on fire, die the death of Hony-Bees, burnt out of the Hive.

SECT. XVII.

A Conſpiracy againſt Alexander; The death of Philotas and Parmenio.

ALexander was, after he parted hence, no where reſiſted, till he came into Aria, to the Eaſt of Bactria, where the chief City of that Province, called Artacoana, was a while defended againſt him, by the revolt of Satribarzanes; but in the end he received the Inhabitants to mercy. At this place his Army was re-enforced, with a new ſupply of five thouſand and five hundred foot, and near five hundred horſe out of Greece, Theſſalia, and other places. His journey out of Perſia into theſe parts, is very confuſedly deſcribed. For, having (as all his Hiſtorians tells us) a determination to find Beſſus in Bactria, he leaves it at the very entrance, and takes the way of Hyrcania; from thence he wanders Northwards towards the obſcure Mardi, upon the Caſpian-Sea, and thence over the Mountain Coronus into Aria and Dranginia

At this time it was that the Treason of Dimnus brake out, of which Philotas the Son of Parmenio was accused, as accessary, if not principal. This Dimnus, having (I know not upon what ground) conspired with some others against the life of Alexander, went about to draw Nichomachus, a young man whom he loved, into the same Treason. The Youth, although he was first bound by oath to secrecy, when he heard so foul a matter uttered, began to protest against it so vehemently, that his friend was like to have slain him for security of his own life. So, constrained by fear, he made shew as if he had been won by perswasion; and by seeming at length to like well of the business, he was told more at large what they were that had undertaken it. There were nine or ten of them, all men of rank, whose names Dimnus (to countenance the enterprize) reckoned up to Nichomachus. Nichomachus had no sooner freed himself from the company of this Traytor Dimnus, than he acquainted his own Brother Ceballinus with the whole History: whereupon it was agreed between them, that Ceballinus (who might with least suspicion) should go to the Court, and utter all. Ceballinus, meeting with Philotas, told him the whole business; desiring him to acquaint the King therewith: which he promised to do, but did not. Two days passed, and Philotas never brake with the King about the matter, but still excused himself to Ceballinus by the Kings want of leisure. This his coldness bred suspicion, and caused Ceballinus to address himself to another, one Metron, Keeper of the Kings Armory, who forthwith brought him to Alexander's presence. Alexander, finding by examination what had passed between Ceballinus and Philotas, did fully perswade himself that this concealment of the Treason, argued his hand to have been in the business. Therefore when Dimnus was brought before him, he asked the Traytor no other question than this: Wherein have I so offended thee, that thou shouldest think Philotas more worthy to be a King than I? Dimnus perceiving when he was apprehended, how the matter went, had so wounded himself, that he lived no longer, than to give his last groan in the King's presence. Then was Philotas called, and charged with the suspicion, which his silence might justly breed. His answer was, That when the practice was reveiled unto him by Nichomachus, he judging it to be but frivolous, did forbear to acquaint Alexander therewithal, until he might have better information. This error of his, (if it were only an error) although Alexander, for the notorious services of his Farther Parmenio, of his Brother Nicanor lately dead, and of Philotas himself, had freely pardoned and given his hand for assurance; yet by the instigation of Craterus, he again swallowed his Princely promise, and made his enemies his Judges. Curtius gives a note of Craterus in this business; How he perswaded himself that he could never find a better occasion to oppress his private enemy, than by pretending Piety and Duty towards the King. Hereof a Poet of our own hath given a note as much better, as it is most general, in his Philotas.

See how these great men clothe their private
In these fair colours of the publick good;
And, to effect their ends, pretend the State,
As if the State by their affection stood:
And arm'd with Power and Princes jealousies,
Will put the least conceit of discontent
Into the greatest rank of treacheries,
That no one action shall seem innocent:
Yea, valour, honour, bounty shall be made
As accessaries unto ends unjust:
And even the service of the State must lade
The needfull'st undertaking with distrust;
So that base vileness, idle Luxury,
Seem safer far, than to do worthily, &c.

Now, although it were so, that the King, following the advice of Craterus, had resolved the next day to put Philotas to torment, yet in the very evening of the same night in which he was apprehended, he called him to a Banquet, and discoursed as familiarly with him, as at any other time. But when in the dead of the night Philotas was taken in his lodging, and that they which hated him began to bind him, he cried out upon the King in these words; O Alexander, the malice of mine Enemies hath surmounted thy mercy, and their hatred is far more constant than the word of a King. Many circumstances were urged against him by Alexander himself (for the King of Macedon did in person examine the accusations of Treason) and this was not the least (not the least offence, indeed, against the King's humour, who desired to be glorified as a god) That when Alexander wrote unto him concerning the title given him by Jupiter Hammon; He answered, That he could not but rejoyce, that he was admitted into that sacred Fellowship of the gods, and yet he could not but withal grieve for those that should live under such a one as would exceed the nature of man. This was (said Alexander) a firm perswasion unto me, that his heart was changed, and that he held my glory in despight. See what a strange Monster Flattery is, that can perswade Kings to kill those that do not praise and allow those things in them, which are of all other most to be abhorred. Philotas was brought before the multitude to hear the Kings Oration against him: he was brought forth in vile garments, and bound like a Thief; where he heard himself, and his absent Father, the greatest Captain of the World, accused; his two other Brothers, Hector and Nicanor having been lost in the present War. He was so greatly oppress with grief, as for a while he could utter nothing but tears, and sorrow had so wasted his spirits, as he sank under those that led him. In the end, the King asked him, In what language he would make his defence; he answered, In the same wherein it had pleased the King to accuse him; which he did, to the end that the Persians, as well as the Macedonians, might understand him. But hereof the King made his advantage, perswading the assembly, that he disdained the language of his own Country; and so withdrawing himself, left him to his mercileſs enemies.

This proceeding of the Kings, Philotas greatly lamented, seeing the King, who had so sharply inveighed against him, would not vouchsafe to hear his excuse. For not his enemies only were emboldened thereby against him, but all the rest, having discovered the King's disposition and resolution, contended among themselves, which of them should exceed in hatred towards him. Among many other arguments, which he used in his own defence, this was not the weakest; That when Nichomachus desired to know of Dimnus, what men of mark and power were his partners in the conspiracy (as seeming unwilling to adventure himself, with mean and base Companions) Dimnus named named unto him Demetrius of the King's Chamber, Nicanor, Amyntas, and some others; but spake not a word of Philotas, who by being Commander of the Horse, would greatly have valued the party, and have encouraged Nichomachus. Indeed, as Philotas said well for himself, it is likely that Dimnus, thereby the better to have heartned Nichomachus, would have named him, though he had never dealt with him in any such practice. And for more certain proof, that he knew nothing of their intents that practised against the King, there was not any one of the Conspirators, being many, inforced by torments, or otherwise, that could accuse him; and it is true, that adversity being seldom able to bear her own burthen, is for the most part found so malicious, as she rather desires to draw others (not always deserving it) into the same danger, than to spare any that it can accuse. Yet at the last, howsoever it were, to avoid the extremity of resistless and unnatural torments, devised by his profest enemies Craterus, Cenus, Ephestion, and others; Philotas accused his own self; being perswaded they would have slain him forthwith. But he failed even in that miserable hope, and suffering all that could be laid on flesh and blood, he was forced to deliver, not wat he knew, but whatsoever best pleased their ears, that were far more mercileſs than death it self.

Aug de Civitat. Dei. lib. 1. c. 6. Of this kind of judicial proceeding St. Augustine greatly complaineth, as a matter to be bewailed, saith he, with Fountains of tears, Quid cum in sua causa quisque torquetur; & cum quæritur utrum sit nocens, cruciatur; & innocens luit pro incerto scelere, certissimas pœnas: non quia illud commisisse detegitur sed quia non commisisse nescitur. What shall we say to it, when one is put to torture in his own cause; and tormented whilst yet it is in question whether he be guilty, and being innocent, suffers assured punishment for a fault, of which there is no certainty: not because he is known to have committed the offence, but because others do not know that he hath not committed it?

It had been enough for Alexander's safety, if Philotas had been put to death without torment, the rest would not much have grieved thereat, because he was greatly suspected. But Hemolaus, who afterwards conspired against him, made the King's cruelty and delight in blood, the greatest motive of his own ill intent. Therefore, Seneca speaking of Alexander, saith thus: Sen. de Clem. l. 1. Crudelitas minime humanum malum est, indignum tam miti animo; ferina ista rabies est sanguine gaudere & vulneribus, & abjecto homine, in silvestre animal transire; Cruelty is not a humane vice, it is unworthy of so milde a spirit: It is even a beastly rage to delight in blood and wounds, and casting away the nature of man, to become a savage Monster.

For the conclusion of this Tragedy, Curtius makes a doubt, whether the confession that Philotas made, were to give end to the torments which he could not any longer endure, or that the same was true indeed: For (saith he) in this case, they that speak truly, or they that deny falsly, come to one and the same end. Now while the King's hands were yet wet in blood, he commanded that Lyncestes, Son-in-law to Antipater, who had been three years in prison, should be slain: The same dispatch had all those that Nichomachus had accused: others there were that were suspected because they had followed Philotas; but when they had answered for themselves, that they knew no way so direct to win the King's favour, as by loving those whom the King favoured, they were dismist. But Parmenio was yet living; Parmenio, who had served with great fidelity as well Philip of Macedon the King's Father, as himself; Parmenio, that first opened the way into Asia; that had depest Attalus the King's enemy; that had always, and in all hazards, the leading of the King's Van-guard, that was no less prudent in counsel, than fortunate in all attempts; A man beloved of all the men of War, and to say the truth, he that had made the purchase for the King of the Empire of the East, and of all the glory and fame he had: That he might not therefore revenge the death of his Son, though not upon the King (for it was unlikely that he would have dishonored his fidelity in his eldest age, having now lived threescore and ten years) yet upon those that by the witchcraft of flattery had possest themselves of his affection, it was resolved, that he should be dispatcht. Polydamas was employed in this business, a man whom of all other Parmenio trusted most, and loved best, who (to be short) finding him in Media, and having Cleander and other murderers with him, slew him walking in his Garden, while he was reading the King's Letters. Hic exitus Parmenionis fuit, militiæ domique clari viri; Multa sine Rege prosperè, Rex sine illo nihil magnæ rei gesserat; This was the end of Parmenio (saith Curtius) who had performed many notable things without the King; but the King, without him, did never effect any thing worthy of praise. Lib. 7.

SECT. XVIII.

How Alexander subdued the Bactrians, Sogdians, and other people. How Bessus was delivered into his hands. How he fought with the Scythians.

WHen these things had end, Alexander went on with his Army, and brought under his obedience the Araspians, or Evergitans; he made Amenides (sometime Darius his Secretary) their Governour, then he subdued the Arachosians, and left Menon to command over them. Here the Army, sometimes led by Parmenio, finds him, consisting of twelve thousand Macedons and Greeks, with whom he past through some cold Regions with difficulty enough. At length he came to the foot of the Mountain Taurus towards the East, where he built a City, which he honoured with his own name, and peopled it with seven thousand of his oldest Macedons, worn with age, and with travels of the War. The Arians, who since he left them were revolted, he subdued again by the industry and valour of Caranus and Erigius. And now he resolves to find out the new King Bessus in Bactria. Bessus, hearing of his coming, prepares to pass over the great River of Oxus, which divides Bactria from Sogdiana; Artabazus is made Governor of Bactria abandoned by Bessus: The Macedonian Army suffereth for want of Water, insomuch as when they came to the River of Oxus, there died more of them by drinking inordinately, than Alexander had lost in any one Battel against the Persians. And it may well be; For (as Clytus did after object unto him) he fought against women, and not against men; and not against their persons, but their shadows. He found on the Banks of this great River no manner of Timber or other materials, to make either boats, bridges or raff, but was forced to sew together the hides that covered his carriages, and stuff them with straw, and on them in six days to pass over his Army; which Bessus might easily have distrest, if he had dared but to behold the Macedonian Army a far off. He had formerly complained against Darius for neglecting to defend the banks of Tygris, and other passages; and yet now, when this traiterous slave had stiled himself a King, he durst not perform any thing worthy of a slave. And therefore those that were neerest unto him, and whom he most trusted, to wit, Spitamenes, Dataphernes, Catanes, and others the Commanders of his Army, moved both by the care of their own safety, and by the memory of Bessus his treason and cruelty against Darius, bound him in the like manner, that he had done his Master, but with this difference, that he had the chain closed about his neck like a Mastiff-Dog, and so was dragged along to be presented to his Enemy.

In the mean while Alexander was arrived at a certain Town inhabited with Greeks of Miletum, brought thither by Xerxes, when long before he returned out of Greece; whose Issues had well-near forgotten their Country language. These most cruelly (after they had received him with great joy) he put to the Sword, and destroyed their City. At this place he received Bessus, and having rewarded Spitamenes with the rest that delivered him, he gave the Traitor into the hands of Oxatres, Darius his Brother, to be tormented.

But while he now thought himself secure, some twenty thousand Mountainers assaulted his Camp; in repelling whom he received a shot in the leg, the arrow-head sticking in the flesh, so as he was carried in a Horse-litter, sometime by the Horsemen, sometime by the Foot.

Soon after he came unto Maracanda, which Petrus Perondinus takes to be Samarchand, the regal City of the great Tamerlain. It had in compass threescore and ten furlongs (Curtius saith. Here he received the Ambassadors of the Scythians (called Avians) who offered to serve him.

The Bactrians are shortly again with the Sogdians stirred to rebellion, by the same Spitamenes and Catanes, who had lately delivered into his hands the Traytor Bessus. Many Cities were resolvedly defended against him, all which, after victory, he defaced and razed, killing all therein. At one of these he received a blow on the neck, which struck him to the ground, and much disabled him for many days after. In the mean while Spitamenes had recovered Maracanda, against whom he employed Menedemus with three thousand foot, and eight hundred horse.

In the heat of these tumults Alexander marched on (if we may believe Curtius and others) till he came to the River of Tanais; upon whose bank he built another Alexandria, threescore furlongs in compass, which he beautified with houses within seventeen days after the walls built. The building of this City is said to have been occasion of a War between him and the Scythians; the Scythian King perswaded himself, that this new Town was fortified of purpose to keep him under. I do not well understand, why the Scythians, offering war in such a terrible manner, that Alexander was judged by his own Souldiers to counterfeit sickness for very fear, should nevertheless make suit for peace: neither find I the reason why Alexander (not intending the Conquest of those Northern desarts, but only the defence of his own bank) should refuse to let them alone, with whom he could not meddle further than they should agree to suffer him. Yet hereof is made a greater matter; and a victory described; in pursuit of which the Macedons ran beyond the bounds and monuments of Bacchus his Expedition.

The truth is, That Curtius and Trogus have greatly mistaken this River, which they call Tanais. For it was the River of Jaxartes, that runs between Sogdiana and Scythia, which Alexander past over, while Menedemus was employed in the recovery of Samarchand: But Tanais, which divides Asia from Europe, is near two thousand miles distant from any part of Bactria and Sogdiana, and the way desart and unknown. So that Alexander had (besides Jaxartes) the great River of Volga, and many others to swim over, ere he could recover Tanais: which (from the place where he was) he could hardly have discovered with the Army that followed him, if he had employed all the time that he lived in Asia in that travel.

Wherefore it is enough to believe, that the Asiatique Scythians, making some offer to disturb the erection of his new City, which was like to give some hinderance to their excursions, were driven away by the Macedonians; and being naked of defensive Arms, easily chased some ten or twelve miles; which is the substance of Curtius his report. As for the limits of Bacchus his journey, like enough it is that Bacchus (if in his life-time he were as sober a man, as after his death he was held a drunken god) went not very far into that waste Country, where he could find nothing but trees and stones, nor other business than to set up a Monument.

Threescore of the Macedonians are said to have been slain, and one thousand one hundred hurt in this fight, which might easily be in passing a great River, defended against them by good Archers. Of Scythian horses one thousand eight hundred were brought into the Camp, and many prisoners. It is forbidden by some Historians, and indeed it is hardly possible, to set down the numbers of such as perish in Battel: yet Cæsar commonly did it. And where the diligence of the Victors hath been so inquisitive into the greatness of their own success, that Writers have been able to deliver such particulars by credible report, I hold it not unlawful to set down what we find; especially when it serves to give light to the business in hand. The small number which the Macedonians lost, the omission of the number which they slew (a thing not usual in Curtius, who forbears nothing that may set out the greatness of Alexander) and the little booty that was gotten, do make it probable, that this War was no better than the repulsion of a few roving Tartars (the like being yearly performed by the Moscovite, without any boast) and therefore better omitted by some Historians, than so highly extolled as a great exploit by others.

While Alexander was assuring himself of those Scythians bordering upon Jaxartes, he received the ill news that Menedemus was slain by Spitamenes, the Army (by him led) broken, and the greatest numbers slain, to wit, two thousand foot, and three hundred horse. He therefore, to appease the rebellion, and to take revenge of Spitamenes, makes all the haste he can; but Spitamenes flees into Bactria. Alexander kills, burns, and lays waste all before him, not sparing the innocent children, and so departs, leaving a new Governor in that Province.

To

To repair this loſs, he received a great ſupply of nineteen thouſand Souldiers out of Greece, Lycia, and Syria; with all which, and the old Army he returns towards the South, and paſſeth the River of Oxus; on the South-ſide whereof he built ſix Towns near each other for mutual ſuccour. But he finds a new ſtart up Rebel, called Arimazes (a Sogdian) followed with thirty thouſand Souldiers that defended againſt him a ſtrong piece of ground on the top of a high Hill; whom when Alexander had ſought in vain to win by fair words, he made choice of three hundred young men, and promiſed ten Talents to the firſt, nine to the ſecond; and ſo in proportion to the reſt, that could find a way to creep up to the top thereof. This they performed with the loſs of ſome two and thirty of their men, and then made a ſign to Alexander, that they had performed his commandment. Hereupon he ſent one Cophes to perſwade Arimazes to yield the place; who being ſhewed by Cophes that the Army of Macedon was already mounted up, yielded ſimply to Alexander's mercy, and was (with all his kinred) ſcourged and crucified to death; which puniſhment they well deſerved for neglecting to keep good watch in ſo dangerous a time. For the place, as ſeems by the deſcription, might eaſily have been defended againſt all the Armies of the World. But, what ſtrength cannot do, Man's wit, being the moſt forcible Engine, hath often effected: Of which I will give you an example in a place of our own.

The Iſland of Sark, joyned to Garnſey, and of that Government, was in Queen Maries time ſurprized by the French, and could never have been recovered again by ſtrong hand, having Cattel and Corn enough upon the place to feed ſo many men as will ſerve to defend it, and being every way ſo inacceſſible, that it might be held againſt the Great Turk. Yet by the induſtry of a Gentleman of the Netherlands, it was in this ſort regained. He anchored in the road with one Ship of ſmall burthen, and pretending the death of his Merchant: beſought the French, being ſome thirty in number, that they might bury their Merchant in hallowed Ground, and in the Chappel of that Iſle, offering a preſent to the French of ſuch commodities as they had aboard: whereto (with condition that they ſhould not come aſhore with any weapon, no not ſo much as with a Knife) the French-men yielded. Then did the Flemings, put a coffin into their Boat, not filled with a dead Carkaſs, but with Swords, Targets, and Harquebuſſes: The French received them at their landing; and ſearching every of them ſo narrowly as they could not hide a Penknife, gave them leave to draw their Coffin up the Rocks with great difficulty; ſome part of the French took the Flemiſh Boat, and rowed aboard their Ship, to fetch the Commodities promiſed, and what elſe they pleaſed; but being entred they were taken and bound. The Flemings on the Land, when they had carried their Coffin into the Chappel, ſhut the door to them, and taking their weapons out of the Coffin, ſet upon the French; they run to the Cliff, and cry to their company aboard the Fleming to come to their ſuccour, but finding the Boat charged with Flemings, yielded themſelves and the place. Thus a Fox-tail doth ſometimes help well to piece out the Lyon's-skin that elſe would be too ſhort.

SECT. XIX.

How Alexander ſlew his own Friends.

After theſe Sogdian and Scythian Wars, we read of Alexander's killing of a Lyon, and other frivolous matters, and that he committed the Government of Maracanda, and the Country about it, to Clytus, and how he ſlew him ſoon after, for valuing the virtue of Philip the father before that of Alexander the ſon, or rather becauſe he objected to the King the death of Parmenio, and derided the Oracle of Hammon: for therein he toucht him to the quick, the ſame being delivered in publick, and at a drunken Banquet. Clytus indeed, had deſerved as much at the King's hands, as any man living had done, and had in particular ſaved his life, which the King well remembred, when he came to himſelf, and when it was too late. Yet, to ſay the truth, Clytus his inſolency was intolerable. As he in his Cups forgat whom he offended, ſo the King in his (for neither of them were themſelves) forgat whom he went about to ſlay: For the grief whereof, he tare his own face, and ſorrowed ſo inordinately, as, but for the perſwaſions of Caliſthenes, it is thought he would have ſlain himſelf.

Wine begat Fury, Fury matter of Repentance: But preceding miſchiefs are not amended by ſucceeding bewailing: Omne vitium ebrietas & incendit, & detegit; obſtantem malis conatibus verecundiam removet; ubi poſſedit animum nimia vis vini, quicquid mali latebat, emergit: non facit ebrietas vitia, ſed protrahit; Drunkenneſs both kindles and lays open every vice; it removes out of the way that ſhame which gives impediment unto bad attempts; where Wine gets the maſtery, all the ill that before lay hidden breaks out: Drunkenneſs indeed rather diſcovers vices than makes them.

Soon after this, Spitamenes, who ſlew Beſſus, and had lately revolted from Alexander, was murthered by his Wife, and his head preſented to Alexander. Spitamenes being taken away, the Dacons alſo ſeized upon his Fellow-Conſpirator Dataphernes and delivered him up. So Alexander being now freed from all theſe petty Rebels, diſpoſed of the Provinces which he paſt over, and went on with his Army into Gabaza, where it ſuffered ſo much Hunger, Cold, Lightning, Thunder, and Storm, as he loſt in one Tempeſt a thouſand of his Train. From hence he invaded the Sacans, and deſtroyed their Country. Then came he into the Territory of Cohortanes, who ſubmitted himſelf unto him, feaſted him greatly, and preſented him with thirty beautiful Virgins, among whom Roxana, afterwards his Wife, was one: which although all the Macedonians diſdained, yet none of them durſt uſe any freedom of ſpeech after Clytus his death. From hence he directed his courſe towards India, having ſo increaſed his numbers, as they amounted to an hundred and twenty thouſand armed men.

In the mean while he would needs be honoured as a god: whereto that he might allure the Macedonians, he employed two pernicious Paraſites Hagis and Cleo; whom Caliſthenes oppoſed: For, among many other honeſt Arguments uſed to the Aſſembly, he told Cleo, That he thought, that Alexander would diſdain the gift of God-head from his Vaſſals; That the opinion of Sanctity, though it did ſometime follow the death of thoſe, who in their life life time had done the greatest things, yet it never accompanied any one as yet living in the world. He further told him, That neither Hercules nor Bacchus were Deified at a Banquet, and upon drink (for this matter was propounded by Cleo at a carousing Feast:) but that, for the more than manly Acts by them performed while they lived, they were in future and succeeding Ages numbred among the gods. Alexander stood behind a partition, and heard all that was spoken, waiting but an opportunity to be revenged on Calisthenes, who being a man of free speech, honest, learned, and a lover of the King's honour, was yet soon after tormented to death; not for that he had betrayed the King to others, but because he would never condescend to betray the King to himself, as all his detestable flatterers did. For in a conspiracy against the King made by one Hermolaus and others (which they confest) he caused Calisthenes without confession, accusation or Trial, to be torn asunder upon the Rack: This deed unworthy of a King, Seneca thus censureth, Hoc est Alexandri crimen æternum, quod nulla virtus, nulla bellorum fœlicitas redimet: Nam quoties quis dixerit, Occîdit Persarum multa millia; opponitur, & Calisthenem. Quoties dictum erit, Occîdit Darium; opponitur, & Calisthenem. Quoties dictum erit, Omnia Oceano tenus vicit, ipsum quoq; tentavit novis classibus, & Imperium ex angulo Thraciæ usq; ad orientis terminos protulit; dicetur sed Calisthenem occîdit. Omnia licèt antiqua Ducum Regumque exempla transierit, ex his quæ fecit nihil tam magnum erit quam scelus Calisthenis; This is the eternal crime of Alexander, which no vertue nor felicity of his in War shall ever be able to redeem: For as often as any man shall say, He slew many thousand Persians; it shall be replyed, he did so, and he slew Calisthenes. When it shall be said, he slew Darius, it shall be replyed, and Calisthenes. When it shall be said he wan all as far as the very Ocean, thereon also he adventured with unusual Navies, and extended his Empire from a corner of Thrace, to the utmost bounds of the Orient; It shall be said withall, But he killed Calisthenes. Let him have out-gone all the ancient examples of Captains and Kings; none of all his Acts make so much to his glory, as Calisthenes to his reproach.

SECT. XX.

Of Alexander's journey into India. The Battel between him and Porus.

WIth the Army before remembred, of one hundred and twenty thousand foot and horse, Alexander did enter the borders of India, where such of the Princes, as submitted themselves unto him, he entertained lovingly, the rest he constrained, killing Man, Woman, and Child, where they resisted. He then came before Nisa, built by Bacchus, which after a few days was rendred unto him. From thence he removed to a Hill at hand, which on the top had goodly Gardens, filled with delicate Fruits and Vines, dedicated to Bacchus, to whom he made Feasts for ten days together. Now when he had drank his fill, he went on towards Dedula, and from thence to Acadera, Countries spoiled and abandoned by the Inhabitants; by reason whereof, victuals failing, he divides his Army: Ptolomy led one part, Cenon another, and himself the rest. They take many Towns, whereof that of greatest fame was Mazage, which had in it three hundred thousand men; but after some resistance, it was yielded unto him by Cleophe the Queen, to whom again he restored it; at the siege of this City he received a wound in the Leg. After this, Nora was taken by Polysperchon, and a Rock of great strength by himself: he wan also a passage upon one Eryx, who was slain by his company, and his head presented to Alexander. This is the sum of Alexander's doings in those parts, before such time as he arrived at the River of Indus. Coming to Indus, he found there Ephestion, who (being sent before) had prepared Boats for the transportation of his Army, and e're Alexander's arrival, had perswaded Omphis King of that part of the Country, to submit himself to this great Conquerour. Therefore, soon upon Alexander's coming, Omphis presented himself with all the strength of his Country, and six and fifty Elephants, unto him; offering him his service and assistance. He made Alexander know, that he was an Enemy to the next two great Kings of that part of India, named Abiasares and Porus; wherewith Alexander was not a little pleased, hoping by this dis-union to make his own victory by far the more easie. He presented Alexander with a Crown of Gold, so did he the rest of his Commanders, and withal fourscore Talents of Silver Coyn; which Alexander not only refused, but to shew that he was covetous of glory, not of gold, he gave Omphis a thousand Talents of his own Treasure, besides other Persian rarities. Abiasares having heard that Alexander had received his enemy Omphis into his protection, resolved to make his own peace also: For, knowing that his own strength did but equal that of Omphis, and that there was no other difference between them, than that which the chance of War gave, he thought it an ill match, when Alexander, who had already beaten under foot all the greatest Princes of Asia, should make himself a Party and Head of the quarrel. So had Alexander none now to stand in his way but Porus, to whom he sent a commandment. that he should attend him at the border of his Kingdom, there to do him homage. But from Porus he received this manly Answer; That he would satisfie him in his first demand, which was to attend him on his borders, and that well accompanied; but for any other acknowledgement he would take counsel of his Sword. To be short, Alexander resolves to pass over the River Hydaspes, and to find Porus at his own home. Porus attends him on the farther bank with thirty thousand foot, fourscore and ten Elephants, and three hundred armed Chariots, and a great Troop of Horse. If Darius had done the like on Tigris, Alexander had surely stayed somewhat longer e're he had seen India. The River was four furlongs broad, which makes half a mile, and withal deep and swift. It had in it many Islands, among which there was one well shadowed with wood, and of good capacity. Alexander sent Ptolomy up the River with a part of the Army, shrowding the rest from the view of Porus: who by this device being drawn from his first encamping, sets himself down opposite to Ptolomy, supposing that the whole Army of Macedon, meant to force their passage there. In the mean while Alexander recovers the farther shore without resistance. He orders his Troops, and advanceth towards Porus, who at first rather believes that Abiasares his Confederate (but now the Confederate of fortune) had been come over Hydaspes to his Aid, than that Alexander had past it. But he finds it otherwise, and sends his Brother Hagis with with four thousand Horse, and a hundred armed Waggons to entertain him. Each Waggon had in it four to fight, and two to guide it; but they were at this time of little use: for there had fallen so much rain, and thereby the fields were so moistned, as the horses could hardly trot. The Scythians and Dahans had the Vant-guard, who so galled these Indians, as they brake their Reins, and other Furniture, overturning the Waggons, and those in them. Perdiccas also gave up the Indian horsemen, and the one and the other were forc'd to recoil. Porus moves forward with the gross of his Army, that those of his Vant-guard scattered might recover his Rear; Alexander being followed with Ephestion, Ptolomy, and Perdiccas, took on him to charge the Indian horse-men on the left wing, commanding Cenus, or Cenon to invade the right; Antigonus and Leonatus, he directed to break upon Porus his battel of foot, strengthned with Elephants, Porus himself being carried upon one of them, of the greatest stature. By these beasts the Macedonian foot were most offended, but the Archers and Darters being well guarded by the long and strong pikes of the Macedonians, so galled them, as being enraged, they turned head, and ran over the foot that followed them; In the end, and after a long and doubtful fight, by the advantage of weapon, and by the courage and skilfulness of the Macedonian Captains, the Victory fell to Alexander, who also far exceeded Porus in number: for besides the Macedonians, and other Eastern and Northern Nations, Porus was assailed by his own Confederate and Country-people. Yet for his own person he never gave ground other wise than with his sword towards his enemies, till being weakned with many wounds, and abandoned by his Army, he became a prisoner to the Conquerour, from whom again he received his Estate with a great enlargement.

SECT. XXI.

How Alexander finished his Expedition, and returned out of India.

I Forbear to trouble my self and others with a frivolous discourse of Serpents, Apes, and Peacocks, which the Macedonians found in these their Travels: or of those petty Wars which Alexander made between the overthrow of Porus, and his sailing down the River of Indus. The descriptions of places about the head and branches thereof are better known unto us in this Age, by means of our late Navigations into those parts, than they were in any former times. The magnificence and riches of those Kings we could in no sort be perswaded to believe, till our own experience had taught us, that there were many stranger things in the World, than are to be seen between London and Staines.

Our great Traveller Mandevile, who died in the year, 1372. and had seen so much of the World, and of the East-India, we accounted the greatest fabler of the World; yet had he another reputation among other Nations, as well able to judge as we. Witness the Monument made of him in the Covent of the Friars Guillimus in Liege, where the Religious of that place keep some things of his, Comme pour honourable memoire de son Excellence; For an honourable memory of his Excellency, saith Guicciardine.

Guic. in Disc. of the Low Countries.

The Countries towards the Springs of Indus, and where those many Rivers of Hydaspes, Zaradis, Acesines, and the rest fall into the main stream, are now possest by the great Mogul the ninth from Tamberlain, who commands all the Tract between Persia and Indus towards the West, as also a great extent of Country towards Ganges. In the mouth of Indus, the Ascension, a Ship of London suffered shipwrack, in the year 1609. and some of the company travelled over Land till they came to Agra, the same great city (as I take it) which our later Cosmographers call Nagra, being named of old Dionysopolis.

Philostratus in the Life of Apollonius Tyaneus, speaking of the expedition of Bacchus and Hercules into the East-India, tells us, that those two great Captains (whom Alexander sought by all means to out-fame) when they endeavoured to subject to them the Oxidracæ, a people inhabiting between the Rivers of Hyphasis and Ganges, they were beaten from the assault of their City with Thunder & Lightnings. This may well be understood by the great Ordinance that those people had then in use. For it is now certainly known, that the great Kings of the uttermost East, have had the use of the Cannon many hundreds of years since, and even since their first civility and greatness, which was long before Alexander's time. But Alexander pierc'd not so far into the East. It sufficed, that having already over-wearied his Army, he discovered the rest of India by fame. The Indian Kings whom he had subdued, informed him, that a Prince called Aggramenes, who commanded many Nations beyond the River Ganges, was the powerfullest King of all those Regions: and that he was able to bring into the field two hundred thousand Foot, three thousand Elephants, twenty thousand Horse, and two thousand armed Chariots. With this report, though Alexander were more enflamed than ever to proceed in this discovery and conquest, yet all the Art he had, could not perswade the Souldiers to wander over those great Desarts, beyond Indus and Ganges, more terrible unto them than the greatest Army that the East could gather. Yet at the last contented they were, after many perswasive Orations, to follow him towards the South, to discover such part of the Ocean Sea, as was nearer at hand, whereunto the River of Indus was their infallible guide. Alexander seeing that it would be no otherwise, devised a pretty trick, wherewith he hoped to beguil posterity, and make himself seem greater than he was. He enlarged his Camp, made greater Trenches, greater Cabbins for Souldiers, greater Horse-stalls, and higher Mangers than Horses could feed in. He caused all Furniture of Men and Horses to be made larger than would serve for use; and scattered these Armours and Bridles about his Camp, to be kept as Reliques, and wondred at by the Savages. Proportionable to these he raised up twelve great Altars to be the monument of his journeys end. This was a ready way to encrease the fame of his bigness; to his greatness it could add nothing save a suspicion, that it was less than is thought, seeing he strove so earnestly to make it thought more than it was.

This done, he returned again to the bank of Acesines, and there determined to set up his Fleet, where Acesines and Hydaspes encounter; where to testifie by a surer monument, how far he had past towards the East, he built by those Rivers two Cities: the one he called Nicea, and the other Bucephalon, after the name of his beloved Horse Bucephalus. Here again he received a fourth supply of six thousand Thracian Horse-men, seven thousand Foot; and from his Lieutenant at Babylon, five and twenty thousand Armours garnished with silver and gold, which he distributed among his Souldiers. About these Rivers he wan many Towns, and committed great slaughter on those that resisted; It is then written of him, that in assaulting a City of the Oxidracans, he leapt from the top of the wall into it, and fought, I know not how long, against all the Inhabitants; tales like those of Bevis of Southampton, trivolous and incredible. Finally, he pass'd down the River with his Fleet, at which time also the news came unto him of a Rebellion in Bactria, and then of the arrival of an hundred Ambassadours from a King of India, who submitted himself unto him. He feasted these Ambassadours upon a hundred beds of gold, with all the sumptuosity that could be devised, who, soon after their dispatch, returned again with a present of three hundred Horses, one hundred and thirty Waggons, and to each of them four Horses, a thousand Targets, with many other things rare and rich.

Their entertainments ended, he sailed towards the South, passed through many obscure Nations, which did all yield unto him either quietly, or compelled by force: among these he builded another Alexandria. Of many places which he took in this passage, Samos was one, the Inhabitants whereof fought against him with poysoned swords, with one of which Ptolomy (afterward King of Egypt) was wounded, and cured by an herb which Alexander dreamt he had seen in the mouth of a Serpent.

When he came near to the out-let of Indus (being ignorant of the tides of the Sea) his Gallies as they were on a sudden shuffled one upon another by the flood, so on the Ebb they were left on the dry ground, and on the sandy banks of the River, wherewith the Macedonians were much amazed; but after he had a few days observed well the course of the Sea, he past out of the Rivers mouth some few miles, and after Sacrifices offered to Neptune, returned: and the better to inform himself, he sent Nearchus and Onesicritus, to discover the coast towards the mouth of Euphrates. Arrianus in the beginning of his sixth book hath written this passage down the River of Indus at length, with the manner of the Vessels in which he transported his Army, the Commanders that were used therein, and other the marvellous provisions made.

Near the out-lets of this River, he spent some part of the Winter, and in eighteen days march from thence recovered Gedrosia, in which passage his Army suffered such misery for want of Food, that of a hundred and twenty thousand foot, and twelve thousand horse, which he carried into India not the fourth part returned alive.

SECT. XXII.

Of Alexander's Riot, Cruelty, and Death.

FRom Gedrosia, Alexander led his Army into Carmania, and so drawing near to Persia, he gave himself wholly to feasting and drinking, imitating the triumphs of Bacchus. And though this Swinish vice be hateful enough in it self, yet it always inflamed this King to cruelty. For (saith Curtius) the Hangman followed the feast: for Aspastes, one of his Provincial Governours, he commanded to be slain; so as neither did the excess of voluptuousness qualifie his cruelty, nor his cruelty hinder in ought his voluptuousness.

While he refreshed his Army in these parts, a new supply of five thousand foot, and a thousand horse was brought him by Cleander, and his Fellows that had been employed in the killing of Parmenio. Against these Murderers, great complaint was made by the Deputies of the Provinces, in which they had commanded; and their offences were so outragious, as Alexander was perswaded, that had they not altogether despaired of his return out of India they durst not have committed them. All men were glad of this occasion, remembring the virtue of him whom they had slaughtered. The end was, That Cleander, and the other chief, with six hundred Souldiers by them employed, were delivered over to the Hangman: every one rejoycing that the Ire of the King was at last executed on the Ministers of his Ire.

Nearchus and Onesicritus were now returned from the Coast, and made report of an Island rich in gold and of other strange things: whereupon they were commanded to make some farther discovery: which done, that they should enter the mouth of Euphrates, and find the King at Babylon.

As he drew near to Babylon, he visited the Sepulchre of Cyrus in Pasargada, now called Chalquera: where he was presented with many rich gifts by Orsines, one of the Princes of Persia, of the race of Cyrus. But because Bagoas, an Eunuch in special favour with the King was neglected; he not only practised certain loose fellows to witness against Orsines, that he had robbed Cyrus's Tomb, for which he was condemned to die; but he assisted the Hangman with his own hands in tormenting him. At which time also Alexander caused Phradites to be slain, suspecting his greatness. Cæperat (saith Curtius) esse præceps ad repræsentanda supplicia, item ad deteriora credenda; He began headlongly to shed blood, and believe false reports. It is true, that he took a way to make all men weary of his Government, seeing cruelty is more fearful, than all adventures that can be made against it.

Arrianus hath a far different description of Cyrus's Tomb.

At this time it is said, that Calanus the Philosopher burnt himself, when he had lived threescore and thirteen years. Whether herein he followed the custom of his Country, being an Indian, or sought to prevent the grief and incommodity of elder age, it is uncertain: but in this Historians agree, that fore-seeing and fore-shewing Alexander's death, he promised to meet him shortly after at Babylon.

From Pasargada he came to Susa, where he married Statira Darius his Eldest Daughter, giving her younger sister to his beloved Ephestion, and fourscore other Persian Ladies to his Captains, there were six thousand guests invited to the Feast to each of which he gave a cup of gold. Here there came unto him three thousand young Souldiers out of his conquered Provinces, whereat the Macedonians greatly murmured. Harpalus his Treasurer in Babylon, having lavishly consumed the moneys in his keeping, got him going with five thousand Talents; and six thousand hired Souldiers: but he was rejected in Greece, and there slain. Alexander greatly rejoyced at the fidelity of the Greeks, whom Harpalus with these forces and treasures could not stir: yet he sent commandment that they should again receive their banished men, whereunto (fearful of his indignation) all submitted themselves themselves (except the Athenians) though they resolved, that it was a manifest preparation towards their bondage. After this, there followed a marvellous discontentment in his Army, because he had resolved to send into Macedon all those old Souldiers which could no longer endure the travel of War, and to keep the rest in Asia. He used many Orations to satisfie them, but it was in vain during the Tempest of their fury. But afterward as Whales are drawn to the Land with a twine-thred, when they have tumbled a while; so are the unconsiderate multitude easily conducted when their first passions are evaporate. With such as were licensed to depart, he sent Craterus, to whom he gave the Lieutenantship of Macedon, Thessaly, and Thrace, which Antipater had held from his first departure out of Europe, who had beaten the rebellious Greeks in his absence, discharged the trust committed unto him with great fidelity, and sent him so many strong supplies into Asia from time to time. Certainly, if Alexander had not taken counsel of his cups, he would have cast some better colour on this alteration, and given Antipater a stronger reason for his remove, than to have employed him in the conduction of a new supply to be brought him to Babylon, the War being now at an end. For Antipater saw nothing in this remove, but the King's disposition to send him after Parmenio, and the rest. With this Antipater, the King, notwithstanding his great courage, had no great appetite to grapple: Princes, though jealous, do not stand in doubt of every man ill affected, though valiant: but there is a kind of Kingly courage compounded of hardiness and understanding, which is many times so fearful unto them, as they take leave both of Law and Religion, to free themselves thereof.

After he had sent for Antipater, he made a journey into Media to settle things there; where Ephestion whom he favoured most of all men, dies. The King, according to the greatness of his love, laments his loss, hangs his Physician, and bestows upon his Monument twelve thousand Talents: After which he returns to Babylon. Thither Antipater came not, but sent; and not to excuse himself, but to free himself. For if we believe Curtius (whom Plutarch and others gainsay) Antipater by his Sons, Cassander, Philip, and Iolla, who waited on Alexander's cup, gave him poyson; Thessalus (who was of the Conspiracy) having invited him to a drinking Feast of purpose. For after he had taken a carouse in Hercules his cup, a draught of drink stronger than Hercules himself, he quitted the World within a few days.

Certainly the Princes of the World have seldom found good, by making their Ministers over great and thereby suspicious to themselves. For he that doth not acknowledge fidelity to be a debt, but is perswaded, that Kings ought to purchase it from their Vassals, will never please himself with the price given. The only restorative, indeed, that strengthens it, is the goodness and virtue of the Prince, and his liberality makes it more diligent; so as proportion and distance be observed. It may be that Antipater, having commanded two or three Kingdoms ten or twelve years, knew not how to play any other part; no more than Cæsar did, after he had so long a time governed the Gauls, where he utterly forgat the Art of obedience. A most cruel and ungrateful Traitor Antipater was, if Curtius do not belie him: For though he feared some ill measure upon his remove (the Tragedies of Parmenio, Clytus, and Calisthenes, having been so lately acted) yet he knew nothing to the contrary, but that the King had resolved to have given him some other great Goverment in Asia: The old Souldiers thence returned, having perchance desired to be governed by Craterus, whom they had followed in all the former War.

SECT. XXIII.

Of Alexander's Person and Qualities.

HOwsoever it were Alexander's former cruelties cannot be excused no more than his vanity to be esteemed the Son of Jupiter, with his excessive delight in drink and drunkenness, which others make the cause of his Fever and death. In that he lamented his want of enterprising, and grieved to consider what he should do when he had conquered the World, Augustus Cæsar found just cause to deride him, as if the well governing of so many Nations and Kingdoms, as he had already conquered, could not have afforded him matter more than abundant, to busie his brains withal. That he was both Learned, and a lover of Learning, it cannot be doubted. Sir Francis Bacon, in his first Book of the Advancement of Learning, hath proved it sufficiently. His liberality I know not how to praise, because it exceeded proportion. It is said, That when he gave a whole City to one of his servants, he, to whom it was given did out of modesty refuse it, as disproportionable to his fortune: to whom Alexander replyed, That he did not enquire what became him to accept but the King to give: of which Seneca; Animosa vox videtur & regia, cùm sit stultissima. Nihil enim per se quenquam decet. Refert quid, cui, quando, quare, ubi, &c. sine quibus facti ratio non constabit; habeatur personarum & dignitatum proportio, & cum sit ubiq; virtutis modus, æquè peccat quod excedit, quàm quod deficit; It seems a brave and Royal speech, whereas indeed it is very foolish. For nothing simply considered by it self beseems a man. We must regard what, to whom, when, why, where and the like; without which considerations, no act can be approved. Let honours be proportioned unto the persons: for whereas virtue is ever limited by measure, the excess is as faulty as the defect. Lib. 2. de Ben. c. 1.

For his Person, it is very apparent, That he was as valiant as any man; a disposition, taken by it self, not much to be admired: For I am resolved, that he had ten thousand in his Army as daring as himself. Surely, if adventurous natures were to be commended simply, we should confound that virtue with the hardiness of Thieves, Ruffians, and Mastiff-dogs. For certainly it is no way praiseworthy, but in daring good things, and in the performance of those lawful enterprizes, in which we are employed for the service of our Kings, and Common-weals.

If we compare this great Conquerour with other troublers of the World, who have bought their glory with so great destruction and effusion of blood, I think him far inferiour to Cæsar, and many other that lived after him, seeing he never undertook any warlike Nation, the naked Scythians excepted: nor was ever encountred with any Army of which he had not a most mastering advantage, both of Weapons and Commanders, every one of his Father's old Captains by far exceeding the best of his Enemies. But it seems Fortune and Destiny

(if we may uſe thoſe terms) had found out and prepared for him, without any care of his own, both heaps of Men, that willingly offered their necks to the yoke, and Kingdoms that invited and called in their own Conquerours. For concluſion, we will agree with Seneca, who ſpeaking of Philip the Father, and Alexander the Son, gives this Judgement of them: Quod non minores fuere peſtes mortalium, quam inundatio, quâ planum omne perfuſum eſt, quam conflagratio, quâ magna pars animantium exaruit; They were no leſs plagues to mankind, than an overthrow of Waters, drowning all the level; or ſome burning drought, whereby a great part of living Creatures are ſcorched up.

CHAP. III.

The Reign of Arideus.

SECT. I.

Of the Queſtion about Succeſſion to Alexander.

THe death of Alexander left his Army (as Demades the Athenian then compared it) in ſuch caſe, as was that monſtrous Gyant Polyphemus, having loſt his only eye. For that which is reported in Fables of that great Cyclops, might well be verified of the Macedonians: their force was intolerable, but for want of good guidance uneffectual, and harmful chiefly to themſelves. The cauſes whereof (under the divine ordinance) were partly the uncertainty of Title to ſucceſſion in the Kingdom of Macedon, partly the ſtubborn pride of Alexander himſelf, who thinking none worthy to be his heir, did refuſe to eſtabliſh the right in any one, leaving every one to his own fortune: but eſpecially the great ambition of his followers, who all had learned of their Maſter to ſuffer no equals; a leſſon ſoon taught unto ſpirits reflecting upon their own worth, when the reverence of a greater object faileth.

It hath formerly been ſhewed, That Philip (the Father of Alexander) governing in Macedon as Protector, aſſumed unto himſelf the Kingdom, not rendring it unto Amyntas, (the Son of his elder Brother Perdiccas) when he grew to man's eſtate; but only beſtowing upon him in marriage a Daughter of his own: by which bond, and much more by his own proper ſtrength, he aſſured the Crown unto himſelf: Amyntas never attempting ought againſt Philip; though (with price of his life) he did againſt Alexander in the beginning of his Reign. Wherefore Eurydice the ſole iſſue of this Marriage, ought in reaſon to have been acknowledged Queen after Alexander; as having better Title thereunto, than either He or Philip had, when they lived, unleſs (peradventure) ſome Law of that Nation forbad the Reign of Women. But the excellent virtue of theſe two Princes, had utterly defaced the right of all Pretenders, not claiming from their own bodies: and ſo great were their Conqueſts, that Macedon it ſelf was (in regard of them) a very ſmall Appendix, and no way deſerving to be laid in ballance againſt the demand of their poſterity, had they left any able to make challenge of the Royal Seat.

Alexander having taken many Wives, had iſſue by none of the principal of them. Barſine the Daughter of Artabazus a Perſian, had born unto him a young Son: and Roxane the Daughter of Oxyartes (whom he had more ſolemnly married) was left by him great with Child. But the baſeneſs of the Mothers, and contempt of the conquered Nations, was generally alledged in Bar of Plea made for them, by ſome that would (perhaps) have wrought out their own ends, under the name of Alexander's children.

Cleopatra, a Siſter of Alexander, Widow to the King of Epirus, and Aridæus his baſe Brother (Son to Philip by a Concubine of no account) who had married the Lady Eurydice before mentioned, were next in courſe. Of Cleopatra there was no ſpeech, which may give ſuſpicion, that either Law or Cuſtom had made that Sex uncapable of the Soveraignty: Arideus (beſides his baſtardy) was neither for perſon nor quality fit to rule as King; yet upon him the election fell, but ſlowly, and (as happeneth often) for lack of a better: when the Counſellors having over-laboured their diſagreeing wits in deviſing what was beſt, were content for very wearineſs to take what comes next to hand.

Ptolomy (ſoon after King of Egypt) concurring with them who rejected all mention of the half-Perſian brood, King Alexander's children; was of opinion, that the rule of all ſhould be given to the Captains; that going for Law, which by the greater part of them ſhould be decreed: ſo far was he from acknowledging any one as true Heir to the Crown.

This Ptolomy was called the Son of Lagus, but reputed of Philip: who having uſed the company of Arſinoe, Ptolomy's Mother, delivered her in marriage to Lagus, being great with child. Therefore, whether it were ſo, that he hoped well to work his own fortune out of thoſe diſſenſions, which are incident unto the conſultations of many ambitious men, equal in place, forcing them at length to redeem their quiet with ſubjection to one, deſerving regard by his blood, and truſt for his even carriage; or whether he only deſired to get a ſhare to himſelf, which could not have come to paſs, had all all been given to one: plain enough it is, that he thought not on preferring Arideus before himſelf: and therefore gave ſuch counſel as fitted his own and other mens purpoſes. Yea, this device of his took place indeed, though not in form as he had propounded it: For, it was in effect all one, to have aſſembled at Alexander's empty Chair, as Ptolomy had conceived the form of their conſultations, or to ſet in the Chair ſuch a King as Arideus, no wiſer than the Chair it ſelf. Alſo the Controverſies ariſing were determined by the greater part of the Captains; by the greater part, if not in number, yet in puiſſance.

But as theſe counterfeit ſhews of diſſembling aſpirers do often take check by the plain dealing of them who dare to go more directly to work: ſo was it like to have fared with Ptolomy and the reſt, when Ariſtonus, another of the Captains, interpreted the very words of Alexander, ſaying, That he left his Kingdom to the worthyeſt, as deſigning Perdiccas, to whom (lying at the point of death) he delivered his Ring. It ſeemed good in reaſon, that Alexander ſhould be diſpoſer of his own purchaſes: and thoſe tokens of Alexander's purpoſe appeared plain enough, ſo long as no man would interpoſe another's conſtruction: every one being uncertain how the ſecret affections of the reſt might be enclined. Many therefore, either out of their love, or becauſe they would not be of the lateſt, urged Perdiccas to take upon him the Eſtate Royal. He was no ſtranger to the Royal blood; yet his birth gave him not ſuch reputation, as the great favour of his dead King, with whom he had been very inward, and that eſpecially ſince the death of Epheſtion (a powerful Minion) into whoſe place he was choſen. For his own worth he might well be commended, as a good man of War, and one that had given much proof of his private valour. But very ſurly he was: which quality (joyned with good fortune) carried a ſhew of Majeſty: being checkt with miſadventure, it was called by a true name, Pride; and rewarded with death.

In the preſent buſineſs a fooliſh over-weening did him as great harm, as it had been great happineſs to have ſucceeded Alexander. For, not content to have the acclamation of the Souldiers, approving the ſentence of Ariſtonus, he would needs counterfeit modeſty; thinking that every one of the Princes would have intreated him to take the weighty burthen of an Empire, which would be the leſs envious, the more ſolemnity he uſed in the acceptance. It is truly ſaid, He that feigneth himſelf a Sheep, may chance to be eaten by a Wolf. Meleager, (a man by nature envious, and bearing a particular hatred to Perdiccas) took advantage of his irreſolute behaviour, and very bitterly inveighed againſt him. In concluſion, he pronounced, That whoſoever was Heir to the Crown, the Souldiers ought to be heirs to the Treaſure; and therefore he invited them, who were nothing ſlow to ſhare it. This diſturbed all the Conſultation. The Captains were left alone, far enough from agreeing, and not able to have brought any concluſion to good effect without conſent of the Souldiers, who greedy of ſpoil, thronged about Meleager.

SECT. II.

The Election of Arideus, with the troubles thereabout ariſing; the firſt Diviſion of the Empire.

During this up-roar, mention was made of Arideus by ſome one, and entertained with good liking of many, until at laſt it grew to the voice of the Army. Meleager having withdrawn himſelf tumultuouſly from the company of the Lords, was glad of ſo fair an occaſion to make himſelf great: therefore he produced Arideus, commended him to the Souldiers, who called him by his Fathers name Philip, and brought him into the Palace, inveſting him in Alexander's Robes, and proclaiming him King. Many of the Nobles withſtood this election, but in vain: for they could not reſolve what courſe to follow, rejecting this. Only Python, a hot-headed man, took upon him to proclaim the Son of Alexander by Roxane, according to the counſel which Perdiccas at firſt had given, appointing Perdiccas and Leontius his Protectors. But the child was not yet born, which made that attempt of Python vain. Finally, Perdiccas with ſix hundred men, and Ptolomy with the King's Pages took upon them to defend the place where Alexander's body lay: but the Army, conducted by Meleager, who carried the new King about whither he liſted, eaſily brake in upon them, and inforced them to accept Arideus for their Soveraign Lord. Then by interceſſion of the ancient Captains, a reconciliation was propounded and admitted, but on neither ſide faithfully meant.

Leonatus who was of Royal blood, a goodly Gentleman, and valiant, iſſued out of Babylon, being followed by all the horſe, which conſiſted (for the moſt part) of the Nobility. Perdiccas abode in the City (but ſtanding upon his guard) that he might be ready to take the opportunity of any commotion that ſhould happen among the Infantry. The King (who was governed by Meleager) commanded, or gave leave to have Perdiccas made away; which attempt ſucceeded ill, being neither ſecretly carried, nor committed to ſure Executioners. Their coming was not unexpected: and they were by Perdiccas rebuked with ſuch gravity, that they departed honeſter than they came; being ſorry for their bad enterpriſe. Upon the news of this attempt, the Camp was in an up-roar, which the King ſeeking to pacifie, wanted Authority, as having newly got the Crown by them, and holding it by their courteſie. The matter it ſelf afforded no good excuſes, and his indiſcretion made them worſe. He ſaid that no harm was done, for Perdiccas was alive: but their exclamations were againſt the tyrannous enterprize, which he imputed to Meleager; abandoning the ſureſt of his friends to the rage of the multitude, who were not appeaſed, until the King by offering to reſign his Eſtate unto them, renewed out of their pitty that favourable affection, which had moved them to ſet him up at the firſt.

Perdiccas having now joyned himſelf with Leonatus, kept the fields, intending to cut off all proviſion of victuals from the City. But after ſundry Embaſſies paſſing between the King and the Nobles, (they requiring to have the Authours of ſedition given up into their hands; the King, that Meleager might be joyned with Leonatus and Perdiccas, as a Third in the Government of the Army) things were compounded according to the King's desire. Meleager should have done well to consider, That such men as had one day demanded his head, were not like the day following to give him a principal place among them without any new occation offered, had not some purpose of treachery lurked under their great facility. General peace was renewed, and much love protested where little was intended. The face of the Court was the same which it had been in Alexander's time: but no longer now did the same heart give it life; and windy spirits they were which moved in the Arteries. False reports were given out by appointment of Perdiccas, tending to his own disgrace, but in such terms as might seem to have proceeded from Meleager: who finding part of the drift, but not all, took it as an injury done to himself; and (as desirous of a true friendship) desired of Perdiccas, that such Authours of discord might be punished. Perdiccas (as a lover of peace) did well approve the motion; and therefore agreed that a general Muster should be made, at which time the disturbers of the common quiet should receive their punishment (as was the manner for Souldiers offending) in presence of the Army. The plot was mischievously laid. Had Meleager given way to seditious rumours, he must needs have incurred the general hatred of all, as a sower of dissension, and thereby with a publick approbation might have been cut off, as having often offended in that kind; his Prince being too weak a Patron. Now seeking redress of these disorders, he hastned his own ruine, by a less formal, but more speedy way. This kind of Muster was very solemn, and practised with many ceremonies, as for cleansing the Army. The Horse-men, the Elephants, the Macedonian foot, the Mercenaries were were each according to their quality set in array, apart from others, as if they had been of sundry sorts, met at adventure: which done, the manner was to skirmish (as by way of exercise) according to the direction of their several Captains. But at that time the great battel of Macedonian Pikes, which they called the Phalanx, led by Meleager, was of purpose bestowed in a ground of disadvantage; and the countenance of the Horse and Elephants beginning to give charge upon them was such, as discovered no jesting pastime, nor good intent. Kings were always wont to fight among the horse-men: of which custom Perdiccas made great use that day, to the utter confusion of his enemies. For Arideus was always governed by him, who for the present had him in possession. Two or three days before he sought the death of Perdiccas at the instigation of Meleager: now he rides with Perdiccas up and down about the foot-men, commanding them to deliver unto the death all such as Perdiccas required. Three hundred they were who were cast unto the Elephants, and by them slain, in the presence of the King (who should have defended them) and of their affrighted companions. But these three hundred were not the men whose punishment Meleager had expected: they were such as had followed him, when he disturbed the first consultation that was held about the election of a new King, and some of them his especial friends. Having therefore kept himself quiet a while, as unwilling to give offence to them that had the advantage; when he saw their proceedings tend very manifestly to his destruction, he fled away into a Temple, which he found no Sanctuary: for thither they sent and slew him.

The Army being thus corrected, was led into the City, where a new Council of the Princes was held; who finding what manner of man their King was, divided all the Provinces of the Empire among themselves; leaving to Arideus the office of a Visitor, and yet making Perdiccas his Protector, and Commander of the Forces remaining with him. Then were the funerals of Alexander thought upon; whose body having been seven days neglected, was opened and embalmed by the Egyptians: no sign of poyson appearing, how great soever the suspicion might be. The charge of his burial was committed to Arideus, one of the Captains, who was two years preparing of a great and costly shew, making a stately Chariot in which the corps was laid; many coarses of his friends being laid in the ground before that of Alexander was bestowed in Alexandria, a City of his own building in Egypt.

SECT. III.

The beginning of the Lamian War.

WHilst these things were in doing, or presently after, Antipater and Craterus, two principal Noblemen, and inferiour to none of Alexander's followers, if not greater than any of the rest, were busied in Greece with a War, which the Athenians more bravely than wisely had begun in Alexander's life, but now did prosecute more boldly than before, upon the courage which they had taken by his death. Alexander not long before he died, had commanded that all the banished Greeks (few excepted) should be restored unto their former places. He knew the factious quality of the Grecian Estates, and therefore thought so to provide, that in every City he would have a sure party. But it fell out otherwise: For he lost the hearts of many more than he won by this proud injunction. His pleasure indeed was fulfilled; yet not without great murmuring of the whole Nation, as being against all order of Law, and a beginning of open tyranny. The Athenians greatly decayed in estate, but retaining more than was needful of their ancient spirits, forbad the execution of this Decree in their Dominions; so did also the Ætolians who were valiant men, and inhabited a Region well fortified by Nature: yet neither of them took Arms, but seemed to bear themselves as men that had done no more than they might well justifie by reason: nevertheless to prevent the worst, the Athenians gave secret instructions to Leosthenes, a Captain of theirs, willing him to levy an Army, but in his own name, and to keep it in a readiness for their use. This was no hard thing for Leosthenes to do: great numbers of Greek Souldiers being lately returned from the Asian War in poor estate, as defrauded of their pay by the Captains. Of these he had gathered up eight thousand, when the certain news was brought of Alexander's death: at which the City of Athens declared it self, and more honourably than wisely, proclaimed War against the Macedonians for the liberty of Greece. Hereupon Leosthenes drew in the Ætolians, and some other Estates, gave battel to the Beætians, who sided with Antipater, and overthrew them; growing so fast in reputation, and and so strong in adherents, that Antipater (arming in all haste, yet suspecting his own strength) was fain to send into Asia to Craterus for succour.

Nothing is more vain than the fears and hopes of men, shunning or pursuing their destinies afar off, which deceive all mortal wisdom, even when they seem near at hand. One month was scarcely past, since nothing so heavily burthened the thoughts of Antipater as the return of Caterus into Macedon; which he then feared as death, but now desired as the most likely assurance of his life. Craterus, whom Alexander held as of all men the most assured unto him, was sent into Macedon to convey the old Souldiers (that was the pretence) and to succeed Antipater in the Government of Macedon and Greece. The suspicions were strong that he had a privy charge to put Antipater to death: neither did that which was commonly published sound much better; which was, That Antipater should be sent unto the King, as Captain of the young Souldiers, newly to be levied in Europe. For Alexander was much incensed against him by his Mother Olympias: and would sometimes give out speeches, testifying his own jealousie and hatred of him; but yet he strove to smother it, which in a cruel Prince betokeneth little good. Few of Alexander's Lieutenants had escaped with life: most of them indeed were mean persons in regard of those who followed him in his Indian expedition, and were therefore (perhaps) removed to make place for their betters. But if the King's rigour was such, as could find rebellious purposes (for so he interpreted even lewd Government) in base persons; little might Antipater hope for, who having sitten Viceroy ten years in the strongest part of the Empire, was called away to the presence of so fell a Master, and the envy of a Court, wherein they had been his inferiours, which would now repine to see him their equal. Therefore whether his fear drew him to prevention, working first the King's death by poyson, given by his Son Iolaus, Alexander's Cup-bearer; or whether it brake not forth until opportunity had changed it into the passion of revenge, which was cruelly performed by his Son Cassander; great cause of much fear he had; which I note in this place, as the ground of effects to be produced in very few years.

At the present, Craterus was sent for, and all the Captains of Companies lying near, solicited to make haste. Not without cause: For in Macedon there could not at that time be raised more than thirteen thousand foot, and six hundred horse; which Muster was of raw Souldiers, all the force of the Country being employed in Asia. The Thessalians indeed who had long stood firm for Philip and Alexander, who also were the best horse-men of Greece; furnished him with very brave troops, that might have done great service, had their faith held out, which they changed for the liberty of Greece. With these forces did Antipater in Thessaly try the Fortune of a Battel with Leosthenes; rather (as may seem) fearing the increase of his enemies power, and rebellion of the Greeks, (were they not checkt at the first) than presuming on his strength. For Leosthenes had of Athenians, Ætolians, and Mercenaries, two and twenty thousand foot, besides the assistance of many petty Signiories, and of some Illyrians and Thracians: of horse he brought into the field about two thousand and five hundred; but over-strong he was that way also, when once the Thessalians had revolted unto him. So Antipater lost the day; and his loss was such, that he neither was able to keep the field, nor to make a safe retreat into his own Country; therefore he fled into the Town of Lamia, which was well fortified, and well provided of all things necessary to bear out a siege. Thither did Leosthenes follow him, present him battel again, and upon refusal close up the Town with Earth-works, and a Wall. There will we leave him for a while, travelling in the last honourable enterprize that ever was undertaken by that great City of Athens.

How Perdiccas employed his Army.

KIng Arideus living under the rule of Perdiccas, when all the Princes were gone each to his own Province, kept a naked Court: all his greatness consisting in a bare Title, supported by the strength of his Protector, who cared not for him otherwise than to make use of him. Perdiccas had no Province of his own peculiar, neither was he like to be welcome to any whom he should visit in his Government. A stronger Army than any of the rest he had, which he might easily hope in that unsettled condition of things to make better worth to him than many Provinces could have been. The better to accomplish his desires, he closely sought the marriage of Cleopatra, the sister of Alexander; yet about the same time he either married Nicæa the daughter of Antipater, or made such love to her as blinded their eyes, who did not somewhat narrowly search into his doings.

Ariarathes the Cappadocian, the second of that name, and tenth King of that Country, had continued faithful to the Persian Empire as long as it stood: following the example of his fore-fathers, even from Pharnaces, the first that reigned in Cappadocia, who married Atossa sister to the great Cyrus. Some of his Ancestors had (indeed) been oppressed by the Persian: but what Fortune took from them at one time, Vertue restored at another, and their faithful Princes had much encreased all. But now in the fatal Period of so great an Empire, with much wisdom, and (Darius being slain) with sufficient honour, he might have acknowledged the Macedonian in the Persians room. This he did not; neither did Alexander call him him to account, being occupied with great cares. But Perdiccas, who had no greater business wherein to entertain his Army, found it expedient both for the honour of the Empire, to take that inland Kingdom, surrounded with Provinces of the Macedonian Conquest, and for his own particular, to have one opportune place of sure retreat, under the Government of a stedfast friend. Therefore he entred Cappadocia, fought with Ariarathes, who drew into the field 30000 foot, and 15000 horse (a strong Army, had it not encountred a stronger, and better trained) wan the victory, and thereby the whole Kingdom. But with much cruelty did he use the victory: for having taken Ariarathes prisoner, with many others, he crucified him, and as many of his Kindred as he could light upon, and so delivered that Province to Eumenes, whom of all men living he trusted most. Another part of his forces he had committed to Python, thon, rather as to the moſt honourable of ſuch as remained about him, than as to the moſt aſſured. Python was to ſuddue the Greeks rebelling in the high Countries of Aſia. About twenty thouſand foot, and thirty thouſand horſe they were (all old Souldiers) who planted in Colonies by Alexander to bridle the barbarous Nations, were ſoon weary of their unpleaſant habitations, and the rude people, among whom they lived: And therefore took advantage of the preſent troubles to ſeek unto themſelves a better fortune. Againſt theſe Python went, more deſirous to make them his own, than to deſtroy them: which intent of his Perdiccas diſcovering, did both give him in charge to put all thoſe Rebels to the ſword, giving the ſpoils of them to his Souldiers, and further enjoyned it upon Python's Captains (his own creatures) that they ſhould ſee his commandment executed. Theſe directions for uſe of the victory, might have proved needleſs; ſo uncertain was the victory it ſelf. A Captain of the Rebels commanding over three thouſand, corrupted by Python, did in the heat of the fight (which was very doubtful) retire without neceſſity to a hill not far off. This diſmayed the reſt, and gave the day to Python: who being far enough from Perdiccas, offered compoſition to the vanquiſhed, granting unto them their lives and liberty, under condition of laying down their arms; and hereupon he gave them his faith. Being Maſter of theſe Companies, he might well have a good opinion of his own power: all power being then valued by ſtrength in followers, when as none could vaunt himſelf as free Lord of any Territory. He had thirteen thouſand foot, and eight thouſand eight hundred horſe, beſides theſe new Companions, whom needleſs fear without great loſs had cauſed to leave the field: but in true eſtimation, all the greatneſs whereof Python might think himſelf aſſured, was (and ſoon appeared to be) inherent in Perdiccas. For by his command were ten thouſand foot, and eight thouſand horſe, of thoſe which followed Python, levied; the Rulers of the Provinces carefully obeying the Letters of Perdiccas, by which they were enjoyned to give aſſiſtance to that buſineſs; and by virtue of the precept given unto them by Perdiccas, did the Macedonians cut in pieces all thoſe poor men who had yielded themſelves; leaving Python as naked as he came forth to return unto his great Maſter.

Now was Perdiccas mighty above the mighty, and had fair leiſure to purſue his hopes of marriage with Cleopatra, and thereby to make himſelf Lord of all: but this muſt be ſecretly carried for fear of oppoſition. How it ſucceeded, will appear when the Lamian War taketh ending.

SECT. V.

The Proceſs of the Lamian War.

WE left Antipater hardly beſieged, wanting means to free himſelf without ſuccours from his friends in Aſia. Thoſe helps not appearring ſo ſoon as he expected, he came to parley with Leoſthenes, and would have yielded unto any terms of reaſon, wherewith men poſſeſſed with hope of Victory, do ſeldom limit there deſires. Leoſthenes willed him without further circumſtance to ſubmit himſelf to diſcretion. This was too much for him that had once commanded over them, who now required of him ſuch a diſhonourable compoſition. Wherefore knowing that the extremity, from which as yet he was far enough, could bring no worſe with it, Antipater prepared for the defence; and the other for winning the Town, which felt great want of victuals.

In this lingering War the Ætolians (whether weary of ſitting ſtill at a ſiege, or having buſineſs which they pretended at home) took their leave, and returned into their own Country. Their departure left the trenches ſo thinly manned, that Antipater found means to ſally out upon his enemies to their great loſs: for many were ſlain, and Leoſthenes himſelf among them, ere he could be repulſed into the Town. Yet hereby the Macedonians were nothing relieved, their victuals waſted, and they were not ſtrong enough to deal with the Greeks in open fight. Craterus was long in coming. Lyſimachus, who was neareſt at hand in Thrace, had work too much of his own, leading no more than four thouſand foot, and two thouſand horſe, againſt Seuthas the Thracian King, who brought into the field above four times that number; and though Lyſimachus, not without loſs, had gotten one victory, yet the enemy abounding in multitude, felt not the blow ſo much as might abate his courage. Therefore Leonatus was earneſtly ſolicited by Antipater's friends, to make all haſte to the reſcue. He had the Government of Phrygia the leſs, and was able to raiſe an Army of more than twenty thouſand foot, and two thouſand five hundred horſe; whether levied out of his own Province, or appointed unto him out of the main Army, it is uncertain. Certain it is, that he was more willing to take in hand the journey into Greece, than Antipater was to have him come. For Cleopatra had written unto him, deſiring his preſence at Pella, the chief City of Macedon, and very kindly offering her ſelf to be his Wife; which letters he kept not ſo cloſe as had been requiſite, and therefore brought himſelf into great ſuſpicion, that ſoon ended with his life. Antiphilus, choſen General by the Athenians in place of Leoſthenes, hearing of his approach, forſook the ſiege of Lamia, and took the ready way to theſe great Conquerors of Aſia, with purpoſe to give them an evil welcome home, before Antipater and they ſhould joyn in one. He had (notwithſtanding the departure of the Ætolians) the advantage of Leonatus in horſe, by the odds of two thouſand Theſſalians; in other things he was equal with him; in caſe he thought himſelf Superiour, in the fortune of that day he proved ſo: for he wan a great victory (chiefly by virtue of the Theſſalians) which appeared the greater by the end of Leonatus himſelf; who fighting valiantly, was driven into a mariſh piece of ground, where he found his death, which he deſperately had fought among the Indians, but it waited for him at home, not far from the place of his nativity. He was the firſt of Alexander's Captains which died in battel; but all, or moſt of the reſt ſhall follow him the ſame way. After this day, the Athenians did never any thing ſuitable to their ancient glory.

The vanquiſhed Macedonians were too weak to renew the fight, and too proud to flee. They betook themſelves to high grounds unfit for ſervice on horſeback, and ſo abode in the ſight of the enemy that day; the day following, Antipater with his men came into their Camp, and took the charge of all. The Athenians perceiving their ſtrength to be at the

the greatest, and fearing lest that of the enemy should increase, did earnestly seek to determine the matter quickly by another battel. But still Antipater kept himself on ground of advantage; which gave more than reasonable confidence to the Greeks, many of whom departed to their homes, accounting the enemy to be vanquished. This wretchlesness (incorrigible in an Army of Voluntaries) was very inexcusable; seeing that the victories by Land were very much defaced by losses at Sea, where the Athenians, labouring to have made themselves once again Masters, were put to the worst.

But now the fatal captivity of Greece came on, of which she never could be delivered unto this day. Craterus with a strong Army having made great marches from Cilicia, passed over into Europe, and coming into Thessaly, joyned himself with Antipater. The forces of Leonatus, Antipater and Craterus being joyned in one, contained forty thousand weightily armed, three thousand light-armed men, and five thousand horse; of which numbers the Greeks wanted a thousand and five hundred in horse; in foot, eighteen thousand. Carefully therefore did Antiphilus labour to avoid the necessity of a battel, until such time as the Towns confederate should return unto the Camp those bands which straggled from it. But those companies were so slow in coming, and Antipater so urgent upon the Greeks, that compelled they were to put the matter in hazard without further attendance. Like enough it is, that with a little more help they had carried away the victory: for the Thessalians had the upper hand, and held it, until such time as they perceived their battels (over-laid with multitude) retire unto the higher ground, which caused them also to fall back. So the Macedonians became Lords of the field, having little else to boast of, considering that with the loss of an hundred and thirty men, they had only purchased the death of some five hundred enemies. Yet hereof was great use made: For the Greeks, as not subject unto the full command of one General, and being every one desirous to preserve his own Estate and City: concluded to make a treaty of peace with Antipater; who being a subtle Artificer, and well understanding their aptness to division, refused to hearken to any general composition, but willed every City to deal apart for it self. The intent of his device was so apparent, that it was rejected: the Greeks chusing rather to abide the coming of their assistants, whose unreasonable carelesness betrayed the cause. Antipater and Craterus besieging and winning some Towns in Thessaly, which the Army of the Confederates wanted means and courage to relieve, wearied that Nation from attending any longer upon other mens unlikely hopes, with their own assured and present calamity.

SECT. VI.

Of the peace granted to Athens by Antipater. Of Demosthenes his death.

THe Thessalians falling off, all the rest soon followed severally, and sued for peace; the gentle conditions given to the most forward, inviting such as were slack. Only the Athenians and Ætolians held out. Little favour could they hope for, having been Authors of this tumult; and their fear was not great; the seat of the war being far from them. But the celerity of Antipater confounded all their imaginations; who sate still at Athens, devising upon courses of prosecuting the War to come, which came to their doors before their consultation could find issue. He was ready to enter upon their Frontiers; they had no ability to resist, and were as heartless as friendless. All that remained was to send Ambassadours, desiring peace upon some good terms: necessity enforcing them to have accepted even the very worst. Phocion, with Demades the Orator, and Xenocrates the Philosopher, were chief of this Embassage; Phocion, as the most honourable; Demades as a strong perswader (both of them well respected by Antipater) and Xenocrates, as one admired for wisdom, gravity of manners and virtues; but all these ornaments consisting in speculation, and therefore of less regard, when their admiration was to cost them much in real effects.

Antipater calling to mind the pride of Leosthenes, required of the Athenians, that they should wholly submit themselves to his pleasure; which being (perforce) granted, he commanded them to defray the charges of the War past, to pay a fine, and entertain a Garrison. Further, he abrogated the popular estate, committing the Government of the City to those of most wealth, depriving of the right of suffrage all such as wanted a convenient proportion of riches

About nine thousand they were, all men of good substance, to whom the administration of the Common-wealth was given; a number great enough to retain the name and form of a Democracy. But the rascal multitude of beggarly persons, accustomed to get their livings out of the common troubles, being now debarred from bearing offices and giving their voyces, cryed out, that this was a meer Oligarchy, the violent usurpation of a few encroaching upon the publick right. These turbulent fellows (of whom King Philip had been wont to say, That war to them was peace, and peace war) Antipater planted in Thrace, and gave them Lands to manure; leaving as few of them as he could to molest the quiet of Athens.

To the same end (yet withal for satisfying his own suspicions and hatred) he caused Demosthenes and Hyperides famous Orators, with some others, to be slain. Had the death of these two, especially of Demosthenes, been forborn, the rest of his proceedings in this action might well have passed for very mild; whereas now, all such as either are delighted with the Orations of Demosthenes, or have surrendred their judgements to Authors justly admiring him, as the most eloquent of all that ever did speak and write, condemn him utterly, calling him a bloody Tyrant. Such grace and reputation do the Learned Arts find in all Civil Nations, that the evil done to a man, famous in one of them, is able to blemish any action, how good soever otherwise it be, or honourably carried.

Demosthenes had taken Sanctuary in the Temple of Neptune, in the Isle of Calauria; there did Archias (sent with Souldiers by Antipater for the purpose) find him, and gently perswaded him to leave the place; but not so prevailing, he threatned violence. Then Demosthenes intreating a little respite, as it had been to write somewhat, secretly ſecretly took poyſon, which he had kept for ſuch a neceſſity, and ſo died; rather chuſing to do the laſt execution upon himſelf, than to fall into the hands of ſuch as hated him. Only this act of his (commendable perhaps in a Heathen man) argued ſome valour in him; who was otherwiſe too much a coward in battel, howſoever valiant in perſwading to enterprizes, wherein the way to very honourable ends was to be made through paſſages exceeding dangerous. He loved money well, and had great ſums given him by the Perſian, to encourage him, in finding work for the Macedonians at home. Neither did he ill (me thinks) in taking from the Perſians which loved not his Country, great rewards, for ſpeaking ſuch things as tended to his Countries good; which he did not ceaſe to procure, when the Perſians were no longer able to give him recompence. Such as in tender contemplation of his death can endure no honourable, though true, mention of Antipater, may (if they can) believe Lucian, who tells us, That it was Antipater's purpoſe to have done him great honour. Sure it is, that he was a ſtedfaſt enemy to the Macedonians; therefore diſcretion required that he ſhould be cut off.

The matters of Athens being thus ordered, the chief command was left in the hands of Phocion, a virtuous man, lover of his Country, yet applying himſelf to the neceſſity of the times; by which commendations he had both at other times done the City much good, and now procured this peace, which (though grievous to free men, yet favourable to the vanquiſhed) he endeavoured carefully to preſerve.

SECT. VII.

How Craterus and Antipater were drawn from their Ætolian wars into Aſia. The ground of the firſt civil war between the Macedonian Lords.

SO Antipater with Craterus returned into Macedonia, where they ſtrengthened their friendſhip with a new alliance; Craterus taking Phila, the Daughter of Antipater to Wife.

Shortly after they went againſt the Ætolians, whoſe poverty was not ſo eaſily daunted, as the luxurious wealth of the more powerful State of Athens had been. Their Country was rough and mountainous, having many places of great faſtneſs, into which they conveyed ſuch of their goods as they moſt eſteemed, and of their people, as were leaſt fit for War: with the reſt they fortified the ſtrongeſt of their Cities, and ſo abode the coming of the Macedonians, whom they manfully reſiſted. With great obſtinacy did the Macedonians contend againſt the difficulties of the places, which the Ætolians made good as long as their victuals held out. But when Craterus had ſhut up all paſſages, and utterly debarred them of of relief, then were they put to a miſerable choice; either to deſcend from their ſtrong holds, and fight upon equal ground, with unequal numbers, or to endure the miſeries of hunger and cold, againſt which they could make no long reſiſtance; or to yield themſelves to the Macedonians, who, incenſed by the loſs of many good Souldiers, were not like to leave ſo ſtubborn enemies in places which might give confidence to Rebellion. In caſe of extremity much fineneſs of wit apprehending all circumſtances of danger, commonly doth more hurt than a blunt conſideration of that only which at the preſent is in hand. Theſe Ætolians did not as yet want meat; but their enemies daily moleſted them: wherefore as yet they thought upon nothing but fighting. Fortune was gracious to their courage. For ſuch news came out of Aſia into the Macedonian Camp as made Antipater and Craterus think every hour a month, till they had rid their hands of theſe Ætolians, giving them whatſoever conditions they would ask: yet with purpoſe to call them to a ſevere account; yea, to root them out of Greece by death or by captivity, when once they ſhould have ſettled the affairs of Aſia; as they hoped and deſired. But of mens purpoſes God is diſpoſer: in whoſe high Counſel it was ordained, that that poor Nation ſhould continue a troubleſome bar to the proceedings of Macedon and Greece, and (when time had ripened the next Monarchy) an open gate to let the Roman Conquerors into thoſe and other Provinces. Likewiſe concerning the matters of Aſia, the reformation intended by Antipater and Craterus, was ſo far from taking effect, that it ſerved meerly as an introduction to all the civil Wars enſuing.

The grounds of the Aſiatique Expedition, which did ſet the world in an uproar, were theſe. Antipater and Craterus were of Alexander's Captains the mightieſt in reputation: The one, in regard of his ancient preſidency, and the preſent rule which he bare in the parts of Europe. The other, as of all men the beſt beloved, and moſt reſpected, both of Alexander and of the whole Army. Next unto theſe had Perdiccas been; whom the advantage of his preſence at the King's death did make equal, or ſuperiour, to either of theſe, if not to both together. The firſt intents of Perdiccas were, to have conſorted with theſe two, and to have been with them a third partner in the Government of all; to which purpoſe he entertained the diſcourſe of marriage with one of Antipater's Daughters. But feeling in ſhort ſpace the ſtrength of that gale of wind which bore him up, he began to take wing and ſoar quite another way. Arideus was a very ſimple man, yet ſerved well enough to wear the title of that Majeſty, whereof Perdiccas being Adminiſtrator, and hoping to become Proprietary, the practice was more ſevere than had been in the days of Alexander: the deſire to ſeem terrible, being very familiar with weak Princes, and their ambitious Officers, who knew no other means of preſerving themſelves from contempt, and of giving ſuch a fiery luſtre to their Actions, as may dazle the eyes of the beholders. How cruelly the poor Greeks in the higher Aſia were all put to the ſword; and how tyrannouſly the King and Princes of Cappadocia were crucified, hath already been ſhewed. The Piſidians were the next who felt the wrath of the counterfeit Alexanders. One City of theirs was utterly razed; the children ſold for ſlaves, and all the reſt maſſacred. The Iſaurians, by this example grown deſperate, when after two or three days trial they found themſelves unable to continue the defence, lockt themſelves into their houſes, and ſet the Town on fire, into the flame whereof the young men did throw themſelves, after that they had a while repelled the Macedonians from the walls.

Theſe exploits being performed, the Army had no other work than to ſift the aſhes of the burnt City for gold and ſilver; but Perdiccas had

buſineſs of greater importance troubling his brains. Nothing was more contrary to his ends, than to ſit ſtill without employment, letting his Souldiers grow idle about him, whilſt others grew great, and took deep root in their ſeveral Provinces. He purpoſed therefore to tranſport his forces into Europe, under pretence of bringing the King into Macedonia, the ſeat of his Anceſtors, and head of the Empire. The King's preſence would make the Offices of his Vice-roys (during the time) actually void; Antipater with Craterus being once in caſe of private men, and only Perdiccas holding authority, the match with Cleopatra might eaſily be made. So ſhould greatneſs meet with a good title; and what more could be wiſhed? Some impediment the power of Ptolomy might give, who held Egypt well fortified with men, but much better with love of the people; yet if the buſineſs proſpered in Macedonia, like enough it was that either Ptolomy would follow of himſelf, or be driven to come to reaſon. Antigonus likewiſe then Governing in Phrygia, a buſie headed man, and ill affected to the ſide, was to be looked into and made away, for fear of further trouble. So thought Perdiccas, and was deceived in ſo thinking. Antigonus was as good a man of War, of as deep a judgement, as high a ſpirit, and as great undertaking, as any of Alexander's Captains. His employments had been leſs than ſome of theirs, which made him alſo the leſs reſpected. But his thoughts were as proud as theirs: for he valued himſelf by his own worth, not by the opinions of other men: with careful attention had he watched Perdiccas, and ſounded the depth of his purpoſes, which it was now high time to diſcover. For Perdiccas having with a jealous eye pryed into the demeanour of Antigonus, and finding him no way fit for his turn, cauſed him to be charged with ſuch accuſations, as might ſuffice to take away his life, eſpecially by a Judge that ſought his death. This device Antigonus would not ſeem to perceive, but prepared himſelf in ſhew to make anſwer, indeed, to make eſcape; which eaſily he did, putting himſelf and his Son Demetrius aboard of ſome Athenian Gallies, that carried him to Antipater, laden with ſuch tidings as finiſhed the Ætolian War before mentioned.

As the coming of Antigonus made Craterus and Antipater manifeſtly perceive their own danger: ſo his flight gave Perdiccas to underſtand that his intentions were laid open, and muſt now be juſtified by the ſword. Therefore he prepared as faſt as he could, not only for defence, but (as having on his ſide the King's name) to meet with them at home, who were nothing ſlack in providing to encounter him. Ptolomy being advertiſed of theſe proceedings, and conſidering how nearly they concerned him, ſided with Antipater. To his Government of Egypt he had annexed the Dominion of Cyrene, not without conſent of the chief Citizens; and now in the midſt of theſe garboyls he celebrated the funeral of Alexander with great ſolemnity, purchaſing thereby to himſelf much good will and many partakers, notwithſtanding the terrible report of the King's Army coming againſt him.

Perdiccas his voyage into Egypt, and his death.

Perdiccas, uncertain which way to bend his main power, at length reſolved to ſet upon Ptolomy; leaving Eumenes to keep to his uſe, againſt Craterus and Antipater, the parts of Aſia bordering upon Europe.

It may ſeem ſtrange, that he did not rather make head againſt thoſe who were to come out of Greece with a great number, and of more able men than Ptolomy could bring. Perhaps he thought to make a quick end with Ptolomy; or believed that Craterus would not be ready for him ſoon enough. Sure it is, that he took a bad courſe and made it worſe with ill handling.

Ptolomy by his ſweet behaviour allured many to his party, without help of any bad arts. Perdiccas contrariwiſe was full of inſolency, which never fails to be rewarded with hatred; which is truly defined, An affection founded upon opinion of an unjuſt contempt. The whole ſtory of his proceedings in Egypt is not worth relation: for he did nothing of importance; but (as a wilful man) tired his followers, and waſted them in hard enterprizes without ſucceſs. His moſt forceable attempt was upon a Town, called the Camels Wall: thither he marched by night, with more haſte than good ſpeed; for Ptolomy preventing him, did put himſelf into the place, where behaving himſelf not only as a good Commander, but as a ſtout Souldier, he gave the foil to Perdiccas, cauſing him to retire with loſs, after a vehement, but vain aſſault, continued one whole day. The night following, Perdiccas made another journey (which was his laſt) and came to the diviſions of Nilus, over againſt Memphis. There with much difficulty he began to paſs over his Army into an Iſland, where he meant to encamp. The current was ſtrong, the water deep, and hardly foordable. Wherefore he placed his Elephants above the paſſage, to break the violence of the ſtream, and his horſemen beneath it, to take up ſuch as were carried away by ſwiftneſs of water. A great part of his Army being arrived on the further bank, the channel began to wax deep; ſo that whereas the former companies had waded up to the chin, they who ſhould have followed could find no footing. Whether this came by the riſing of the water, or ſlitting away of the ground; (the earth being broken with the feet of ſo many Men, Horſe and Elephants) no remedy there was, but ſuch as had paſſed muſt repaſs again, as well as they might for they were too weak for the enemy, and could not be relieved by their fellows. With great confuſion therefore they committed themſelves to the River, wherein above two thouſand of them periſhed, a thouſand were devoured by Crocodiles, a miſerable ſpectacle even to ſuch as were out of danger; ſuch as were ſtrong and could ſwim, recovered the Camp; many were carried down the ſtream, and driven to the contrary bank, whereby they fell into the hands of their enemies.

This misfortune exaſperated the Souldiers againſt their General, giving liberty to their tongues, which long time had concealed the evil thoughts of their hearts. While they were thus murmuring, news came from Ptolomy, which did ſet them in an up-roar. Ptolomy had not only shewed much compassion on those who fell into his hands alive, but performed all rights of Funeral to the dead carcasses, which the River had cast upon his side: and finally, sent their bones and ashes to be interred by their Kinsmen or Friends. This did not only move the common Souldiers, but made the Captains fall into mutiny, thinking it unreasonable to make war upon so virtuous and honourable a person, to fulful the pleasure of a Lordly ambitious man, using them like slaves. The sedition growing strong, wanted only a head, which it quickly found. Python was there, who inwardly hated Perdiccas, for the disgrace which he had suffered by his procurement, after the Victory upon the rebellious Greeks. Python had lived in honourable place about Alexander; he was in the division of the Provinces made Governour of Media; he had followed Perdiccas, and being in all things (the Protectorship excepted) equal to him, had nevertheless been scornfully used by him, which now he requited. Drawing together a hundred of the Captains, and a good part of the Horse, which consisted of the Gentry (the footmen having declared themselves before) he entred the Tent of Perdiccas, where without further circumstance they all ran upon him, and slew him. Such end had the proud mis-governing authority of Perdiccas. He might have lived as great as any, could he have suffered any as great as himself; yea, peradventure Master of all, had he not been too masterly over those which were already his.

The next day Ptolomy came into the Camp, where he was joyfully received; he excused himself of things past, as not having been Author, or given cause of the War, and was easily believed: the favour of the Army being such toward him, that needs they would have made him Protector in the room of Perdiccas. But this he refused. It was an Office fit for one that would seek to increase his greatness with his trouble. Ptolomy was well enough already, wherefore, for his own quiet he forbare to accept it, and for their well-deserving of him, he procured that honourable charge to Python, and to Arideus the Captain, who having had some Companies of Souldiers, to furnish with their attendance the solemnities of Alexander's Funerals, did with them adhere to him against Perdiccas.

In the midst of these businesses came news of two great Victories obtained by Eumenes; which news, had they arrived two or three days sooner, had been entertained with joyful acclamations; and would have given such reputation to Perdiccas, as had caused both his private maligners to continue his open flatterers, and his open enemies to have accepted any tolerable composition. But these good tidings coming in ill time, when death had stopped the ears which would have given them welcome, found bad acceptance, as shall be shewed hereafter.

SECT. IX.

Victories of Eumenes in the lower Asia.

BEfore we proceed in the relation of things happening about the person of the King, it is meet that we speak of those businesses in the lower Asia, which were handled by Eumenes with notable dexterity, whilst Perdiccas was occupied in the Egyptian Wars. Alcetas the Brother of Perdiccas, and Neoptolemus, had received command from Perdiccas to be assistant to Eumenes, and to follow his directions. But Alcetas made flat answer that he would not; alledging the backwardness of his men to bear Arms against so great a person as Antipater, and a man so much honoured as Craterus. Neoptolemus was content to make fair shew, but inwardly he repined at the precedency given to Eumenes, as thinking himself the better man. Eumenes discovering, through the counterfeited looks of Neoptolemus, the mischief lurking in his heart, wisely dissembled with him, in hope to win him by gentle behaviour, and sweet language, that commonly are lost, when bestowed upon arrogant creatures. Yet the better to fortifie himself, that he might stand upon his own strength, he raised out of the Countries under his jurisdiction, about six thousand Horse, giving many priviledges to such as were serviceable; and training them well up. Not without great need. For when upon advertisement of the great preparations made by Craterus and Antipater (who had newly passed the Hellespont) for the invasion of his Provinces, he willed Neoptolemus to come to him with all his power; Neoptolemus did (indeed) advance, but in hostile manner, though unprovoked, presented him Battel. Neoptolemus had secretly covenanted with Antipater to lay open the way for him to the Conquest of Asia, which now intending to perform, he was shamefully disappointed. For, though his foot-men, being all Macedonians, had much the better, and prevailed far upon Eumenes his Battels; yet were his horse driven out of the field, and himself compelled, with a few of them, to run away, leaving naked the backs of his Macedonian foot-men to be charged by Eumenes, who forced them in such wise, that casting down their Pikes, they cried for mercy, and gladly took their oath to do him faithful service. Antipater and Craterus endeavoured with many goodly promises to draw Eumenes into their society, who contrariwise offered himself as a mean of reconciliation, between Perdiccas and Craterus, whom he dearly loved; professing withal his hatred to Antipater, and constant faith to the cause which he had undertaken to maintain.

Whilst these negotiations were on foot, Neoptolemus came with his broken crew to Antipater, and his Associates, vilifying Eumenes, and calling him a Scribe (at which foolish railing they laught) but extolling the virtue of Craterus (as well he might) with high commendations; assuring them, that if Craterus did but once appear, or that his voice were but heard by any Macedonian in Eumenes his Camp, the Victory was won; for they would all forthwith revolt unto him. Earnestly therefore he desired them to give him aid against Eumenes, and especially requested that Craterus might have the leading of the Army to be sent. Their own affections did easily lead them to condescend to his motion: good hope there was, that the reputation of Craterus might prevail as much as the force which he drew along. For he had in the midſt of Alexander's vanities, when others (imitating their King) betook themſelves to the Perſian faſhions of garments and cuſtoms, retained the ancient Macedonian form of behaviour, and apparrel; whereby he became very gracious with the common Souldiers, who beheld theſe new tricks of Aſia with diſcontented eyes, as reproachful and derogatory to the manners of their native Country. So Antipater took the way toward Cilicia, to hold Perdiccas at bay, and to joyn with Ptolomy. Craterus uſed great celerity, to have taken Eumenes revelling (as he hoped) according to the common faſhion of Captains, after a great Victory. But he had a wary and well adviſed enemy to encounter, who kept good eſpial upon him, and with much wiſdom fore-ſaw all that was to be feared, and the means of prevention, which his courage did not fail to execute. Eumenes was not ignorant that Craterus was able to defeat him without Battel, yea without ſtroke; him therefore he feared more than the Army following him: (yet the Army following him were ſuch as much exceeded his own foot-men, but was inferiour in horſe-men) and thought it more uneaſie to keep the Macedonians from revolting to him, than from knowing him. Hereupon he took in hand a ſtrange piece of work, which deſperation of all courſes elſe taught him, and wiſe managing proſperouſly accompliſhed. He gave out reports, that Neoptolemus was returned with ſuch company as he could gather together, and had gotten Pigres (a Captain of no great eſtimation, who lay not far off) to joyn with him. Having animated his men againſt Neoptolemus, whom he knew to be deſpiſed and hated among them, (as having been vanquiſhed by ſome of them, and forſaken others in plain field, whilſt they valiantly fought in his quarrel) he took great care to keep them from receiving any intelligence of the enemies matters. Peremptorily he commanded that no meſſenger nor trumpeter ſhould be admitted; and not herewith ſatisfied, he placed againſt Craterus no one Macedonian, nor any other, that much would have regarded him, had he been known: but Thracians, Cappadocians and Perſians, under the leading of ſuch, as thought more highly of none, than of Perdiccas and himſelf. To theſe alſo he give in charge, that without ſpeaking or hearkening to any word, they ſhould run upon the enemy; and give him no leiſure to ſay, or do any thing but fight. The directions which he gave to others, he did not fail to execute in his own perſon: but placing himſelf in the right wing of his Battel, oppoſite to Neoptolemus, who (as he underſtood) conducted the left wing on the contrary ſide, he held the Macedonians arranged in good order, and ready to charge the enemy as ſoon as the diſtance would give leave. A riſing piece of ground lay between them, which having aſcended, the Armies diſcovered each other: but that of Eumenes every way prepared for the fight, the other wearied with long journeys, which overhaſtily they had made, ſeeking the deceitful iſſue of frivolous hopes. Then was it high time for Craterus (having failed in ſurpriſing them as enemies) to diſcover himſelf to his old friends, and fellow-ſouldiers, of whom he could ſee none. Phœnix a Tenidian, and Artabazus a Perſian, had the leading of that ſide, who, mindful of their inſtructions, began to give battel upon him, with ſuch countenance as told him his error; which to redeem, he bad his men fight, and redeem the day, and take the ſpoil to themſelves; but the Bear, whoſe skin he ſells, is not yet caught. The ground whereon the Battel was fought, gave moſt advantage to the horſe, who encountred very roughly on all parts: eſpecially about Eumenes and Neoptolemus; who, as ſoon as they had diſcovered one another, could not contain themſelves, but with great rage met body to body, and letting looſe their bridles, grappled ſo violently together, that their horſes ran from under them, leaving both of them tumbling on the ground. Neoptolemus roſe firſt up; but Eumenes had his ſword firſt drawn, wherewith he houghed the other, cauſing him to fall down and fight upon one knee. In this conflict they received many wounds, but Neoptolemus giving ſlight ones, took ſuch as were deadly, by which he died in the place, and there was (being half-dead, half-alive) ſtripped by his mortal enemy, whoſe revilings he requited, lying even at the laſt gaſp, with one wound in the groin, dangerous had it not wanted force. The death of Neoptolemus cauſed his followers to run away upon the ſpurr, and ſeek ſhelter behind the Battels of their Foot. They were nothing hotly purſued. For Eumenes pained himſelf to carry ſuccour to his left wing, which he ſuſpected much to be diſtreſſed; but found accompanied with the ſame fortune, that had aſſiſted him when he fought in perſon. Craterus had gallantly born himſelf a while, and ſuſtained the impreſſion of Artabazus and Phœnix with more courage than force; holding it nothing agreeable with his honour to retire and protract the fight, when he was charged by men of little eſtimation or note. Otherwiſe it is not unlikely that he might have either carried the day, or preſerved himſelf to a better adventure by giving ground, as the reſt (when he and Neoptolemus were ſlain) did. But whilſt he ſought to preſerve his reputation, he loſt his life by the fall of his Horſe, or his falling from his Horſe, through force of a wound received; upon which accident he was trampled under foot by many that knew him not, and ſo periſhed unknown, till it was too late to know it. Eumenes coming to the place where he lay, made great lamentation, as having always loved and honoured Craterus, of whoſe death he was now become the inſtrument. The vanquiſhed Army entertained a treaty of peace with Eumenes, making ſhew of willingneſs to become his followers; but their intent was only to refreſh themſelves, which (by his permiſſion) having done, they ſtole away by night, and fled towards Antipater.

This Battel fought within ten days of the former, wan to Eumenes more reputation than good will: for his own Souldiers took the death of Craterus heavily; and the Armies lying further off were inraged with the news. But other matters there were which incenſed men againſt him, beſides the death of Craterus, whereof it manifeſtly appeared, that he was as ſorry as any that pretended greater heavineſs. His Army wanted pay. This was a great fault; which he wiſely amended, by giving to them the ſpoil of ſuch Towns as were ill affected to him. So he redeemed the love of his own men, who of their meer motion appointed unto him a Guard for defence of his perſon. Others were not ſo eaſie to be reconciled. They who had been Traitors to Perdiccas, hated him for his faithfulneſs, as greatly, as they thought he would hate them for their falſhood; neither found they any fairer way of excuſing their late revolt, than by accuſing and condemning the ſide which they had forſaken. Wherefore they proclaimed Eumenes a Traitor, and condemned him to dye: but it was an eaſier matter to give that ſentence, than to put it in execution.

SECT. X.

Quarrels between Eurydice the Queen, and Python the Protector. Python reſigns his Office, into which Antipater is choſen.

Python and Arideus being choſen Protectors of King Arideus, and the children of Alexander; took the way to Aſia the leſs, conducting the Army thorow Syria. Of theſe two, Python was the greater in reputation, yet far too weak to ſuſtain ſo important a Charge. For Eurydice, wife to King Arideus, was come to her husband, a Lady of a maſculine ſpirit, well underſtanding what ſhe was or ſhould be, and thinking her ſelf able to ſupport the weight which fortune laid upon her fooliſh husband, being due to her own title. Her mother Cyna, Siſter to Alexander, by her Father King Philip, was married (as hath been ſhewed) to Amyntas, who was the right Heir to the Kingdom of Macedon, being the only Son of King Perdiccas, Philip's elder Brother.

This Cyna was a warlike woman; ſhe had led Armies, and (as a true Siſter of Alexander) fighting hand to hand with Ceria, Queen of the Phrygians, a Virago, like unto her ſelf, had ſlain her. She brought up this Eurydice in the ſame unwomanly Art of War, who now among the Souldiers began to put in practice the rudiments of her education, to the ſmall contentment of Python, that could not brook her too curious intermedling in his charge. Whether it were ſo, that Python had ſome purpoſe to advance the Son of Alexander by Roxane, to the Kingdom, (as once he had ſought to do) or whether the Queen did ſuſpect him of ſome ſuch intent; or whether only deſire of rule cauſed her to quarrel with him; quarrel ſhe did, which diſturbed the proceeding againſt Eumenes. The Army having ſhaken off ſuch a rank-rider as Perdiccas, would not afterward be reigned with a twined thred. Python bearing himſelf upon his office took upon him to give directions in the King's name, which the Queen did oftentimes control, uſing the ſame name with more authority, and better liking of the Souldiers. Python ſeeing this, would needs reſign his office, whether upon wearineſs of the contentions daily growing, or on purpoſe to bring the Queen into envy, it is uncertain. Perhaps he thought, that now being the far worthieſt man in the Camp, he ſhould be intreated to retain the place, and have his Authority confirmed, or (as might be) increaſed, were it but for want of a fit Succeſſor. Eurydice was nothing ſorry at this courſe; for now ſhe thought to manage the affairs of the Empire at her own will, being freed from the troubleſome aſſiſtance of a Protector. But the Souldiers diſappointed both her and Python of their contrary expectations; chuſing Antipater, the only powerful man of Alexander's Captains, then living, into the room of Python. Hereat the Queen fretted exceedingly, and began to deal earneſtly with the Macedonians, that they ſhould acknowledge no Lord, ſave only the King their Soveraign. Yet ſhe failed of her purpoſe, being hindred (as may ſeem) by three things: the apparent weakneſs of her husband; the growth of Alexander's children, who (though born of out-landiſh women) were bred in the Macedonian Camp; and the mightineſs of Antipater, who commanding a great Army near at hand, arrived in few days at the Camp, and enforced Eurydice to hold her ſelf content. Antipater was of ſuch power, that he needed not to work by any cloſe deviſes, as Perdiccas had done: he had no concurrents, all the Governours of Provinces that remained alive, acknowledged him their better; yea many of them he diſplaced out of hand, putting other in their rooms. This done, he took the King, Queen and Princes along with him into Macedonia, leaving Antigonus General of the Royal Army: to whom for his good ſervices done, and to be done againſt Eumenes, he gave the rule of Suſiana, beſides his former Provinces, and committed into his hands the Govrnment of Aſia during that War.

SECT. XI.

Anitigonus Lieutenant of Aſia, wins a Battel of Eumenes, and beſieged him in Nora: He vanquiſheth other followers of Perdiccas.

HEre begins the greatneſs of Antigonus, whoſe power in few years over-growing the reſt, wanted little of ſpreading it ſelf over the whole Monarchy. He was to make War upon Eumenes, Alcetus the Brother, and Attalus the Brother-in-law to Perdiccas: work enough to keep his Army employed in the publick ſervice, till ſuch time as he might find occaſion to make uſe of it in his own buſineſs. The firſt of theſe which he undertook, was Eumenes, with whom Alcetus and Attalus refuſed to joyn, having unreaſonably contended with him in time of common danger about the chief place. Eumenes had an Army ſtrong in number, courage, and all needful proviſions; but obedient only at diſcretion. Therefore Antigonus tried all ways of corrupting his Souldiers; tempting firſt the whole Army with Letters: which practice failing by the cunning of Eumenes (who made ſhew as if he himſelf had ſcattered abroad thoſe Letters to try the faith of his men) he dealt apart with ſuch Captains as he thought moſt eaſie to be won. Of theſe Captains one rebelled, breaking out too haſtily before any help was near him, yet looking ſo careleſly to himſelf, that he and his were ſurprized, when he thought his enemies far off. Another follower of Eumenes (or rather of good fortune, which he thought now to be in company with Antigonus) kept his treachery ſecret, reſerving it for the time of execution. Upon confidence of the treaſon which this falſe man Apollonides, had undertaken. Antigonus preſented battel to Eumenes; in the heat whereof Apollonides, General of the Horſe to Eumenes, fled over to the contrary ſide, with ſuch as he could get to follow him, but was cloſely followed by ſome, whoſe company he deſired not. Eumenes perceiving the irrecoverable miſchief which this traiterous practice had brought upon him, purſued the villain, and cut him off before he could thruſt himſelf into the Troops of Antigonus, and boaſt of his treachery. This was ſome comfort to Eumenes in the loſs of his Battel, which diſabled him utterly to keep the field, and left it, very hard for him to make a ſafe retreat. Yet one one thing he did which much amazed his enemies, and (though a matter of small importance) caused Antigonus himself to admire his high resolution. It was held no small part of the Victory, to get possession of the dead bodies. Eumenes, whilst Antigonus held him in chase, turned out of the way, and fetching a compass, returned to the place where the Battel had been fought; there he burned (according to the manner of the time) the bodies of his own men, and interred the bones and ashes of the Captains and common Souldiers apart, raising up heaps of earth as mountains over them, and so went his way. As this bold adventure bred in the Macedonians (returned to their Camp) great admiration of his brave spirit: so the news which Menander (who was set to look unto their carriages) brought and published among them, enticed them to love him as their honourable friend. He had found Menander in an open Plain, careless, as after an assured Victory, and loaden with the spoils of many Nations, the rewards of their long service; all which he might have taken: but fearing lest such a purchase should prove a heavy burthen to him, whose chief hope consisted in swift expedition, he gave secret warning to Menander to flee to the Mountains, whilst he detained his men (whom authority could not have restrained) by this sleight, setting them to bait their horses. The Macedonians extolled him for this courtesie, as a noble Gentleman, that had forborn when it lay in his power to strip them out of all their wealth, and make their children slaves, and to ravish their wives: but Antigonus told them, that he had not forborn to do this out of any good will to them; but of meer subtilty had avoided those precious Fetters, which would have hindred his speedy flight. He told them true. For Eumenes did not only think all carriages to be over-burthensome, but the number of his men to be more troublesome than available in his intended course. Wherefore he sent them from him as fast as he could, wishing them to shift for themselves; and retaining only five hundred horse, and two hundred foot. When he had wearied Antigonus a while in following him up and down, he came to Nora, where again keeping about him no more than necessity required to make good the place, he lovingly dismissed all the rest. Nora was a little Fortress in Lycaonia and Cappadocia, so strongly situated, that it seemed impregnable, and so well victualled and stored with all necessaries, that it might hold out for many years. Thither did Antigonus follow him, with more desire to make him his friend, than to vanquish him in War. To this purpose he entertained parley with him, but in vain. For, whereas Antigonus offered him pardon and his love; Eumenes required restitution of his Provinces, which could not be granted without Antipater's consent. Then was Nora closed up; where Antigonus leaving sufficient strength for continuance of the Siege, took his Journey into Pisidia against Alcetus and Attalus, with whom he made short work. He came upon them unexpected, and seised on passages, which wanted not men, but such a Captain as Eumenes, to have defended them. Alcetus and Attalus, as they had been too secure before his coming, so were they too adventurous in fighting at the first sight upon all disadvantages, and their folly was attended with suitable event. Attalus, with many principal Captains was taken; Alcetus fled to the City of Termessus, where the love of the younger sort toward him was so vehement, that stopping their ears against all perswasions of the ancient men, they needs would hazard their lives, and their Country in his defence. Yet this availed him nothing: for the Governours of the Town having secretly compounded with Antigonus, caused the young men to sally out; and using the time of advantage, they with their servants did set upon Alcetus, who unable to resist, slew himself. His dead body was conveyed to Antigonus, and by him barbarously torn, was cast forth without burial. When Antigonus was gone, the young men interred the Carkass with solemn Funerals, having once been minded to set on Fire their Town in revenge of his death. Such favour had he purchased with courteous liberality. But, to make an able General, one virtue, how great soever is insufficient.

SECT. XII.

Ptolomy wins Syria and Phœnicia. The death of Antipater.

WHilst these things were in doing, the rest of the Princes lay idle, rather seeking to enjoy their Governments for the present, than to confirm or enlarge them. Only Ptolomy looking abroad, wan all Syria and Phœnicia: an action of great importance, but not remarkable for any circumstance in the managing. He sent a Lieutenant with an Army, who quickly took Laomedon prisoner, that ruled there by appointment of Antipater, and formerly of Perdiccas; but (as may seem) without any great strength of Souldiers, far from Assistants, and vainly relying upon the Authority which had given him that Province, and was now occupied with greater cares, than with seeking to maintain him in his office.

Antipater was old and sickly, desirous of rest, and therefore contented to let Antigonus pursue the dispatch of those businesses in Asia. He had with him Polysperchon, one of the most ancient of Alexander's Captains, that had lately suppressed a dangerous insurrection of the Ætolians, which Nation had stirred in the quarrel of Perdiccas, prevailing far at the first, but soon losing all that they had gained, whilst Antipater was abroad in his Cilician Expedition. In this Polysperchon, Antipater did repose great confidence; so far forth, that (suspecting the youth of his own Son Cassander of insufficiency in so great a charge) he bequeathed unto him on his death-bed the Government of Macedon and Greece, together with the office of Protectorship. So Antipater died, being fourscore years old, having always travelled in the great affairs of mighty Princes, with such reputation, that Alexander in all his greatness was jealous of him, and the Successors of Alexander did either quietly give place unto him, or were unfortunate in making oppositions. In his private qualities, he was a subtle man, temperate, frugal, and of a Philosophical behaviour, not unlearned, as having been Scholar to Aristotle, and written some Histories. He had been much molested by Olympias, Alexander's Mother; whom after the death of her Son, he compelled to abstain from coming into Macedonia, or intermedling in matters of State: yea, at his own death he gave especial direction, that no woman should be permitted to deal in the administration of the Empire. But this precept was soon forgotten; and yet, e're long, by sorrowful experience approved to have been sound and good.

SECT. XIII.

Of Polysperchon, who succeeded unto Antipater in the Protectorship. The insurrection of Cassander against him.

Polysperchon was very skilful in the Art of War, having long time been Apprentice in that occupation; other qualities, requisite in so high an Office as he under-went, either Nature had not given to him, or Time had robbed him of them. He managed his business more formally than wisely, as a man of a second wit, fitter to assist, than command in chief. At the first entrance upon the Stage, he called to council all his friends, wherein for weighty considerations (as they who weighed not the contrary reasons held them) the Queen Olympias was revoked out of Epirus into Macedon, that the presence of Alexander's Mother might countenance and strengthen their proceedings. For, the condition of the times requiring, that the Governors of Provinces abroad should keep greater Armies, than were needful or easie to be retained about the person of the King in Macedonia; it seemed expedient, that the face of the Court should be filled with all Majesty, that might give authority to the Injunctions from thence proceeding, and by an awful regard contain within the limited bounds of duty such as could not by force have been kept in order, being strong, and lying too far off.

Such care was taken for prevention of imaginary dangers and out of sight, whilst present mischiefs lay unregarded in their bosoms. Cassander, the Son of Antipater, was not able to discover that great sufficiency in Polysperchon, for which his Father had reposed in him so much confidence: neither could he discern such odds in the quality of himself and Polysperchon, as was in their fortune. He was left Captain of one thousand; which Office by practice of those times was of more importance, than the Title now seems to imply. He should thereby have been as Camp-master, or Lieutenant-General to the other: a place no way satisfying his ambition, that thought himself the better man. Therefore he began to examine his own power, and compare it with the forces likely to oppose him. All that had relyed on his Father, were his own assured, especially such as commanded the Garrisons bestowed in the principal Cities of Greece. The like hope was of the Magistrates, and others of principal authority, in those Commonweals, whose forms had been corrected by Antipater, that they would follow the side, and draw in many partakers: it concerned these men in their own particular to adhere unto the Captains, by whom their faction was up-held; and by whom the rascal multitude, covetous of re-gaining the Tyrannous power which they had formerly exercised over the principal Citizens, were kept in order, obeying their betters perforce. Besides all these helps, Cassander had the secret love of Queen Eurydice, who had in private rendred him such courtesie, as was due only to her Husband. But neither the Queens favour, nor all his other possibilities, gave him confidence to break out into open rebellion; because he saw Polysperchon much reverenced among the Macedonians, and strong enough to suppress him, before he could have made head. Therefore he made shew of following his pleasures in the Countrey, and calling many of his friends about him, under pretence of hunting, advised with them upon the safest course, and most free from all suspicion. The necessity was apparent of raising an Army, before the business was set on foot; and to do this, opportunity presented him with fair means. Ptolomy had by fine force, without any commission, annexed Syria to his Government of Egypt and Cyrene: this was too much either for the King to trust him with, or for him to part with. Antigonus upon the first news of Antipater's death, began to lay hold upon all that he could get, in such sort, that he manifestly discovered his intent of making himself Lord of all Asia. These two therefore stood in need of a Civil War; which Cassander well noted, and presumed withal, That the friendship which had passed between his Father and them, would avail him somewhat. Whereupon he secretly dispatched messengers to them both; and within a little while conveyed himself on a sudden over the Hellespont, that he might in person advance the business with greater speed. Much perswasion is needless in winning a man to what he desireth. Antigonus coveting nothing more, than to find Polysperchon work, by raising some commotion in Greece. Yet (as formalities must not be neglected) Cassander did very earnestly press him, by the memory of his Father, and all requisite conjurations, to assist him in this enterprise; telling him, that Ptolomy was ready to declare for them, and urging him to a speedy dispatch. Antigonus on the other side repayed him with the same coyn, saying, That for his own sake, and for his dead Father's, whom he had very dearly loved, he would not fail to give him all manner of succour. Having thus feasted one another with words, they were nothing slack in preparing the common means, leading to their several ends.

SECT. XIV.

The unworthy courses held by Polysperchon, for the keeping down of Cassander.

GReat necessity there was of timely provision. For Polysperchon needed no other instructions to inform him of Cassander's drift, than the news of his departure. He was not ignorant of the ready disposition, which might be found in Antigonus and Ptolomy, to the strengthning of Rebellion; and well he knew that one principal hope of Cassander was reposed in the confidence of such as ruled in the Grecian Estate. Therefore (loving to work circumspectly) he called another Council, wherein it was concluded, That the popular form of Government should be erected in all the Cities of Greece; the Garrisons withdrawn; and that all Magistrates and principal Men, into whose hands Antipater had committed the supreme Authority, should forthwith be either slain or banished. This was a sure way to diminish the number of Cassander's friends, and to raise up many enemies to him in all quarters. Yet hereby was disclosed both an unthankful nature in Polysperchon, and a factious malice in his adherents. For, how could he be excused of extream ingratitude, that for hatred of the Son went about to dishonour the Father's actions, whose only bounty had enabled him to do it? Or what could be said in their defence, who sought to destroy many worthy men, friends to the State, by whom the Greeks were held restrainſtrained from ſtirring againſt the Macedonians? and in oppoſition to their private enemy, gave the rule of things to baſe Companions, and ſuch as naturally maligned the Empire? But as in Man's Body, through ſinews newly iſſuing from one branch, a finger is vexed more by inflammation of his next Neighbour, than by any diſtemper in the contrary hand: ſo in bodies politick, the humours of men ſubdivided in faction, are more enraged by the diſagreeable qualities of ſuch as curb them in their neareſt purpoſes, than they are exaſperated by the general oppoſition of ſuch as are divided from them in the main trunk. Hereby it comes to paſs, that contrary Religions are invited to help againſt Neighbour Princes; bordering enemies drawn in, to a part in civil Wars, and ancient hatred called to counſel againſt injurious friends. Of this fault Nature is not guilty; ſhe hath taught the arm to offer it ſelf unto manifeſt loſs in defence of the head: They are depraved affections, which render men ſenſible of their own particular, and forgetful of the more general good, for which they were created.

The decree, whereby the Greeks were preſented with a vain ſhew of liberty, ran under the King's name; but ſo, as one might eaſily diſcern, that Polyſperchon had guided his pen. For the main point was, That they ſhould follow ſuch directions, as Polyſperchon gave, and treat with him about all difficulties. In the reſt it contained ſuch a deal of kindneſs as proceeding on a ſudden from thoſe who had kept them in hard ſubjection, might well appear to have ſome other root than the pretended good will; and was of it ſelf too baſe and unfit for a King to uſe toward his conquered Subjects, and often ſubdued Rebels.

SECT. XV.

Of the great Commotions raiſed in Athens by Polyſperchon's decree. The death of Phocion.

NEvertheleſs the Athenians with immoderate joy entertained this happy-ſeeming Proclamation, and ſought how to put it in execution without further delay. But Nicanor, Captain of the Garriſon, which kept one of their Havens, called Munychia, in the lower part of the Town, would needs take longer time of deliberation, than was pleaſing to their haſty deſires.

Nicanor, as a truſty follower of Caſſander, was by him ſhifted into the place, and Menillus (that was Captain there before) diſcharged, when Antipater was newly dead. His coming to Athens was no way grateful to the Citizens, who ſoon after hearing the news of Antipater's death, cried out upon Phocion, ſaying, That he had ſufficient intelligence of that accident, and might, by advertiſing them in due time, have put into their hands a fair opportunity of thruſting out the Macedonians. But theſe exclamations argued no more than a deſire to ſhake off the Macedonian yoke. Far more grievouſly would they have been offended, had they known the inſtructions which Caſſander had given to Nicanor, and his reſolution to follow them. It was concluded, That he ſhould not only retain Munychia, any injunction to the contrary notwithſtanding; but that he ſhould find means to thruſt ſome companies into Pireus, and fortifie that alſo, which was the principal Haven, againſt the High Town. How to accompliſh this, he rather wanted ſome reaſonable pretence, than good ability: But the Athenians were not long in giving him ſufficient cauſe to do that, which he would have done without any cauſe given. They deſired him to come unto their Council, aſſembled in the Pireus, there to conſider of the King's Proclamation: whither upon Phocion's word and ſafe conduct he came, and earneſtly preſſed them to hold with Caſſander in the War which was ready to break forth. Contrariwiſe, they urged him firſt of all, to make them maſters of their own, which how to uſe, they might conſult afterwards. Each of them refuſing to condeſcend unto the other's demand; the Athenians (who did always meaſure Juſtice by profit, yet ſeldom thrived by that courſe) practiſed with Dercillus, a Captain following Polyſperchon, and then lying near at hand, that he ſhould enter into the Town, and take Nicanor Priſoner. But Phocion, who then governed in Athens, a man very unlike to the reſt of the Citizens, being nothing pleaſed with ſuch a trick of politick diſhoneſty, did quietly ſuffer him to depart and ſave himſelf.

Nicanor hereupon began to deviſe upon taking Pireus; not as following now the project of Caſſander, but proſecuting his own juſt revenge. He levied as many Souldiers as he could, and drew them cloſely into Munychia: which done, he iſſued into Pireus, took it, and intrenched himſelf therein, to the exceeding diſcomfort of the Athenians, who lately impatient of his keeping the one Haven, ſaw him now maſter of both. Alexander, the Son of Polyſperchon, came thither ſhortly after with an Army. Then were the Citizens in great hope of recovering all, and addreſſed themſelves unto him; who made fair ſhews, intending meer miſchief, which they perceived not, being blinded with the vain Epiſtles of his Father, and of Olympias the old Queen. Olympias taking upon her to command, before ſhe durſt well adventure to return into Macedon, had peremptorily charged Nicanor to reſtore to the Athenians the places which he held: but he would firſt conſider more of the matter. Polyſperchon had further ordained, that the Iſle of Samos ſhould be rendred unto them: a goodly offer, had it accorded with his power and meaning. He was (indeed) ſo far from purpoſing to let them have Samos, that as yet he did not throughly intend to let them have themſelves. The commodity of their Havens was ſuch, as he would rather get into his own hands, than leave in theirs; yet rather wiſhed in theirs, than in Caſſander's. His Son Alexander, not ignorant of this, made fair ſhew to the Athenians, and ſpent much labour in communing with Nicanor, but ſuffered not them, for whom he ſeemed to labour, to intermeddle with the buſineſs. Hereupon the Citizens grew jealous, and the diſpleaſure they conceived againſt him, they poured out upon Phocion, depriving him of his office. This was done with much tumult; baniſhed Men and ſtrangers thruſting themſelves into the aſſembly of the Citizens, who diſtracted with ſundry paſſions, growing out of their preſent misfortunes, thought every one that beſt could inveigh againſt things paſt, a moſt likely man to find ſome remedy for the evil threatning them. In this hurly-burly was Alexander deviſing how he might come to ſome good point of compoſition with Nicanor, and held much privy conference with him; which he could not ſo ſecretly carry, but that his negotiation was diſcovered, whereby the up-roar in the Town was ſo far encreaſed, that Phocion with many of his friends were accuſed, and driven to ſeek ſafeguard of their lives by flight. So they came to Alexander, who entertained them gently, and gave them his letters of commendation to his Father, deſiring him to take them into his protection.

Polyſpercon was in the Country of Phocis, ready to enter with an Army into Attica. Thither came Phocion with his companions, hoping well that the Letters which they brought, and their own deſerts (having always been Friends to the Macedonians, as far as the good of their Countrey gave leave) ſhould be enough to get patronage to their innocency. Beſides all this, Dinarchus a Corinthian, Polyſperchon's familiar friend, went along with them (in an evil hour) who promiſed to himſelf and them great favour, by means of his acquaintance. But Polyſperchon was an unſtable man, very earneſt in what he took in hand, yet either for want of Judgement in following them, or of honeſty in holding the beſt of them, eaſily changing his intended courſes, and doing things by the halves, which made him commonly fail of good ſucceſs. For fear of Caſſander he had offered wonderful kindneſs to the Athenians; this had cauſed them to love him: out of their love he gathered hope of deceiving them, which made him to change his mind, and ſeek how to get into his own hands thoſe keys, with which Caſſander held them faſt lockt up: finding himſelf diſappointed of this purpoſe, and ſuſpected as a falſe diſhonourable man, he ſtood wavering between the contrary allurements of profit and reputation, To keep the Athenians perforce at his devotion, would indeed have done well: but the effecting of this began to grow deſperate; and many Towns of importance in Greece, began to caſt their eyes upon his proceeding in that action. Wherefore he thought it the wiſeſt way to redeem their good opinion, by giving all contentment unto the popular faction, which was then grown to be Maſter of that City. And in good time for this purpoſe were the Athenian Ambaſſadours come, treading (as one may ſay) upon Phocion's heels, whom they were ſent to accuſe. Theſe had ſolemn audience given to them in the King's preſence, who was attended by many great Lords, and for oſtentations ſake was glorified with all exterior ſhews of Majeſty; yet all too little to change Arideus into Alexander: for he did nothing there, but either laugh or chafe, as he ſaw others do. For beginning of the buſineſs; Polyſperchon commanded that Dinarchus ſhould be tortured and ſlain. This was enough to teſtifie his hearty affection to the Commonalty of Athens, in that he ſpared not his old acquaintance for their ſake; whoſe Ambaſſadours he then bid to ſpeak. When their errand was done, and anſwer to it made by the accuſed, who had no indifferent hearing, Phocion and the reſt were pronounced guilty of Treaſon; but to give ſentence, and do the execution upon them, was (for honours ſake) referred unto the City of Athens, becauſe they were Burgeſſes. Then were they ſent away to Athens, where the raſcal multitude, not ſuffering them to ſpeak for themſelves, condemned them to dye. So they periſhed being innocent. But the death of Phocion being very conſpicuous, made the fortune of the reſt to be of the leſs regard. Five and forty times had he been choſen Governor of the City, never ſuing for the place, but ſent for when he was abſent, ſo well was his integrity known, and ſo highly valued, even of ſuch as were no pretenders to the ſame virtue. He was a good Commander in War, wherein, though his Actions were not very great, yet were they of good importance, and never unfortunate. Never did the City repent of having followed his counſel: nor any private man of having truſted his word. Philip of Macedon highly eſteemed him; ſo, and much more did Alexander, who (beſides other ſigns of his love) ſent him two hundred Talents of ſilver, and offered to beſtow upon him of four Cities in Aſia, any one which he would chuſe. But Phocion refuſed theſe and other gifts, howſoever importunately thruſt upon him; reſting well contented with his honeſt poverty: wherein he lived about fourſcore years, and then was compelled by the unjuſt Judgement of wicked men to drink that poyſon, which by juſt Judgement of the righteous God, ſo infected the City of Athens, as from that day forwards it never brought forth any worthy man reſembling the virtue of their Anceſtors.

SECT. XVI.

Of Polyſperchon his vain Expedition againſt Caſſander.

NOt long after theſe things were done, Caſſander, with ſuch forces as Antigonus lent him, entred into Pireus; which news drew Polyſperchon headlong into Attica, with a great Army but ſo ill victualled, that he was fain to depart without any thing done. Only he had given ſome impediment to the enemy; who, not contented with defending what he held, began to look out, and made new purchaſes abroad. Finding therefore himſelf unable to drive Caſſander out of Athens, he left his Son Alexander, with ſuch number of men as exceeded not the proportion of victuals, to withſtand his further encroaching. The greateſt part of his Army he carried into Peloponneſus, to make the Country ſure to himſelf, wherein Caſſander had many friends.

His doings in Peloponneſus were ſuch as they had been in other parts of Greece. Firſt, he began to fight with Edicts, reſtoring the Democracy, or popular form of Government. He commanded that the principal Citizens, that had by Antipater been made Rulers, ſhould be either ſlain, or driven into exile. This Decree took immediate effect in moſt places: the vulgar ſort being very ready to ſeal the Charter of their freedom and authority, with the blood of thoſe who had kept them in ſubjection. Yet many Cities there were, which delighted in the rule of the chief Citizens; and many which wiſhed well to Caſſander, eſpecially they of Megalopolis, on whom Polyſperchon meant to inflict an exemplary puniſhment of diſobedience to him, which he termed Rebellion. Megalopolis had in it fifteen thouſand ſerviceable men, well furniſhed of neceſſaries, and reſolved to endure the worſt. And need there was of ſuch reſolution. For Polyſperchon coming thither with all his power, did ſo much, that he overthrew, by a Mine, three of their Bulwarks, and all the ſpace of wall between them. But the Defendents manfully repelled the Macedonians which came up to the breach; and at the ſame time with great labour they raiſed up an inner Wall, to bear out the next aſſault. The Aſſailants having failed to carry the Town at the firſt attempt, took much pains to clear the ground, and make fair way for their Elephants, whoſe violence lence was likely to overthrow all that came in their way. But the Townsmen perceiving their drift, prepared boards driven thorow with long nails, which they used as gall-throps, bestowing them sleightly covered, with the points upward, in the way by which the beasts were to pass. Neither did they set any to encounter them in front, but appointed certain light armed men to beat upon their sides with Arrows and Darts, as they were instructed by some that had learned the manner of that fight in the Asian Wars. Of these provisions they made happy use in the next assault. For, by them were the Elephants (wherein the enemy chiefly trusted) either sorely hurt, or driven back upon the Macedonians, whom they trampled under feet. Polysperchon came as ill furnisht for long abode to Megalopolis as before to Athens. Therefore being neither able to dispatch the business quickly, nor to take such leisure as was requisite, he forsook the siege, with some loss, and much dishonour, leaving some part of his Army to lie before the Town for his credit.

After this he sent Clitus, his Admiral, to Sea, to joyn with Arideus that was come out of Phrygia, and to cut off all succour which might come to the enemy out of Asia. Cassander also sent his whole fleet under Nicanor, who taking along with him some ships of Antigonus, came to the Propontis, where he fought with Clitus and was beaten. But Antigonus hearing of the overthrow, gathered together the ships that were escaped, and manning them very well, sent out Nicanor again, assuring himself of the Victory, as well he might. For he sent out sufficient numbers of light-armed men, whom he caused to be wafted over the Straits in small Vessels by night; these before day-light setting upon Clitus, drave his men, that lay securely on the Land, headlong into their ships; in which tumult Nicanor arriving, did assail them so lustily that few or none escaped them.

This loss at Sea, together with his bad success by Land, brought Polysperchon into great contempt. He had a good faculty in penning bloody Decrees, but when the execution was referred to his own sword, he could find the matter more difficult. Wherefore the Athenians, perceiving that he had left them to shift for themselves, and was not able to give them protection against the enemy which lay in their bosomes, came to agreement with Cassander; accepting a Governour of his appointment; and restoring all things to the same state wherein Antipater had left them. The like inclination to the party of Cassander, was found in very many Cities of Greece, which daily and willingly revolted unto him, as to an industrious man, and likely to prevail in the end. Thus was the whole Country set in a cumbustion, uneasie to be quenched; which presented unto Antigonus an opportunity, that he neglected not, of making himself Lord of Asia.

SECT. XVII.

Antigonus seeks to make himself an absolute Lord: and thereupon treats with Eumenes, who disappointeth him. Phrygia and Lydia won by Antigonus.

Antigonus had in Antipater's life-time a firm resolution, to make unto himself the utmost benefit that he might of the Army committed to his charge, And in fair season for advancement of his purposes came the news of Antipater's death, even then, when all the business in Pisidia was dispatched, and no more employment for the Army remaining, save only the continuance of the siege of Nora, a small thing of it self, but as hard as a greater matter; and requiring few men, but much time; when time of all things was most precious. Eumenes lay in that Fort of Nora, able to make the place good, and hoping that the mutability, to which the present Estate was manifestly subject, would in continuance of some years (which he might abide) work more for him, than his enemies in that space could work against him. His most fear was, that for want of exercise in that narrow Castle, his men and horses might grow sickly and unserviceable: which made him to practise many devices of keeping them in health and lusty. But when he had continued shut up in this manner about a year, his hopes came to good pass, and he was eased of his cares by Antigonus himself, whose forces held him besieged.

Antigonus knowing the great sufficiency of Eumenes, and considering his fidelity shewed unto Perdiccas, thought that he could not find in all the world a fitter man than him, to employ in managing those high designs wherein he doubted not that he should be withstood by the mightiest Princes of the Empire. He sent therefore to Eumenes by one that was friend to them both, acquainting him with some part of his intent, and promising to make him a better Lord than ever he had been, and the next man to himself, if things fell out as he desired: in regard whereof he required only his friendship, and thereupon sent him an oath to take; which done, he might at his good pleasure issue safely out of Nora, and enjoy his perfect liberty. Eumenes perusing the form of the oath, did perceive the meaning of Antigonus; which was, rather to make him his follower than his fellow. For, whereas, in a few words, it mentioned the King and Princes of the blood, rather to keep the Decorum, than upon any loyal intent, the binding words and sum of all were such, as tied him fast only to Antigonus, omitting all reservation of duty, to the King or any other. This he liked not, holding it unseemly to become a sworn man to him, with whom he had fought for the mastery; and being assured that his voluntary assistance, which way soever he gave it, would be more acceptable and far more honourable than the course propounded. Yet would he not therefore break off the negotiation, and wait for some better occasion of enlargement, which might perhaps be long in coming: but seeming to be well agreed with Antigonus, he prepared to give up his Hold and depart. As for the oath it self, when he came to take it, he made shew of dislike, in that it was not solemn enough for such personages as they were, who could not be too ceremonious in teſtifying in their allegiance. The Macedonians which lay encamped before Nora, liked his words, and gave him leave to put in Olympias, and the children of Alexander, binding himſelf to them and their adherents, as well as to Antigonus; and ſo he departed.

Antigonus had taken upon him, as ſoon as he came down to the Sea-ſide, to remove ſome of the Governours of the Provinces, behaving himſelf according to the authority which he had received of Antipater, to exerciſe in the time of War. Neither did he want ſufficient pretence whereby to juſtifie his proceeding. For, if Polyſperchon might lawfully hold the Protectorſhip, which the old man doting on his death-bed bequeathed unto him as a Legacy, without conſent of the Princes and Souldiers; why might not he himſelf as well retain the Lieutenantſhip of Aſia, that was granted unto him for the general good of the State, in preſence of the whole Army, by the King, and by Antipater, who had power to ordain what ſhould ſeem convenient whilſt he lived, not to diſpoſe of things that ſhould happen after his death? To give a fair colour to his ambition, this was enough: if any were not herewith ſatisfied, he had threeſcore thouſand footmen, ten thouſand horſe, and thirty Elephants in a readineſs to anſwer them.

The firſt that perceived his drift, and provided to reſiſt him, was Arideus Governour of Phrygia; who fortified the Towns of his own Province, and ſought to have won Cizicus, a fair Haven Town, and ſeated very conveniently for him, but was fain to go away without it. Hereupon Antigonus took occaſion to command him out of the Country. Arideus was ſo far from obeying him, that he ſent forces to relieve Eumenes. Nevertheleſs finding that he was unable of himſelf to make long reſiſtance, he took ſuch companies as he could draw along with him, and ſo paſſed over into Europe, to complain at the Court. The like fortune had Clitus, who ruled in Lydia, and ſought the like remedy of his fortune, with ſome hope at the firſt (for both of them were entertained with very good words) which quickly vaniſhed; and grew deſperate, when they were beaten at Sea, as hath already been declared.

SECT. XVIII.

Antigonus purſues Eumenes. Eumenes having authority from the Court, raiſeth great War againſt Antigonus in defence of the Royal Houſe.

Antigonus having thus gotten into his hands all, or moſt of all Aſia the leſs, was able to have entred Macedon and ſeized upon the Court; which that he forbare to do, it proceeded (as may ſeem) from ſome of theſe reaſons. It would have bred as much jealouſie in Caſſander, as fear in Polyſperchon, which might have brought them to terms of reconciliation: It would ask more time than he could ſpare; and the envy which followed the Protectorſhip was ſuch, as he that had power enough without the office, ought rather to ſhun, than to purſue. Beſides all this, it was manifeſt that Eumenes would not only refuſe to take his part, but would make war upon him in defence of the Royal houſe, to which it was found that Antigonus did not ſtand well-affected. Againſt him therefore he bent his courſe, and with an Army of twenty thouſand foot, and four thouſand horſe, made great haſt towards Cilicia, hoping to ſuppreſs him before he ſhould be able to make head.

Eumenes was one of thoſe few that continued faithful to their dead Maſter, which being well known in the Court, he had commiſſion ſent unto him from thence to raiſe an Army, and make War upon Antigonus, taking of the King's treaſure, as much as he ſhould need. Other Letters alſo there were directed to all the Governors of Provinces, requiring them to give aſſiſtance to Eumenes, and be ordered by his direction: eſpecially to the Captains of the old Souldiers, called the Argyraſpides, or Silver-ſhielded bands, commandment was given to be at his appointment. He had of his old followers gathered together two thouſand foot, and five hundred horſe, before this Authority was given him: but now he purpoſed with all the ſtrength which he could make, to fight with Antigonus in defence of the Royal blood. Olympias had written to him, deſiring him to bring help to her, and her Nephew the Son of Alexander; and in the mean time to give her his advice in that which Polyſperchon required of her: for ſhe was deſirous to return into Macedon, but ſuſpected his ambition, as not contained within lawful bounds. Eumenes therefore counſelled her to remain in Epirus, till ſuch time as he could bring the war to a good iſſue; which done, he promiſed that his faith and care ſhould not be wanting to the ſeed of Alexander.

Strange it is to conſider, that in all the Empire ſcarce any one could be found among the Noblemen, in whom Alexander's Mother, Wives, and Children, might repoſe firm confidence, ſaving only this Eumenes, a ſtranger to the Macedonian blood, born at Cardia, a City of Thrace. His reputation was no more than his own virtue had made it; his followers obeyed at their own diſcretion; and compelled he was to travel as far as Perſia, to gather together an Army ſufficient to reſiſt the enemies that purſued his heels.

SECT. XIX.

How the Princes of Macedon ſtood affected mutually. Olympias takes Arideus and Eurydice, whom ſhe cruelly puts to death.

NOw, forasmuch as in this preſent War all the Rulers of the Provinces did intermeddle; and great alterations happened, not only in the parts of Aſia, but Macedon it ſelf, which brought a new face unto the State, by the extirpation of the Royal houſe of Philip and Alexander: I hold it convenient in this place, before we enter into the particulars of the War it ſelf, to ſhew briefly how the great Ones did mutually ſtand affected; and by what paſſions they were drawn into thoſe courſes, which overthrew moſt of them, and out of their ruines built the greatneſs of a few: as likewiſe to what extremity the faction brake out in Macedon it ſelf, about the main Controverſie of the Title to the Crown, whereupon all other quarrels were or ſhould have been depending.

Arideus the King, being ſimple and fearful, did only what he was bidden.

Polyſper-

Polysperchon, desirous to continue long in Office, had a purpose to advance the Son of Alexander by Roxane to the Kingdom, and become Governor to a King of his own making.

Eurydice the Queen discovering plainly this intent, and meaning nothing less than to let her husband serve as a Stale, keeping the Throne warm till another were grown old enough to sit in it, grew acquainted with Cassander, who hated the memory of Alexander, and was therefore the fitter for her turn.

Cassander held fresh in mind the danger wherein his family had been through Alexander's malice, together with the indignity offered to himself by Alexander, who knocked his head against a wall for deriding one that adored him after the Persian manner. The displeasure hereof, and the pleasure which he took in the amorous Queen, made him to resolve, both to suppress the lineage which he hated, and to maintain his beloved Mistress, either by supporting her weak Husband, or by taking her to be his own Wife.

The rest of the Lords held it a thing indifferent, who reigned over all, so as they might reign in their several Countries, and establish their authority in such wise, that it might not be taken from them.

Among these, Ptolomy and Antigonus were well enough already, if their ambition would have suffered them to see it.

Pytho and Seleucbus lying far off, and being strong, had some good hope to encroach upon their neighbours. Against these, Peucestes, and some others, with much ado hardly made resistance until such time as Eumenes came to them; who propounded to himself great matters, which he lived not to accomplish.

Olympias the old Queen (as it is common with step dames) hated the children of her Husband by his other Wives. It was thought that she had given poison to Aridæus, which failing to take away his life, had much impaired both his body and wits. Now she considering, that Eumenes was too full of business to come home so soon as she wished that he should; and that Cassander daily prevailed in Greece: thought it the best way to joyn with Polysperchon, and set up as King, her Nephew Alexander, the Son of Roxane, removing Aridæus before Cassander were able to defend him. To this intent she procured men among her kinred in Epirus, and so took her way towards Polysperchon, who joyning with her, entred into Macedon.

Eurydice hearing these news, wrote very earnestly to Cassander, praying him to set aside all other business, and come to succour her. She her self by entreaty, gifts, and promises, drew to her party as many of the Macedonians as she could, until she thought her own side strong enough; and then taking her Husband with her, went boldly forth against Olympias, and the Traitor Polysperchon.

These two Queens met armed, as if the matter should have been determined by their own hands, which ended without any stroke stricken, by the revolt of those who followed Eurydice. For as soon as the Macedonians beheld Olympias, caling to mind her former Estate, and the victorious Reigns of her Husband and Son, they refused to lift any weapon against her. Eurydice finding her self thus forsaken, fled towards Amphipolis, but was intercepted, and made Prisoner with her Husband.

Olympias having obtained this Victory without blood, thought that all things would succeed as easily, and upon the same considerations for which they had refused to bear arms against her, the Macedonians would not stick to maintain her, whatsoever her proceedings were. Having therefore shut up Aridæus and his wife in a close room, where they could scarce turn round, she fed them thorow a little hole, till after a while it came in her head (for fear lest the people should have commiseration of him, that had reigned almost six years and a half) to put them to death. So she delivered Aridæus to some barbarous Thracians; who took away his life by cruel torments; to Eurydice she sent a sword, a halter, and a cup of poison, willing her to chuse the instrument of her own death, who praying that the like presents might one day be sent to Olympias, yielded her neck to the Halter, having spent her last curses not in vain. Nicanor the Brother of Cassander, and a hundred the chief of his friends, did Olympias then chuse out, all whom she commanded to be slain. His Brother Iolaus that was already dead and buried, she accused of poison given to Alexander, and thereupon caused his Tomb to be thrown down, and his bones to be scattered abroad. The Macedonians wondring at this fury, began to condemn themselves, and the folly of Polysperchon, who had quite contrary to Antipater's charge given on his deathbed, called this outragious woman to the Government of the Empire.

SECT. XX.

How Cassander was revenged on Olympias.

†. I.

The great Expedition of Cassander. Olympias shuts her self into Pydna, where Cassander besieged her. Æacides King of Epirus, coming to succour Olympias is forsaken and banished by his own Subjects.

Cassander at that time lay before Tegea, in Peloponnesus; whither when all these ill tidings were brought to him, he never stayed to take the City, nor to give order for the state of things in that Country, (though Alexander the Son of Polysperchon, were there with an Army) but compounding with them of Tegea, he willed his associates to look to themselves as well as they could, till his return; and so in all haste he took his journey towards Macedon, carried headlong with the greedy desire of just revenge. The Ætolians had taken the Straits of Thermopylæ, in favour of the Queen and Polysperchon, to hinder his passage; but he, not willing to mispend any time in dealing with them, got together as many ships as he could, great and small, with which he transported his Army into Thessaly. There he divided his companies, appointing some under Callas a subtil Captain, to hold Polysperchon busied, who then lay encamped near to Perrhæbia, with the rest he marched directly against Olympias. She, having once prevailed by the respect given to her dignity took more care how to appear Majestical, than to make her self strong. To this end she made a solemn progress to Pydna, a Sea-Town, and well fenced, having in her company all the flower of the Court, especially the great Ladies, among whom was Roxane, and her young Son Alexander, heir to the great Alexander, by his Grandmothers designment: who during his minority, kept his Soveraign power in her own hands. But all this pomp served to little use against the violence of the enemy, that soon presented himself before the Walls; only it fed the besieged with a vain hope of succour, that would from all parts arrive, to rescue persons of their quality. And hereof there soon appeared a fair likelihood, which as soon vanished and went away in smoak.

For Æacides King of Epirus made great hast to bring succour to Olympias his Cousin, with whom Deodamia his daughter was also shut up. Nevertheless, his Subjects were nothing forward in this Expedition; but finding certain passages taken in the way by Cassander's men, they called upon him to retire, and quit the enterprise. The King's importunity urging them to proceed, and the obstinate refusal of the Army, brake out at length into such terms, that when he had raged in vain against the multitude, his Authority, with which he thought to have prevailed upon them, was by them taken from him, and he compelled to forsake his Kingdom, and to wander up and down in forreign Countries a banished man, his people joyning with the enemy, against whom he had led them forth to War.

Pydna in the mean time was closed up straitly, both by Sea and Land, so that neither any could issue out of the City, nor any relief be conveyed into it, but it held out as long as any food was left; no memorable service being done there, whilst great Actions were managed abroad.

†. II.

A continuation of Olympias her story. Polysperchon defeated. Extreme Famine in Pydna. Olympias yields to Cassander.

NOw, though order of time require it, that we should rehearse the doings of Eumenes, and Antigonus in this place, leaving Olympias yet a while to the hour of her destiny; which grows the faster upon her, because she may discern it coming: yet that we may not be compelled to interrupt the course of our Narration, by inserting her Tragedy in the midst of things not manifestly coherent with it; we will here (as elsewhere we have done, and elsewhere must) continue to an end one History, that we may not therewith be distracted, when we shall come to the relation of another. All the hope of the besieged, remaining in Polysperchon, was in like manner disappointed as their former trust had been, which was reposed in the succours of the Epirots. For Callas who was sent against him, found the means to corrupt the greatest part of the Army with money, leaving him within a little while so slenderly accompanied, that he was fit for no other business of War, than a swift retreat. When Famine had so far prevailed in the City, that the Horses were killed as a precious food, many men feeding on the dead Carcases of their fellows, and saw-dust being given to the Elephants for Provender; some of the Souldiers obtaining the Queens leave (who could not deny it) others without asking leave, yielded themselves to the enemy, and were by him gently relieved, and sent abroad into the Country. The news of the Queens affairs, dispersed by these men, did so affright her well-willers, that such as had reserved themselves to the event, came in apace, and submitted to Cassander. At length, when the mortality was so great in the Town, that the living were even poisoned with the noisome scent of the dead; Olympias bethought her self of stealing away by Sea in a Galley that she had: wherewith her success was as bad as in the rest. For God had appointed this Town, by her chosen as a place of refuge, to be unto her as a house of torment, and a Gaol, out of which she should not be delivered, but unto an evil death. Being therefore utterly broken with miseries, which daily afflicted her and the other Ladies, unaccustomed to so wretched a kind of life, she offered composition, and with much labour hardly obtained of Cassander (who having fetcht her Galley out of the Haven, accounted himself as good as master of her body) a grant of her own life. Immediately upon her apprehension, Pella, the chief City of the Kingdom, was yielded to Cassander. Amphipolis did stand out: for Aristonus (to whom Olympias had given charge of such forces as were left abroad in the Country, taking courage from the success of some petty services wherein he had prevailed) began to promise himself great unlikelihoods. But Olympias, to win Cassander's favour, very earnestly required him upon his faith to her, that he should give it up. He did so, and presently after was killed by his private enemies, that were set on by Cassander, who partly hated him upon old respects, partly doubted him, as a man likely to seek Innovation.

†. III.

The death of Olympias, and her Conditions.

WHen Olympias had now heard sorrowful tidings of all her friends, she her self was called into question, and accused in an Assembly of the Macedonians, for the murthers (they were so stiled in her affliction, which in time of prosperity she called Justice) by her committed. There was she (being not heard, nor called to speak) condemned to die. The sute was commenced and prosecuted against her, by the kinred of those whom she had slain. But it was at Cassander's instigation, who (to hasten the execution) sent her word, that he would furnish her with a ship, and other necessaries, to save her self by flight: which when she refused, saying, that she would plead for her self, and tell her own tale; he dissembled no longer, but sent unto her such men, as hated her most, who took away her miserable life. She was Daughter, and Sister, unto two Kings of Epirus; Wife and Mother unto two the mightiest Kings of that, or many other Ages; a stout Lady, and of unreproveable chastity; but her ambition was boundless, her hatred unappeasable, and her fury in revenge most unwomanly. Her perverse conditions made her Husband seek other Wives and Concubines, which caused her to hate both him and them. She was thought privy to her Husband's death; after which, very cruelly, she slew his late Wife Cleopatra, having first murthered one of her two children in her arms, and with a beastly fury broiled the other alive in fire, in a Copper-bason.

For

For these things, her Son Alexander (otherwise loving her well) forbad her to meddle in the Government of Macedon. But God, more severe unto cruel Tyrants, than only to hinder them of their wills, permitted her to live, and fulfil the rest of her wickedness (which was his justice upon the adulteries of Philip, and the oppression done by him and others;) after all which, he rewarded her malice, by returning it upon her own head.

†IV.

Cassander celebrates the Funeral of Aridæus and Eurydice; and seeks to make himself King of Macedon.

After her death, Cassander gave honourable burial to Aridæus and Eurydice, among their Progenitors, Kings of Macedon. And looking further into his own possibilities of greatness, he married the Lady Thessalonica, whom he had taken at Pydna, being the Daughter of King Philip, by another of his Wives; that by her he might have some title to the Crown. For the same end he committed Roxane, and her young Son to close Prison, removing thereby some part of his impediment. And, the better to encrease his fame, and purchase love, built a City, called by his own name Cassandria, that soon grew to be very great and powerful. He re-edified likewise Thebes in Greece, and restored it unto the old Inhabitants, after it had lain twenty years waste, being utterly razed by Alexander. By these means, especially by the restauration of Thebes, whereunto all Greece voluntarily contributed, he grew so strong, that few remained enemies unto him; and they with much labour, hardly could resist him. Leaving him therefore daily prevailing in Greece, we will return to them, who contended in Asia, for less titles, but larger Provinces, with greater forces.

CHAP. IV.

Of the great Lordship which Antigonus got in Asia.

SECT. I.

The Journey of Eumenes into Persia. His wise dealing with those that joyned with him.

Eumenes, having joyned unto his company the Argyraspides, made haste into the Eastern parts, to take possession of those Countries, according to his Commission, and strengthen himself against Antigonus. He took his journey through Cœlosyria and Phœnicia, hoping to reclaim those Provinces, the rest of Syria usurped (as hath been shewed) by Ptolomy, to the King's obedience. But to effect this, his haste of his passing forward was too great, his Army too little, and the readiness of the people, to return their due obedience, none at all. Besides all which Impediments, one inconvenience troubled him in all his proceedings, making them the less effectual. The Captains of the Argyraspides were so froward, that they scorned to repair to him, and take his directions; and their fidelity was so unsteady, that they might more easily have dealt with open Traytors. It was not expedient, that he, being General, should weaken his authority by courting them; neither lay it in his power to keep them in order by compulsion. Therefore he feigned, that Alexander had appointed unto him, in a dream, a place for their meeting, namely, in a rich pavilion, wherein an empty throne was placed, as if Alexander himself had been present at their consultations. Thus he freed himself from their vain pride; but of their faith he could have no assurance. Yet when Ptolomy requested them, and Antigonus bribed them to forsake him, they continued (though not without considering of the matter) to take his part. So he marched on, sending before him the King's Warrant; which Pytho and Seleucus refused to obey; not as rejecting the King's Authority, but excepting the person of Eumenes, as a man condemned to die by the Macedonian Army, for the death of Craterus. Eumenes, knowing well that he was not to rely upon their assistance, who stood otherwise affected than his affairs required, and were not to be dealt with by perswasion, sought passage by strong hand through the Country of Babylon; in such wise that Seleucus, having in vain assayed to hinder him, by opening the sluces of Euphrates, was glad at length to grant him friendly way, as desirous to be rid of him. Thus he came to Peucestes and the rest of the Eastern Lords, who were glad of his company, because of the differences between Pytho, and themselves. Yet the contention about superiority grew very hot among them, every one finding matter enough to feed his own humour of self-worthiness. But the former device of assembling in one pavilion, made all quiet; the conclusion ever being sure to follow that which Eumenes propounded, who was both wisest in giving advice, and best able to reward, by means of the Authority given him, to take what he pleased of the King's treasures. By these means he won to himself many of those, who had most power to do good or hurt.

SECT.

SECT. II.

How Antigonus coming to set upon Eumenes, was driven off with loss.

ANtigonus, hearing that Eumenes lay in the Province of Susa, had an earnest desire to follow him, and drive him further from the King's treasures, which were kept there. To which end, as soon as he had made himself strong enough, he removed out of Mesopotamia, where he had wintered; and taking to him Pytho and Seleucus, with their men, he marched directly against the enemies, with intent to give them battel. Eumenes had fortified the Castle of Susa, and was retired back toward Persia, keeping the River of Tigris between him and his pursuers. The passages of the River were well guarded, and good espial kept upon Antigonus, to observe which way he took. Before he came to Tigris it self, he was to pass over Coprates, a great River, and not fordable, which he sought to do by small Vessels, whereof he had no great store. A great part of his Army had gotten over, when Eumenes, who kept a bridge upon Tigris, came with a thousand horse, and four thousand foot, to see their demeanour: and finding them out of order, charged them, brake them, and drave them head-long back into Coprates, wherein most of them were drowned; very few escaping with life, except four thousand that yielded themselves prisoners in sight of Antigonus, that was not able to relieve them. This loss made Antigonus glad to fall off; and the heat of that Country in the Dog days, breeding diseases in his Army, by which many perished, caused him to remove as far as into Media. So he took Python with him (leaving Seleucus to besiege the Castle of Susa) and seeking to go the nearest way, passed through savage Nations, that continually vexing him with skirmishes, slew great numbers of his men, before he could arrive in Media with his Troops, that were quite heart-broken.

SECT. III.

Of Eumenes his cunning. A Battel between him and Antigonus.

AFter his departure, Eumenes with his associates fell into consultation, about the remainder of their business. Fain he would have had them to enter upon those Provinces, which Antigonus had left behind him; to which also the Captains of the Argyraspides or Silver shields, were very inclinable, as desiring to draw near to Greece. But Peucestes, and the rest, whose Dominions lay in the high Countries, had more care of their own particular Estates, and would needs march Eastward. These carried it; for the Army was not strong enough to divide it self into parts.

When they came into Persia, Peucestes ruling there, feasted them royally, and sought by all means to win the Souldiers love to himself. Eumenes perceiving whereunto those doings tended, suffered him a while to keep good chear, till the time of War drew near. Then did he feign an Epistle, directed, as from Orontes Governour of Armenia, to Peucestes himself: The puport whereof was; that Olympias had vanquished Cassander, and sent over a great Army under Polysperchon, to joyn with Eumenes. These news, as they filled the Camp with vain joy, so they wrought in all mens minds a great willingness to obey Eumenes by whom was the likeliest appearance of their preferment; wherein they dealt wisely, he being far the most sufficient Commander, as they found soon after. For when Antigonus, coming out of Media, drew near unto them, Eumenes, by some mischance was fallen sick, and fain to be carried in a Litter; the Army marched in very bad array, and was likely to have been forced to take battel in that disorder. But Eumenes, when the rest of the Captains were amazed, was carried about the Army in his Litter, and upon the sudden did cast his men into so good form, that Antigonus, perceiving him afar off, could not refrain from giving him deserved commendations. Yet he did not cease to promise great rewards to the Captains, and all sorts of men, if they would forsake Eumenes: which hopes deceiving him, he came to the trial of a Battel. Eumenes had more Elephants than Antigonus; otherwise, he was inferiour in number both of horse and foot by a third part. The Battel was fought with variable success, and great loss on both sides, continuing a great part of the day, and of the night following. Yet the Victory was uncertain. For Eumenes could not force his men to lye far from their carriages: by which means Antigonus (who had a more absolute command over his) encamping on the ground whereon they fought, had in his power the dead bodies, which was accounted the sign of victory; for he buried his own, and gave leave to his enemies craving it, to do the like. But a greater sign of victory had Eumenes; For he abode still in the same place, and not only buried his men very honourably, at great leisure, but held the Country round about; whereas Antigonus was glad (having tarried but one day) to steal away by night, and return into Media, from whence he came.

SECT. IV.

Of divers stratagems practised by Antigonus and Eumenes, one against the other.

THus did the War continue doubtful, and was protracted to a great length, each part having stout Souldiers, and skilful Generals; but the side which had hitherto prevailed, being hindred by the equal authority of many, from pursuing all advantages to the best, Antigonus grew daily weaker, in men and reputation, so that to repair himself he could find no way safer, than to put all to adventure. He knew that his enemies lay in wintering places, quartering far asunder, so that if he could suddenly come among them, he was likely to put them in great distress. Between him and them, the way was not long, being only nine days journey, but very bad, through a rough dry wilderness, hardly passible. Another way, fairer and leading through a Country well peopled, but requiring twenty five days journey, he forsook; partly for the length, partly and chiefly, because he

he would come undiſcovered. So therefore taking his journey in the dead of Winter, he forbad unto his men the uſe of fire by night, becauſe he would not have them diſcryed afar off. This commandment had been well obſerved four or five days, when continuance of time (as commonly) breeding negligence, and the cold weather pinching them, they were bold to cheriſh themſelves, being near to their ways end. The light of theſe fires gave notice of their coming, which being reported to Peuceſtes, and other Captains, they were ſo aſtoniſhed with the ſudden danger, that in all haſte they betook themſelves to flight. But Eumenes, meeting with the news, began to hearten his affrighted companions, promiſing to make Antigonus march leiſurely, and willing them to abide, and draw up their men together. They could ſcarce believe him; yet they were content to be ruled, and did as he appointed, who failed not in making his word good. He took with him ſome companies of the readieſt men, wherewith he occupied certain tops of mountains, looking toward the Camp of Antigonus: there he choſe a convenient ground to encamp upon, and made great ſtore of fires in ſundry places, as if the whole Army had been preſent. This was a ſorrowful ſpectacle to Antigonus, who thought himſelf prevented of his purpoſe; and began to fear leſt he ſhould be compelled to fight, whilſt his men were tired with a long and painful journey. Therefore he reſolved to turn aſide, and take the way to ſuch places, as might better ſerve to refreſh his Army. This he did with great care and circumſpection, at the firſt, as knowing how ready Eumenes would be upon all advantages. But after a while conſidering that no enemy ſtirred about him, he began to pauſe, and think in himſelf, that ſomewhat or other was not fallen out according to his opinion. To be the better informed in the matter, he cauſed ſome Inhabitants of that Deſart to be taken, and brought before him; of whom he learned, that they had ſeen no other Army than his thereabout, but only a few men that kept fires on the Hill-tops. It vexed him exceedingly to find that he had been ſo deluded. Therefore he went againſt theſe Troops with great fury, meaning to take ſharp vengeance on them, for having ſo deceived him. But by this time, ſufficient ſtrength was arrived there, which could not be forced without much buſineſs, and long ſtay. All the Army was come, ſave only Eudamus, Captain of the Elephants, who, beſides thoſe beaſts, had no more than four hundred horſemen in his company. Antigonus hearing of this ſupply coming to his enemies, ſent above two thouſand Horſe, and all his light-armed foot-men, to cut it off by the way. Eudamus being fallen into this danger, was fain to place his Elephants round about his carriages, and ſo to defend himſelf as well as he could; for his horſemen, overlaid with multitudes, were quickly broken, and driven to run away upon the ſpur. Neither knew they, who ſate upon the Elephants, which way to turn them, for on all ſides they received wounds, and were not able to requite them with the like. In this extremity there appeared brave Troops of horſe and foot, that came unexpected to the reſcue; and charging the Aſſailants upon the back, drave them to ſeek their own ſafety by ſpeedy flight. Theſe were ſent by Eumenes; who though he knew not what his Adverſary meant to do, yet he knew very well what was fitteſt for him to do: and therefore, playing both games himſelf, provided the remedy.

SECT. V.

The conſpiracy of Peuceſtes and others, againſt Eumenes his life.

BY theſe means Eumenes won great honour, and was by the whole Army acknowledged a moſt expert General, and well worthy of the chief command. But Peuceſtes, and the other Captains, guilty of their own much inſufficiency, were ſo tranſported with Envy, that they could no longer contain their vile thoughts, but held communication, as upon a neceſſary point, how they might find means to murther him.

Surely, it is great injuſtice to impute the miſchief contrived againſt worthy men, to their own proud carriage, or ſome other ill deſerving: For, though it often happen, that ſmall vices do ſerve to counterpoize great virtues; (the ſenſe of evil being more quick and laſting than of good) yet he ſhall bewray a very fooliſh malice, that, wanting other teſtimony, will think it a part of wiſdom to find good reaſon of the evils done to virtuous men, which oftentimes have no other cauſe than virtue it ſelf. Eumenes, among many excellent qualities, was noted to be of ſingular courteſie, of a very ſweet converſation among his friends, and careful by all gentle means to win their love, that ſeemed to bear him any ſecret ill affection. It was his meer virtue that overthrew him, which even they that ſought his life acknowledged. For they concluded that he ſhould not be ſlain, before the battel were fought with Antigonus, wherein they confeſſed that it ſtood beſt with their ſafety, to be governed by his direction. Of this Treaſon he was quickly advertiſed by Eudamus, to whom he had done many pleaſures, and by ſome others of whom he uſed to borrow money when he needed not, to the end that they ſhould be careful of his good, for fear of loſing their own. Conſidering therefore, and diſcourſing with himſelf of the villany intended againſt him, he made his laſt Will, and burnt all his Writings that contained any matter of ſecret: which done, he revolved many things in his mind; being doubtful what courſe he had beſt to follow. All the Nobles of the Empire ſtood ill affected to the Royal blood, excepting thoſe which were with him, that were more in number than in worth. How things at that time ſtood in Macedon and Greece, either he knew not, or knowing the truth, knew nothing that might encourage him to ſeek their help, that needed his. To make his own peace with Antigonus, had been againſt his faith to Olympias, and the Princes, that had committed this great power into his hands. For which cauſe alſo it may be thought, that he forbare either to loſe the battel willingly, or to flee into Cappadocia, and make ſhift for himſelf among his old friends. At length he reſolved to do his beſt againſt the common enemy, and afterwards look to himſelf as well as he might.

SECT. VI.

The laſt battel between Antigonus and Eumenes.

THe Souldiers, eſpecially thoſe old bands of the Silver-ſhields, finding Eumenes perplexed, and not knowing the cauſe, entreated him not to doubt of the victory, but only to bring them into the field, and ſet them in array; for the reſt, they alone would take ſufficient order. The like alacrity was generally found in the common Souldiers faces; but the chief Commanders were ſo miſchievouſly bent againſt him, that they could not endure to think of being beholding to him for the Victory. Yet he ordered the battel ſo well, that without their own great fault, they could hardly fail of getting the upper hand.

Before the Armies came to joyning, a horſeman from the ſide of Eumenes, proclaimed with a loud voyce unto the followers of Antigonus, That their wickedneſs in fighting againſt their own Fathers, would now be puniſhed, as it well deſerved. This was not ſpoken in vain, For the Silver-ſhields were men of threeſcore or ſeventy years old, and ſtrengthened more by continual exerciſe, than decayed by age, and excelling in courage, as having paſſed through greater dangers, than any like to be preſented in that fight.

Therefore Antigonus his men (who had often been beaten by them, and were now to try their laſt hope with theſe reſolute warriors, the moſt ancient and beſt regarded of all Alexander's Soulders) grew very penſive, and advanced heavily, ſuſpecting their own cauſe, and fearing that the threatning uttered would prove true.

Antigonus was now again far the ſtronger in horſe, which gave him cauſe of great hope; the ground on which they were to fight, being a plain levelled field. Placing therefore himſelf, and his ſon Demetrius in the right wing, and committing the left wing to Python, he did ſet forward couragiouſly againſt the Enemies, that were ready to give him a ſharp enetrtainment.

Eumenes took unto him Peuceſtes, with the reſt of the Lords, and ſtood in the left wing of his battel, in the face of Antigonus; meaning both to prevent the Traytors, his Companions, of all means to make head againſt him on the ſudden; and (withal) to give proof of his own valour, which perhaps he ſhould no more do, in the face of all his Enemies. In the right wing, oppoſite unto Python, he beſtowed the weakeſt of his Horſe and Elephants, under one Philip, an honeſt man and (which was enough at ſuch a time) obedient: commanding him to protract the fight, and make a reaſonable retreat, expecting the event of the other ſide.

So they joyned very fiercely; Antigonus, labouring to make himſelf maſter of all; Eumenes, to die an honourable death, or to win ſuch a victory upon his open enemies, as might give him leiſure and opportunity to deal with his falſe friends.

The footmen of Antigonus, being, even in their own opinions, far inferiour to thoſe whom they muſt encounter, were at the firſt brunt preſently defeated by the Silver-ſhields, who ſlew above five thouſand of them, loſing of their own not one man. But in Horſe, Eumenes was ſo overmatched, that he could not repel Antigonus, who preſſed him very hard, but was fain to ſtand wholly upon defence. Yet his courage wrought ſo well by example, among his followers, that the Enemy could not win one foot of ground upon him, until ſuch time as Peuceſtes, with one thouſand five hundred Horſe, withdrew himſelf out of the battel, leaving his companions fighting to defend his back.

Then did Eumenes deſperately ruſh among his Enemies, labouring to break open the way unto Antigonus himſelf. And though he failed of his purpoſe; yet with great ſlaughter he did ſo beat upon them which came in his way, that the victory hung a long time in ſuſpence, uncertain which way to incline.

The ground whereon they fought, being of a ſlight ſandy mould, through the trampling of Horſes, Men and Elephants, did caſt up ſuch a cloud of duſt, as hindred the proſpect, ſo that no man could ſee what was done a little from him. Antigonus finding this advantage, diſpatched away ſome companies of Horſe, that paſſed undiſcovered beyond Eumenes his battels, and came to his carriages, which lay about half a mile from the place of fight, ſlenderly guarded (for that the whole body of the Army lay between them and danger) and therefore eaſily taken. Had Peuceſtes retired himſelf no farther than unto the carriages, he might not only have defended them, but peradventure have ſurprized thoſe which came to ſurprize them, and ſo have done as good a piece of ſervice as a better man. But he was gotten ſomewhat further, to a place, where out of danger he might expect the event; and Eumenes was ſo over-laboured both in body and mind, that he could not poſſibly give an eye to every place, being not well able to continue where he was.

It happened ſo, that the Elephants meeting together, thoſe of Antigonus had the better hand; whereupon Eumenes, finding himſelf every way overcharged, began to give back, and withdrew himſelf and his companies in good order, where Philip (as he was directed) had by fighting and retiring together, kept that wing from loſs. The Antigonians had felt ſo much of Eumenes that day, that they were all content to let him depart quietly, and wiſhed not to ſee him come again; as fain he would have done.

The loſs of the carriages was reported unto him, as ſoon as he had any leiſure to hear how things went: whereupon he preſently ordered his men for a freſh charge, and ſent for Peuceſtes that was not far off, requeſting him to bring in his men, and renew the fight, whereby he truſted not only to recover their own goods, but to enrich themſelves with the ſpoils of the enemies. Peuceſtes not only refuſed to joyn with him, but immediately withdrew himſelf into a ſafer place, where he might be further from ſuch dangerous temptations.

By this the night grew on; and both Armies, wearied with fighting, were deſirous to return into their Camps. Yet Antigonus conceived hope of doing ſomewhat more, and therefore taking half his horſemen, he waited upon Eumenes a part of his way homewards, but found no opportunity to offend him: the other half he committed to Python, willing him to ſet upon the Silver-ſhields in their retreat; which yet he forbare to do, becauſe it appeared too full of danger. So the battel ended; wherein wherein Antigonus had not ſo much the better in horſe, as the worſe in foot: but the ſpoil which he got, by ſurprizing his enemies carriages, made amends for all his other loſſes.

SECT. VII.

How Eumenes was betrayed to Antigonus and ſlain.

Eumenes, coming into his Camp, and finding the Silver-ſhields extremely diſcontented with their misfortune, began to cheer them up, and put them in hope of recovering all with advantage. For their brave demeanour that day had ſo cruſhed the enemy, that he had no power left, wherewith to abide them in open field, and was much leſs able to draw their Carts after him, through that great Wilderneſs, over the high Mountains.

But theſe perſwaſions availed nothing. Peuceſtes was gone; the other Captains would needs return into the high Countries; and the Souldiers had no deſire either to flee or to fight, but only to recover their goods. Wherefore Teutamus, one of the two Captains of the Silver ſhields (who had in former times readily conſented unto trayterous motions, in hope of gain, but was letted by his partner Antigenes) finding, as he thought a fit occaſion of making himſelf great, and winning the love of thoſe bands, dealt ſecretly with Antigonus, requeſting him to reſtore unto thoſe old Souldiers their goods, which he had taken, being the only reward of their ſervices, in the Wars of Philip and Alexander.

Antigonus, as a ſubtile man, knew very well, that they which requeſted more than they had reaſon to expect, would alſo with little entreaty, perform a great deal more than they promiſed; and therefore he lovingly entertained the meſſengers, filling them with hopes of far greater matters than they deſired, if they would put Eumenes into his hands, by whom they were ſeduced to make War againſt him. This anſwer pleaſed them ſo well, that they forthwith deviſed how to deliver him alive. Wherefore coming about him, as at other times to do their duty, and pretending more joy of their victory, than ſorrow of their loſs, which they ſaid they would redeem by another fight; in the midſt of this goodly talk, they leapt upon him, caught hold of his ſword, and bound him faſt. So they haled him away; and, ſtopping their ears againſt all perſwaſions, would not yield ſo far as to looſen one of his hands, and let him kill himſelf, but brought him alive (that was their own General, under whom they had obtained many victories) as it had been in triumph, into the Camp of their enemies.

The preſs of men, running out of the Camp to ſee him, was ſo great, that Antigonus was fain to ſend a guard of Horſemen and Elephants, to keep him from being ſmothered; whom he could not ſuddenly reſolve eitheir to kill or ſave. Very few there were that ſued for his life, but of theſe, Demetrius the ſon of Antigonus was one, the reſt were deſirous to be rid of him quickly; thinking belike, that if he were ſaved, he would ſoon be the chief in reputation, for his great ability. So, after long deliberation, Antigonus concluded that it was the ſafeſt way to put him to death; which intending to have done by famine (perhaps becauſe he would keep it a while in his own power, to reverſe the ſentence, as deſiring, if it might be, to have him live his friend) haſt of other buſineſs made him do it by the ſword.

To this end came all the travel of that worthy General Eumenes; who had with great wiſdom, fidelity and patience, laboured in vain to uphold the family which God had purpoſed to caſt down. He is reckoned among the notable examples of Fortunes mutability, but more notable was his Government of himſelf, in all his changes. Adverſity never leſſened his courage, nor proſperity his circumſpection. But all his virtue, induſtry and wit, were caſt away; in leading an Army, without full power, to keep it in due obedience. Therefore it was not ill anſwered by Gaſper de Coligny, Admiral of France in our days, to one that foretold his death, which enſued ſoon after in the maſacre of Paris: That rather than to lead again an Army of Voluntaries, he would dye a thouſand times.

Antigonus himſelf gave to the body of Eumenes Honourable Funerals; and rewarded the Treaſon, wrought againſt him, with deſerved vengeance. One chief Captain of the Silver-ſhields he burnt alive; many of the other Captains he ſlew; and to the whole multitude of the Silver-ſhields, that had betrayed ſo worthy a Commander, he appointed a Leader that ſhould carry them into far Countries, under pretence of Wars; but with a privy charge, to conſume them all, as perjured wretches, letting none of them return alive unto his friends and kindred, or ſo much as once behold the Seas that beat upon the ſhores of Greece and Macedon.

SECT. VIII.

How Antigonus ſlew Python, and occupied Media. How he removed Governours of Provinces, and made himſelf Lord of Perſia, carrying away Peuceſtes.

The two Armies being joyned thus in one, were carried into Media, where they ſpent the reſt of the Winter: the common Souldiers idly; the principal men intentively bent unto the buſineſs enſuing. Python began to conſider his own deſervings; for the whole War had been chiefly maintained by the ſtrength, and riches of his Province. Beſides, he thought himſelf as good a man as Antigonus, unleſs it were in the Souldiers opinion, which he judged eaſie to be purchaſed with gifts, and therefore ſpared not to aſſay them with great liberality. But in following this courſe he was driven by neceſſity to truſt many, of whom he ſtumbled upon ſome, that were unſecret, and others, bearning him no ſincere affection. Thus was his purpoſe diſcovered to Antigonus, who (nothing like to Python) diſſembled his indignation, and rebuked the informers, as breeders of diſſention between him, and his honourable friend, unto whom he meant to commit the Government of all thoſe Countries: his own buſineſs calling him into the lower Aſia. Theſe reports coming daily to his ears, did finely delude Python. By his greatneſs with Alexander; his Authoriry in that Province where they lay, whereof he was Governour; and the love of the Souldiers which he had bought with money; he was ſtrong enough to maintain, even an offenſive War. But what need had he to uſe the ſword, when he was likely without contention, to obtain more than his own asking? Therefore he came as ſoon as he was ſent for, to take his farewel of Antigonus, and to divide the Provinces with him, that meant nothing leſs than to yield to any ſuch diviſion. As ſoon as he came, he was taken, and accuſed, condemned to dye, and ſlain out of hand. For Antigonus, having begun with Eumenes his ancient friend, was not afterward reſtrained by any conſideration of old acquaintance, from cutting down indifferently all that ſtood in his way: but ſwam carelеſly thorow the blood, wherein at the firſt he doubtfully waded.

When this buſineſs was ended, he appointed a new Governor in Media, to order the Province, and a Captain, to ſuppreſs all commotions: thinking belike that the power and authority, ſo divided, would hardly agree in one againſt him, from whom both were derived.

After this he marched into Perſia, where he was entertained as abſolute Lord of Aſia. There began he to ſhew how well he underſtood his own mightineſs. For he placed and diſplaced, at his own pleaſure, Governours in all Provinces, leaveing none in Office, that were not his own creatures, except ſuch as lay too far off to be diſlodged eaſily.

Peuceſtes, who ruled in Perſia, thought with good cheer to redeem old offences; but was deceived, having to do with one that could not be taken with ſuch baits: he was carried away, and feaſted with goodly words of promiſe, that never after took effect. Thus he, that envied the virtue of his friend, was driven to flatter (in vain) the fortune of his enemy, after which he led a moſt contemptible life, till he died obſcurely a man forgotten.

SECT. IX.

How Seleucus was chaſed out of Babylon by Antigonus. The great riches of Antigonus.

Seleucus was the next in this Viſitation; one that had from time to time continued in the ſame tenour of good will to Antigonus, & now gave proof of his hearty affection toward him, by making the Captain of the Caſtle of Suſa to meet him on the way, rendering unto him that ſtrong Place, and all the Treaſures therein beſtowed. This offer was ſo great, that Antigonus (though having in his hands the Keeper of the place) could hardly believe it; but uſed him with exceſſive kindneſs, for fear ſo good a mood ſhould change. In that Caſtle he found all the Treaſures of Alexander, with the Jewels of the Perſian Kings, which, added to his former ſtore of money, made up five and twenty thouſand Talents. Having all this, he might well account himſelf a happy man, if riches were ſufficient to happineſs. But large Dominion was the mark at which he aimed; therefore he proceeded, with intent to leave no Country behind his back, that ſhould not acknowledge him for Soveraign Lord. Coming to Babylon, he was entertained by Seleucus, with all poſſible demonſtration of love, and honoured with preſents beſeeming the Majeſty of a King. All this he accepted with great gravity, as being due to him; and began to require an account of the revenues of that Province. This demand Seleucus held unreaſonable; ſaying, That it was not needful for him to render unto any man an account of that Province, which was given unto him, in reſpect of his many good ſervices to the State. But whether he ſpake reaſon or no, it ſufficeth, that Antigonus was powerful; who urged him daily to come to a reckoning. Manifeſt it was, that neither want of money, nor any other neceſſity, moved Antigonus to preſs him thus, but only the deſire to pick matter of quarrel againſt him, whereof it was likely that he ſhould find ſuch iſſue, as Python and Peuceſtes had done. Therefore taking with him only fifty horſe, he conveyed himſelf away, and fled into Ptolomie's Dominions; deſiring him to protect him from ſuch a man as went about to oppreſs all, that in former times had been his betters, or at leaſt his equals. Antigonus was glad of his flight; for now all thoſe Countries were yielded unto him without battel, whereas to fight with Seleucus for them, he wanted all pretence; and to kill him it was not his deſire, having received many benefits of him, and thoſe not intermixed, as commonly it happens, with any injuries. Yet it is reported, that the Chaldeans brought a ſtrange Prophecy to Antigonus, bidding him look well to himſelf; and know, that if Seleucus did eſcape his hands, he ſhould recover Babylon, yea, win all Aſia, and kill Antigonus in battel. Eaſie believers may give credit to this tale. Had it been true, methinks Antigonus rather ſhould have hanged thoſe Chaldeans, for giving him no warning till it was too late, than ſent purſuers (as they ſay that he did) after him, whom the Deſtinies preſerved for ſo great purpoſes. When he had ſettled things at Babylon, he took his journey into Cilicia, where he wintered. There he took up ten thouſand Talents more of the King's treaſures, and caſting up his accounts, found his yearly in-come to amount unto eleven thouſand Talents.

CHAP.

CHAP. V.

Of the great War between Alexander's Captains: and how they assumed the Name and State of Kings.

SECT. I.

The Combination of Ptolomy, Cassander, and others against Antigonus. Their Demands, and his Answer.

THis great riches, and the rest of his Power, made Antigonus dreaded, envied and suspected, whereby he was quickly embarked in a new War. Ptolomy, Cassander and Lysimachus, had privily combined themselves together, intending to hinder his further growth, and bring him to more reason than of his own accord he seemed like to yield unto. Of their practices he had some notice; the good entertainment given unto Seleucus, giving him sufficient cause of mistrust. Therefore he sent Ambassadours to them severally, entreating them to continue firm in their love toward him, that would be ready to requite them with the like. The cold answers which they made, occasioned his hasty preparations against the most forward of them, which was Ptolomy, it being likely that a good Army should prevail more than a fair message. Therefore, as soon as the season of the year would permit, he took the way toward Syria, and was encountred by Embassage from them all. These told him, that their Lords did much rejoyce at his victory obtained against Eumenes their common enemy, and the honour that he had thereby gotten. In which War, forasmuch as they being his Confederates, must have endured great loss, with hazard of their whole Estates, if the contrary faction had prevailed; they held it very just, that all should be partakers in the fruits of that voyage, wherein they had been all adventurers. Wherefore they desired him, that making between them all an equal division of the treasures that were in his hands (a thing easie to be done) he would also take some convenient order for enlarging their Dominions, according to the rate of his new purchases. This might best be to every ones liking, if he would make over Cappadocia, with Lycia, to Cassander; and Phrygia, bordering upon the Hellespont; to Lysimachus: for whereas his own Dominions were so much extended Eastward by his late victory, he might well spare some of those Western Provinces, to those that were seated in the West. As for Ptolomy, he would not crave any new addition, but rest contented within his own Territories. Provided always, that Seleucus their common friend, and partner in the late War, might be restored to his own, out of which he had been driven so injuriously, that all of them were forced to take it deeply to heart; requiring amends, with his friendly consent unto their demands, which otherwise they must labour to obtain with armed hands.

Antigonus knew, that after many losses received, he should yet be able to redeem Peace whensoever he listed, with these, or perhaps with easier conditions. Neither was he so weak, to give away quietly any part of his strength into the hands of such bad friends, for fear only, lest it should be taken from him perforce. Rather he hoped that he should be able to find them work, more than enough to defend their own. Therefore he roundly answered the Ambassadours, that it was no part of his meaning to communicate with other men the profit of that victory, which he alone without other mens help had obtained. Though indeed they had already sufficiently gained by him, if they could see it, having by his means kept their Government, whereof they were like to be dispossessed by Polysperchon, and the council of Estate in Macedon. But what marvel was it, if they considered not how he had saved them, seeing one them had forgotten the time, when coming to him as a fugitive, and begging succour, he was by his meer bounty relieved, and enabled to get all that he now held? Cassander did not (said he) in those days command me to surrender Provinces, and give him his equal share of my Treasures; but (for his Father's sake) desired me to pity him, and help him against his enemies: which I did; by lending him an Army, and Fleet, on confidence whereof he now presumes to threaten me. As for Seleucus, How can he complain of wrong, that durst not stay to plead his right? I did use him well, but his conscience told him that he had deserved ill; else he would not have fled. Let them that so curiously search into my doings, consider well their own, which some of them can hardly justifie. I am now in the way to Syria, meaning to examine Ptolomie's proceedings, and after him to deal with others, if they continue to provoke me.

SECT. II.

The preparation and beginnings of the War.

WHen the Ambassadours were dismissed with this answer, nothing was thought upon but War. Antigonus perceiving that he should be invaded from Europe, as soon as he was entred into Syria, left his Nephew Ptolomy to guard the Sea-coſts, and hinder Caſſander from landing in Aſia: giving him alſo charge, to drive out of Cappadocia, ſome that were already ſent over to moleſt him. Likewiſe he diſpatched Meſſengers into Greece and Cyprus, not unfurniſhed of money; to draw friends to his ſide, and raiſe up troubles to his enemies. Eſpecially, he laboured to make himſelf the ſtrongeſt by Sea; to which purpoſe he rather haſtened, than foreſlowed his journey into Syria, that he might get poſſeſſion of Mount Libanus, which afforded many excellent commodities for building of a Navy. Therefore, having erected Beacons, and laid poſt-horſes throughout all Aſia, to give ſwift advertiſement of all occurrences, he invaded Syria, that was not held againſt him by any power ſufficient to maintain the field.

Ptolomy lay in Egypt, the ſtrength and heart of his Dominion, where he was beloved and honoured of the people as their natural Lord: his other Provinces be kept with a few Garriſons, better ſerving to contain the people within obedience, than to confront a Forreign enemy. So Antigonus took many Cities and Places of that Country, and began to ſet great numbers of Artificers on work in making ſhips, which was one of his moſt earneſt cares. In theſe buſineſſes he conſumed a year and three months; not idly. For he took Joppa and Gaza, which were yielded unto his diſcretion, and well uſed. The ſtrong City of Tyrus held out long, but was compelled in the end by famine, to render it ſelf upon compoſition, that Ptolomie's Souldiers might depart with their Arms; which was permitted.

Ptolomy was not aſleep, whilſt theſe things were in doing, though he kept himſelf within the bounds of Egypt, as indeed it behoved him to do. His forces were not able to ſtand againſt Antigonus in plain field, but likely they were to encreaſe, which made him willing to protract the time. Nevertheleſs by Sea (where his enemy was as yet unready) he ſent his Fleet into all quarters, whereof Seleucus had the chief command.

Seleucus paſſed with an hundred ſail along the coaſt of Syria, in full view of Antigonus and his Army, to their no little diſcomfort. He landed in Cyprus, which was then governed by many petty Lords: of whom the greateſt adhered to Ptolomy, the reſt were by the Factors of Antigonus, bought for him with gold, but now redeemed by the Egyptians with ſharp ſteel.

The ſame commodity of aid by Sea, encouraged the Preſident of Caria (called alſo Caſſander, but not the Son of Antipater, howſoever by the painful and learned Writer Reinerus Reineccius, he is, by ſome overſight, counted for the ſame) to declare for Ptolomy and his Confederates, and buſily imploy in their quatrel all his forces, which he had hitherto kept in good neutrality, and thereby enjoyed reſt; but now he threw himſelf into dangerous War, chuſing rather to undergo trouble at hand, than to fall under certain ruine, though ſomewhat further diſtant, which would have overwhelmed him, if Antigonus had beaten all the reſt.

SECT. III.

How each party ſought to win the aſſiſtance of Greece. Antigonus his declaration againſt Caſſander. Alexander the Son of Polyſperchon revolted from Antigonus who had ſet him up.

IN the mean ſeaſon all care poſſible was taken on both ſides, to aſſure unto them the people of Greece, whoſe aid, which way ſoever inclined, was of great importance. Herein at the firſt, Antigonus ſped ſo well by large effuſion of his treaſure, that he drew to him the Lacedemonians, and other Peloponneſians, of whom he waged eight thouſand; and cauſed Polyſperchon (who had a good while made hard ſhifts) to rowſe himſelf again, and taking upon him the title of Captain of Peloponneſus, to make head againſt Caſſander.

Theſe hopeful beginnings encouraged him to proceed further in the ſame kind. Wherefore to make Caſſander the more odious, he called together both his own Souldiers, and all the Greeks and Macedonians that were to be found thereabouts. To theſe he declared, that Caſſander had very cruelly ſlain Olympias, Mother to the great Alexander; and not herewith contented, had ſhut up in cloſe priſon the poor Lady Roxane, Alexander's Wife, and his Son begotten on her body. That all this proceeded from a deſire to make himſelf King over the Macedonians; which well appeared by his enforcing the Lady Theſſalonica, Daughter to King Philip, a match unfit for a man of no greater parentage than he, to joyn with him in marriage. That in meer diſpite of thoſe dead Princes, Philip and Alexander, he had planted the Olynthians, rooted out by Philip, in a new City by him built, and called by his own name Caſſandria; and had re-edified the City of Thebes, which for the great treaſon of the Inhabitants, was levelled with the ground by the victorious hand of Alexander. For theſe reaſons he required them to make a Decree, that Caſſander ſhould reſtore to abſolute liberty the Lady Roxane, and her Son; and ſhould yield obedience to the Lord Lieutenant General of the Empire (by which name Antigonus himſelf was underſtood) or elſe ſhould be reputed a Traytor, and open Enemy to the State. Furthermore he propounded, that all the Cities of Greece ſhould be reſtored into freedom: this he did, not becauſe he was careful of their good, but for the need which he had of their aſſiſtance.

Theſe things being decreed, Antigonus was perſwaded, that not only the Greeks would adhere unto him, as to their loving Patron, and fall off from Caſſander, but that the rulers of Provinces, who had hitherto ſuſpected him as a man regardful of nothing but his own benefit, would correct their opinion, and think him the moſt faithful of all others to the Royal Blood. But concerning his loyalty to the young Prince, the world was too wiſe to be deceived with vain ſhews. His undertaking for the liberty of the Greeks was more effectual, and got eaſie belief, in regard of his preſent hatred to Caſſander. Yet herein alſo Ptolomy ſtrove to be as earneſt as he, making the like decree, in hope to win to himſelf that valiant Nation, which afforded afforded men far more servicable in War, than were to be found in any Province of the Empire.

And this indeed was the point at which both sides aimed. Wherein Antigonus thinking to make all sure, deceived himself, not without great cost. For he gave to Alexander the Son of Polysperchon five hundred Talents, willing him to set the War on foot in Peloponnesus, whereby it might appear that on his side was meant nothing else, than what was openly pretended.

In Peloponnesus, Cassander's men had with much blood-shed, grievously afflicted the contrary faction, and he himself perceiving, that they were more easily spoiled as enemies, than retained as friends, thought it the best way to make what use he could of them, that were not like to continue long his. Finally, perceiving that Alexander came furnished with plenty of gold, wherewith he was able not only to win the doubtful, but to corrupt such as might seem best assured; he thought it a part of wisdom, to surrender upon fair conditions, that which he could not assure himself to hold any long time by force. Therefore he sent one to deal with Alexander about the matters in controversie; telling him, that Antigonus was very skilful in setting men together by the ears, not caring who prevailed, but only desiring to have them weary themselves, whilst he was busied elsewhere; that so at length he might find opportunity to set upon the stronger. If therefore Alexander were so wise, as to keep in his purse the five hundred Talents which he had, and without stroke stticken, to receive the whole Lordship of Peloponnesus, it should be freely put into his hands by Cassander; provided, that he should from thenceforth renounce all confederacy made with Antigonus, and enter into a sure and faithful league with Ptolomy, Cassander, and the rest of the Confederates. Otherwise he might well perswade himself, that the Country which his Father could not keep, when he was indeed the Lieutenant of the Empire, should not in hast be won by him, that was only the Factor of a proud injurious man, so stiling himself, but not acknowledged by others.
